43030

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIB.

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43030

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXXXI

JULY 2, 1930, TO DECEMBER 31, 1930

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXI

JULY 2, 1930, TO DECEMBER 31, 1930

(Nos. 3391-3417)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
Dt	Driftway
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
I	International Relations, Documents
IP	International Relations, Foreign Press
IS	International Relations, Signed Article
M	Music
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

Abbott, Grace
Appointment as secretary of labor urged; EP 540
Abbott, Leonard D.
Mother Jones and socialism; C..... 707
Abraham Lincoln. A. Bakshy; D..... 305
Abyssinia
Coronation ceremonies reported; EP.... 513
Slavery; EP..... 337
Academic freedom
List of accredited colleges and universities proposed; E..... 488
Accidents, automobile. See Automobiles
Adams, Franklin P.
Broun, H.; S..... 341
Adversity, uses of; E..... 235
Advertising, ways; Dt..... 706
Æ. See Russell, G. W.
Aeronautics
Hawks, F. M., speed records; EP..... 433
Publicity; E..... 262
R-101, disaster; EP.....389; letter.... 552
Record, woman's, by R. Nichols; EP.. 693
Safety; E..... 262
Safety; R-101 disaster. F. D. Walton; S 438
Africa, south and east
Negroes, progress or slavery; IP..... 590
Agricultural relief
Farm board attacks Central City, Nebraska, Republican, for criticizing it; EP 540
Farm board folly; E..... 84
Farm board's stabilization corporation wheat plan defended by Senator Capper; EP..... 596
Wheat stabilization; EP..... 109
Airships. See Aeronautics
Alabama. See Negroes Aliens
Rights to citizenship; E..... 57
See also Immigration
All quiet on the western front. See Remarque, Erich Maria
Allen, Devere
British labor falters; S..... 519
Allen, Henry Justine
Political difficulties. P. Y. Anderson; S. 176
Wins in Kansas Republican primary; EP 211
Allen, Henry Tureman
Death; EP..... 259
Allen, Henry Ware
Tariff reform, down with; C..... 298
Amateurs. See Tennis
American federation of labor
Collapse. L. Stanley; S..... 367
Unemployment insurance, compulsory, views on; EP..... 284
American legion
Long Beach, California, post fights communism. T. W. Patterson; C..... 180
St. Clairsville, Ohio, post wrecks store for non-closing on armistice day; EP. 569
Takes Boston. E. Gordon; S..... 469
American merchant marine; E..571; see also C 708
Americanisms; E..... 572
Americans. See United States
America's cup races; E..... 313
Amtorg company
Bogdanov insulted by Americans; EP.. 166
Anaconda copper mining company
And Montana press. O. G. Villard; S. 39
Andersen, Hans Christian
Stories defended. D. F. Benardete; C..68
Anderson, Paul Y.
Allen, Henry J.; S..... 177
Congressional wonderland; S..... 669
Davis, James John, campaign expenditures; S..... 669
Democratic candidates in 1932; S..... 727
Fish committee activities; S..... 176
Hoover, "new"; S..... 176
Hoover signs tariff bill; S..... 13
Huston, Claudius H.; S..... 119
Huston, Claudius H., ousted; S..... 177
Investigations, congressional, scheduled; S 669
La Follette, Robert Marion, jr.; S.... 727
Mellon, A. W., and tax refunds; S.... 727
Mishandling facts; C..... 706
Morrow, D. W., supported by Hoover; S 13
Muscle Shoals; S..... 13
Muscle Shoals; president opposes government operation; S..... 176
National commission on law observance and enforcement; senate limits activity to investigation of prohibition; S.... 66
Norris, George W., trick attempted with another G. W. Norris; S..... 119
Post-office lease graft; S..... 66
"Power administration"; S..... 176
Power commission, finding members; S.. 119
Power trust wins again; S..... 66
Progressives in congress, program and leader; S..... 669
Prohibition enforcement becomes "conservative"; S..... 66
Republican party chairmanship; S..... 176
Senate lobby committee; S..... 14
Unemployment, administration program lacking; S..... 727
Veterans' pension bill veto sustained by house of representatives; S..... 66
Wheat problem; S..... 119
Wilbur, Ray Lyman, and water power; S 669
Anderson, Sherwood
Look out, brown man!; S..... 579
Andrée, Salomon-Auguste
Finding of body, with those of associates; EP..... 233
Animal crackers. A. Bakshy; D..... 356 Animals
Prices decline; EP..... 259
Anonymity, cult of. H. Hazlitt; S..... 350
Anthracite. See Coal miners, American
Antioch college
Faculty trust. J. F. Kirkpatrick; S.... 441
Apartments
Cooperative. R. Ward; S..... 269
Appalachian power company. See Power and power industry
Appleman, Morris
Nation club of Chicago; C..... 378
Arabs
Ferment in the Arabic world. F. Valyi; IS 77
Architecture
Chrysler's pretty bauble. D. Haskell; S 450
Monumental masses. D. Haskell; S.... 561
Stripes of the News. D. Haskell; S.... 713
Argentina
Revolution; EP..... 283
Armament limitation
Germany restless over failure of victorious nations to disarm; EP..... 512
See also Naval reduction (London conference and treaty)
Armaments
World, in 1929; EP..... 28
Armistice day
Hoover speech; EP..... 567
Non-closing of store, St. Clairsville, Ohio, causes wrecking by American legion; EP 569
Art, Negro. See Negroes
Asia
Central; women attain freedom. L. Fischer; S..... 11
Associated press
Labor news, mishandling. U. Sinclair; C 17
Athletics, college
Butler, N. M., views; EP..... 721
Auburn prison
Conditions, shocking; EP..... 167
Auer, Leopold; death; EP..... 111
Au Sable valley. See Delaware and Hudson railroad Australia
Bankruptcy near; EP..... 258
Austria
Health insurance. A. H. Bornfell; C.. 43
Parliamentary elections; EP..... 541
Political situation; EP..... 391
Schober, J., downfall as chancellor; EP 362
Seipel intrigues. G. E. R. Gedye; IS. 25
Authors
Poor; E....394; letter..... 498
Automobiles
Accidents; homicide on wheels. C. Dreher; S..... 221
Old; Dt..... 297
Speed; E..... 287
Aviation. See Aeronautics

B

Babson, Roger W.
Views on trade depression and unemployment. J. Brooks; C..... 153
Bach, transcribing. A. Mendel; M..... 684
Backwoods behavior. C. M. Wilson; S.... 523
Bail, skipping. L. S. Gannett; S..437; letter, with editorial comment..... 497
Bakshy, Alexander
Abraham Lincoln; D..... 305
Animal crackers; D..... 356
Big house, the; D..... 160
Big trail, the; D..... 534
Billy the kid; D..... 534
Dawn patrol; D..... 209
Dimensions, new in the talkies; S..... 702
Fast and loose; D..... 713
Girl of the golden west; D..... 534
Grumpy; D..... 209
Hell's angels; D..... 254
Holiday; D..... 160
Igdenbu; D..... 713
Just imagine; D..... 657
Kismet; D..... 590
Laughter; D..... 713
Manslaughter; D..... 209
Moby Dick; D..... 254
Monte Carlo; D..... 356
Morocco; D..... 657
Murder; D..... 534
Old English; D..... 305
Outward bound; D..... 424
Raffles; D..... 160
Razlom; D..... 713
Slums of Tokio; D..... 104
Soil; D..... 480
Storm over Asia; D..... 356
Swing, you sinner; D..... 480
Travel pictures; D..... 657
What a widow; D..... 480
White hell of Pitz Palu, the; D..... 424
Whoopee; D..... 480
Wild men of Kalihari, the; D..... 657
With Byrd at the south pole; D..... 49
Young Woodley; D..... 424
Zwei herzen im ¾ takt; D..... 534
Baldwin, Roger
Peace lovers and the London naval treaty; C.....96; E..... 85
Balloons. See Aeronautics
Bank of United States
Closing; EP..... 691
Banks
Failures. J. G. Curtis; S..... 675
Banks, savings
Mutual, hamstringing. J. G. Curtis; S. 346
Barbers, Negro, in the south, threatened. V. Dabney; S..... 64
Barnes, Julius Howland
On return of prosperity; EP..... 191
Barnett, A. G.
Papa Droissart; S..... 123
Barry, Griffin
Prosecuted by British secret police. A. E. E. R.; S..... 321
Bathing, nude, in Russia. S. Hibben; C.... 127
Batiste, Louis
Comics and the North American newspaper alliance; C..... 17
Beals, Carleton
Mexico and the Harris bill; IS..... 51
Beazell, William Preston
World, New York; C..... 126
Beebe, Lucius
Opinion of The Nation; C..376; see also 323
Begley, Robert V.
Packers' plea; S..... 219
Bell, Hallen M.
Michigan unemployment insurance law, proposed; C..... 324
Bellew, Henry T.
Morrow, D. W., victory; C..... 43
Bemis, Edward W.; death. M. L. Cooke; C. 444
Benardete, Doris Fox
Books for children; C..... 68
Benchley, Robert
Brown buddies; D..... 451
Marigold; D..... 451
Stepdaughters of war; D..... 451

Berg, Carl
Farmer, approves of new tariff; C..98; letter 180
Bernheim, Alfred L.
Are wages coming down?; S..... 489
Bethlehem steel corporation
Grace, E. G., salary as head; EP..... 111
Merger with Youngstown sheet and tube; stars of Bethlehem; E..... 141
Better speech. H. Broun; S..... 33
Big Ben, time by; Dt..... 16
Big house, the. A. Bakshy; D..... 160
Big trail, the. A. Bakshy; D..... 534
Bilbo, Theodore G. See Mississippi
Billings, Warren K. See Mooney and Billings
Billy the kid. A. Bakshy; D..... 534
Birkenhead, Earl of
Death; EP..... 391
Birth control
Lambeth conference, indorsement by; EP 233
Black, Elizabeth
Manton, Judge, decision on citizenship; C 204
Black, Forrest Revere
Profits of war; S..... 222
Black, Van Lear
Disappearance from yacht; EP..... 233
Blackbirds. M. Connelly; D..... 506
Blackwell, Alice Stone
British rule in India; C..... 323
Blanshard, Paul
Lingle, "Jake," murder; S..... 9
Bliss, Tasker H.; death; EP..... 541
Blum, Emanuel
Fish out of congress (investigation of communism); S..... 202
Bobbitt, Benjamin Boisseau
Simmons, Senator, loss of election; C.. 42
Bogdanov, Mr.
Insulted by Americans; EP..... 166
Bolton, J. R. Glorney
Anglo-Indian speaks; C..... 224
Books
Censorship. See Censorship, books
Children's. D. F. Benardete; C..... 68
Communist criticism. H. Hazlitt; S.... 583
See also Fiction
Borah, William Edgar
Replies to proposal of Democratic cooperation with Republicans in Congress; EP 567
Borchard, Edwin M.
Conference for codification of international law; S..... 94
Bornfell, A. H.
Health insurance in Austria; C..... 43
Boston Evening Transcript
Centennial celebrated; EP..... 139
Defended. K. Schriftgiesser; C....323; letter 376
Boswell, James
Manuscripts found; EP..... 569
Boyle, James E.
Wheat prices and wheat pools; S..... 491
Brandeis, Louis Dembitz
Tribute by Ohio supreme court justice. Pertinax; C..... 651
Brazil
Revolution; EP.....391; 483
Briand, Aristide
Attacks by right may lead to retirement from active politics; EP..... 484
See also Europe; United States of Europe
British empire
Imperial conference; EP..231; J. A. Hobson; S..342; J. A. Hobson; IS.. 660 Conference, imperial; tariff at; E..393; EP..431; free trade wins; EP..... 568
Imperial conference; trade discussed; E 461
British imperial conference. See British empire
Brooks, Jack
Babson, Roger W., on trade depression and unemployment; C..... 153
Broun, Heywood
Arrest as would-be picket; EP..... 363
Arrest for picketing. H. Broun; C.... 444
Better speech; S..... 33
Candidate for congress; S...171; E.... 236
Comic strips; S..... 87
Comrade Broun. F. P. Adams; S..... 341
Farewell to arms, a; D..... 386
Fine and dandy; D..... 422
Heat and work; S..... 116
Little show, the; D..... 331
Mr. Gilhooley; D..... 422
New York turns moral; S..... 143
Once in a lifetime; D..... 386
Overture; D..... 714
Rhapsody; D..... 355
Russia, pleasure in; S..... 59
Substitutes for him as dramatic critic during political campaign; EP..... 391
Sweet and low; D..... 632
Telephone; S..... 8
That's gratitude; D..... 355
Torch song; D..... 303
Vinegar tree, the; D..... 658
Brown buddies. R. Benchley; D..... 452
Brown, Dexter P.
Costigan, E. P., campaign for senator; C 349
Brown, John Mason
His majesty's car; D..... 533
On the spot; D..... 533
Puppet show; D..... 533
Roar China; D..... 533
Bryan, William Jennings
Views on public ownership; book review 74; C..... 246
Buell, Raymond Leslie
Cuba and the world court; C (with editorial comment)..611; see also E.... 435
Slavery and forced labor; S..... 699
Burgess, Jennie P.
Mott, L., letters requested; C..... 247
Business
Adversity, uses of; E..... 235
And government. O. G. Villard; S.237; letter 297
Barnes, J. H., sees return of prosperity; EP 191
Depression as viewed by R. W. Babson. J. Brooks; C..... 153
End of depression not in sight; EP.... 191
Recovery, signs of; EP..... 138
Spreckels, R., urges governmental control of industry as remedy; EP..... 362
Butler, Nicholas Murray
Athletics, college, views on; EP..... 721
Butte Daily Bulletin. M. Carney; C..... 153
Byington, Steven T.
Arms and arms; C..... 402
Opposes increase in letter postage; C.. 612
Pronunciation and correct English; C.. 153
Byrd antarctic expedition
Reception on return; EP..... 1

C

C., J.
Korea, rule by force; C..... 68
California
Communism. See Communism
League for independent political action, branch being organized. O. L. Triggs; C 43
Cameron, Alice M.
England, played out?; S....265; letter, 445
Cameron, W. H.
National safety council and Mr. Resnick; C..... 402
Campbell, Maurice
Tells of officials' interference with prohibition enforcement; EP..... 310
Canada
Armaments and peace. A. Morgan; IS.. 564
Elections; Conservative victory; EP.... 137
Elections; protection policy wins; E.... 169
Tariff; E..... 169
Canaries sometimes sing. M. Connelly; D.. 506
Cannon, James, jr.
Senate lobby committee surrenders to bishop. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 14
Cano, B. Sanin
Colombia, Liberals win election; C..42; letter 97
Cantaloupes and communists. C. Seiler; S.... 243; letter..... 376
Capital punishment
Nullification by grand and petty juries; E 723
Capitalism or cooperation. C. Long; C.... 445
see also 265
Capper, Arthur
Defense of Farm board's stabilization corporation; EP..... 596
Caribbean seminar. See Latin America
Carney, Mina
Butte Daily Bulletin; C..... 153
Carroll, Earl. See Censorship, plays
Cartels, European; EP..... 540
Catholicism. See Roman catholic church
Catholics. See Roman catholic church
"Caucasian crusade" begun; EP..... 193
Cazanova's homecoming. See Censorship, book
Censorship, book
Casanova's Homecoming seized; EP.213; letter, 297; held not obscene; EP.... 363
Lady Chatterley's lover; EP..... 637
Censorship, mail
How pure are the mails? P. Telco; S. 144
Censorship, moving pictures
British films are pure. W. A. Robson; S 547
Censorship, plays
Dramatists' guild, statement by; E.... 696
Vanities, Earl Carroll's, part of cast arrested; EP..... 83
Censorship, press
Communist publications prosecuted; EP. 110
Census, United States
Report, preliminary; E..... 196
Returns; EP..... 258
Central City, Nebraska, Republican
Attacked by federal farm board; EP.... 540
Centralia, Washington
Religious bodies say conspiracy to kill by Industrial workers of the world was not proved; EP..... 432
Chain stores
Versus independents. E. G. Ernst and E. M. Hartl. I. Price war; S..... 545
II. Chain stores and the community.... 545
III. Chain management and labor..... 574
IV. Fighting independents..... 606
Chaney, Lon
Death; EP..... 259
Chicago
Crime and the courts. L. Howe; S.... 315
Crime; murder of Lingle. P. Blanshard; S 9
Newspaper criminals. Veteran Journalist; S.....88; letter, 246
Chicago music festival
Mass production; EP..... 233
Chicago, university of Reorganization plans of President Hutchins; E..... 599
Chicago world's fair of 1933
Wright, F. L., not on list of architects. D. Haskell; S..... 605
Children. See White house conference on child health and protection
Children's books. D. F. Benardete; C.... 68
Children's bureau
Transfer discussed; EP..... 595
China
Bandits or communists?; EP..... 165
Civil war; nationalist government losing; EP..... 165
Communism. M. S. Stewart; S..... 217
Famine; not due to political disturbances; relief asked; EP..... 213
Christianson, V. C.
Republicans, an article for; C..... 154
Chrysler building. D. Haskell; S..... 450
Church and state
Hoover views offend Lutherans; EP.457; letter 552
Church and war; views of. H. E. Fosdick; EP 193
Church of England
Lambeth conference; E..... 261
Nation's editorial criticized. J. H. Lever; C..... 348
Churchill, Winston
India, "mad dog" views on; E.234; letter 377
Cities. See Municipal government; United States—Rural and urban population Citizenship
Alien's right to citizenship; E.55; letter 204
Manton, Judge, decision. E. Black; C.. 204
Clark, William. See Prohibition
Clement, Theodore G.
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
Coal miners, American
Anthracite agreement; EP..... 192
Lewis, J. L., fined for violating injunction in Illinois dispute; EP..... 139
Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
Bats; P..... 379
Colby, Kansas
Municipal ownership eliminates taxes; EP 193
College professors. See Professors
Colleges and universities
American universities indicted in Universities—American, English, German, by A. Flexner; E..... 599
And culture; E..... 339
Collegians, American, conservative. B. R. Katz; C..... 472
List of accredited institutions proposed; E 488
On the college frontier. I. Who ought to go to college? D. T. Howard; S.. 344
II. Rollins idea. H. Holt; S..... 372
III. Experimenting at Columbia. H. E. Hawkes; S..... 398
IV. Antioch faculty trust. J. F. Kirkpatrick; S..... 441
V. Wisconsin's experience. M. C. Otto; S 467
VI. New legal education. H. Oliphant; S 493
VII. Civilizing teacher training. T. L. Scholtz; S..... 521
Sarah Lawrence plan. C. Warren; S. 549
Teachers lacking; E..... 7
Colombia
Elections; liberals win. B. S. Cano; C.....42; letter..... 97
Election; liberals win despite church opposition. J. M. E.; C..... 97
Colorado shale-oil fields. See Petroleum
Columbia university
Experimenting at. H. E. Hawkes; S.. 398
Comic strips. H. Broun; S..... 87
Committee on cultural relations with Latin America
Caribbean seminar. H. C. Herring; C. 582
Committees, government by; E..... 6
Commodore (steamship)
Word from, after thirty-one years; EP. 285
Communists
And deportation. C. W. King; C.... 97
Bail skipping. L. S. Gannett; S....437; letter, with editorial comment..... 497
California, cantaloupes and communists. C. Seiler; S.....243; letter..... 376
California, Long Beach, American legion post fights communism. T. W. Patterson; C..... 180
California; red baiting in. C. J. Taft; C 18
China. M. S. Stewart; S..... 217
China; bandits or communists?; EP.... 165

Communist criticism. H. Hazlitt; S.... 583
Fish committee ends investigation for summer. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 176
Fish, H., investigation. E. Blum; S... 202
Gold, H., arrested after giving hitch-hiker a lift; released; EP..... 110
Nation, The, and communists. G. A. Flint and G. F. Illsley; C..... 17
New York, Gonzales funeral; EP..... 54
New York; Police Commissioner Mulrooney shows willingness to avoid trouble; EP..... 54
Newark, New Jersey, persecution; EP. 2
Publications prosecuted; EP..... 110
Rights, constitutional, ignored; EP..... 2
Root, Elihu, views on suppressive measures needed; EP..... 82
Van Etten camp; two women fined and imprisoned for "insulting" flag; EP. 211
Companionate marriage. See Marriage
Compensation insurance, workmen's. See Insurance, workmen's compensation Conference, imperial. See British empire Congress
Adjournment; EP..... 719
Agreement, working, between Republicans and Democrats; EP..... 636
Confusion. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 601
Democratic cooperation with Republicans pledged by seven leaders; EP.....539; Senator Borah replies; EP.....567; no truce; E..... 571
Democratic opposition wakes. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 727
Investigation scheduled. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 669
"Lame duck" nuisance; E..... 543
Message to, Hoover's; EP..... 635
Progressive program; EP..... 598
Progressives, program and leader. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 669
Reapportionment; EP..... 596
Wonderland. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 669
See also elections
Connecticut
Levitt, A., fights against political conditions; EP..... 2
Republican party, revolt in. A. B. MacMurphy; S..... 263
Connelly, Marc
Blackbirds; D..... 506
Canaries sometimes sing; D..... 506
Siegfried; D..... 506
This one man; D..... 506
Conversations, requested. W. B. Pitkin; C.. 98
Convicts. See Prisons and Prisoners
Cooke, Morris Llewellyn
Bemis, E. W., death; C..... 444
Cooksley, Bert
Shadows, the; P..... 181
Coolidge, Calvin
Cluckings of Calvin. H. Fordham; S.. 270
Columnist; E..... 58
Tariff, views on; EP..... 309
Cooperation or capitalism. C. Long; C..445; see also..... 265
Cooperative apartments. R. Ward; S..... 269
Copper
Production, stocks and prices; EP..... 567
Copyright
Design; Vestal bill; E..... 668
Corey, Lewis
Wage insurance; S....573; letter, with editorial comment..... 677
Cortambert, Louis
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
Cost and standard of living
American, defended by President Hoover; denounced by E. R. Black; E..... 461
Costigan, Edward P.
Campaign for senator. D. P. Brown; C 349
Costigan of Colorado. W. MacL. Raine; S..... 465
Cotton trade
Reorganizing; IP..... 307
Country. See United States—Rural and urban population
Courts, happenings in; E..... 695
Crandall, Allen
Writing biography of C. Darrow; asks material; C..... 180
Crime and criminals
Chicago. See Chicago
Crime is crime. R. W. White; C..246; see also..... 88
Problem; A. Lewisohn; C..... 526
Stocks, use of, advocated. J. G. Curtis; C..... 734
See also Capital punishment
Crime commission. See National commission on law observance and enforcement Crisp county, Georgia. See Power and power industry
Cuba
And the world court. R. L. Buell; C (with editorial comment).611; see also E 435
Election, result fixed in advance; EP... 513
Opposition to President Machado; EP.. 692
Political situation disquieting; EP..... 390
Culture, American, since the sixties. M. Josephson; S..... 615
Culture and colleges; E..... 339
Curtis, J. G.
Bank Failures; S..... 675
Investment trust; S..... 93
Savings banks, mutual; hamstringing; S..... 346
Stocks advocated for criminals; C..... 734
Curtiss, Glenn H.
Death; EP..... 139

D

Dabney, Virginius
Negro barbers in the south threatened; S..... 64
Dahlberg, D'Arcy
Hoover use of misleading phrase on socialism and bolshevism; C..... 498
Darrow, Clarence
Biography being written by A. Crandall; he asks material; C..... 180
Davis, James John
Campaign expenditures. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 669
Dawn patrol. A. Bakshy; D..... 209
Deer dance in Taos. M. H. Vorse; S..... 178
De Ford, Miriam Allen
Shall convicts write books?; S..... 495
Delaware and Hudson railroad
Loses fight to discontinue service to Au Sable valley, R. Kent, victor; EP.... 484
Del Bourgo, Maurice
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
Del Castillo, Hugh Grand opera in America; C..... 444
Democratic party
House of representatives, opposition in. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 727
Presidential campaign of 1932; candidates. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 727
See also Congress; Elections
Denmark
Disarmament urged; EP..... 336
Deportation
Communists and deportation. C. W. King; C..... 97
Serio, G., ordered deported to Italy, where death awaits him; EP..... 541
Depression, industrial. See Business, Economic conditions, world
Design copyright and piracy; E..... 668
Detroit
Mayor Bowles recalled; EP..... 138
Murphy, F. radical, elected mayor. R. Rothman; S..... 400
Deutsch, Babette
Free lecture; P..... 473
De Veldt, Ochunvay
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
Dictionary, oldest; Dt..... 223
Dinosaur eggs; Dt..... 471
Disarmament
Denmark, disarmament urged; EP..... 336
Hoover armistice day speech not a help; EP..... 567
League of nations shuns disarmament; E 260
Preparatory disarmament commission meets; EP....512; EP....540; E.... 695
Way to disarm; E..... 599
What hope for? W. T. Stone; S..... 725
See also Armament limitation Diseases
Bacteriophage, discovery reported; EP.. 513
Venereal, campaign against. R. H. Everett; C..... 552
Divorce
Schools for marriage. L. F. W.; C.... 245
Doak, William Nuckles
Appointment as secretary of labor; EP.. 636
Doctors. See Medical profession
Dogs
Judge; dog; Dt..... 179
Dominican republic. See Santo Domingo
Dorau, Herbert B.
Appointed head of public-utilities department, New York university; EP..... 484
Doukhobors in Canada. J. Montagnes; S.. 374
Downing, Agnes H.
Women and jobs; C..... 651
Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan
Death; E..... 86
Dramatists' guild
Statement on play censorship; E 696
Dreher, Carl
Homicide on wheels; S..... 221
Dresbach, Glenn Ward
Orchard; P..... 218
Drought
Appropriations for relief; EP..... 691
Loss overestimated; EP..... 257
National disaster. A. Robbins; C..... 376
Plea to Hoover to do something; E.... 195
Relief; farmers and workers pay. F. S. Kinder; C..... 734
Relief measures; EP..... 211
Durling, Dorothy
Criticizes article on degradation of American psychology by B. Stolberg; C..... 525; see also..... 395
Dutch Guiana
Papa Droissart. A. G. Barnett; S.... 123
Dwyer, W. J.
Bryan, W. J., on public ownership; C.....246; see also..... 74

E

E., J. M.
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
Election in Colombia; E. Olaya Herrera wins despite church opposition; C.... 97
East Africa
Negroes, progress or slavery; IP..... 590
Economic conditions, world
Depression, industrial; E..... 338
Economic depression. See Business Economics
Industrial system; "improvement or explosion." F. D. Smith; C..... 42
Want, elimination of. I. Rus; C..... 582
Edgerton, John E.
Working and praying in his factory; E.....32; letter..... 246
Edman, Irwin
Memoir; P..... 527
Education
Experimental College, University of Wisconsin, to continue; EP..... 55
Higher, evils in Japan; IP..... 537
"Selling" at American universities; views of A. Flexner; E..... 599
Students, wandering; E..... 57
University of Chicago, reorganization plans of R. M. Hutchins; E..... 599
See also Colleges and universities
Egypt
Anglo-Egyptian failure. D. W. Wainhouse; IS..... 332
Riots, political; EP..... 110
Egypt (steamship)
Treasure recovery operations; EP..... 285
Einstein, Albert
Visit to United States; EP.....597, 693
Elections
Candidates and issues; E..... 312
Congressional; Democratic gains foreseen; EP..... 458
Democratic sweep; EP..... 511
Hoover in; E.....392; letter, 526
Issues, and candidates recommended by The Nation; E..... 460
"Lame duck" nuisance; E..... 543
Primary; E..... 5
Primary, results; EP..... 257
Revolt against Hoover; E..... 542
Electricity
Rates; New York companies offer cut; EP..... 166
See also Power and power industry
Elizabeth the queen. M. Van Doren; D.... 562
Ellington, Karl J., house building method; Dt..... 322
Emelle, Alabama. See Negroes
Emigration. See Immigration
England
Cooperatives' gain in 1929. C. Long; C.....445; see also 265
Played out? A. M. Cameron; S...265; letter..... 445
Removal of landmarks; Dt..... 650
See also Great Britain
English channel tunnel
Rejected by British government; EP.... 4
English language
Americanisms; E..... 572
Pronunciation and correct English. S. T. Byington; C..... 153
Epstein, Abraham
Exposes life insurance evils; E.....287; letter..... 377
Ernst, Edward G., and Emil L. Hartl. See Chain stores
Erskine, John
Views on future of opera; EP.337; letter 444
Ethridge, Willie Snow
Southern women attack lynching; S.... 647
Europe
Economic blocs, new. F. Scheu; S.... 241
United States of Europe; Briand plan; EP.....53; E, 112; E, 286; E, 313
European war
American diplomatic correspondence with Great Britain, 1916, published; EP.. 458
Negro gold star mothers and widows, discrimination against; E..... 85
Peace treaties, Italian dissatisfaction with; EP..... 53
Responsibility; World Tomorrow questionnaire; EP..... 363
Unknown warrior; perfunctory wreath laying to be abandoned; EP..... 484
Evangelism. See Religion
Everett, Roy H.
Venereal diseases, campaign against; C.. 552
Ex-Employee
World, New York; C..... 126
Experimental college. See Wisconsin, University of Ex-Reader
Down with idealism!; C..... 677
Extravagance; E..... 461

F

Facts, mishandling. P. Y. Anderson; C.... 706
Fame and privacy; E.... 195
Family reunions; Dt.... 96
Famine. See China
Famous men's shortcomings; EP.... 721
Farewell to arms, a. H. Broun; D.... 386
Farm board and relief. See Agricultural relief
Farmers
  And the tariff. C. Berg; C..98; letter, 180
  Farmer, a, speaks. F. J. Steidl; C.... 733 Fascism
  Finland; IP.... 255
  Menace of; E.... 515
  United States, fascist sympathies in. E. C. Lindeman; S.... 267
  See also Italy
Fashions
  "Shorts" craze; EP.... 29
Fast and loose. A. Bakshy; D.... 713
Federal power commission
  Appointments; president wins; EP.... 719
  Bonner, F. E., appointed executive secretary on advice of Pacific gas and electric company's president; EP.... 458
  Jadwin, E., appointed chairman; power trust wins again. P. Y. Anderson; S 66
  McNinch, F. R., appointment; EP.... 663
  Members, difficulty in finding. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 119
Federal reserve bank
  Meyer, Eugene, appointed governor; EP 284
Ferguson, Otis C.
  Lindsey, B. B., and Bishop Manning; C.... 734
Fess, Simeon D.
  Suggested for chairman of Republican national committee; EP.... 137
Fiction
  Novels, greatest; E.... 15
  Verisimilitude in; E.... 463
Films. See Moving pictures
Fine and dandy. H. Broun; D.... 422
Finland
  Fascism; IP.... 255
  Fascism wins electoral victory; EP.... 433
Finney, Ruth
  Power fight goes on; S.... 697
Fischer, Louis
  Russian "dumping"; IS.... 688
  Russia's collectivized farms; S.... 369
  Servants of the soviets; S.... 577
  Stalin's victory, reasons for; S.... 174
  Women in central Asia; S.... 11
Fish committee. See Communism
Fitts, Dudley
  Cathemerinon; P.... 70
Fletcher, Henry Prather
  Appointment as chairman of tariff commission; EP.... 232
Flexner, Abraham
  Indicts American universities in book, Universities—American, English, German; E.... 599
Flint, George A.
  Nation, The, and the communists; C.... 17
Ford, Henry
  Examination; Mr. Ford just passes; E.. 169
  Optimistic on world condition; EP.... 459
Fordham, Herbert
  Cluckings of Calvin; S.... 270
Foreign loans. See Loans, foreign
Foreign relations, information on organizations sought. R. Savord; C.... 472 Foreign trade. See Trade, foreign Forest service; Dt.... 732
Fosdick, Harry Emerson
  On church and war; EP.... 195
France
  Finances; EP.... 336
  Parliamentary government, Tardieu's views; EP.... 138
  Prosperity fades. M. A. Hallgren; S.. 440
  Strikes. See Strikes—textile mills, France
  Tardieu, Premier, downfall; EP.... 664
  War with Italy, possibility; Germany's position; EP.... 81
Francke, Kuno
  Death; EP.... 29
Franklin, Fabian
  "Writing down"; C.... 472
Freight rates. See Railroad rates
Frisbie, Charles B.
  Oregon, exciting news from; C.... 707

G

Galicia
  Polish terror in. M. A. Hallgren; IS. 508
Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand. See India
Gannett, Lewis S.
  Skipping bail; S..437; letter, with editorial comment.... 497
Gardner, Gilson
  Taft and Roosevelt; C.....581; see also 501
Gastonia, North Carolina. See Strikes—textile mills, southern Gedye, G. E. R.
  Austria, Seipel intrigues in; IS.... 25
Gerard, James Watson
  Lists sixty-four "rulers" of the United States; E.... 235
Germany
  Bruening, Chancellor, performances; EP 138
  Crisis near. O. G. Villard; S.... 603
  Dictatorship foreshadowed; EP.... 110
  Election, result; EP.....309; EP..... 336
  Financial and tax reforms by presidential decree; EP.... 664
  Financial reform program; EP.... 431
  Militarism reappears; EP.... 692
  See also Germany—Soldiers old, soldiers new Newspapers, A. Hugenberg ownership. O. G. Villard; S.... 197
  Occupation ends; EP.... 27
  Parliamentary government gets reprieve; EP.... 459
  Political and economic situation; EP.... 664
  Political unrest; street fighting; EP.... 459
  Politics and government; crisis. R. Niebuhr; IS.... 358
  Politics; dictator or parliament; E.... 365
  Soldiers old, soldiers new. O. G. Villard; S.... 463
  Travel in; Dt.... 270
  Girl crazy. N. Levy; D.... 479
  Girl of the golden west. A. Bakshy; D. 534
Gold, Harry
  Arrested as communist after giving hitch-hiker a lift; released; EP..... 110
Gold
  Shortage; EP.... 362
  Supply and prices; EP.... 664
Gold star mothers and widows. See European war
Golf, miniature; E.... 215
Gonzales, Gonzalo
  Funeral of communist; EP.... 54
Gordon, Eugene
  Legion takes Boston; S.... 469
Gouverneur, New York
  Village sells surplus power; EP.... 284
Government and business. O. G. Villard; S.....237; letter, ... 297
Grace, Eugene G.
  Salary as head of Bethlehem steel corporation; EP.... 111
Graham, Frank
  Election as president of the university of North Carolina. E. W. Knight; S... 240
"Graham, Marcus." See Poetry
Granada; Spain; Dt.... 611
Grand hotel. D. V. D.; D.... 634
Grand opera. See Opera
Graves, Henry S.
  Public domain, the; S.... 147
Great Britain
  Cheka, the. A. E. E. R.; S.... 321
  Conservative party, split threatened; EP 28
  Egypt; Anglo-Egyptian failure. D. W. Wainhouse; IS.... 332
  Labor government escapes defeat; party situation confused; EP.... 81
  Labor party falters. D. Allen; S..... 519
  Mosley, Sir O., governmental proposals; E.... 667
  Police, secret. A. E. E. R.; S..... 321
  Protection not in sight; EP.... 431
  Tariff at imperial conference; E..... 393
  Tariff, food, discussed; EP.... 212
  Trade disputes act may cause downfall of government; EP.... 484
  Great men's shortcomings; EP.... 721
Green, William
  Unemployment insurance, compulsory, views on; EP.... 284
Green pastures, the (play)
  Banned in England; EP.... 29
Gregg, Richard B.
  Simon commission report on India; S.36; letter.... 224
Gregory, Horace
  Schoolmaster dies in Italy, a; P..... 248
Grumpy. A. Bakshy; D.... 209
Guatemala
  Revolution; EP.... 721

H

H., H.
  Marseilles; D.... 658
  Oh, promise me; D.... 658
  Petticoat influence; D.... 742
  Solid south, the; D.... 479
  This is New York; D.... 714
H., J. L.
  World, New York; C.... 127
Haiti
  News, disturbing; EP.... 212
  Vincent, S., elected president; EP..... 597
Haldane, J. B. S.
  What I believe; S.....90; letter.... 153
Hall of fame
  Elections; EP.... 485
Hallgren, Mauritz A.
  Becomes associate editor of The Nation; EP.... 363
  Congress in confusion; S.... 601
  Fascism bankrupt; S.... 670
  French prosperity fades; S.... 440
  Polish terror in Galicia; IS.... 508
Ham; Dt.... 401
Hanson, Merlin H.
  Boycotting Negroes; C.... 180
Harding, Warren Gamaliel
  Memorial dedication postponed; Hoover and Coolidge refusal to take part alleged; EP.... 433
Harris bill and Mexico; C. Beals; IS..... 51
Hartl, Emil L. See Ernst, Edward G.
Hartmann, Sadakichi
  On Casanova's Homecoming; C....297; see also EP.... 213
Harvard university
  Teachers lacking; E.... 7
Haskell, Douglas
  Architecture; monumental masses; S.... 561
  Chrysler building; S.... 450
  Stripes of the News; S.... 713
  Wright, F. L., and the Chicago fair; S 605
Harkness Hoot, Yale university, starts; EP.. 459
Hawkes, Herbert E.
  Columbia university, experimenting at; S 398
Hawks, Frank M.
  Speed records in air; EP.... 433
Hazlitt, Henry
  Anonymity, cult of; S.... 350
  Our intellectual rulers; S.... 273
  Standards, literary; S.... 613
Health insurance in Austria. A. H. Bornfell; C.... 43
Heat and work. H. Broun; S.... 116
Heist, A. A.
  Edgerton, John E., "heckling" by theologians; C .... 246; see also E.... 32
Hell's angels. A. Bakshy; D.... 254
Hemingway, Ernest; Bibliography; material asked. V. Orton; C.... 247
Herrick, Robert
  Our super-Babbitt (President Hoover); a recantation; S .....60; letter..... 154
Herring, Hubert C.
  Caribbean seminar; C.... 582
Herskovits, Melville J.
  Correction of book review; C.....247; see also.... 102
Hewitt, Elsa. See Immigration
Hibben, Sheila
  Russian bare, the; C.... 127
Hirst, Albert
  Wishes to organize Westchester group of League for independent political action; C.... 247
His majesty's car. J. M. Brown; D..... 533
Hobson, John A.
  British imperial conference; S..342; IS 660
Hoe, R., and company, plant and workers; Dt.... 676
Hogue, Richard W.
  M. Storey memorial fund; C.... 324
Holberg, Ruth Langland
  Now summer; P.... 67
  Pigeons wading; P.... 177
Holiday. A. Bakshy; D.... 160
Hollywood technical directors' institute
  Attacks All quiet on the western front; E.... 7
Holmes, Aileen
  With M. Husa, fined and imprisoned for "insulting" flag; EP.... 212
Holmes, Oliver Wendell
  Tribute by Ohio supreme court justice. Pertinax; C.... 651
Holt, Hamilton
  Rollins idea; S.... 372
Hoover, Herbert
  Adminstration, Hoover commission on Hoover suggested; E.... 140
  Administration; Republican handicap; E 168
  And congress. M. A. Hallgren; S.... 601
  EP.... 691
  Appointments; EP.... 663
  Armistice day speech; EP.... 567
  Begins to fight; EP.... 27
  Committees, government by; E.... 6
  Criticism by The Nation offends subscriber. J. S. L. Thomas; C..... 153
  Immigration, action on, contrary to supreme court decision. C. W. King; C.... 472
  Legislation, attitude toward; E.... 31
  Lutherans, greetings to; Roman catholics offended; EP .....457; letter..... 452
  Message to congress, second annual; EP 635
  Misleading phrase, "socialism or its violent brother, bolshevism." D. Dahlberg; C.... 498
  Morrow, D. W., supported by president. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 13
  Muscle Shoals; president opposes government operation; EP.....137; S..... 176
  Muscle Shoals, views on; EP.... 137
  Naval reduction, president's views; EP.. 53
  "New" Hoover. P. Y. Anderson; S... 176
  Political campaign, Mr. Hoover in; E.....392; letter.... 526
  "Power administration." P. Y. Anderson; S.... 176
  Resents oil-shale charges; E.... 514
  Revolt against president shown by election results; E.... 542
  Silences; E.... 434

Super-Babbitt; a recantation. R. Herrick; S.....60; letter 154
Tariff bill signed. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 13
Unemployment committee; EP..... 457
Unemployment, president's job; EP..... 30
Wheat problem. P. Y. Anderson; S... 119
Hotel, American; book on; E..... 462
House building, pisé method; Dt..... 322
How, J. Eads
Left fortune for humanity; executor and trustee asks advice. N. Klein; C.... 180 executor gets too many letters; C.... 324
Howard, D. T.
College; who ought to go? S..... 344
Howe, Lawrence
Crime and courts in Chicago; S..... 315
Howie, J. B.
"Journey's end," play; C..... 98
Hugenberg, Alfred
German dailies. O. G. Villard; S..... 197
Hull, Cordell
Nominated for senator from Tennessee; EP 192
Hungary
Sixtus, Prince, of Bourbon-Parma, negotiates for return of king; his war activities; EP..... 285
Huntley, Margaret Steer
Sacco-Vanzetti memorial in New York; C 204
Husa, Mabel
With A. Holmes, fined and imprisoned for "insulting" flag; EP..... 212
Huston, Claudius H.
Holds on to chairmanship of Republican national committee; EP..... 81
P. Y. Anderson; S..... 119
Ousted as Republican chairman. P. Y. Anderson; S 176
Retires with blast at Hoover; EP..... 191
Hutchins, Grace
Gastonia bail; C.... 497; see also.... 437
Huxley, Aldous
Requests letters of D. H. Lawrence; C 127
Hyde, Arthur M.
Advice to beat growers; EP..... 54

I

Idealism
"Ex-Reader" finds it does not "pay"; C 677
Igdenbu. A. Bakshy; D..... 713
Illsley, Graydon F.
Nation, The, and the communists; C... 17
Imber, Isaac
Zionism, essence of; C..298; see also.. 200
Immigration
Aliens and unemployment. C. W. King; C 472
Hewitt, E., case of, raises question of power over entry; EP..... 310
Japanese. C. Panunzio; C....246; 323; see also EP 29
Restriction and suspension; EP..... 720
United States, checked; EP..29; letter.. 246
United States, further restriction; EP. 309
Imperial conference. See British empire
Income, ideal; E..... 288
Income tax
Cut, differences on; EP..... 232
Cut, restoration in sight; EP..... 567
Refunds and A. W. Mellon. P. Y. Anderson; S 727
India
Anglo-Indian speaks. J. R. G. Bolton; C 224
Churchill, W., "mad dog" views; E.234; letter 377
Conference. See India, conference on, London
Gandhi, M. M., negotiations with, fail; EP 285
Gandhi, M. M., views on, by S. K. Ratcliffe; C 69
Nation, The, editorial criticized by English reader. F. M. Kenyon; C.. 377
Nation, The, views on India called precise; opinions of an English subscriber. H. Spencer, Jr.; C..... 97
Nationalism, Lord Maston's views; EP.. 213
News items reflect conditions; EP..... 27
Non-violence. G. Slocombe; IS..... 454
Police brutality; EP 1
Police control; T. H. K. Rezmie; C.... 127
Policy of British government; E..234; letter 377
Ratcliffe, S. K., replies to criticisms of his views on India in book review; C 69
Resistance to government continues; EP 165
Scottish subscriber speaks. J. C. Mortimer; C 68
Self-rule; British government makes people less fit. A. S. Blackwell; C.. 323
Simon, Sir John, views; EP..... 258
Suppression by government continues; EP 665
Viceroy's speech denounces nationalists; EP 82
Simon commission report; second volume published; EP 1
Simon commission report; views on. R. B. Gregg; S.... 36; letter..... 224
Simon commission report; viceroy speaks on; E 114
Conference on, London
British delegates; EP 432
Deliberations; EP 569
Dominion status for India predicted as result; EP 693
Indian delegates; EP..... 310
Indian delegates stipulate demands; EP 459
MacDonald speech; EP 596
Meets; E 543
Indians
Taos deer dance. M. H. Vorse; S.... 178
Industrial depression. See Business; Economic conditions, world
Industrial relations counselors, incorporated
Report on unemployment insurance; EP 691
Industrial system. See Economics
Industrial workers of the world. See Centralia, Washington
Injunctions
Yellow-dog. J. I. Seidman; S..... 729
Institute of politics (Williams college)
Russian session; EP 166
Insurance, health, in Austria. A. H. Bornfell; C 43
Insurance, life
Evils exposed by A. Epstein; E..... 287 letter by A. Epstein 377
Insurance unemployment, compulsory
American federation of labor, views on; EP 284
Campaign for; EP 111
Legislative proposals; EP 720
Michigan law, proposed. H. M. Bell; C 324
New York state, move for, E..... 261
Report by Industrial relations counselors, incorporated; EP 691
Insurance, wage. L. Corey; S..... 573
Letter, with editorial comment 677
Insurance, workmen's compensation
Weakness. H. S. Cullman; S..... 294
Intellectual rulers of the United States. H. Hazlitt; S..... 273
Intellectuals in politics; E..... 236
International law
Hague codification conference. E. M. Borchard; S 94
Interstate Commerce Commission
Boosts railroad freight rates; EP.... . 82
Investment trust. J. G. Curtis; S..... 93
Islam. See Moslems
Italy
Army reorganization; EP 310
Dissatisfaction with peace treaties expressed by Mussolini; EP 53
Economic difficulties; Mussolini blames United States; EP..... 721
Fascism bankrupt. M. A. Hallgren; S. 670
Russia, commercial treaty with; EP.... 192
Slav subjects reported oppressed and killed; EP..... 310
War with France, possibility; Germany's position; EP..... 81

J

Jackson, Gardner
Sacco-Vanzetti memorial in Boston; C.. 204
Women workers in Massachusetts; S.... 608
Jackson, Mississippi
Negro killed by deputy sheriff; EP... 259
Jadwin, Edgar
Appointed chairman of federal power commission. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 66
Japan
Education, higher, evils of; IP..... 537
Immigration from; quota. C. Panunzio; C..... 246, 343; see also EP..... 29
Moving pictures. A. Bakshy..... 104
Trade-union bill; IP..... 281
Women mill slaves; IP..... 134
Jarvis, Royal P.
On Mr. Hoover and the campaign; C.....526; see also..... 392
Jay, John
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
Jennings, Leslie Nelson
Wilderness; P 709
Jews
Nation trapped. W. Zukerman; S..200; letter 298
Jones, Mary ("Mother")
And socialism. L. D. Abbott; C..... 707
Death; EP 637
Jones, Weimar
South, property-minded; S..... 319
Southern labor and the law; S..... 14
Josephson, Matthew
American culture since the sixties; S.. 615
Journalists. See Newspapers
Journey's end (play). J. B. Howie; C..... 98
Judge; dog; Dt 179
Judiciary scandals. See New York city
Jugoslavia
Agricultural exchange agreement with Rumania; EP..... 192
Matchek, V., acquitted of treason; EP.. 83
Just imagine. A. Bakshy; D..... 657

K

Kahler, Wood
Poor author; C.... 498; see also..... 394
Katz, Benjamin R.
Collegians, American, conservative; C.. 472
Kazakstan
Women attain freedom. L. Fischer; S.. 11
Kelley, Florence
Children, saving; White house conference; S..... 643
Kelley, Ralph S. See Petroleum
Kellogg, Frank Billings
Election to world court; EP..... 335
Nobel peace prize winner; EP..... 635
Kellogg pact
Strengthening, Hoover suggestion for; EP 595
Kemp, Eleanor
Criticizes article on degradation of American psychology by B. Stolberg; C..... 525; see also..... 395
Kempton, A. Norman
Nation, The, what's wrong with; C.... 612
Kenyon, F. M.
India; protest against Nation editorial; C 377
Kinder, F. S.
Unemployment and drought relief, farmers and workers pay; C..... 734
King, Carol Weiss
Aliens and unemployment; C..... 472
Communists and deportation; C..... 97
Kirkpatrick, J. J.
Antioch faculty trust; S..... 441
Kismet. A. Bakshy; D..... 590
Klein, Nicholas
Executor of J. Eads How bequest to help world; suggestions asked; C..180; gets too many letters; C..... 324
Knight, Edgar W.
North Carolina keeps faith; S..... 240
Kopeloff, Nicholas
Krutch, J. W., tribute to; C..... 18
Korea
Rule by force. J. C.; C..... 68
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Tribute to. N. Kopeloff; C..... 18
Kurds. See Turkey.

L

Labor
Forced. See Slavery
Japan, women mill slaves; IP..... 134
Southern, and the law. W. Jones; S.. 14
Turnover, tax proposed. J. F. Wayne; C 677
Unemployment. See Unemployment
Wage cuts; EP 82
Wage study by International labor office at instance of H. Ford; EP..... 28
Wages, coming down? A. L. Bernheim; S 489
Women. See Women
Work and pray; E.... 32; letter..... 246
Labor party (British). See Great Britain
Labor, secretary of Doak, William N., appointment; EP... 636
Labor unions
Japanese trade-union bill; IP..... 281
Win victory in New Orleans railway company case on right of collective bargaining; E 113
See also injunctions
Lady Chatterley's lover. See Lawrence, D. H.
La Follette dynasty
Fate at stake in Wisconsin election; EP 111
La Follette, Philip F.
Wins in Wisconsin primaries; EP..... 335
La Follette, Robert Marion, jr.
Unemployment, work in senate; P. Y. Anderson; S 727
Lambeth conference; E 261
See also Birth control; Church of England
"Lame ducks." See Congress
Lamont, Professor
Greatest novels, sixty, list of; E..... 115
Lands, public. See Public lands
Latin America
Caribbean seminar of Committee on cultural relations with Latin America; C 582
Disquiet; EP 311
Loans and revolution. D. Pearson; S.. 644
Recognition of new governments by United States; EP 336
United States diplomatic blunders; EP.. 721
Laughter. A. Bakshy; D 713
Law enforcement
Third degree only part of lawless enforcement; E..... 339
See also National commission on law observance and enforcement
Law, international. See International law
Law observance and enforcement. See National commission on law observance and enforcement
Lawrence, D. H.
Lady Chatterley's lover bootlegged; EP 637
Letters requested; A. Huxley; C..... 127
Lawrence, Sarah, college. C. Warren; S... 549
Lawyers. See Legal profession
Leadership in politics; E..... 194

League for independent political action
California branch being organized. O. L. Triggs; C 43
Westchester group proposed. A. Hirst; C 247
League of composers; concert. A. Mendel; M 741
League of nations
Defended. P. C. Nash; C..... 651
Disarmament shunned by league; E.... 260
Kellogg, F. B., election of; EP..... 335
Mandate commission report on Palestine; A. Henderson replies; EP..231; EP.. 285
Meeting, forthcoming; EP 231
Permanent court of international justice; Cuba and R. L. Buell; C, with editorial comment.....611; see also E.. 435
Reorganization, and American entry; E 435 see also letter, with editorial comment 611
World court protocol to come before senate; EP 635
Legal profession
Education, new legal. H. Oliphant; S.. 493
Lena Goldfields limited. See Russia
Letters, bread-and-butter; Dt 125
Lever, John R.
Criticizes Nation's article on Lambeth conference; C..... 348
Levitt, Albert
Fight against Connecticut political conditions; EP 2
Levy, Newman
Girl crazy; D 479
Princess charming; D 479
Three's a crowd; D..... 479
Lewis, John L.
Fined for violating injunction; EP.... 139
Lewis, Sinclair
Wins Nobel prize for literature; E..... 544
Lewisohn, Adolph
Crime, problem of; C..... 526
Liberalism
Catholicism and liberalism. Rev. J. A. Ryan; S ..... 150; letters 271
Life insurance. See Insurance, life
Lincoln, Abraham. A. Bakshy; D..... 305
Lindbergh, Charles Augustus
Newspapers, treatment by; E..... 195
Lindeman, E. C.
Fascist sympathies in the United States; S 267
Lindley, Ernest K.
Two years of Franklin Roosevelt; S.289; EP 284
Lindsay, Vachell
Dunce-cap on the ghost, the; P..... 583
Lindsey, Ben B. See Marriage
Lingle, "Jake"
Murder. P. Blanshard; S 9
Literature
Is literature possible? L. Trilling; S.. 405
Negro in. G. A. Steward; S 295; letter 402
Standards. H. Hazlitt; S 613
See also Books; Fiction
Little show, the. H. Broun; D..... 331
Living, standard of. See Cost and standard of living
Loans, Foreign
And revolutions. D. Pearson; S..... 644
State department supervision; EP..... 3
Locmariaquer; Dt 550
London
Building height cut down; EP..... 311
London Daily Worker
Prosecuted; EP..... 110
Long, Cedric
Capitalism or cooperation; C.....445; see also 265
Lucas, Robert H. See Republican party
Lutherans
Greeted by President Hoover; Roman catholics offended; EP.. 457; letter.. 452
Lynchings
Commission of investigation named; EP 337
Federal law needed more than ever; EP 311
Marion, Indiana; two Negroes hanged; EP 193
Mississippi; two; EP 311
Oconee county, South Carolina, fined; EP 513
Southern comment. W. Thornton; C... 444
Southern women attack lynching. W. S. Ethridge; S 647
Texas, one averted; one perpetrated in South Carolina; EP 28
Texas riots; EP 167

M

McChesney, John
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
McDonald, Duncan
Republicans should be investigated; C.. 96
MacDonald, Ramsay
Speech at India round-table conference; EP 597
Machado y Morales, Gerardo. See Cuba
Macleod, Norman
Dark of the brain; P..... 99
MacMurphy, Allen B.
Mora, F. L., model for war memorial; C 247
Revolt in Connecticut; S..... 263
McNinch, Frank R.
Appointment to federal power commission; EP 663
Mails, censorship. See Censorship, mail
Malta
Church and state disturbances; EP..... 110
Mandate commission. See League of Nations
Manning, William T. See Marriage
Manslaughter. A. Bakshy; D 209
Manton, Judge
Citizenship decision. E. Black; C..... 204
Marclay, George C.
Public-utility and power-trust inroads on public; C 472
Marigold. R. Benchley; D 452
Marion, Indiana
Two Negroes lynched; EP..... 193
Marion, North Carolina
Relief for workers. V. Perlman; C.... 378 Marriage
Companionate; dispute between B. B. Lindsey and Bishop Manning; EP.665; letter, C..... 734
Martyrs to marriage; S....34; letter.. 245
Marseilles. H. H.; D..... 658
Marsh, Reid
Cantaloupe a fruit; C.. 376; see also.. 243
Massachusetts
Primaries; EP 335
Tercentenary. H. R. Mussey; S..... 199
Women workers. G. Jackson; S..... 608
Matchek, Vladimir
Acquitted of high treason; EP..... 83
Maternity
Death rate highest in United States; EP 693
Maugham, W. Somerset
Verisimilitude in his book, Cakes and Ale; E 436
Mavity, Nancy Barr
Billings and the supreme court; C..... 651
Meat
Packers' plea for modification of 1920 decree. R. V. Begley; S..... 219
Medical profession
Doctor and patient; E 487
Russia, soviet, doctor in. R. A. Reynolds; S..... 316
Mellon, Andrew William
Tax refunds. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 727
Mencken, Henry L.
Marriage; EP 259
Mendel, Arthur
Bach, transcribing; M 684
League of composers' concert; M..... 741
Menzel, J. C.
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
Merchant marine, American; E.....571; see also C..... 708
In war time, views of D. W. Morrow; EP 663
Mergers
Movement halted by depression; EP.... 512
Meston of Dunottar, Lord
Views on nationalism, India; EP..... 213
Mexico
Harris bill. C. Beals; IS 51
Revolution, balance sheet of. B. Urrea; IS 744
Meyer, Eugene
Appointed governor of federal reserve bank; EP 284
Michigan
Unemployment insurance law proposed. H. M. Bell; C..... 324
Militarism
In modern dress. P. von Schoenaich; IS 718
Military training
Optional in land-grant colleges; EP.... 28
Mississippi
Educational policy of Governor Bilbo brings reprisals; EP 665
Mixed claims commission
Claims against Germany by United States disallowed; EP 568
Moby Dick. A. Bakshy; D 254
Mohammedans. See Moslems
Monroe, Karl
No men wanted; S..... 146
Montagnes, James
Doukhobors in Canada, the; S..... 374
Montana
Newspapers; the state and the "company." O. G. Villard; S..... 39
Monte Carlo. A. Bakshy; D..... 356
Mooney and Billings
Billings and the California supreme court. N. B. Mavity; C..... 651
California supreme court refuses pardon in case of W. K. Billings; state pardon board in case of Tom Mooney; EP, 54; EP, 637; E..... 667
Mooney still waits; E..... 170
Rolph, James, and the case; C..... 707
Young, Governor, defeated for renomination; EP 257
Young, Governor, refuses pardon to Mooney; EP 83
Moore, John Bassett
On United States recognition of Russia; EP 663
Moore, Virginia
Last instruction; P..... 299
Parting, a; P..... 735
Mora, F. Luis
Model for war memorial. A. B. MacMurphy; C 247
Morgan, Arthur
Canada, armaments, and peace; IS..... 564
Morocco. A. Bakshy; D 657
Morrow, Dwight Whitney
Defends Hoover administration in campaign speech; EP 458
Hoover supports Morrow. P. Y. Anderson; S 13
Nominated for United States senator; E 5
Victory. H. T. Bellew; C..... 43
Views on merchant marine in war time; EP 663
Mortier bay. See Newfoundland
Mortimer, John C.
India; Scottish subscriber speaks; C.... 68
Morton, David
Again this quiet day; P..... 446
Moslems
Ferment in the Arabic world. F. Valyi; IS 77
Mosley, Sir Oswald
Proposals, governmental; E..... 667
Mosul. See Petroleum
Mott, Lucretia; letters requested. J. P. Burgess; C 247
Moving pictures
Competition and trusts; E..... 639
Competition with stage; E..... 216
Dimensions, new in the talkies. A. Bakshy; S 702
Japanese. A. Bakshy 104
Travel pictures. A. Bakshy; D..... 657
Mr. Gilhooley. H. Broun; D..... 422
Municipal government
Corruption; E 214
Municipal ownership. See Public ownership
Murder. A. Bakshy; D 534
Murders
Record in Great Britain and the United States; EP 83
See also Capital punishment
Murphy, Frank
Radical, elected mayor of Detroit. R. Rothman; S 400
Murray, Robert H.
World, New York; C 126
Muscle Shoals
Hoover, H., opposes government operation; S 176
Hoover, H., views on; EP..... 137
House of representatives and senate in deadlock. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 13 Operation; politics and power issue; E..666
Music
Mass production at Chicago festival; EP 233
Mussey, Henry Raymond
Fighting unemployment. I. Organizing the labor market; S..... 641
II. Unemployment insurance; S..... 673
III. Stabilization; S 704
Massachusetts—three hundred years; S.. 199
Mussolini, Benito. See Italy
Mutual savings banks. See Savings banks

N

Nansen, Fridtjof, death; IP..... 106
Nash, Philip C.
Defends world court; C..... 651
Nation, The
Chicago club resumes activities. M. Appleman; C 378
Colorado readers called upon to communicate with one another. E. L. Widmayer; C 98
Communists, treatment by The Nation. G. A. Flint and G. F. Illsley, C.... 17
Criticized by A. N. Kempton; C..... 612
Criticized by L. Beebe; C 376; see also 323
Editorial on India criticized by English reader. F. M. Kenyon; C..... 377
see also 234
Hallgren, M. A., becomes associate editor; EP 363
India, views on, found precise. H. Spencer, Jr.; C 97
Lambeth conference article criticized; C 348
Praise from Southern Rhodesia. P. Nielsen; C 180
Prodding commended. W. C. Smith; C 68
Santo Domingo, anniversary of restoration; President Urena thanks The Nation; C 97
Subscriber cancels subscriptions; objects to criticism of President Hoover. J. S. L. Thomas; C..... 153
National association for the advancement of colored people. See Negroes
National commission on law observance and enforcement
Disagreement, rumors of; EP..... 458
Senate limits activity to investigation of prohibition. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 66

National safety council. See Safety
Naval reduction (London conference and treaty)
Hoover expresses views on treaty; EP.. 53
Peace lovers and the treaty; E.....85; letter by R. Baldwin..... 96
Ratifications deposited in London; EP.. 483
Treaty near ratification by United States; EP..... 81
Treaty ratified by senate; EP..... 109
Neal, John R.
Loses nomination for senatorship from Tennessee; EP..... 192
Neal, John Randolph
Biography; material sought. F. Reynolds; C..... 298 Negroes
Africa, south and east; progress or slavery; IP..... 592
Art; segregation de luxe. G. A. Steward; S.....295; letter..... 402
Barbers, in the south, threatened. V. Dabney; S..... 64
Boycotting. M. N. Hanson; C..... 180
Gold star mothers and widows, discrimination against; E..... 85
Killing, Jackson, Mississippi; EP..... 259
Literature, exploitation in. G. A. Steward; S.....295; letter..... 402
Look out, brown man! S. Anderson; S. 579
Lynching. See Lynching
National association for the advancement of colored people, campaign for civil rights contemplated; EP..... 541
Race riots at Emelle, Alabama; six deaths; EP..... 54
Race riots, Texas; EP..... 167
Segregation de luxe. G. A. Steward; S.....295; letter..... 402
Spirituals; Dt..... 245
New Orleans railway company case. See Labor
New Republic
Questionnaire on American; E..... 365
New York city
Election results; EP..... 511
Judiciary scandals; "new Tammany"; municipal corruption; E, 214; EP, 362; EP 390
Sins of New York; book; E..... 640
Tammany under cloud; EP..... 362
Turns moral. H. Broun; S..... 143
New York state
Roosevelt, Governor, two years of. E. K. Lindley; S.....289; EP..... 284
Unemployment insurance, move for; E.. 261
Newark, New Jersey
Persecution of aliens and communists; EP 2
Newfoundland
Mortier bay, proposed ocean clearing house; IP..... 404
News building, New York
Stripes of the News. D. Haskell; S... 713
Newspapers
Lindbergh, C. A., treatment by newspapers; E..... 195
Mishandling facts. P. Y. Anderson; C. 706
News, front-page; EP..... 513
Newspaper criminals in Chicago. Veteran Journalist; S.....88; letter.... 246
Press today. VIII. Montana and the "company." O. G. Villard; S..... 39
IX. Opportunity in the small city. O. G. Villard; S..... 120
X. Hugenberg and the German dailies. O. G. Villard; S..... 197
Tales, hair-raising; Dt..... 348
"Writing down!" F. Franklin; C..... 472 Nicaragua
Concentration policy adopted by United States; EP..... 55
Election, American-supervised; EP..... 569
Nicholl, Louise Townsend
Suicide by drowning; P..... 652
Without shield; P..... 19
Nichols, Ruth
Makes woman's flying record; EP..... 693
Niebuhr, Reinhold
German crisis; IS..... 358
Nielsen, Peter
Praises The Nation; C..... 180
Nitrates
Merger; EP..... 138
Nobel prize for literature
Awarded to S. Lewis; E..... 544
Nobel prize for peace
Awarded to F. B. Kellogg; EP..... 635
Norris, Frank; biographical material sought. F. D. Walker; C..... 445
Norris, George W.
Attacked by R. H. Lucas; EP..... 719
Leadership in politics; E..... 194
Primary campaign, investigation; EP... 361
Trick attempted with another G. W. Norris. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 119
Wins in Nebraska Republican primary; EP 211
North American newspaper alliance
Comics and the alliance. L. Batiste; C. 17
North Carolina
Election, loss of, by Senator Simmons. B. B. Bobbitt; C..... 42
North Carolina, university of Graham, Frank, election as president. E. W. Knight; S..... 240
Norway
Swing to right; EP..... 484
Novák, Sonia Ruthèle
Hermit by the dead sea; P..... 44
Novels. See Fiction
Nutting; Dt..... 443

O

O'Brien, Edward J.
Wilson, R., letters requested; C..... 247
Ocean clearing house; IP..... 404
Oconee county. See South Carolina
Oh, promise me. H. H.; D..... 658
Oil. See Petroleum
Oil shale. See Petroleum
Old English. A. Bakshy; D..... 305
Oliphant, Herman
New legal education; S..... 493
On the spot. J. M. Brown; D..... 533
Once in a lifetime. H. Broun; D..... 386
Opera
Future; views of J. Erskine; EP..337; letter 444
Grand opera in America. H. del Castillo; C.....444; see also EP..... 337
Oregon
News, exciting, from. C. B. Frisbie; C 707
Orton, Vrest
Hemingway, E., bibliography; material asked; C..... 247
Otto, M. C.
Wisconsin, university of; S..... 467
Outward bound. A Bakshy; D..... 424
Overture. H. Broun; D..... 714
Ownership, public. See Public ownership

P

Pacifism
And citizenship; E....57; letter..... 204
Packers. See Meat
Palestine
British action on; E..... 487
Debate in house of commons on British white paper; EP..... 568
Future. V. S. Yarros; S..... 117
Jewish immigration suspended by Great Britain. W. Zukerman; S..200; letter 298
League of nations mandate commission report; A. Henderson replies; EP.... 231
Simpson report recommending restriction of immigration of Jews denounced by them; EP..... 457
Panunzio, Constantine
Japan and the quota; C.....246, 323; see also EP..... 29
Papa Droissart. A. G. Barnett; S..... 123
Parliamentary government
French, and others; EP..... 138
Parsons, Robert. See Poetry
Patterson, Thomas W.
American legion in Long Beach, California, fights communism; C..... 180
Peace treaties. See European war
Pearson, Drew
Loans and revolutions; S..... 644
Penguins; Dt..... 67
Pennsylvania
Election; decision for Pinchot in Luzerne county ballot case; EP..... 232
Gubernatorial campaign; EP..... 390
Pinchot candidacy bolted by W. W. Atterbury and Philadelphia ward leaders; EP 432
Pensions, veterans'. See Veterans
Perlman, Vee
Mill workers in Marion, relief; C..... 378
Persia
Involved in Turkish-Kurd warfare; Mosul oil mentioned; EP..... 212
Struggle for power. J. Van As; IS.... 162
Pertinax
Holmes and Brandeis; C..... 651
Peru
Revolt; EP..... 258
Revolt; A. Roller; S..... 291
Petroleum
Colorado shale-oil fields; R. S. Kelley resigns, charging wrongful administration; EP..... 361
Kelley charges denied by department of justice; EP..... 483
Kelley charges resented by president; E 514
Kelley resignation declined; charges investigated; EP..... 389
Mosul; issue in case of Turkey, Kurds and Persia; Great Britain involved; EP.. 212
Production, shut-in; EP..... 484
Petticoat influence. H. H.; D..... 742
Philadelphia Record
Service to liberal cause. C. T. Sempers; C .....!.. 204
Philippine Islands
Roosevelt, N., appointment as vice-governor; EP..... 109
Phipps, Henry
Death; EP..... 363
Pierce, David H.
Exploiting Negro in literature; C..402; see also..... 295
Pigeons; Dt..... 497
Pilsudski, Joseph. See Poland
Pinchot, Gifford. See Pennsylvania
Pisé method of house building; Dt..... 322
Pitkin, Walter B.
Requests conversations; C..... 98
Playboy of Paris. A Bakshy; D..... 590
Poems
After reading a history of biology. I. Schneider 407
Again this quiet day. D. Morton..... 446
Bats. R. P. T. Coffin..... 379
Belated sheep. A. Wurdemann..... 155
Cathemerinon. D. Fitts..... 70
Clean as these rocks. W. Snow..... 273
Coach Window. S. Rodman..... 728
Dark of the brain. N. MacLeod..... 99
Detail. G. Taggard..... 553
Do as I tell you. G. Taggard..... 679
Dunce-cap on the ghost, the. V. Lindsay 583
Free lecture. B. Deutsch..... 473
Haunted. L. W. Spencer..... 499
Hermit by the dead sea. S. R. Novak.. 44
In memoriam (A. J.), E. L. Walton.... 439
Last instructions. V. Moore..... 299
Memoir. I. Edman..... 527
No more this home. G. Taggard..... 205
Now must the mind write. E. L. Walton 225
Now summer. R. L. Holberg..... 67
Orchard. G. W. Dresbach..... 218
Parting, a. V. Moore..... 735
Pigeons wading. R. L. Holberg..... 177
Prelude. L. Speyer..... 616
Schoolmaster dies in Italy, a. H. Gregory 248
Shadow, the. B. Cooksley..... 181
Spring plowing. H. S. White..... 128
Suicide by drowning. L. T. Nicholl.... 652
Sunset. E. L. Walton..... 325
Uncle Mells and the witches' tree. E. M. Roberts..... 406
Wall, the. I. Schneider..... 350
White-face. J. Rorty..... 614
Wilderness. L. N. Jennings..... 709
Without shield. L. T. Nicholl..... 19
Poetry
Revolutionary verse in possession of R. Parsons ("M. Graham") brings him into conflict with law; EP..... 433
Poland
Elections; Pilsudski terrorism; EP.637; EP ..... 597; EP 592
Galicia, Polish terror in. M. A. Hallgren; IS..... 508
Police
Women, use by police; E..... 31
See also Third degree
Political campaign. See Election
Politics
Candidate Broun. H. Broun; S..... 171
Intellectuals in; E..... 236
Leadership in; E..... 194
Population, United States
Census report, preliminary; E..... 196
Porter, Stephen G.; death; EP..... 55
Ports
Ocean clearing house; IP..... 404
Postage
Increase opposed. S. T. Byington; C.. 612
Postmasters and politics; EP..... 390
Post-office department
Lease graft. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 66
Power and power industry
Dorau, Herbert B., appointed head of public-utilities department, New York university; EP..... 484
Federal act threatened by opinion in Appalachian power company case; EP... 432
Fight goes on. R. Finney; S..... 697
Georgia power company cuts rate in Crisp county to meet public competition; EP..... 390
Hoover, H., views on Muscle Shoals; EP 137
New York commission appointed; EP.. 212
Politics and power issue; E..... 666
"Power administration," P. Y. Anderson; S 176
Roosevelt, Governor, views on; EP.... 284
Sackett, Ambassador, on cost of production of electricity and price to user; EP 3
Trust foes win in election; EP..... 539
Trust inroads on public. G. C. Marcley; C 472
Trust wins again. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 66
Wilbur, R. L., and water power. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 669
Power commission. See Federal power commission
Preparatory commission on disarmament. See Disarmament
Press. See Newspapers
Press censorship. See Censorship, press
Prices. See Gold
Primary elections. See Elections

Princess charming. N. Levy; D..... 479
Prisons and prisoners
Shall convicts write books? M. A. De Ford; S..... 495
Professors
And propaganda; E..... 114
Progressives in congress. See Congress
Prohibition
Enforcement becomes "conservative." P. Y. Anderson; S..... 66
Legality; decision of Judge W. Clark; E 722
Officials, interference with enforcement; EP..... 310
Propaganda
Professors and propaganda; E..... 114
Psychology
American, degradation of. B. Stolberg; S..... 395; letters of criticism..... 525
Public lands
Domain, public. H. S. Graves; S..... 147
Plan for transfer to states; EP..... 636
Public officials
Right to criticize; E..... 514
Public ownership
Bryan, W. J., views. W. J. Dwyer; C.....246; see also..... 74
Colby, Kansas, has no taxes; EP..... 193
Public utilities
Trust inroads on public. G. C. Marcley; C..... 472
Puppet show. J. M. Brown; D..... 533
Puritanism, sex, in Russia. C. von Wiegand; S..... 62

R

R., A. E. E.
British cheka, the; S..... 321
R-101 (airship). See Aeronautics
Race problem. See Negroes
Raffles. A. Bakshy; D..... 160
Railroad rates
Boost granted by Interstate commerce commission; EP..... 82
Railroad workers
Indorse six-hour day as unemployment relief measure; EP..... 596
Railroads
Consolidation; decision by interstate commerce commission; EP..... 664
Earnings fall off; EP..... 257
Recapture clause, repeal recommended by interstate commerce commission; EP.. 663
Raine, William MacLeod
Costigan of Colorado; S..... 465
Rand school of social science
Twenty-fifth anniversary; EP..... 337
Ratcliffe, S. K.
Replies to criticisms of his review of book on India; C..... 69
Rates, freight. See Railroad rates
Razlom. A. Bakshy; D..... 713
Razran, H. S.
Criticizes article on degradation of American psychology by B. Stolberg; C.....525; see also..... 395
Reds. See Communists
Reed, Ferdinanda W.
School in Russia, going to; S..... 731
Religion
Evangelism dying; EP..... 139
Remarque, Erich Maria
All quiet on the western front attacked by Hollywood technical directors' institute; E..... 7
Rembrandt van Rijn
Defense by H. W. van Loon; EP..... 721
Rent
Cooperative apartments. R. Ward; S.. 269
Republican party
Chairmanship. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 176
Elections. See Elections
Fess, Simeon D., suggested for chairman of national committee; EP..... 137
Handicap in elections; E..... 168
Investigation demanded. D. McDonald; C 96
Norris, Senator, attack by R. H. Lucas; EP..... 719
Republicans, an article for. V. C. Christianson; C..... 154
Resnick, Louis
Replies to criticism of articles on safety movement; C..... 402
Revolution, right to; E..... 56
Revolutionary Age
Barring from mails; EP..... 110
Reynolds, Ralph A.
Doctor in Soviet Russia; S..... 316
Reynolds, Franklin
Seeks material concerning J. R. Neal; C 298
Rezmie, T. H. K.
India, police control; C..... 127
Rhapsody. H. Broun; D..... 355
Rich, pitiful; E..... 142
Roar China. J. M. Brown; D..... 533
Robbins, A.
Drought; C..... 376
Roberts, Elizabeth Madox
Uncle Mells and the witches' tree; P... 406
Robson, William A.
British films, pure; S..... 547
Rodman, Selden
Coach window; P..... 728
Roller Arnold
Peru, revolt in; S..... 291
Rollins college
Rollins idea. H. Holt; S..... 372
Rolph, James
And Mooney-Billings; C..... 707
Roman catholic church
Catholicism and liberalism. Rev. J. A. Ryan; S.....150; letters..... 271
In Colombia; liberals win despite church opposition. J. M. E.; C..... 97
Members offended by President Hoover's greetings to Lutherans; EP.457; letter 452
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
Power, views on; EP..... 284
Two years of. E. K. Lindley; S..289; EP..... 284
Roosevelt, Nicholas
Appointed minister to Hungary instead of vice-governor of Philippines; EP.. 361
Appointment as vice-governor of the Philippines; EP..... 109
Roosevelt, Theodore
And W. H. Taft; book reviews....501; letter..... 581
Root, Elihu
Views on legislation against reds; EP.. 81
Rorty, James
White-face; P..... 614
Rothman, R.
Detroit elects a radical; S..... 400
Ruedy, August
Americans victims of wealth; C..... 153
"Rulers" of the United States
Gerard, J. W., list of sixty-four; E.... 235
Intellectual. H. Hazlitt; S..... 273
Rumania
Agricultural exchange agreement with Jugoslavia; EP..... 192
Rural and urban population. See United States
Rus, Inne
Want, elimination of; C..... 582
Russell, G. E. (Æ)
Views on rural and urban population; E 366
Russia
Bathing, nude. S. Hibben; C..... 127
Doctor in soviet Russia. R. A. Reynolds; S..... 316
"Dumping." L. Fischer; IS..... 688
"Dumping" and forced labor, investigated; EP..... 720
Economic conditions; reasons for Stalin's victory. L. Fischer; S..... 174
Farms, collectivized. L. Fischer; S.... 369
Imports from, called convict-made and menace; E..... 639
Inability to understand United States; EP..... 55
Institute of politics discusses Russia; EP 166
Italy, commercial treaty with; EP..... 192
Lena Goldfields limited, concession; soviet reported as refusing to pay judgment; EP..... 311
Pleasure in. H. Broun; S..... 59
Rumors of counter-revolution; EP..... 595
Rykor, A., dismissed from office; EP.. 720
Sale of planes to Russia interdicted by state department; EP..... 3
School, going to. F. W. Reed; S..... 731
Servants of the soviets. L. Fischer; S.. 577
Sex puritanism. C. von Wiegand; S.. 62
Trade abroad; E..... 364
Trade relations with; E..... 141
Trade with Great Britain grows after signing of trade agreement; EP..... 4
United States attitude toward. O. G. Villard; S..... 172
United States policy as seen by J. B. Moore; EP..... 663
Wheat. See Wheat
Wheat; alleged "dumping"; E..... 364
See also Amtorg company
Ryan, Rev. John A.
Catholicism and liberalism; S.....150; letters..... 271
Rykov, Alexei
Dismissed from office; EP..... 720

S

Sacco-Vanzetti
Massachusetts—three hundred years. H. R. Mussey; S..... 199
Memorial in Boston. G. Jackson; C.... 204
Memorial in New York. M. S. Huntley; C..... 204
Sackett, Frederic M.
On cost of production of electricity and price to user; EP..... 3
Safety
National safety council replies to L. Resnick; C..... 402
Saint Paul's chapel, churchyard; Dt..... 203
Samoa
Terror in western Samoa; IP..... 189
Samoa, American
To have representative government, commission reports; EP..... 433
Santo Domingo
Anniversary of restoration, President Urena thanks The Nation; C..... 97
Sarah Lawrence college. C. Warren; S.... 549
Savings banks. See Banks, savings
Savord, Ruth
Foreign relations, information on organizations sought; C..... 472
Scheu, Friedrich
Economic blocs in Europe, new; S..... 241
Schneider, Isidor
After reading a history of biology; P.. 407
Wall, the; P..... 350
Schnitzler, Arthur. See Censorship, book
Schober, Johann. See Austria
Schoenaich, Paul von Militarism in modern dress; IS..... 718
Scholtz, T. L.
Teacher training, civilizing; S..... 521
Schriftgiesser, Karl
Defends Boston Evening Transcript; C.....323; letter..... 376
Scott, William
Farmer and tariff; C..... 180
Sea serpent
None this year; EP..... 213
Seager, Henry Rogers
Death; EP..... 233
Segregation. See Negroes
Seidman, Joel I.
Injunction, yellow-dog; S..... 729
Seiler, Conrad
Cantaloupes and communists; S....243; letter..... 376
Seipel, Ignaz. See Austria
Selenine, George
Wage insurance; C, with editorial comment.....677; see also..... 573
Sempers, Charles T.
Philadelphia Record's service to liberal cause; C..... 204
Senate lobby committee
Cannon, Bishop, surrender to. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 14
Serio, Guido
Ordered deported to Italy, where death awaits him; EP..... 541
Sex puritanism in Russia. C. von Wiegand; S..... 62
Shale oil. See Petroleum
Shaw, George Bernard
Letters between him and Ellen Terry; EP..... 665
Sherwood, Ernest
Government and business; C.....297; see also..... 237
Shipping
Great Britain, pool; EP..... 540
Overcrowded ocean; E..571; see also C. 707
Steamships, fast; EP..... 167
See also Merchant marine
"Short" selling. See Stocks
Siegfried. M. Connelly; D..... 506
Simmons, Furnifold McLendel. See North Carolina
Simon, Sir John
Views on India; EP..... 258
Simon commission report. See India
Simpson report. See Palestine
Sinclair, Upton
Associated press; C..... 17
Sixtus, Prince. See Hungary
Skyscrapers; Dt..... 524
Land values and buildings; E..... 600
London cuts down building height; EP.. 311
Slavery
And forced labor. R. L. Buell; S..... 699
Five million slaves in the world; EP.... 337
Labor, forced, in Russia; EP..... 720
Slocombe, George
India; non-violence; IS..... 454
Slums of Tokio. A. Bakshy; D..... 104
Smith, F. Darwin
Industrial system; C..... 42
Smith, William Chandler
Commends The Nation for prodding; C 68
Snow, Wilbert
Clean as these rocks; P..... 273
Socialist party
New York City candidates; EP..... 167
Soil. A. Bakshy; D..... 480
Solid south, the. H. H.; D..... 479
South, the Labor and the law. W. Jones; S..... 14
Property-minded. W. Jones; S..... 319
South Africa
Negroes; progress or slavery; IP..... 590
Race enmity and secession, political issues; EP..... 4
South America
Loans and revolutions. D. Pearson; S.. 644
Recognition of new governments by United States; EP..... 336
"Revolt"; E..... 435
Revolutions; right to revolt recognized in Washington; EP..... 283
South Carolina
Oconee county fined for lynching; EP.. 513
Southern states. See South, the Souvenirs, travel; E..... 314
Soviets. See Russia

Spain
Revolution; E. . . . 723
Strikes and political situation; EP. . . . 337
Speech, better. H. Broun; S. . . . 33
Spencer, H., Jr.
The Nation and India; views on India; C 97
Spencer, Lillian White
Haunted; P. . . . 499
Sperry, Elmer A.
Death; EP. . . . 4
Speyer, Leonora
Prelude; P. . . . 616
Spirituals, Negro; Dt. . . . 245
Sport
Amateur; what is?; E. . . . 340
Spreckels, Rudolph
Urges governmental control of industry to combat hard times; EP. . . . 362
Stalin, Joseph V.
Victory in sixteenth party congress. L. Fischer; S. . . . 174
Standard of living. See Cost and standard of living Standards, literary. H. Hazlitt; S. . . . 613
Stanley, Louis
American federation of labor, collapse of; S. . . . 367
State and church. See Church and state
State department
Supervision of foreign loans; EP. . . . 3 Steamships
Fast; EP. . . . 167
Steidl, F. J.
Farmer speaks; C. . . . 733
Stepdaughters of war. R. Benchley; D. . . . 451
Steward, Gustavus Adolphus
Segregation (Negro) de luxe; S. . . . 295; letter 402
Stewart, Maxwell S.
Communism in China; S. . . . 217
Stimson, Henry L.
On state department supervision of foreign loans; EP. . . . 3
Stocks (penal device). See Crime and criminals
Stocks (securities)
"Short" sellings, investigation; EP. . . . 432
Stolberg, Benjamin
Degradation of American psychology; S. . . . 395; letters of criticism. . . . 525
Stone, W. T.
Disarmament, what hope for?; S. . . . 725
Storm over Asia. A. Bakshy; D. . . . 356
Storey, Moorfield
Memorial fund. R. W. Hogue; C. . . . 324
Strikes
Strikers, help for. N. Thomas; C. . . . 734
Strikes—textile mills, France
Social-insurance law causes strikes; EP 193
Strikes—Textile mills, southern Danville, Virginia, strike; EP. . . . 636
Gastonia bail skipping. L. S. Gannett; S. . . . 437; letter, with editorial comment 497
Gastonia conviction sustained by state supreme court; EP. . . . 232
Southern labor and the law. W. Jones; S 14
Students, wandering; E. . . . 57
Sugar
Conference on production; EP. . . . 692
Swanson, Claude A.
Demands revision of Hawley-Smoot tariff; EP. . . . 166
Sweet and low. H. Broun; D. . . . 632
Swing, you sinner. A. Bakshy; D. . . . 480
Swope, Rebecca Wendel
Death; E. . . . 142

T

Taft, Clinton J.
Communist baiting in California; C. . . . 18
Taft, William Howard
And Roosevelt; book reviews. . . . 501; letter 581
Taggard, Genevieve
Detail; P. . . . 553
Do as I tell you; P. . . . 679
No more this home; P. . . . 205
Tahiti (steamship)
Sinking; EP. . . . 285
Tammany hall. See New York city
Taos deer dance. M. H. Vorse; S. . . . 178
Tariff, British. See Great Britain
Tariff, Canadian
Protection wins in election; E. . . . 169
Tariff commission. See Tariff, United States Tariff, European
Step toward freer trade; EP. . . . 192
Tariff, United States
And war debts; EP. . . . 283
Borah resolution for investigation adopted; EP. . . . 2
Canadian reprisals; EP. . . . 137
Commission; appointments; EP. . . . 335
Commission hearings worthless; EP. . . . 513
Coolidge, C., views; EP. . . . 309
Effect on trade; EP. . . . 258
Farmer approves of new tariff. C. Berg; C. . . . 98; letter. . . . 180
Fletcher, H. P., appointment as chairman; EP. . . . 232
Flexible provisions; EP. . . . 2; E. . . . 31
Hoover signs bill. P. Y. Anderson; S. 13
Reform, tariff, down with. H. W. Allen; C. . . . 298
Revision demanded by Senator Swanson; EP 166
Revision requests at home and retaliation threats abroad; EP. . . . 53
Taxation
Labor turnover, tax on, proposed. J. F. Wayne; C. . . . 677
See also Income tax
Teachers. See Colleges and universities
Telco, Paul
Mails, censorship of; S. . . . 144
Telephones
Broun, H., views on its use; S. . . . 8
Tennessee
Senatorship; C. Hull nominated; EP. . . . 192
Tennis
Amateur; what is?; E. . . . 340
Terry, Ellen
Letters between her and G. B. Shaw; EP 665
Tessitore, Joel
Catholicism and liberalism; C. . . . 271
Textile mills. See Strikes
Thanksgiving day
Presidential proclamation; divine providence in; EP. . . . 539
That's gratitude. H. Broun; D. . . . 355
Theater, the Censorship. See Censorship
Realism, away with; E. . . . 516
Survival predicted; E. . . . 216
Third degree
Part of lawless law enforcement; E. . . . 339
This is New York. H. H.; D. . . . 714
This one man. M. Connelly; D. . . . 506
Thomas, J. S. Ladd
Discontinues subscription to The Nation; C 153
Thomas, Norman
Strikers, help for; C. . . . 734
Thomson, Lord
Death in R-101 disaster; EP. . . . 389; letter 552
Thornton, William
Southern comment on lynching; C. . . . 444
Three's a crowd. N. Levy; D. . . . 479
Torch song. H. Broun; D. . . . 303
Tourists. See Travel
Trade, foreign
Falls off; EP. . . . 211
Prohibition by state department, in matter of sale of planes to Russia; EP. . . . 3
Trade unions. See Labor unions
Transportation
Legislative program; EP. . . . 636
Travel
Money spent abroad by tourists; EP. . . . 258
Souvenirs, money spent for; E. . . . 314
Treasury, United States
Raiding; E. . . . 694
Triggs, Oscar L.
California branch of League for independent political action being organized; C. . . . 43
Trilling, Lionel
Is literature possible?; S. . . . 405
Trusts
Competition and trusts in moving-picture business; E. . . . 639
Turkey
Kurds, warfare with; Persia, Great Britain and Mosul oil involved; EP. . . . 312
Twelfth night. D. V. D.; D. . . . 562

U

Unemployment
Administration program lacking. P. Y. Anderson; S. . . . 727
Aliens and unemployment. C. W. King; C 472
Appropriations by congress; EP. . . . 719
Babson, R. W., views. J. Brooks; C. . . . 153
Barnes, J. H., sees return of prosperity; EP 191
Census findings criticized; EP. . . . 211
Estimates unreliable; EP. . . . 82
Fighting Unemployment. I. Organizing the labor market. H. R. Mussey; S. . . . 641
II. Unemployment insurance. H. R. Mussey; S. . . . 673
III. Stabilization. H. R. Mussey; S 704
Government and business. E. Sherwood; C. . . . 297; see also. . . . 237
Hoover committee appointed; EP. . . . 457
Insurance. See Insurance, unemployment, compulsory
Less work—more pay; E. . . . 393
No men wanted. K. Monroe; S. . . . 146
President's job; E. . . . 30
Program for relief; E. . . . 638
Railroad workers indorse six-hour day as relief measure; EP. . . . 596
Relief by publicity; E. . . . 515
Relief; farmers and workers pay. F. S. Kinder; C. . . . 734
Relief measures, suggested; amount of unemployment in the United States unknown; EP. . . . 512
Relief measures, United States and Canada; EP. . . . 232
Second winter; E. . . . 570
Unemployed man speaks. W. Walden; C. 733 Wage insurance. L. Corey; S. . . . 677
letter, with editorial comment. . . . 677
Want, elimination of. I. Rus; C. . . . 582
Woods, Arthur, open letter to, as head of committee; E. . . . 486
World-wide; EP. . . . 192
Unemployment insurance, compulsory. See Insurance, unemployment, compulsory Union of South Africa. See South Africa
Unions, labor. See Labor unions
United States
American, what is? New Republic questionnaire; E. . . . 365
Americans victims of wealth. A. Ruedy; C 153
Backwoods behavior. C. M. Wilson; S. 523
Blunders, diplomatic, with respect to Latin America; EP. . . . 721
Committees, government by; E. . . . 6
Culture since the sixties; S. . . . 615
Economic depression. See Business
Elections. See Elections
Government and business. O. G. Villard; S. . . . 237; letter. . . . 297
Population, preliminary census report; E 196
Public lands. H. S. Graves; S. . . . 147
Rulers, intellectual. H. Hazlitt; S. . . . 273
"Rulers," sixty-four, listed by J. W. Gerard; E. . . . 235
Russia, attitude toward. O. G. Villard; S 172
Rural and urban population; views of G. W. Russell (Æ); E. . . . 366
Russian inability to understand conditions; EP. . . . 55
Treasury, raiding; E. . . . 694
United States of Europe. See Europe
Universities. See Colleges and universities
Unknown warrior. See European war
Urena, Estrella
Thanks The Nation for aid to Santo Domingo; C. . . . 87
Urrea, Blas
Mexico, balance sheet of the revolution; IS 744
Utilities, public. See Public utilities

V

V. D., D.
Grand hotel; D. . . . 634
Twelfth night; D. . . . 562
Valyi, Felix
Ferment in the Arabic world; IS. . . . 77
Van As, Jan
Persia, struggle for power; IS. . . . 160
Van Doren, Mark
Elizabeth the queen; D. . . . 562
Van Etten camp
A. Holmes and M. Husa fined and imprisoned for "insulting" flag; EP. . . . 211
Van Every, Edward
Sins of New York; Book; E. . . . 640
Van Loon, Hendrik Willem
Rembrandt van Rijn, defense; EP. . . . 721
"Vanities," Earl Carroll's. See Censorship, plays
Venereal diseases, campaign against. R. H. Everett; C. . . . 552
Verisimilitude in fiction; E. . . . 436
Vestal bill for design copyright; E. . . . 668
Veteran journalist
Newspaper criminals in Chicago; S. . . . 88; letter 246
Veterans
Pension bill veto sustained by house of representatives. P. Y. Anderson; S. . . . 66
Pension steal voted as compensation law; EP 1
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Germany nears the crisis; S. . . . 603
Government and business; S. . . . 237; letter 297
Press today. VIII. Montana and "the company"; S. . . . 39
IX. Opportunity in the small city; S. . . . 120
X. Hugenberg and the German dailies; S 197
Russia, American attitude toward; S. . . . 172
Soldiers old, soldiers new, in Germany; S 463
Thomson, Lord, justice to; C. . . . 552; see also. . . . 389
Vincent, Stenio. See Haiti
Vinegar tree, the. H. Broun; D. . . . 658
Voich (communist)
Release. C. W. King; C. . . . 97
Voliva, W. G.
Believes world is flat, goes on round-the-world cruise; EP. . . . 391
Vorse, Mary Heaton
Deer dance in Taos; S. . . . 178

W

W., L. F.
Schools for marriage; C..245; see also.. 34
W., S. B.
Church and state; C....552; see also.. 457
Wage insurance. See Insurance, wage, compulsory Wages. See Insurance; wage; labor
Wainhouse, David W.
Anglo-Egyptian failure; IS..... 332
Walden, Wayne
Unemployed man speaks; C..... 733
Walker, Franklin D.
Seeks material for biography of F. Norris; C..... 445
Walton, Eda Lou
In memoriam (A. J.); P..... 439
Now must the mind write; P..... 225
Sunset; P..... 325
Walton, Francis D.
Aeronautics; safety; S..... 438
Want, elimination of. I. Rus; C..... 582
War
Fosdick, H. E., on church and war; EP. 193
Future, predicted; E..... 215
Profits. F. R. Black; S..... 222
Young men and war. J. B. Howie; C. 98
See also Kellogg pact
War claims. See Mixed claims commission
War debts and reparations
And United States tariff; EP..... 283
War memorial
Model for, F. L. Mora's. A. B. MacMurphy; C..... 247
War, world. See European war
Ward, Roswell
Cut your own rent; S..... 269
Warren, Constance
Sarah Lawrence college; S..... 549
Water power. See Power and power industry
Wayne, James F.
Tax on labor turnover; C..... 677
Weather; Dt..... 152
Defended; E..... 724
Wendel fortune, misuse; E..... 142
Wertgen, F.
Catholicism and liberalism; C..... 271
Westchester county; Dt..... 41
What a widow. A. Bakshy; D..... 480
What I believe. J. B. S. Haldane; S....90; letter..... 153
Wheat
Chicago pit operations; EP..... 567
Hyde, Secretary, advises growers; EP.. 54
Price, low, due to supply and demand, not Russian short selling; EP..... 335
Prices and pools. J. E. Boyle; S..... 491
Prices and production; EP..... 284
Problem disturbs Hoover. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 119
Russian "dumping," alleged; E..... 364
Stabilization corporation, Capper defense of; EP..... 596
See also Agricultural relief
White, Hal Saunders
Spring plowing; P..... 128
White hell of Pitz Palu, the. A. Bakshy; D. 424
White house conference on child health and protection
Conference. F. Kelly; S..... 643
Conclusions, controversial; EP..... 595
Proceedings. F. Kelly; S..... 643
White, Randolph William
Crime is crime; C....246; see also.... 88
Whitman, Walt
Elected to hall of fame; EP..... 485
Whoopee. A. Bakshy; D..... 480
Who's who in America; Dt..... 375
Wickersham commission. See National commission on law observance and enforcement Widmayer, Elsa L.
Calls upon Colorado readers to communicate with one another; C..... 98
Wiegand, Charmion von
Sex puritanism in Russia; S..... 62
Wilbur, Ray Lyman
And water power. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 669
Criticized for retaining presidency of Stanford university while acting on federal power commission; EP..... 458
Replies to charge of receiving salary from Stanford university while head of federal power commission; EP..... 596
Still president of Stanford university while secretary of interior; EP..... 512
Wild men of Kalihari, the. A. Bakshy; D. 657
Williams college. See Institute of politics
Wilson, Charles Morrow
Backwoods behavior; S..... 523
Wilson, Romer; letters requested. E. J. O'Brien; C..... 247
Wisconsin
La Follette dynasty's fate at stake in election; EP..... 111
Primaries; P. F. La Follette wins; EP. 335
Wisconsin, university of Experience. M. C. Otto; S..... 467
Experimental college to continue; EP.. 55
With Byrd at the south pole; D..... 49
Women
Asia, central; freedom. L. Fischer; S.. 11
Jobs. A. H. Downing; C..... 651
Labor, cheap southern; EP..... 29
Police use of; E..... 31
Workers, married, of Cedar Rapids may lose jobs; EP..... 513
Workers; mill slaves in Japan; AN.... 134
Workers in Massachusetts. G. Jackson; S..... 608
Woods, Arthur
Open letter to, as head of unemployment committee; E..... 486
Work and pray; E.....32; letter..... 246
Workmen's compensation insurance. See Insurance, workmen's compensation
World court. See League of nations
World, New York
Letters on The Nation's article "What's wrong with the World?"; C..... 126
World To-morrow
Questionnaire on war guilt; EP..... 363
Wright, Frank Lloyd
Not on list of architects of Chicago's world fair of 1933. D. Haskell; S.. 605
Wurdemann, Audrey
Belated sheep; P..... 155

Y

Yachting
America's cup races; E..... 313
Yale university
Harkness Hoot starts; EP..... 459
Yarros, Victor S.
Palestine, future; S..... 117
Yellow-dog injunctions. See Injunctions
Yiddish; Dt..... 580
Young, Governor, of California
Defeated for renomination; EP..... 257
Young Woodley. A. Bakshy; D..... 424

Z

Zameres, Jay
Rolph, James, and Mooney-Billings; C.. 707
Zionism
Essence of. I. Imber; C..298; see also 200
See also Palestine
Zukerman, William
Jews, the—a nation trapped; S....200; letter..... 298
Zwei herzen im ¾ takt. A. Bakshy; D.... 534

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

According to the flesh: A biography of Mary Baker Eddy. F. C. Springer; B.... 683
Adams family, the. J. T. Adams; B..... 70
Adams, Henry, Letters of, 1858-1898. Edited by W. C. Ford; B..... 408
Adams, James Truslow
Adams family, the; B..... 70
Adams, James Truslow; R.....20, 408, 629
Adventures in religion. B. King; B..... 72
Aesthetic judgment. D. W. Prall; B..... 277
After-walker. L. Cline; B..... 130
Ahearn, Danny
How to commit a murder; AN..... 252
Akeley, Carl; Carl Akeley's Africa. M. L. J. Akeley; AN..... 252
Akeley, Mary L. Jobe
Carl Akeley's Africa; AN..... 252
Alain
Mars, or the truth about war; B..... 500
Albert Einstein. A. Reiser; B..... 553
Aldrich, Nelson W. N. W. Stephenson; B. 447
Alexander. K. Mann. Translated by M. Saunders; AN..... 712
Aloe, the. K. Mansfield; B..... 249
Alverdes, Paul
Whistlers' room, the; B..... 102
Amazon, the. E. Paul; AN..... 656
America Challenged. L. C. Carr; AN..... 188
American girl. J. R. Tunis; AN..... 208
American heresy, the. C. Hollis; AN..... 159
American hotel, the. J. Williamson; E.... 462
American leviathan, the. C. A. and W. Beard; B..... 622
American road to culture, the. G. S. Counts; B..... 184
Americanization of Carl Schurz, the. C. V. Easum; B..... 206
Anatomy of music, the. W. Parkhurst; AN. 160
Angel pavement. J. B. Priestley; B..... 300
Anonymous
Youth dares all; B..... 205
Anthony, Edward, and F. Buck
Bring 'em back alive; AN..... 684
Armageddon: The world war in literature. Edited by E. Löhrke; B..... 530
Armament defended by biblical quotation. S. T. Byington; C..... 402
Armitage, Doris Mary
Challenge to neurasthenia, a; AN..... 354
Armstrong, Margaret
Five generations: Life and letters of an American family, 1750-1900; AN.... 504
Around theaters. M. Beerbohm; B..... 680
Art in America. S. La Follette; B..... 326
As I lay dying. W. Faulkner; B..... 500
As I saw it. A. Brooks; B..... 530
As we were. E. F. Benson; B..... 529
Ash-Wednesday. T. S. Eliot; B..... 155
Asquith, Herbert
Pillicock hill; AN..... 558
August Strindberg. V. J. McGill; B..... 183
Austin, Mary; R..... 23
Autocracy of Mr. Parham, the. H. G. Wells; AN..... 208

B

Bach, John Christian and John Sebastian; biographies. C. S. Terry; B..... 74
Bachelor abroad, a. E. Waugh; AN..... 630
Bachhofer, Ludwig
Early Indian sculpture; B..... 302
Back-to-backs, the. J. C. Grant; AN..... 656
Baker, Oliver E., and others
Population; B..... 250
Baker's dozen, a. M. G. Davis; AN..... 556
Banning, W., and G. H.
Six horses; B..... 182
Baring, Maurice
Robert Peckham; AN..... 353
Barkley, John Lewis
No hard feelings; B..... 530
Barnes, Harry Elmer
World politics in modern civilization; B. 130
Barnes, L. S., biographical work on. D. M. Armitage; AN..... 354
Barnes, Margaret Ayer
Years of grace; B..... 158
Baron Fritz. K. Federn. Translated by D. Douglas; B..... 530
Barrett, E. Boyd
Magnificent illusion, the; AN..... 712
Beach, Joseph Warren
Glass mountain; AN..... 532
Beach, Joseph Warren; R..... 622
Beard, Charles A., and William
American leviathan, the; B..... 622
Beasts called wild. A. Demaison. Translated by G. Endore; AN..... 630
Beerbohm, Max
Around theatres; B..... 680
Beethoven, biography in Three titans, by E. Ludwig; B..... 300
Beggars abroad. J. Tully; AN..... 631
Benét, Stephen Vincent
John Brown's body; AN..... 560
Bennett, Arnold
Imperial palace; B..... 736
Journal of things old and new; AN.... 504
Benson, E. F.
As we were; B..... 529
Best seller. N. O. Youmans; AN..... 656
Biography of President von Hindenburg, the. R. Weterstettin and A. M. K. Watson; B..... 251
Biological basis of human nature, the. H. S. Jennings; B..... 181
Birkenfeld, Gunther
Room in Berlin, a. E. Sutton, translator; B..... 620
Birkenhead, Earl of World in 2030 A. D., the; B..... 381
Black Manhattan. J. W. Johnson; B..... 353
Blacksmith of Vilno, the. E. P. Kelly; AN. 558
Blaisdell, Donald C.
European financial control in the Ottoman empire; B..... 101
Blue forest. V. C. White; AN..... 104
Blumenfeld, Josephine
Shrimps for tea; AN..... 330
Blumenfeld, R. D.
In the days of bicycles and bustles. Diary, 1883-1914; B..... 529
Boss, Louise Schulz
Elizabeth Barrett Browning; B..... 45
Bold dragoon, the. W. Irving; AN..... 560
Bolitho, William
Camera obscura; AN..... 740
Bolivar, the passionate warrior. T. R. Ybarra; B..... 185
Book of the three dragons, the. K. Morris; AN..... 558
Books: Their place in a democracy. R. L. Duffus; B..... 248; letter..... 472
Bowers, Claude G.; R..... 447
Boyd, James
Long hunt; AN..... 187
Boyle, Kay
Wedding day and other stories; B..... 711
Brass hat in no man's land, a. F. P. Crozier; B..... 530
Bravery of earth, a. R. Eberhart; AN.... 75
Brawny Wycherley, first master in English modern comedy. W. Connely; B..... 275
Brenner, Anita; R..... 185

Briand, man of peace. V. Thomson; AN.. 252
Bridal pond; Z. Gale; AN..... 588
Bring 'em back alive. F. Buck and E. Anthony; AN..... 684
British documents of the origin of the war, 1898-1914. Vol. VI: Anglo-German tension; armaments and negotiations, 1907-1912; AN..... 330
Brody, Alter; R..... 102
Bromfield, Louis
24 hours; B..... 503
Brooks, Alden
As I saw it; B..... 530
Brown, John: The making of a martyr. R. P. Warren; B..... 22
Brown, Ray C. B.; R..... 418
Brown, W. Norman; R.....303, 682
Browning, Elizabeth Barrett. L. S. Boas; B. 45
Buck, Frank, and E. Anthony
Bring 'em back alive; AN..... 684
Builders of the bay colony. S. E. Morison; B..... 20
Burnett, W. R.
Saint Johnson; AN..... 532
Burnt offering. J. Galzy. Translated by J. Le Clerq; AN..... 655
Buss, Kate
Chinese drama, the; AN..... 252
Butt, Archie
Taft and Roosevelt: The intimate letters of Archie Butt; B..... 501
By way of Cape Horn. A. J. Villiers; AN. 450

C

Cabell, James Branch
Some of us. An essay in epitaphs; B.. 622
Caesarius of Heisterbach
Dialogue on miracles, the. H. von E. Scott and C. C. Swinton Bland, translators; B..... 46
Cahill, Holger
Max Weber; B..... 251
Yankee adventurer, a; B..... 586
Cahill, Holger; R..... 380
Cakes and ale: or the skeleton in the cupboard. W. S. Maugham; B..... 475
Calkins, Clinch
Some folks won't work; B..... 712
Calverton, V. F.; R.....22, 157, 528
Camera obscura. W. Bolitho; AN..... 740
Campos, Ruben
Folklore literario de Mexico, el; B..... 23
Canary village. G. B. Cawthorpe; AN.... 556
Captured! F. H. Horvath; B..... 71
Carl Akeley's Africa; M. L. J. Akeley; AN. 252
Carnock, Lord; biography; B..... 737
Carossa, Hans
Roumanian diary, a. A. N. Scott, translator; AN..... 159
Carr, Lewis F.
America challenged; AN..... 188
Case for India, the. W. Durant; B..... 618
Castle, the. F. Kafka. Translated by E. and W. Muir; B..... 411
Cat who went to heaven, the. E. Coatsworth; AN..... 556
Catlin, George E. G.; R.....278, 736
Cavalry goes through, the! B. Newman; B.. 474
Cawthorpe, Grace B.
Canary village; AN..... 556
Certain people. E. Wharton; B..... 654
Cestre, Charles
Introduction to Edwin Arlington Robinson, an; B..... 382
Challenge to neurasthenia, a. D. M. Armitage; AN..... 354
Chapman, Frank M.
My tropical air castle; AN..... 253
Charles W. Eliot. H. James; B..... 617
Chatterton, E. Keble
Seed of liberty. The story of the American colonies; AN..... 48
Chelsea rooming house. H. Gregory; B.... 679
Cheney, Sheldon
New world architecture, the; B..... 652
Cherry-Garrard, Apsley
Worst journey in the world, the: Antarctic, 1910-1913; B..... 44
Chevalier, Jacques
Pascual. L. A. Claire, translator; AN.. 505
Children's books for fall..... 556
China
The collapse of a civilization. N. Peffer; B..... 554
Chinese art. W. Cohn; AN..... 505
Chinese revolution, the. A. N. Holcombe; B. 278
Christine, and other stories. J. Green; AN. 104
Civilization and its discontents. S. Freud. Translated by J. Riviere; B..... 299
Clark, Jane Perry; R..... 101
Claudia. A. Zweig. Translated by E. Sutton; B..... 620
Claudine at school. Colette and Willy; AN. 589
Cline, Leonard
After-walker; B..... 130
Coates, Robert M.
Outlaw years, the; B..... 380
Coatsworth, Elizabeth
Cat who went to heaven, the; AN.... 556
Cocteau, Jean
Enfants terribles. S. Putnam, translator; AN..... 48
Codman, Florence
Lamp and the lute, the; B..... 207
Codman, Florence; R.....411, 654
Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
Laud: Storm center of Stuart England; B..... 156
Cohn, William
Chinese art; AN..... 505
Coleman, Emily Holmes
Shutter of snow, the; AN..... 684
Coleman, McAlister
Eugene V. Debs; B..... 206
Colette
Mitsou: or How girls grow wise. J. Terry, translator; AN..... 159
Colette and Willy
Claudine at school; AN..... 589
Colossal blunders of the war. W. S. Woods; B..... 474
Colum, Padraic
Old pastures; B..... 738
Coming of the war, 1914, the. B. E. Schmitt; B..... 737
Coming of the white man, the, 1492-1848 (A history of American life, volume I). H. I. Priestley; B..... 47
Commager, Henry Steele, and Samuel Eliot Morison
Growth of the American republic, the; B. 629
Communist and cooperative colonies. C. Gide. Translated by E. F. Row; AN..... 684
Complete works of William Hazlitt, the. Edited by P. P. Howe; B..... 735
Condliffe, J. B.
New Zealand in the making; B..... 129
Confessions of Zeno, the. I. Svevo; B..... 183
Confucianism. F. Starr; AN..... 132
Connely, Willard
Brawny Wycherley, first master in English modern comedy; B..... 275
Conquest of happiness, the. B. Russell; B.. 379
Constitution of the United States, the: A brief and general commentary. W. B. Munro; AN..... 103
Contemporary American philosophy. G. P. Adams and W. P. Montague, editors; B..... 19
Contemporary immortals. A. Henderson; AN. 450
Cooley, Charles Horton
Sociological theory and social research; selected papers; B..... 527
Corbin, John
Unknown Washington, the; AN..... 187
Corley, Donald
Fifth son of the shoemaker, the; AN.. 588
Cosima Wagner. R. count du Moulin-Eckart. Translated by C. A. Phillips; B..... 418
Course of English classicism, the. S. Vines; B..... 225 Counts, George S.
American road to culture, the; B..... 184
Cowell, Henry
New musical resources; AN..... 188
Cradle of God, the. L. Powys; B..... 72
Critique of humanism, the. A symposium. Edited by C. H. Grattan; B..... 99
Crowther, Samuel, in collaboration with H. Ford
Moving forward; B..... 681
Crozier, F. P.
Brass hat in no man's land, a; B..... 530

D

D. H Lawrence. S. Potter; AN..... 531
D'Abernon, Viscount
Rapallo to Dawes, 1922-1924. The diary of an ambassador; AN..... 132
Damon, S. Foster
Day after Christmas, the; AN..... 558
Dance of youth, the. H. Sudermann. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B..... 620
Dangers of obedience and other essays, the. H. J. Laski; B..... 156
Daniel Webster. C. M. Fuess; B..... 554
Dartmouth verse. 1930; AN..... 421
Davis, Elmer
Morals for moderns; B..... 654
Davis, Jerome; R..... 184
Davis, Mary Gould
Baker's dozen, a; AN..... 556
Day after Christmas, the. S. F. Damon; AN..... 558
Dead towns and living men. C. L. Wooley; B..... 20
Debs, Eugene V.; two biographies; B..... 206
Decorative art, 1930. Edited by C. G. Holme and S. B. Wainwright; AN.. 208
Demaison, André
Beasts called wild. G. Endore, translator; AN..... 630
Deutsche arbeit in Amerika. K. Francke; B. 301
Deutschlands aussenpolitik in der nachkriegszeit. E. Koch-Weser; AN..... 279
Deval, Jacques
Wooden swords; AN..... 132
Development of Harvard university, the, 1869-1929. Edited by S. E. Morison; B..... 274
Dewey, John
Individualism old and new; B..... 446
Dialogue on miracles, the. Caesarius of Heisterbach. Translated by H. von E. Scott and C. C. Swinton Bland; B.. 46
Dilemma of the liberated, the. G. B. Munson; B..... 475
Dobie, J. Frank; R..... 182
Dobrée, Bonamy
Lamp and the lute, the; B..... 207
Doctor Donne and Gargantua. The first six cantos. S. Sitwell; B..... 585
Doubloons: The story of buried treasure; AN..... 560
Douglas, Norman
Good-bye to western culture; B..... 351
Driberg, J. H.
People of the small arrow; AN..... 132
Driscoll, Charles B.
Doubloons: The story of buried treasure; AN..... 560
Droll Peter. F. Timmermans. Translated by M. C. Darnton and W. J. Paul; AN. 159
Duffus, R. L.
Books: Their place in a democracy; B.....248; letter..... 472
Santa Fé trail, the; AN..... 631
Duffy, Herbert S.
William Howard Taft; B..... 501
Dumas, Alexandre
Nutcracker of Nuremberg, the. G. Gingras, translator; AN..... 556
Durant, Will
Case for India, the; B..... 618
Dwinger, Edwin Erich
Prisoner of war: A Siberian diary. I. F. D. Morrow, translator; B..... 683

E

Early Indian sculpture. L. Bachhofer; B.. 302
Earth told me, the. T. Williamson; AN.... 479
Easton, Emily
Roger Williams, prophet and pioneer; B. 276
Easum, Chester Verne
Americanization of Carl Schurz, the; B. 206
Eberhart, Richard
Bravery of earth, a; AN..... 75
Edwardians, the. V. Sackville-West; B.... 413
Edwards, Jonathan: The fiery puritan. H. B. Parkes; B..... 584
Eddy, Mary Baker; two biographies; B.... 683
Eggebrecht, Axel
Pilgrim to the abyss. M. M. Bozman, translator; B..... 46
Einstein, Albert. A. Reiser; B..... 553
Eldridge, Paul, and George Sylvester Viereck
Salome, the wandering Jewess; AN.... 588
Eliot, Charles W. H. James; B..... 617
Eliot, George, biography. J. L. May; B.... 100
Eliot, T. S.
Ash-Wednesday; B..... 155
Elizabeth Barrett Browning. L. S. Boas; B. 45
Elizabethan journal, a. Being a record of those things most talked of during the years 1519-1594. G. B. Harrison; AN 49
Emerson, Gertrude
Voiceless India; B..... 682
Emerson, Gertrude; R..... 618
Emil and the detectives. E. Kastner. Translated by M. Masse; AN..... 556
Emily. MacG. Jenkins; AN..... 450
Encyclopedia of the social sciences. Edited by E. R. A. Seligman and A. Johnson. Vol. II; AN..... 505
Endore, Guy
Man from limbo, the; B..... 628
Endres, Franz Carl
Schönheit am mittelmeer; AN..... 252
Enfants terribles. J. Cocteau. Translated by S. Putnam; AN..... 48
England under Queen Anne. Vol. I. Blenheim. G. M. Trevelyan; B..... 682
Erl king, the. E. Granberry; AN..... 532
Erlande, Albert
Life of John Keats; B..... 45
Essays on things. W. L. Phelps; B..... 473
Ethical basis of political authority, the. W. W. Willoughby; B..... 278
Eugène Sue. P. Ginisty; AN..... 279
Eugene V. Debs. McA. Coleman; B..... 206
European financial control in the Ottoman empire. D. C. Blaisdell; B..... 101
Evans, Ernestine; R..... 556
Every mother's son. N. Lindsay; AN..... 421
Everyman at war. Sixty personal narratives of the war; B..... 71
Evolution of modern marriage, the. F. Müller-Lyer; B..... 21
Ewen, David; R..... 74

F

Fadiman, Clifton P.; R.....249, 413, 500, 617
Fall list..... 425
Family, the. F. Mauriac. Translated by L. Galantière; B..... 416
Faulkner, William
As I lay dying; B..... 500
Federn, Karl
Baron Fritz. D. Douglas, translator; B. 530
Feise, Ernst; R..... 301

Ferber, Nat J.
Spawn: A novel of degeneration; AN.. 630
Ferris, Helen
When I was a girl; AN..... 560
Ferriss, Hugh
Metropolis of tomorrow, the; AN..... 208
Feuchtwanger, Lion
Success. W. and E. Muir, translators; B 620
Field, Rachel
Patchwork plays; AN..... 556
Fifteen rabbits. F. Salten; AN..... 330
Fifth son of the shoemaker, the. D. Corley; AN 588
Figgis, Darrell
Return of the hero, the; AN..... 103
Finger, Charles J.
Seven horizons; B..... 249
Five children, the. E. Nesbit; AN..... 556
Five generations: Life and letters of an American family; 1750-1900. M. Armstrong; AN..... 504
500 Criminal careers. S. and Eleanor T. Glueck; B..... 227
Five masters. J. W. Krutch; B..... 617
Fleg, Edmond
Life of Solomon, the; AN..... 104
Fischer, Louis
Soviets in world affairs, the; B..... 449
Flexner, Abraham
Universities—American, English, German; E..... 599
Floating island. A. Parrish; AN..... 556
Flores, Angel
Lope de Vega; AN..... 75
Flood. R. Neumann; B..... 45
Flowering Judas. K. A. Porter; B..... 352
Flynn, John T.
Investment trusts gone wrong!; B..... 325
Foerster, Norman
Toward standards; B..... 499
Folklore literario de Mexico, el. R. Campos; B..... 23
For the defense: The life of Sir Edward Marshall Hall. E. Marjoribanks; B.. 47
Ford, Henry, in collaboration with S. Crowther
Moving forward; B..... 681
Fouché, Joseph. S. Zweig; B..... 226
Fourteen years of European investments, 1914-1928. S. Stern; AN..... 208
Frances, countess of Warwick
Life's ebb and flow: B..... 186
Francke, Kuno
Deutsche arbeit in Amerika; B..... 301
Frank, Tenney; R..... 626
Fredenburgh, Theodore
Soldiers march!; B..... 530
Freeman, Joseph, J. Kunitz, and L. Lozowick
Voices of October: Art and literature in soviet Russia; B..... 276
Freud, Sigmund
Civilization and its discontents. J. Riviere, translator; B..... 299
From centaur to cross. Being the hitherto unpublished letters of M. de Guérin. Together with a new translation of De Guérin's Centaur; AN..... 49
From Toulouse-Lautrec to Rodin. A. Symons; B..... 588
Fry, Roger
Essay in biography of H. Matisse; B.. 328
Fuess, Claude Moore
Daniel Webster; B..... 554
Future of the German empire, the. Criticisms and postulates. General von Seeckt. Translated by O. Williams; B 328

G

Gadd, C. J.
History and monuments of Ur; AN.... 133
Gale, Zona
Bridal pond; AN..... 588
Gallipoli memories. C. Mackenzie; AN.... 24
Galsworthy, John
On Forsyte 'change; B..... 447
Galzy, Jeanne
Burnt offering. J. Le Clerq, translator; AN..... 655
Gamio, Manuel
Mexican immigration to the United States; B..... 417
Gandhi, Mahatma—His own story. Edited by C. F. Andrews; B..... 618
Gannett, Lewis S.; R..... 554
Garborg, Arne
Peace. P. D. Carleton, translator; AN. 229
Garland, Hamlin
Roadside meetings; B..... 351
Generals die in bed. C. Y. Harrison; B.. 71
Gentleman in the parlour, the. W. S. Maugham; B..... 129
George Eliot. J. L. May; B..... 100
George Harvey: A passionate patriot. W. F. Johnson; B.....74; see also letter 246
German diplomatic documents, 1871-1914. Volume III: The growing antagonism, 1898-1910. Edited by E. T. S. Dugdale; B..... 737
Germany's women go forward. H. W. Puckett; B..... 73
Gettysburg, Manila, Acoma. E. L. Masters; B..... 226
Giant of the western world, the. F. Miller and H. Hill; AN..... 741
Gide, Charles
Communist and cooperative colonies. E. F. Row, translator; AN..... 684 Gini, Corrado, and others
Population; B..... 250
Ginisty, Paul
Eugène Sue; AN..... 279
Ginzburg, Benjamin; R..... 383
Glass mountain. J. W. Beach; AN..... 532
Glenn, Isa
Short history of Julia, a; AN..... 655
Glory of the nightingales, the. E. A. Robinson; B..... 382
Glotz, Gustave
Greek city, the; AN..... 505
Glueck, S., and E. T.
500 criminal careers; B..... 227
God. J. M. Murry; B..... 72
God without thunder. J. C. Ransom; B.... 711
Goldsmith, Margaret, and F. Voigt
Hindenburg: The man and the legend; B 251
Good-bye to western culture. N. Douglas; B 351
Good estate of poetry, the. C. B. Tinker; AN 253
Governor of Massachusetts, the. E. Paul; B 326
Granberry, Edwin
Erl king, the; AN..... 532
Grant, J. C.
Back-to-backs, the; AN..... 656
Grattan, C. Hartley; R..74 (see also letter, 246), 302, 351 ,475, 655
Great revival, 1543-1687, the (A history of modern culture. Volume I). P. Smith; B..... 71
Greek city, the. G. Glotz; AN..... 505
Gregory, Alyse; R..... 300
Gregory, Horace
Chelsea rooming house; B..... 679
Gregory, Horace; R.....71, 226, 301, 588, 628
Green, Julian
Christine, and other stories; AN..... 104
Greene, Ward
Ride the nightmare; AN..... 329
Griswold, Francis
Tides of Malvern, the; AN..... 331
Growth and decadence of constitutional government, the. J. A. Smith; AN.... 132
Growth of the American republic, the. S. E. Morison and H. S. Commager; B.... 629
Guérin, Maurice de
From centaur to cross. Being the hitherto unpublished letters of M. de Guerin. Together with a new translation of his Centaur; AN..... 49
Gunnarsson, Gunnar
Seven days' darkness. R. Tapley, translator; AN..... 740
Gutman, Walter; R.....276; 328

H

Hacker, Louis M.; R.....501; 653
Hall, Sir Edward Marshall; biography. E. Marjoribanks; B..... 47
Hall, Thomas Cuming
Religious background of American culture, the; B..... 302
Hallgren, Mauritz A.; R..... 740
Hamsun, Knut
Vagabonds; B..... 528
Hardy, Thomas, novel on life of; R..... 475
Harlow, Ralph Volney; R..... 47
Harrison, Charles Yale
Generals die in bed; B..... 71
Harrison, G. B.
Elizabethan journal, an. Being a record of those things most talked of during the years 1519-1594; AN.... 49
Hart, B. H. Liddell
Real war, 1914 to 1918, the; B..... 474
Harvey, George: A passionate patriot. W. F. Johnson; B.....74; see also letter.. 246
Haskell, Douglas; R..... 207
Hazlitt, Henry; R....19, 181, 205, 225, 248, 299, 325, 379, 407, 446, 473, 499, 527, 553, 652, 679, 709, 736
Hazlitt, William, complete works. Edited by P. P. Howe; B..... 735
Henderson, Archibald
Contemporary immortals; AN..... 450
Henry Matisse. With an essay by R. Fry; B 328
Her privates we. Private 19022; B..... 71
Hermant, Abel
Last and first love. S. Brown, translator; AN..... 631
Herskovits, Melville J.; R..102; correction of review 247
Hicks, Granville; R.....382, 585, 620, 736
Hill, Helen, and F. Miller
Giant of the western world, the; AN.. 741
Hindenburg: The man and the legend. M. Goldsmith and F. Voigt; B..... 251
Hindenburg, two biographies; B..... 251
History and monuments of Ur. C. J. Gadd; AN 133
History of biological theories, the. E. Radl. Translated by E. T. Hatfield; AN... 386
History of cooperative news-gathering in the United States. V. Rosewater; B.... 420
History of Iberian civilization, the. J. P. O. Martins. Translated by A. F. G. Bell; AN..... 103
History of the Jews, a. A. L. Sachar; B. 228
Hitchcock, Henry-Russell, Jr.
Modern architecture; B..... 207
Hobson, J. A.
Rationalization and unemployment; B.. 414
Hoel, Sigurd
Sinners in summertime. E. Sprigge and C. Napier, translators; AN..... 187
Hoffenstein, Samuel
Year in, you're out; AN..... 23
Holcombe, Arthur N.
Chinese revolution, the; B..... 278
Hollis, Christopher
American heresy, the; AN..... 159
Honey Holler. K. MacKaye; AN..... 159
Hook, Sidney; R..... 476
Horvath, Ferdinand Huszti
Captured!; B..... 71
Hosie, Lady
Portrait of a Chinese lady; AN..... 133
Hot countries. A. Waugh; B..... 129
Hound of Florence, the. F. Salten. Translated by H. Paterson; AN..... 48
How they carried the mail. J. Walker; AN 558
How to commit a murder. D. Ahearn; AN. 252
Hubbard, Ralph
Queer person; AN..... 558
Hughes, Langston
Not without laughter; B..... 157
Hunt, Rockwell D., and N. de G. Sanchez
Short history of California, a; AN.... 133

I

Identity and reality. E. Meyerson. Translated by K. Lowenberg; B..... 383
Imperial palace. A. Bennett; B..... 736
In the days of bicycles and bustles. Diary of R. D. Blumenfeld, 1883-1914; B. 529
India, five books on; B..... 618
Individualism old and new; J. Dewey; B... 446
Introduction to Edwin Arlington Robinson, an. C. Cestre; B..... 382
Introduction to social anthropology, an. C. Wissler; AN..... 656
Introduction to the history of science. Volume I. From Homer to Omar Khayyam. G. Sarton; B..... 250
Investment trusts gone wrong! J. T. Flynn; B..... 325
Irving, Washington
Bold dragoon, the; AN..... 560
Istrati, Panait
Thistles of the Baragan, the. Translated by J. LeClercq; AN..... 48

J

Jade mountain, the. A Chinese anthology; AN 49
James, Henry
Charles W. Eliot; B..... 617
Jansson, A. H.
American merchant marine; C....708; see also E..... 571
Jeans, Sir James
Mysterious universe, the; B..... 653
Jenkins, MacGregor
Emily; AN..... 450
Jennings, H. S.
Biological basis of human nature, the; B 181
Jews in the Christian era. L. Magnus; B.. 228
Jews, two histories; B..... 228
John Brown: The making of a martyr. R. P. Warren; B..... 22
John Brown's body. S. V. Benét; AN..... 560
John Christian Bach. C. S. Terry; B..... 74
John Sebastian Bach. C. S. Terry; B..... 74
Johnson, Charles S.
Negro in American civilization, the; B. 44
Johnson, James Weldon
Black Manhattan; B..... 353
Johnson, Willis Fletcher
George Harvey: A passionate patriot; B 74
Jonathan Edwards: The fiery puritan. H. B. Parkes; B..... 584
Joseph Fouché. S. Zweig; B..... 226
Josephson, Matthew; R.....183, 615
Journal of my other self, the. R. M. Rilke. Translated by J. Linton; B..... 679
Journal of things old and new. A. Bennett; AN..... 504
Junior anthology of world poetry, a; AN.... 49

K

Kafka, Franz
Castle, the. E. and W. Muir, translators; B..... 411

Kaiser and chancellor. K. F. Nowak. Translated by E. W. Dickes; B..... 739
Kastner, Erich
Emil and the detectives. M. Masse, translator; AN..... 556
Kaye-Smith, Sheila
Shepherds in sackcloth; AN..... 228
Keats, John, life of. A. Erlande; B..... 45
Kelly, Eric P.
Blacksmith of Vilno, the; AN..... 558
Kenyon, Theda
Witches still live. A study of the black art of today; AN..... 354
Killegrew, Thomas. A. Harbake; B..... 275
King, Basil
Adventures in religion; B..... 72
Kirkpatrick, Clifford
Religion in human affairs; B..... 72
Koch-Weser, Erich
Deutschlands aussenpolitik in der nachkriegszeit; AN..... 279
Krupp. A great business man seen through his letters. Edited by W. Berdrow. Translated by E. W. Dickes; AN.... 384
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Five masters; B..... 617
Kuczynski, Robert R., and others
Population; B..... 250
Kunitz, Joseph, J. Freeman, and L. Lozowick
Voices of October: Art and literature in soviet Russia; B..... 276
Kunitz, Stanley J.; R..... 585

L

Labor speaks for itself. A symposium by labor leaders throughout the world. Edited by J. Davis; B..... 182
La Follette, Suzanne
Art in America; B..... 326
Laments for the living. D. Parker; AN.. 75
Lamp and the lute, the. B. Dobrée; B..... 207
Laski, Harold J.
Dangers of obedience and other essays, the; B..... 156
Lasswell, Harold D.
Psychopathology and politics; B..... 736
Last and first love. A. Hermant. Translated by S. Brown; AN..... 631
Last frontier, the. Z. T. Sutley; B..... 182
Last paradise, the. H. Powell; B..... 129
Last rustler, the. L. Sage; B..... 182
Laud: Storm center of Stuart England. R. P. T. Coffin; B..... 156
Lawrence, D. H.
Virgin and the gipsy, the; B..... 710
Lawrence, D. H. S. Potter; AN..... 531
Lemaitre, Jules
On the margins of old books; B..... 382
Letters of Henry Adams, 1858-1891. Edited by W. C. Ford; B..... 408
Letters of James Whitcomb Riley. Edited by W. L. Phelps; B..... 655
Levy, Newman; R..... 47
Lewis, Sinclair; R..... 474
Life and letters of Joseph Pennell, the. E. R. Pennell; AN..... 24
Life of John Keats. A. Erlande; B..... 45
Life of Solomon, the. E. Fleg; AN..... 104
Life's ebb and flow. Frances, countess of Warwick; B..... 186
Lindsay, Norman
Every mother's son; AN..... 421
Little dog laughed, the. L. Merrick; AN... 303
Lobagola, an African savage's own story. B. K. A. I. Lobagola; B.....102; correction of review..... 247
Löhrke, Eugene; R..158, 183, 226, 273, 300, 503
Long hunt. J. Boyd; AN..... 187
Lope de Vega. A. Flores; AN..... 75
Loving, Pierre; R..... 45
Lozowick, Louis; R..... 251
Lozowick, Louis, J. Freeman, and J. Kunitz
Voices of October: Art and literature in soviet Russia; B..... 276
Luckner, Count von, biographical work on; L. Thomas; AN..... 354
Ludwig, Emil
Three titans; B..... 300

M

Macaulay, Rose
Staying with relations; B..... 625
MacDonald, William; R..22, 128, 251, 276, 328, 381, 528, 554, 625
McFee, William
North of Suez; AN..... 103
McHugh, Vincent
Touch me not: Four writs of a curt picaresque; AN..... 279
MacKaye, Keith
Honey Holler; AN..... 159
Mackenzie, Compton
Gallipoli memories; AN..... 24
McKeon, Richard; R..... 250
MacLeish, Archibald
New Found Land; B..... 21
Macy, John; R..... 100
Madariaga, Salvador de; R..... 130
Made in Mexico. S. Smith; AN..... 560
Magnificent illusion, the. E. B. Barrett; AN..... 712
Magnus, Laurie
Jews in the Christian era, the; B..... 228
Mahatma Gandhi—His own story. Edited by C. F. Andrews; B..... 618
Main currents in American thought. III. Beginnings of critical realism in America. V. Parrington; B..... 615
Makers of the unwritten constitution, the. W. B. Munro; AN..... 208
Man and his dog, a. T. Mann. Translated by H. G. Scheffauer; AN..... 504
Man from limbo, the. G. Endore; B..... 628
Mandates under the league of nations. Q. Wright; B..... 528
Mann, Klaus
Alexander. M. Saunders, translator; AN..... 712
Mann, Thomas
Man and his dog, a. H. G. Sheffauer, translator; AN..... 504
Mansfield, Katherine
Aloe, the; B..... 249
Markun, Leo
Mrs. Grundy; B..... 530
Mars, or the truth about war. Alain; B.. 500
Marsh, Fred T.; R.....46, 101, 416, 683
Martins, J. P. Oliveira
History of Iberian civilization, the. A. F. G. Bell, translator; AN..... 103
Mary Baker Eddy: A life-size portrait. L. P. Powell; B..... 683
Masefield, John
Wanderer of Liverpool, the; B..... 585
Masters, Edgar Lee
Gettysburg, Manila, Acoma; B..... 226
Matisse, Henry. With an essay by R. Fry; B..... 328
Maugham, W. Somerset
Cakes and ale: or the skeleton in the cupboard; B..... 475
Gentleman in the parlour, the; B..... 129
Mauriac, François
Family, the. L. Galantière, translator; B..... 416
Maurice Guest. H. H. Richardson; B..... 380
Maurois, André
Silence of Colonel Bramble, the; B.... 301
May, J. Lewis
George Eliot; B..... 100
Memoirs of an infantry officer. S. Sassoon; B..... 412
Memories and vagaries. A. Munthe; AN.. 741
Max Weber. H. Cahill; B..... 251
Mencken, H. L.; R.....70, 617
Merrick, Leonard
Little dog laughed, the; AN..... 303
Metropolis of tomorrow, the. H. Ferriss; AN..... 208
Mexican immigration to the United States. M. Gamio; B..... 417
Meyerson, Emile
Identity and reality. K. Lowenberg, translator; B..... 383
Michelangelo, biography, in Three titans, by E. Ludwig; B..... 300
Millen, Gilmore
Sweet man; B..... 101
Miller, Francis, and H. Hill
Giant of the western world, the; AN.. 741
Mirthful haven. B. Tarkington; AN..... 589
Miss Mole. E. H. Young; AN..... 450
Mitsou: or How girls grow wise. Colette. Translated by J. Terry; AN..... 159
Modern architecture. H.-R. Hitchcock, Jr.; B..... 207
Modern writers at work. Edited by J. K. Piercy; B..... 709
Mook, Charles C., and Edith S. Walker
Tales of the first animals; AN..... 558
Morals for moderns. E. Davis; B..... 654
Morgan the magnificent. J. K. Winkler; B. 327
Morison, Samuel Eliot
Builders of the bay colony; B..... 20
Morison, Samuel Eliot; R..... 738
Morison, Samuel Eliot, and Henry Steele Commager
Growth of the American republic, the; B..... 629
Morris, Kenneth
Book of the three dragons, the; AN.... 558
Morrow, Felix; R.....500, 711
Moulin-Eckart, Richard, Count du Cosima Wagner; B..... 418
Moving forward. H. Ford, in collaboration with S. Crowther; B..... 681
Moxley, F. Wright
Red snow; AN..... 303
Mrs. Grundy. L. Markun; B..... 530
Mukerji, Dhan Gopal
Rama: Hero of India; AN..... 558
Müller-Lyer, F.
Evolution of modern marriage, the; B.. 21
Munro, William Bennett
Constitution of the United States, the. A brief and general commentary; AN.. 103
Makers of the unwritten constitution, the; AN..... 208
Munson, Gorham B.
Dilemma of the liberated, the; B..... 475
Munthe, Axel
Memories and vagaries; AN..... 741
Story of San Michele, the; AN..... 741
Murray, J. Middleton
God; B..... 72
Mussey, Henry Raymond; R.....206, 414, 586
Must England lose India? The nemesis of empire. A. Osburn; B..... 128
My tropical air castle. F. M. Chapman; AN..... 253
Mysterious universe, the. Sir J. Jeans; B.. 653

N

Nasu, Shiroshi, and others
Population; B..... 250
Needham, Joseph
Sceptical biologist, the; B..... 274
Negro in American civilization. C. S. Johnson; B..... 44
Neilson, William A.; R..... 274
Nelson W. Aldrich. N. W. Stephenson; B. 447
Nesbit, E.
Five children, the; AN..... 556
Neumann, Robert
Flood; B..... 45
New criticism, the. Edited by E. B. Burgum; B..... 408
New encyclopedia of music and musicians, the. Edited by W. S. Pratt; AN.... 229
New Found Land. A. MacLeish; B..... 21
New generation, the. Edited by V. F. Calverton and S. D. Schmalhausen; AN. 384
New musical resources. H. Cowell; AN.... 188
New world architecture, the. S. Cheney; B. 652
New Zealand in the making. J. B. Condliffe; B..... 129
Newer knowledge of bacteriology and immunology, the. By eighty-two contributors; AN..... 253
Newhall, Richard A.; R..... 46
Newman, Bernard
Cavalry goes through!, the; B..... 474
Newman, Ernest
Stories of the great operas; AN..... 160
Nerval, Gerard de
Women of Cairo, the; AN..... 24
Nexö, Martin Andersen
Pelle the conqueror; AN..... 76
Nicolson, Harold
Portrait of a diplomatist, a; B..... 737
No hard feelings! J. L. Barkley; B..... 530
Norris, Charles G.
Seed; AN..... 228
North of Suez. W. McFee; AN..... 103
Not without laughter. L. Hughes; B..... 157
Nowak, Karl Friedrich
Kaiser and chancellor. E. W. Dickes, translator; B..... 739
Nutcracker of Nuremberg, the. A. Dumas. Translated by G. Gingras; AN..... 556

O

O'Flaherty, Liam
Two years; B..... 448
Old book, the. A mediaeval anthology. Edited and illuminated by D. Hartley; AN..... 478
Old pastures. P. Colum; B..... 738
On Forsyte 'change. J. Galsworthy; B.... 447
On the margins of old books. J. Lemaitre; B..... 382
Only saps work. C. Terrett; AN..... 331
Open range, the, and bunk house philosophy. O. Rush; B..... 182
Osburn, Arthur
Must England lose India? The nemesis of empire; B..... 128
Our biggest customer. G. H. Phelps; AN. 280
Our times. Volume III; Pre-war America. M. Sullivan; B..... 740
Outlaw years, the. R. M. Coates; B..... 380

P

Painter, Floy Ruth
That man Debs and his life work; B.. 206
Papini, Giovanni
St. Augustine. D. Emmerich, translator; B..... 158
Parker, DeWitt; R..... 277
Parker, Dorothy
Laments for the living; AN..... 75
Parkes, Henry Bamford
Jonathan Edwards: The fiery puritan; B. 584
Parkhurst, Winthrop
Anatomy of music, the; AN..... 160
Parrington, Vernon
Main currents in American thought. III. Beginnings of critical realism in America; B..... 615
Parrish, Anne
Floating island; AN..... 556
Parrott, Ursula
Strangers may kiss; AN..... 228
Pascual. J. Chevalier. Translated by L. A. Claire; AN..... 505
Patchwork plays. R. Field; AN..... 556
Patriot's progress, the. H. Williamson; AN. 303
Patterson, Ernest Minor
World's economic dilemma, the; B..... 586

Paul, Eliot
Amazon, the; AN. 656
Governor of Massachusetts, the; B. 326
Peace. A. Garborg. Translated by P. D. Carleton; AN. 229
Peffer, Nathaniel
China: The collapse of a civilization; B. 554
Pelle the conqueror. M. A. Nexö; AN. . . . 76
Pennell, Elizabeth Robbins
Life and letters of Joseph Pennell, the; AN 24
Pennell, Joseph, life and letters of. E. R. Pennell; AN. 24
People of the small arrow. J. H. Driberg; AN 132
Petrova, Natalia
Twice born in Russia. Baroness M. Budberg, translator; B. 328
Phelps, George Harrison
Our biggest customer; AN. 280
Phelps, William Lyon
Essays on things; B. 473
Picture books, new. 555
Pilgrim to the abyss. A. Eggebrecht. Translated by M. M. Bozman; B. 46
Pillicock hill. H. Asquith; AN. 558
Pitter, Ruth
Poems; B. 383
Poems. R. Pitter; B. 383
Poetry at present. C. Williams; AN. 531
Population. C. Gini, S. Nasu, R. R. Kuczynski, O. E. Baker; B. 250
Porter, Katherine Anne
Flowering Judas; B. 352
Portrait of a Chinese lady. Lady Hosie; AN 133
Portrait of a diplomatist. H. Nicolson; B. 737
Post, Augustus
Skycraft; AN. 558
Potter, Stephen
D. H. Lawrence; AN. 531
Powell, Hickman
Last paradise, the; B. 129
Powell, Lyman P.
Mary Baker Eddy: A life-size portrait; B 683
Power of India, the. M. Pym; B. 618
Powys, Llewellyn
Cradle of God, the; B. 72
Prall, D. W.
Aesthetic judgment; B. 277
Priestley, Herbert Ingram
Coming of the white man, the, 1492-1848 (A history of American life, Volume I); B. 47
Priestley, J. B.
Angel pavement; B. 300
Prisoner of war: A Siberian diary. E. E. Dwinger. Translated by I. F. D. Morrow; B. 683
Private 19022
Her privates we; B. 71
Problems of the Pacific, 1929. Edited by J. B. Condliffe; AN. 657
Proof, the. Y. Winters; B. 679
Prophets of the new India. R. Rolland. Translated by E. F. Malcolm-Smith; B 618
Protestant ethic, the, and the spirit of capitalism. M. Weber. Translated by T. Parsons; B. 476
Psychological exercises. Edited by A. R. Orage; AN. 449
Psychopathology and politics. H. D. Lasswell; B. 736
Puckett, Hugh Wiley
Germany's women go forward; B. 73
Puritan mind, the. H. W. Schneider; B. . . 738
Pym, Michael
Power of India, the; B. 618

Q

Queer person. R. Hubbard; AN. 558

R

Radl, Emanuel
History of biological theories, the. E. T. Hatfield, translator; AN. 386
Rama: Hero of India. D. G. Mukerji; AN 558
Ransom, John Crowe
God without thunder; B. 711
Rapallo to Dawes, 1922-1924. The diary of an ambassador. Viscount d'Abernon; AN 132
Rationalization and unemployment. J. A. Hobson; B. 414
Real war, 1914 to 1918, the. B. H. L. Hart; B. 474
Realm of matter, the. G. Santayana; B. . . . 407
Red snow. F. W. Moxley; AN. 303
Redfield, Robert
Tepoztlán—a Mexican village; B. 417
Reed, Thomas B.: Parliamentarian. W. A. Robinson; B. 653
Refutation of the Versailles war guilt thesis, a. A. von Wegerer; B. 737
Reiser, Anton
Albert Einstein; B. 553
Religion in human affairs. C. Kirkpatrick; B 72
Religious background of American culture, the. T. C. Hall; B. 302
Rembrandt; biography, in Three titans, by E. Ludwig; B. 300
Restoration tragedy, 1660-1720. B. Dobrée; B 275
Return of the hero, the. D. Figgis; AN. . . . 103
Richardson, Henry Handel
Maurice Guest; B. 380
Ride the nightmare. W. Greene; AN. 329
Riley, James Whitcomb
Letters. Edited by W. L. Phelps; B. . 655
Rilke, Rainer Maria
Journal of my other self, the. J. Linton, translator; B. 679
River goes with heaven, a. H. Vines; AN. . 741
Roadside meetings. H. Garland; B. 351
Robert Pechman. M. Baring; AN. 353
Roberts, Donald A.; R. 156, 275
Robertson, William Spence; R. 185
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
Glory of the nightingales, the; B. 382
Robinson, Edwin Arlington; introduction to, and book by; B. 382
Robinson, L. E.; R. 740
Robinson, William A.
Thomas B. Reed: Parliamentarian; B. . 653
Roger Williams, prophet and pioneer. E. Easton; B. 276
Rolland, Romain
Prophets of the new India. E. F. Malcolm-Smith, translator; B. 618
Room in Berlin, a. G. Birkenfeld. Translated by E. Sutton; B. 620
Roosevelt and Taft; two books on; B. 501
Roosevelt: The story of a friendship. O. Wister; AN. 303
Rorty, James; R. 681, 712
Rosewater, Victor
History of cooperative news-gathering in the United States; B. 420
Roumanian diary, a. H. Carossa. Translated by A. N. Scott; AN. 159
Rush, Oscar
Open range, the, and bunk house philosophy; B. 182
Russell, Bertrand
Conquest of happiness, the; B. 379

S

Sachar, Abram Leon
History of the Jews, a; B. 228
Sackville-West, V.
Edwardians, the; B. 413
Sage, Lee
Last rustler, the; B. 182
Saint Augustine. G. Papini. Translated by D. Emmerich; B. 158
Saint Johnson. W. R. Burnett; AN. 532
Salome, the wandering Jewess. G. S. Viereck and P. Eldridge; AN. 588
Salten, Felix
Fifteen rabbits; AN. 330
Hound of Florence, the. H. Paterson, translator; AN. 48
Sanchez, Nellie Van de Grift, and R. D Hunt
Short history of California, a; AN. . . . 133
Sand, George
Tales of a grandmother; AN. 558
Santa Fé trail, the. R. L. Duffus; AN. . . . 631
Santayana, George
Realm of matter, the; B. 407
Sarton, George
Introduction to the history of science. Volume I. From Homer to Omar Khayyam; B. 250
Sassoon, Siegfried
Memoirs of an infantry officer; B. 411
Saunders, Catherine
Vergil's primitive Italy; B. 626
Sceptical biologist, the. J. Needham; B. . . . 274
Schmitt, Bernadotte E.
Coming of the war, 1914, the; B. 737
Schneider, Herbert Wallace
Puritan mind, the; B. 738
Schneider, Herbert W.; R. 72, 584
Schneider, Isidor; R. 20, 129, 278, 683
Schönheit am mittelmeer. F. C. Endres; AN. 252
Schuman, Frederick L.; R. 449, 737
Schurz, Carl, the Americanization of. C. V. Easum; B. 206
Scott, Evelyn
Winter alone, the; B. 100
Sea devil's fo'c'sle, the. L. Thomas; AN. . 354
Seagle, William; R. 156, 227, 531
Seeckt, General von
Future of the German empire, the. Criticisms and postulates. O. Williams, translator; B. 328
Seed. C. G. Norris; AN. 228
Seed of liberty. The story of the American colonies. E. K. Chatterton; AN. . . . 48
Seed on the wind. R. Stout; AN. 353
Seven days' darkness. G. Gunnarsson. Translated by R. Tapley; AN. 740
Seven horizons. C. J. Finger; B. 249
Seymour, Flora Warren
Story of the red man, the; B. 185
Shepherds in sackcloth. S. Kaye-Smith; AN 228
Shipley, Joseph T.; R. 382
Shipley, Maynard; R. 653
Short history of British expansion, a. J. A. Williamson; AN. 132
Short history of California, a. R. D. Hunt and N. Van de G. Sanchez; AN. 133
Short history of Julia, a. I. Glenn; AN. . . . 655
Shrimps for tea. J. Blumenfeld; AN. 330
Shutter of snow, the. E. H. Coleman; AN. 684
Silence of Colonel Bramble, the. A. Maurois; B 301
Sinclair, May
Tales told by Simpson; B. 654
Sinners in summertime. S. Hoel. Translated by E. Sprigge and C. Napier; AN 187
Sins of New York. E. Van Every; E. 640
Sitwell, Sacheverell
Doctor Donne and Gargantua. The first six cantos; B. 585
Six horses. W. Banning and G. H. Banning; B. 182
Skycraft. A. Post; AN. 558
Smith, Helen Zenna
Stepdaughters of war; AN. 328
Smith, J. Allen
Growth and decadence of constitutional government, the; AN. 132
Smith, Lucy Humphrey; R. 186
Smith, Preserved
Great revival, 1543-1687. (A history of modern culture. Volume I.); B. 71
Smith, Susan
Made in Mexico; AN. 560
Sociological theory and social research. Selected papers of C. H. Cooley; B. . . . 527
Soldiers march! T. Fredenburgh; B. 530
Some folks won't work. C. Calkins; B. . . . 712
Some of us. An essay in epitaphs. J. B. Cabell; B. 622
Son avenger, the. S. Undset; B. 273
Soviets in world affairs, the. L. Fischer; B 449
Spawn: a novel of degeneration. N. Ferber; AN 630
Spengler, J. J.; R. 250
Starr, Frederick
Confucianism; AN. 132
Staying with relations. R. Macaulay; B. . . . 625
Stepdaughters of war. H. Z. Smith; AN. . . 329
Stephenson, Nathaniel Wright
Nelson W. Aldrich; B. 447
Stern, Bernhard J.; R. 274
Stern, S.
Fourteen years of European investments, 1914-1928; AN. 208
Stolberg, Benjamin; R. 327, 351
Stories of the great operas. E. Newman; AN 160
Story of Roland, the. J. Baldwin; AN. . . . 558
Story of San Michele, the. A. Munthe; AN 741
Story of the red man, the. F. W. Seymour; B. 185
Stout, Rex
Seed on the wind; AN. 353
Strangers may kiss. U. Parrott; AN. 228
Street of the islands, the. S. Young; AN. . 532
Strike! M. H. Vorse; B. 474
Strindberg, August. V. J. McGill; B. 183
Success. L. Feuchtwanger. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B. 620
Sudermann, Hermann
Dance of youth, the. E. and C. Paul, translators; B. 620
Sue, Eugène. P. Ginisty; AN. 279
Sullivan, Mark
Our times. Volume III: Pre-war America; B. 740
Survey of international relations, 1929; AN 49
Sutley, Zack T.
Last frontier, the; B. 182
Svevo, Italo
Confessions of Zeno, the; B. 183
Swift, Jonathan, biography. C. Van Doren; B 473
Sweet man. G. Millen; B. 101
Sykes, Gerald; R. 411, 448, 711
Symons, Arthur
From Toulouse-Lautrec to Rodin; B. . . . 588

T

Taft and Roosevelt: The intimate letters of Archie Butt; B. 501
Taft, William Howard. H. S. Duffy; B. . . . 501
Tales from the Argentine. Edited by W. Frank. Translated by A. Brenner; AN 421
Tales of a grandmother. G. Sand; AN. . . . 558
Tales of the first animals. E. S. Walker and C. C. Mook; AN. 558
Tales told by Simpson. M. Sinclair; B. . . . 654
Tarkington, Booth
Mirthful haven; AN. 589
Tate, Allen; R. 352
Tepoztlán—a Mexican village. R. Redfield; B 417
Terrett, Courtenay
Only saps work; AN. 331
Terry, Charles Sanford
John Christian Bach and John Sebastian Bach; two biographies; B. 74

That man Debs and his life work. F. R. Painter; B..... 206
Thistles of the Baragan, the. P. Istrati. Translated by J. LeClercq; AN..... 48
Thomas B. Reed: Parliamentarian. W. A. Robinson; B..... 653
Thomas Killegrew. A. Harbage; B..... 275
Thomas, Lowell
Sea devil's fo'c'sle, the; AN..... 354
Thomas, Norman; R..... 182
Thomson, Valentine
Briand, man of peace; AN..... 252
Those earnest Victorians. E. Wingfield-Stratford; B..... 529
Three titans. E. Ludwig; B..... 300
Tides of Malvern, the. F. Griswold; AN.. 331
Timmermans, Felix
Droll Peter. M. C. Darnton and W. J. Paul, translators; AN..... 159
Tinker, Chauncey Brewster
Good estate of poetry, the; AN..... 253
Touch me not: Four writs of a curt picaresque. V. McHugh; AN..... 279
Toward standards. N. Foerster; B..... 499
Tree of Life, the. An anthology. Made by V. De S. Pinto and G. N. Wright; AN..... 253
Trevelyan, George Macaulay
England under Queen Anne. Vol. I. Blenheim; B..... 682
Trilling, Lionel; R..... 710
Tully, Jim
Beggars abroad; AN..... 631
Tunis, John R.
American girl; AN..... 208
Twentieth-century poetry; AN..... 49
24 hours. L. Bromfield; B..... 503
Twice born in Russia. N. Petrova. Translated by Baroness M. Budberg; B.... 328
Two years. L. O'Flaherty; B..... 448

U

Undset, Sigrid
Son avenger, the; B..... 273
Universities—American, English, German. A. Flexner; E..... 599
Unknown Washington, the. J. Corbin; AN 187
Ur of the Chaldees. C. L. Wooley; B..... 20

V

Vagabonds. K. Hamsun; B..... 528
Valentine, Chapin; R..... 586
Van Doren, Carl
Swift; B..... 473
Van Doren, Dorothy; R.....158, 447
Van Doren, Mark; R.....44, 99, 475, 680
Van Every, Edward
Sins of New York; E..... 640
Vergil's primitive Italy. C. Saunders; B.... 626
Viereck, George Sylvester, and Paul Eldridge
Salome, the wandering Jewess; AN.... 588
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R.....206, 328, 420
Vines, Howell
River goes with heaven, a; AN..... 741
Vines, Sherard
Course of English classicism, the; B.... 225
Virgin and the gipsy, the. D. H. Lawrence; B..... 710
Voiceless India. G. Emerson; B..... 682
Voices of October: Art and literature in soviet Russia. J. Freeman, J. Kunitz, and L. Lozowick; B..... 276
Voigt, Frederick, and M. Goldsmith
Hindenburg: The man and the legend; B..... 251
Vorse, Mary Heaton
Strike!; B..... 474

W

Wagner, Cosima. R., Count du Moulin-Eckart. Translated by C. A. Phillips; B. 418
Walker, Edith S., and Charles C. Mook
Tales of the first animals; AN..... 558
Walker, Joseph
How they carried the mail; AN..... 558
Walton, Eda Lou; R..21, 45, 100, 130, 155, 383, 408, 679, 738
Wanderer of Liverpool, the. J. Masefield; B..... 585
War, six books on; B..... 530
Ward, biography: A Yankee adventurer. H. Cahill; B..... 586
Warner, Arthur; R.....129, 353
Warren, Robert Penn
John Brown: The making of a martyr; B..... 22
Warwick, Frances, countess of
Life's ebb and flow; B..... 186
Washington, George: The unknown Washington. J. Corbin; AN..... 187
Watson, A. M. K., and R. Weterstettin
Biography of President von Hindenburg, the; B..... 251
Waugh, Alec
Hot countries; B..... 129
Waugh, Evelyn
Bachelor abroad, a; AN..... 630
Weber, Max
Protestant ethic, the, and the spirit of capitalism. T. Parsons, translator; B. 476
Weber, Max. H. Cahill; B..... 251
Webster, Daniel. C. M. Fuess; B..... 554
Wedding day, and other stories. K. Boyle; B..... 711
Wells, Herbert George
Autocracy of Mr. Parham, the; AN.... 208
Wegerer, Alfred von
Refutation of the Versailles war guilt thesis, a; B..... 737
Weterstettin, Rudolph, and A. M. K. Watson
Biography of President von Hindenburg, the; B..... 251
Wharton, Edith
Certain people; B..... 654
Wharton, James B.; R.....474, 530, 683
When I was a girl. H. Ferris; AN..... 560
Whistler's room, the. P. Alverdes; B..... 102
White, Viola C.
Blue forest; AN..... 104
White, Walter; R..... 44
Whitton, F. E.
Wolfe and North America; AN..... 159
William Howard Taft
H. S. Duffy; B..... 501
Williams, Charles
Poetry at present; AN..... 531
Williams, Roger, prophet and pioneer. E. Easton; B..... 276
Williamson, Henry
Patriot's progress, the; AN..... 303
Williamson, James A.
Short history of British expansion, a; AN..... 132
Williamson, Jefferson
American hotel, the; E..... 462
Willoughby, W. W.
Ethical basis of political authority, the; B..... 278
Willy and Colette
Claudine at school; AN..... 589
Wingfield-Stratford, Esmé
Those earnest Victorians; B..... 529
Winkler, John K.
Morgan the magnificent; B..... 327
Winter alone, the. E. Scott; B..... 100
Winters, Yvor
Proof, the; B..... 679
Wissler, Clark
Introduction to social anthropology, an; AN..... 656
Wister, Owen
Roosevelt: The story of a friendship; AN 303
Witches still live. A study of the black art of today. T. Kenyon; AN..... 354
Wolfe and North America. F. E. Whitton; AN..... 159
Wolfson, Theresa; R..... 73
Women of Cairo, the. G. de Nerval; AN.. 24
Wooden swords. J. Deval; AN..... 132
Woods, William Seaver
Colossal blunders of the war; B..... 474
Wooley, C. Leonard
Dead towns and living men; B..... 20
Ur of the Chaldees; B..... 20
World in 2030 A. D., the. Earl of Birkenhead; B..... 381
World politics in modern civilization. H. E. Barnes; B..... 130
World's economic dilemma, the. E. M. Patterson; B..... 586
Worst journey in the world, the: Antarctic, 1910-1913. A. Cherry-Garrard; B.... 44
Wright, Quincy
Mandates under the league of nations; B..... 528
Wycherley, William
Biography. W. Connely; B..... 275

Y

Yankee adventurer, a. H. Cahill; B..... 586
Ybarra, T. R.
Bolivar, the passionate warrior; B..... 185
Year in, you're out. S. Hoffenstein; AN.. 23
Years of grace. M. A. Barnes; B..... 158
Youmans, N. O.
Best seller; AN..... 656
Young, E. H.
Miss Mole; AN..... 450
Young, Stark
Street of the islands, the; AN..... 532
Youth dares all. Anonymous; B..... 205

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.....380, 473, 529
Zweig, Arnold
Claudia. E. Sutton, translator; B..... 620
Zweig, Stefan
Joseph Fouché; B..... 226

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 2, 1930 No. 3391

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
Where Do We Go from Here? 5
Committee Government 6
Fair Harvard 6
Zero for "All Quiet" 7
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 8
WHO KILLED "JAKE" LINGLE? By Paul Blanshard 9
WOMEN GO FREE IN CENTRAL ASIA. By Louis Fischer 11
BABES IN THE HOOVER WOOD. By Paul Y. Anderson 13
SOUTHERN LABOR AND THE LAW. By Weimar Jones 14
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 16
CORRESPONDENCE 17
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 18
BOOKS:
Without Shield. By Louise Townsend Nicholl 19
The Metaphysicians Confess. By Henry Hazlitt 19
A Defense of the Puritans. By James Truslow Adams 20
Dead Cities. By Isidor Schneider 20
America—the New Found Land. By Eda Lou Walton 21
Love and the Modern Age. By V. F. Calverton 21
John Brown. By William MacDonald 22
Mexican Folklore. By Mary Austin 23
Books in Brief 23
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Seipel Intrigues in Austria. By G. E. R. Gedye 25

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

UTTERLY INADEQUATE is the second instalment of the Simon Commission's report on India, if we may judge by the cabled reports. According to these, "the scheme is to give Britain a stronger hold on India than ever before"; "what the report proposes is a long way from dominion status to say nothing of independence"; "the report suggests that Indian defense should be made an imperial rather than an Indian problem and visualizes the presence of the British army in India for many years to come." That is really all one needs to know. After that it is idle even to put any valuation upon the new administrative and judicial devices suggested. For the refusal to fix a definite period for dominion status vitiates all the rest. It will not soothe the troubled waters of India but will gravely inflame the populace. It will make impossible the proposed October Round Table Conference—we doubt if even the Indian moderates will now be lured to that proposed parley. Indeed, we believe that it puts the final seal upon the long struggle which began with Gandhi's march to make salt, and, for better or worse, will not end until the Indian peoples are in complete control of their own destiny.

MEANWHILE, POLICE BRUTALITY, more and more rigid ordinances, the growing use of British troops, and even the monsoon have not checked the ardor of the Indian Nationalists. Between storms the natives come up smiling for the terrible punishment of the police staves. Even unresisting women are now standing beside their men as they are being beaten for their refusal to obey the police. After six days of deadlock in Bombay the police assailed a group of fifty Sikhs of the Akali sect, great bearded men who stood blow after blow until knocked down. There was, reports Negley Farson of the Chicago Daily News, "again the spectacle of a green field dotted with fallen bodies and again the same islands of orange-clad women holding up the flags of Swaraj." One Sikh beaten till bloody "stood up for more. . . . And then the police threw up their hands. 'You can't go on hitting a blighter when he stands up to you like that.'" Precisely. That is where non-resistance wins. No wonder that a pro-British Bombay correspondent of the New York Times reports that "one fact, however, is manifestly certain—events cannot be allowed much longer to proceed as they are doing at present." Indeed, no. Here are the wives and daughters of Indians holding British titles cabling their protest to Queen Mary. Here is an American missionary in Madras expelled for communion with Gandhi sympathizers; and then the news on June 22 of the "fiercest battle in which the Bombay police have been engaged" since Gandhi began the struggle, with 550 casualties, "including a number of women volunteers"—and no police hurt!

THE SENATE has disgraced itself by voting for the pension bill to "liberalize the law" for compensation for disabled World War veterans. President Hoover's objection to it and announcement that he will veto it merely served to inflame the Senate, which has thus, for the sixth or seventh time, deliberately slapped the Executive's face. But Mr. Hoover in this case is right. This is a pension steal pure and simple; it is a direct return to the pension orgies of the Civil and Spanish Wars, although we were assured at the outbreak of the World War that the insurance system would prevent anything of the kind. We are still paying pensions to widows of veterans of the War of 1812; on the same basis we shall be paying pensions to widows of World War veterans in 2048. The estimates of the cost of this measure run from Senator Shortridge's $74,000,000 a year to the $102,000,000 of the Director of the Budget. According to dispatches it includes those who have served only sixty days. It is much pleasanter to read that by a vote of 16 to 4 the Senate Naval Affairs Committee has favorably reported the Naval Disarmament Treaty. As our readers are aware, we think very little of that document as a disarmament measure, but the character of the naval opposition to it makes its ratification entirely defensible.

THE WARMTH OF THE RECEPTION accorded to Rear Admiral Byrd on his arrival in New York was the more striking because in the columns of one journal at least his achievements have been over-touted. Not that we would belittle them; far from it. We are simply unaccustomed to months and months of daily reporting of the routine acts of the explorer, his men, his dogs, his ships.

For the old-fashioned drama of the sudden, unexpected reappearance, from the icy unknown, of a Peary, or a Nansen, or an all-but-dying Greely, we have substituted daily press syndicating of the trivial along with the admirable and the heroic. It is, therefore, a tribute to the patience and discernment of the public that it is ready to hail the really remarkable accomplishments of Byrd and his men. How much of scientific value the expedition has actually brought back a few months will show. Our best scientists evidently are in no doubt. For the rest, we gladly add our tribute to the amazing foresight, preparation, and calculation which made the whole a great success and made the final spectacular flight possible under most difficult and dangerous conditions. To have come back with a schedule exactly carried out, without the loss of a life, with apparently complete harmony, and with all aims attained is an achievement which makes Byrd's two years of exploration rank high in the annals of Arctic and Antarctic adventure.

THE ADOPTION BY THE SENATE, without debate, of the Borah resolution the day after the President had made the Hawley-Smoot tariff a law is a remarkable revelation not only of the distrust of that tariff by its foes, but also of the political discomfort of those who voted for it. The Borah resolution directs the Tariff Commission to investigate the rates on shoes, cement, furniture, and farm implements. Thus the American manufacturers of all these articles are still to be left in doubt regarding the rates under which they are to operate. Apologists for the new tariff, like Senator Reed, voted for it on the ground that even though the rates adopted were extremely bad, they should be settled at once. If the commission functions, Congress will have enacted a permanent state of unsettlement. On the other hand, if the flexible provisions are allowed to become a dead letter, the claim that they will correct the extortions under the new law becomes a pure fraud. Consumers have no reason to hope, in any case, that any revisions will in general be downward. Not only were practically all the revisions under the former act upward, but the principle on which revisions are made—differences in cost of production—is a vicious one. Such differences are, to begin with, extremely difficult to ascertain, and must be determined by arbitrary standards. Apart from this, the use of this standard means simply that the more essentially uneconomic and parasitic an industry is in this country, and the more inefficiently it is run, the higher will be the tariff rate that consumers will have to pay to support it. No wonder Messrs. Mellon, Lamont, and Klein, the Hoover Happiness Boys, have recently felt the need of jumping into the breach with more prosperity talk.

NEWARK HAS BEEN SUFFERING for five months from an epidemic of alien and Communist persecution, and during June three of ten Communists indicted have been convicted of advocating the overthrow of the government by force and violence. The testimony against them was entirely that of officers who could recall practically nothing of their speeches except such advocacy, while the witnesses for the defense in the two cases tried last were not allowed to testify because they were atheists. The New Jersey law provides that persons having conscientious scruples against swearing may be affirmed; but the presiding judge, after allowing the atheist Communists to be affirmed in the first case tried, later held that the law extends the right of affirmation to those persons only who have religious scruples against swearing—the theory being, of course, that atheists, having no fear of punishment hereafter, cannot be trusted to tell the truth in any case. Having thus ruled that the defendants and their witnesses could not even be affirmed, he none the less allowed the defendants to tell their story to the jury, on the ground that a defendant has the right to be heard in his own behalf. When it came to sentencing Dominick Flaiani and Samuel Levine, who denied that they had advocated the overthrow of government by force and violence, Judge Walter Van Riper, instead of giving them the seventeen and ten years respectively to which their conviction rendered them liable, put them on probation for two years on condition that they pay a dollar weekly and refrain from the dreaded advocacy. The third person convicted, an elderly colored man, was given a suspended sentence. There seems to be some hope that minor alien persecutions will now be lessened.

THE ATLANTA COMMUNISTS whose case was reported in our last issue have unexpectedly been admitted to bail of $10,000 in two cases, $4,000 in three others, and $1,000 in the remaining one. The trials have been postponed to an undetermined future date. Meanwhile southern California, true to its tradition, has convicted nine Communist organizers of the workers in the Imperial Valley canteloupe fields. Under the criminal-syndicalism laws six of them were sentenced to three to fourteen years, two applied for probation, and the ninth was given a suspended sentence on condition that he return to Mexico, his native land. In Mt. Vernon, New York, City Judge Bernstein, not to be wholly outdone, imposed sentence of a $25 fine or ten days in jail on each of eleven Communists for trying to hold a street meeting without a permit, the mayor of Mt. Vernon having made his entry in the contest for official illegality by declaring that he would never under any circumstances grant a permit to the Communists. Apparently in most parts of this country Communists have few Constitutional rights that public officials are bound to respect. What is the next unpopular minority group that such lawless officials will choose to trample under foot?

REVOLT IN CONNECTICUT? It seems incredible, but a David has arisen in the ranks of the Republican Party. A year ago Professor Albert Levitt, who besides being a teacher of law is a veteran who was both gassed and wounded in France, decided that conditions in his State had got to the point where they could be endured no longer. So to the public amusement he announced his intention of driving J. Henry Roraback, the Republican boss of the State, who combines bossing with the management of public-utility enterprises, out of his job. Last fall when the small towns voted it appeared that he had won two votes for himself in his town as a candidate for selectman. Everybody laughed again, but a few months later David landed a shot from his sling where it hurt. The Public Utilities Commission of the State has long permitted the railroads to disregard a law which requires that every railroad shall remove, or begin the removal of, at least one grade crossing each year for every fifty miles of road operated by it. The commission was required to compel the railroad to obey if the road did not act. Professor Levitt petitioned the Attorney General to begin ouster proceedings against the commission for neglect of duty. He refused. Then Mr. Levitt went to the Hartford County Superior Court and won his case, which was at once appealed by the Attorney General to the State Supreme Court of Errors for decision.

PROFESSOR LEVITT was not content to sit down and await the decision on the appeal. He continued to speak constantly and hit straight out at the small knot of insiders who run the utilities and the State of Connecticut. He denounced certain rates as extortionate and asserted that there had been much padding of capital stock in order to force higher rates. Not content with that, he announced last month that he was a candidate for Governor of Connecticut, while Mrs. Hannah Townshend joined him as a candidate for Lieutenant Governor. His appeal was direct and straightforward:

> I ask for your support in order that I may end the illegal and selfish exploitation of our State and its natural resources by J. Henry Roraback and his agents.

His platform is admirable, including good roads for rural communities, the abolition of child labor, old-age pensions, the enforcement of law, and the regulation of public utilities. Now it is announced that William J. Pape of Waterbury, the owner of two of the ablest papers in the State, the Waterbury Republican and American, which have steadily fought the boss, has declared that he is ready to serve as candidate for comptroller on the Levitt ticket. People are no longer laughing in Connecticut; they are beginning to wonder whether in this year of Hooverism control of the State will not be wrested from Roraback and perhaps go to the Democrats. At any rate our hat is off to Professor Levitt. He has done a fine job and every reader of The Nation in Connecticut should applaud his effort.

SAMUEL INSULL the great educator leads a hard life. Here was Ambassador Sackett, himself an old utility man, proposing to tell the world (and in a World Power Conference in Berlin at that): "I know no other manufacturing industry where the sale price of the product to the great mass of consumers is fifteen times the actual cost of production." Mr. Sackett, of course, meant to point out the notorious fact that in producing power most of the cost arises in transmission, not in generation, and that transmission accordingly offers the field for technical improvement. When Mr. Insull saw an advance copy of the address, however, he realized, like a true educator, that the public might misinterpret it, might even understand it to mean that the educator and his associates were profiteers instead of public servants. Wouldn't Mr. Sackett change the address? Unfortunately he wouldn't, and the wretched newspapers had advance copies, anyway. And so in the outcome some millions of Americans who otherwise would never have noticed Mr. Sackett's remarks at all had their attention called to the price of electricity. Then the irresponsible Senator Norris utilized the incident as a text for various caustic remarks about the activities of Mr. Insull and his fellow-educators. Verily, the life of a great, unofficial public servant like this is nothing less than a tragedy.

EVASIONS AND HALF-TRUTHS duly mixed with confession and avoidance characterize Secretary Stimson's reply to Senator Glass's resolution inquiring by what authority of law the Department of State assumes to approve or disapprove foreign loans offered in the American market, or to direct the action of the Federal Reserve Board or banks in regard to foreign banking or investment in foreign securities. Mr. Stimson, who knows as well as anybody that there is not a shadow of legal warrant for what the department has been regularly doing for years, is reduced to the extreme of citing Article II of the Constitution, which vests the executive power in the President, and the statutory requirement that the Secretary of State shall do what the President directs. Equipped with this visionary mandate, the department, he says, has been maintaining "a position of watchfulness in the country's interest in its foreign relations," but it has not objected to foreign loans "save in a very small number of cases" and has never tried to control the Federal Reserve Board or banks. The whole business, indeed, is quite informal: the department neither approves nor disapproves; it merely remarks that it has no objection or is not interested. What every banker understands, of course, is that no foreign loan can be floated in this country, nor any American loan made abroad, without the consent of the Department of State. Mr. Hoover, we seem to remember, has enunciated the principle that legislation is the province of Congress, but in this particular matter he appears to agree with Mr. Harding, who began the practice, and with Mr. Coolidge, who continued it, that a little executive law-making on the side is quite all right if you can get away with it.

PROHIBITION OF TRADE as well as of loans, this time without even a pretense of legal justification, is included in the autocratic powers which the Department of State presumes to exercise. The Glenn A. Martin Company of Baltimore, it is reported, has just been forced to drop a contract or agreement of some kind to furnish twenty bombing planes to the Russian government, at a cost of some $2,000,000, because of Washington's disapprobation. Mr. Stimson, who appears to be the great Pooh-Bah of the Administration when it comes to stepping outside the law and juggling with explanations afterwards, is quoted by the Baltimore Sun as saying, in substance, that while he had no objection to the sale of commercial planes to Russia, he did object to the manufacture and sale of military planes. At this point, it seems, the Navy Department comes into the picture with some uncertain right of approval of the Martin contract. We can well understand that the great Secretary, flanked by the Kellogg pact on one side and the London naval treaty on the other, rejoiced at the opportunity to give Russia a hint about the wisdom of peace, but it will be surprising if the Russians do not see in his performance further proof of the intention of the United States to treat Russia as an outcast. It will be in order now for the Administration to take note of the great Communist drive which Moscow is to launch in this country in September at a cost of $500,000. The fact that this Associated Press announcement comes from Russian monarchist circles in Berlin will make sensible people believe that the whole thing is a hoax, but there is nothing like a Russian scare to make Washington see double.

ALMOST COINCIDENTALLY with the signing of the temporary trade agreement between Russia and Great Britain comes the announcement that orders placed in Great Britain by the Soviet trading organizations during the last six months are more than double those for the same period of the previous year. The total sum involved is about $44,000,000, and this gain is really the first fruit of the renewal of diplomatic relations between the two countries. When one considers the condition of English industry this must surely bring hope to many a hard-pressed industrial plant. As for the trade agreement, it is interesting to note that the head of the trade delegation and his two deputies are given diplomatic privileges and immunities, so that hereafter when the Conservatives come back into office they will not again be able to raid the offices of the trade delegation. This treaty is, of course, a temporary agreement, but it is to remain in force until the negotiation of a permanent commercial one, subject to six months' notice of termination by either side. The protocol states that the contracting parties are actuated by the desire to eliminate from their economic relations all forms of discrimination, and they pledge that they will be guided only by commercial and financial considerations. We commend this to our ferocious Sons of the Revolution who, in convention assembled, have recently declared their intention of asking this government to forbid all business relations with the Soviets and to bar out all Russian individuals if the present investigation of Communist activities by Congressman Fish's committee should prove the existence of any propaganda by the Russian government or individuals in this country. Can Englishmen be less forearmed than ourselves?

RACE ENMITY AND SECESSION are an ugly pair of political issues, but the Union of South Africa is wrestling with both of them at the present moment. In pursuance of the policy of keeping down the natives, who constitute a huge majority of the population, and denying them political rights, the assembly has just passed a riotous-assemblies act which gives to the Minister of Justice absolute and arbitrary power to deal with so-called agitators, with no right in the persons arrested or punished to appeal to the courts. The bill is aimed particularly at the movement directed by the African National Congress and at the outbreaks, some of them serious, that have multiplied during the past few months. It is the old story of British imperialism lording it over native races, and strengthening repression by resort to a measure which the Cape Times denounces as "iniquitous" and which a speaker in the assembly declared was not only contrary to both Dutch and English legal tradition, but made the Minister "a tyrant who is prosecutor, judge, and legislator at the same time." What the government thinks about it was shown when Premier Hertzog, in replying to General Smuts's criticism of the bill, heatedly declared that the House "was not the place to theorize about ethical principles" and that the bill was "really in the interests of the natives themselves." It was the same General Hertzog who insisted, in a debate on the recommendations of the Conference on Dominion Legislation, that the right of South Africa to say whether it would remain in the Empire was "a vital test of whether we are or are not a free people." The recommendations were accepted with an amendment to that effect.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL has been rejected again—this time, amazing as it seems, by a Labor Government. The dream of enlightened men and women for generations, it is now turned down by Mr. MacDonald chiefly on the old, familiar militaristic grounds—the Government has not the wish, it declares, to enter upon new military enterprises, and if the tunnel were to be authorized it would have to "be adequately protected, and this would cost a great deal of money." Contradictorily enough it is added: "The committee on imperial defense were unable to discover a single advantage from the military point of view which would follow construction of a Channel tunnel." The whole official statement of the case strikes us as being as puerile as it is confused. The Government dissents from the report of the tunnel committee that such a tunnel would improve trade and dwells, like those who in behalf of the stage-coaches once opposed the coming of railroads, upon the fact that the capital now invested in cross-Channel boats would become unproductive should the tunnel be built. Unable to find, it declares, any substantial public demand for the tunnel and believing that it would help the existing unemployment but little, it then asserts that more foreigners would come but doubts if this "would prove to the economic advantage of this country." Worse than that, should the tunnel take more Englishmen to the Continent for pleasure that would mean "an economic loss to England." Shades of Adam Smith and all the long line of British economists! What could they say to that?

ELMER SPERRY, who died in Brooklyn on June 16, was one of our most remarkable inventors. It is no exaggeration to say that no single man in the entire history of merchant shipping ever did as much for the development of navigation as did Mr. Sperry. When for generations nobody had made a single invention to modernize the steering of ships, he stepped forward with the gyrocompass which eliminated automatically the variations due to the earth's magnetism. Then he invented "Metal Mike," the automatic steerer, which abolishes the helmsman and keeps a ship on an absolutely straight course—something way beyond the skill of the best quartermaster who ever grasped the spokes of a wheel. Before this he utilized the principle of the gyroscope to stabilize ships and airplanes and to keep them on an even keel in all weather. Only two months ago a giant army plane flew from Sacramento to San Francisco without a human being on board—guided by two Sperry gyroscopes as automatic pilots. For fliers he also developed devices to provide artificial horizons in order to enable them to pierce the darkest fogs. The press reports that he had patented nearly 400 devices, about double the number patented by Edison. Among these were arc lights, high-power searchlights, electro-chemical processes, new mining machinery, devices for motion-picture projection, for trolley-cars, and a new system of street lighting—to list only a few. A member of many learned societies and founder of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers and of the American Electro-Chemical Society, he was decorated by Russia and Japan and won seven of the most prized American medals for scientific achievement. Modest and extraordinarily industrious, he died at the forefront of the American scientists who are making over the world under the layman's uncomprehending eyes.

Where Do We Go from Here?

THE astounding victory of Dwight Morrow in the New Jersey Republican primary, for which the most experienced political observers were entirely unprepared, makes him more than ever a national figure. After such a triumph it is impossible to believe that he will not defeat next fall his Democratic rival, Alexander Simpson, a successful, almost spectacular, criminal prosecutor. We rejoice that his State has seen fit to recognize this man's worth, his ability, his modest efficiency, and his fine personal character. It goes far to confirm us in our belief that if the right kind of man should present himself in most communities there would be instant public recognition of his worth and his promise. Will Rogers is right in saying that had Mr. Morrow run as a Bolshevik he would nevertheless have been nominated. The voters apparently sensed that here was a man who had not only made his mark, but was not chasing an office in the usual political manner. They knew that he had wealth, position, and endless opportunities. They knew also that in consenting to enter the contest he perhaps went counter to his own studious tastes and to his wish for continued service in Mexico. As it is, quite aside from the prohibition question—wherein the wets are entitled to considerable satisfaction—Mr. Morrow's victory is like a fresh breeze in the rather sordid political atmosphere of his State.

Of the numerous recent primaries the Morrow victory is, of course, the most outstanding. Next to it the most sensational was the retirement by his party of the veteran Senator Simmons of North Carolina for the crime of bolting the Smith ticket and supporting Hoover in 1928, and this resounding victory for party regularity and white supremacy seems likely to have its repercussions in other Southern States in which Claudius H. Huston et al. labored to implant the Republican gospel. A glance at the other States which have held their primaries reveals a mixed situation. Our readers will recall that Senator Deneen, Republican, has been defeated in Illinois by Mrs. Ruth Hanna McCormick, now a Republican Representative, but that J. Hamilton Lewis is back in the lists on the Democratic side and has shown in the past a winsome way with the voters. Secretary of Labor Davis, who beat Senator Grundy in the primary fight for the Republican nomination in Pennsylvania, has yet to show whether he can get the support of the Grundy following in November. Maine, to our great disappointment, has nominated Representative Wallace H. White, a good old Republican wheel horse and high-tariff supporter, to replace the impossible Senator Gould, defeating a far better candidate in the person of ex-Governor Brewster. It was the candidate for Governor, John A. Wilson, who though defeated won the honors of the campaign.

A disposition on the part of the Iowa farmers to swallow the Smoot-Hawley tariff is the disturbing news from Iowa. The striking success of Lester J. Dickinson in the Republican Senatorial primary, after a campaign in which the tariff was the main issue, does not indicate a farmer revolt. Iowa has long been regarded as a mirror of agrarian sentiment in the Middle West, and Mr. Dickinson, who has served twelve years in the House, has faithfully reflected Iowa opinion and staunchly adhered to the farm bloc. On the other hand, in Minnesota, where Senator Thomas B. Schall, insurgent Republican, has won the primary nomination for a second term against Governor Theodore Christianson, the tariff did not figure prominently in the contest save that both candidates denounced it. Republican Minnesota, in other words, is anti-tariff, but in the Senatorial contest the chief issue was which of the two candidates was the more radical. The platform of the Indiana Republican Convention outdid even Senator Fess by eulogizing Mr. Hoover for his "splendid poise, Lincoln-like moderation, and energized efficiency" and declaring that his Administration "is destined as a period of extraordinary acceleration and stabilization of industry," but it confined itself to generalities on farm relief and unkindly failed to mention the naval treaty. The most self-confident gladiator thus far is former Governor Osborn of Michigan, who has thrown himself into the fray against Senator Couzens because, "as I see it, the nation cannot endure unless women and men who have fitness and taste for filling public positions offer themselves." The ex-Governor, it may be noted, is a stalwart dry.

The present membership of the House of Representatives comprises 263 Republicans, 164 Democrats, and 1 Farmer-Labor. There are 7 vacant seats, of which all but one were formerly held by Republicans. The Senate has 56 Republicans, 39 Democrats, and 1 Farmer-Labor. Three of the Senatorial elections will be held to fill unexpired terms: in Kansas for the seat now held by Henry J. Allen, in New Jersey for that held by David Baird, Jr., and in Ohio for that held by Roscoe C. McCulloch. All three of these Senators are Republicans. Of the remaining 32 Senators whose terms regularly expire March 4, 19 are Republicans and 13 Democrats. Four of the 35 Senators, it has been announced—Phipps of Colorado, Gillett of Massachusetts, Goff of West Virginia, and Sullivan of Wyoming—are not candidates for reelection, and two—Gould of Maine and Baird of New Jersey—who were not candidates have, as stated, had their seats claimed by Messrs. White and Morrow. In Kansas both seats are to be filled, the regular term of Senator Arthur Capper also expiring.

With primaries or nominating conventions still to be held in about two-thirds of the States, prediction is risky indeed. The extraordinarily outspoken criticisms of Republican newspapers and individuals in industrial centers, where high protection has long been well intrenched, are naturally cheering the Democrats. They will do well not to be too confident. Demoralized as a national party, poverty-stricken in ideas, and split on prohibition and the tariff, it will not be so easy for them to overcome the heavy Republican House majority. As for the insurgent Republicans, the most that is to be hoped for, apparently, is that with good luck they may be able to hold their own. Never was there more need of a new party, grounded in enlightened principles, national in scope, and equipped with able and independent candidates, for which a healthy-minded American might vote with a clear conscience.

Committee Government

NOTHING could illustrate more clearly the Hoover method of government than the President's recent appointment of a committee to investigate the actions of the Shipping Board in regard to bids for the purchase of certain government lines in connection with mail subsidies. Early in June he appointed four outstanding citizens, one of them Edward N. Hurley, formerly chairman of the Shipping Board, to investigate and report to him upon the situation, saying:

> I have received many representations pro and con upon the merits of rival bids and protests at the character of ships it is proposed to construct under government loans. The disposal of these questions will have a profound effect upon our merchant marine and upon the policy involved therein. Obviously I cannot personally pass judgment upon highly controversial questions. . . . I propose therefore to appoint a committee of outstanding men who would review these questions and advise upon them and upon the broader policy in merchant-marine organization.

The committee thus chosen is, according to the best count we can obtain, the fourteenth or fifteenth commission appointed by Mr. Hoover since he became President and now becomes the fourth board to deal with the special subject thus assigned to it.

The Shipping Board, in which alone is vested the power to administer the shipping laws of 1916 and 1920, called considerably more than a year ago for competitive sealed bids for the purchase of the America-France and American Diamond Lines. Several bids were received, the highest being that of the United States Lines, which offered $25.38 per dead weight ton. The companies which are operating the two lines bid only $14 a ton each. After publication of the sealed bids one of the operators, the Black Diamond Company, raised its bid to a few cents more than that of the United States Lines. The board having the right to give preferences in the sale of lines under certain circumstances to the operators thereof, the matter hung fire. There immediately developed much political and business pressure, and the board referred the matter to the Merchant Fleet Corporation, which manages and operates the shipping lines of the government, for study and report—a usual procedure. The Shipping Board itself stood five to two in favor of accepting the bid of the United States Lines.

There being a dispute also in regard to the sale of a certain line from the Gulf of Mexico to South America, President Hoover then appointed an Interdepartmental Committee, composed of the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster General, and the chairman of the Shipping Board, to study the proper administration of the shipping laws and postal subsidy. This commission promptly appointed a subcommittee to make detailed studies. Meanwhile the Shipping Board was requested to defer action in the matter of the sale of the France and Diamond lines until further advised by the Interdepartmental Committee. About two months ago, after some eleven months of its detailed study, the Interdepartmental Committee notified the Shipping Board that it had no recommendation whatsoever to make and that the Board could go ahead and make its own decision. The board not having acted since then, the President has now appointed the fourth board to pass upon this problem. Mr. Hoover added in his letter: "I do not believe that more than sixty days will be involved in such an inquiry, and I hope the board will feel it will be valuable to all parties and to the board itself to have such an independent report."

Now, with all due respect to the President's statement that "obviously I cannot personally pass judgment upon highly controversial questions," we must point out that that is the duty and the function of the President in the last resort. While it is true that he has no direct power over the Shipping Board, he has by his own words admitted his involvement and responsibility. It is recognized in Washington that the President has general supervision of all branches of the government, and it is impossible to conceive of the Shipping Board refusing to come to a decision if asked to do so by the President. We are, of course, well aware of the fundamental philosophy of Herbert Hoover in such matters. He has deliberately cultivated the commission habit because of his belief that the more American citizens are thus drawn into the functions of government the better it is for the country and all concerned. It does not appear to him that there is any sign of weakness or of "passing the buck" in this procedure. He came back from his work in the Mississippi flood happy because he had appointed a committee in every town, told them what he wanted done, and then had gone his way rejoicing. We find in the New York Times a statement that "in his first year the President has appointed half as many commissions as Wilson named in two terms, and two-thirds as many as were established in the Coolidge Administration." The President has his Cabinet and his great array of legal advisers in the office of the Attorney General. Not even they can free him from the final responsibility for the actions of the government.

Fair Harvard

ONLY fair, according to Edward M. Warburg, senior orator at the Class Day exercises. Harvard, it appears, isn't quite what it once was—but then, of course, it never has been. In the long view, however, the case is much worse than it appears, as we have discovered from extended observation of colleges and their graduates. Mr. Warburg has just become an alumnus. When he returns for his quarter-centennial in 1955, with his pockets full of money and his mind full of memories, he will experience a melancholy satisfaction in noting the degeneration that has taken place since the golden age of 1926-30, when as a matter of fact Harvard reached the highest point in its history as an undergraduate institution. And Harvard is exactly like all the rest of them. Putting aside, as we older alumni do, the half-baked notions of this year's graduates, we realize that there was a time when these colleges really bred men. That was in our day, as we well recall, but things are not what they were. And this progressive degeneration, we are sorry to say, has been going on ever since the American college was founded, now nearly three hundred years ago.

But to return to Harvard, the case is not so simple.

Who Killed "Jake" Lingle?

By PAUL BLANSHARD

Chicago, June 23

CHICAGO gangsters have developed an expressive phrase to describe the fever of excitement which follows a conspicuously unpopular murder. A city, they say, is "in heat." Chicago is now in the hottest heat that has come to this city since the primary election of 1928 when the notorious Crowe was swept out of office as State's attorney and the Thompson machine was partially cracked. More than 1,200 suspected gangsters have been arrested in two days. Every edition of every newspaper flings some angry protest against gangsterism or some stinging editorial across its front page. The reason for the turmoil, as all the world knows, is that on June 9 Chicago gangsters murdered Alfred ("Jake") Lingle of the Chicago Tribune.

The murder was cold-blooded and carefully planned. A blond man wearing a gray suit and a sailor straw hat walked up behind Lingle while he was hurrying through the Illinois Central traffic tunnel under Michigan Boulevard, pulled out a short-barreled thirty-eight-caliber revolver, gripped it carefully in a gloved hand, and shot him through the head. The killer then threw away his weapon (its numbers had been partially filed off) and dashed away with his five accomplices, while hundreds of pedestrians were all around him.

The chorus of protest has been prodigious and not a little hysterical. Rewards of almost $56,000 for the apprehension of the murderer have been posted by newspapers and civic organizations, and for at least forty-eight hours no gunman or associate of gunmen or unemployed worker who looked like a gunman had constitutional safety in the city. Chief of Detectives John Stege sent out an "execution squad" of city detectives who boast that they have each killed at least one gangster. Their chief gloats over their record—Lieutenant Frank Reynolds has killed eleven men, Lieutenant Patrick O'Connell five, Lieutenant Walter Storms five, Lieutenant William Cusack four, Al Booth six, Andrew Barry six, and so on. The killing squad rounded up 640 men in one night, but not a "big rod" was among them. Al Capone is summering in Miami, where he is vainly trying to break into Florida society; "Bugs" Moran, apparently having advance information of the gang feud which has taken twelve lives in ten days, disappeared three weeks ago. Most of the insignificant hoodlums and ex-burglars rounded up by the police have been released. One judge, Joseph L. McCarthy, rebuked the police for "futile, useless, and illegal arrests." Corporation Counsel Ettelson, the present political ruler of the city, finally decided that some officials must be thrown to the wolves; so the decrepit Mayor Thompson elevated John H. Alcock to the leadership of the police department.

Often in the past the newspaper editors have allowed themselves to be impressed by the feverish energy of the police in rounding up miscellaneous unfortunates. Now they sneer openly. The Chicago Daily News, for instance, made the following comment:

> Gangsters grow rich on mere vocal reproof. They care nothing for sensational hunts for murderers. Indeed, these serve the gangsters' purposes. Such hunts help to distract attention from the damning fact that the murder gangs are permitted freely year in and year out to distribute their truckloads of beer and their cases of booze, to run their gambling houses and their houses of prostitution unmolested.
>
> Citizens must cease to participate in the childish game of the police who make a futile hue and cry over past killings while continually inviting fresh killings because of illicit privileges accorded by them to murderous gangsters.

Will the citizens of Chicago follow this advice? The present writer sees little in the economic trends or the current public opinion of Chicago to excite hope for thoroughgoing reform. The public demonstration at Lingle's funeral was profoundly disappointing. Every opportunity was given to make the funeral one of the greatest demonstrations in the city's history. Advance notices were carried on the front pages of the papers. A parade with bands, police companies, uniformed sailors, and official salutes featured the occasion. But not more than four or five thousand people watched the spectacle, and I, for one, heard no expressions of outraged civic pride. Four judges, a police commissioner, a State's attorney, and a county clerk attended the ceremonies. Contrast this demonstration with the funeral of "Big Jim" Colosimo, lord of Chicago's vice districts, which was graced by the attendance of eight aldermen, three judges, a Congressman, a State representative, and an assistant State's attorney. Anthony D'Andrea, Chicago gangster shot in 1921, had a funeral cortege two and one-half miles long with eight thousand people in attendance.

It may be said with some justice that the great gangster funerals of Chicago's past have been demonstrations by immigrant groups who value mortuary display more than the average citizen. It may also be said that Lingle was not the perfect martyr to arouse Chicago's emotion; he was a friend of Al Capone, a go-between rather than a writer, and he was not engaged in any dramatic crusade for civic reform when he was killed. He was a habitual gambler who made six or eight cash (no check) deposits a month of $500 to $800 in the Lake Shore Trust and Savings Bank. The shot that killed him was fired from a gun belonging to an ex-member of the Moran gang, a traitor to that gang who had deserted to Capone, and the presumption is that the killer was a North Side gangster who attacked Lingle because of his friendship for Capone. But these doubts concerning Lingle were not known widely at the time of his funeral; ostensibly he was an independent citizen killed in the line of duty.

Moreover, the killing of Lingle was the climax to a long series of murders. During 1929 the gang murders in Chicago numbered about one a week; this year the average has been closer to two a week. No one has the slightest hope of convicting a Chicago gangster of murder by ordinary processes of law. It has been accomplished only once—and then the murderer escaped the electric chair. It is an accepted fact that the only way to punish a Chicago gangster is to "shoot it out" with him. The police have shot nineteen criminals this year to date, although not all of them were gangsters. The gangsters have executed forty-two of their own number. Also, they have executed a few of the police, but these police killings are usually considered incidental and not deliberate, occurring only in those rare instances when the police interfere with the gangsters' major economic activities. For the most part the gangsters are loath to shoot a policeman, because the policeman is ordinarily a part of the system which feeds and clothes the gangster.

PUBLIC LIB.

The process by which the Chicago gangster evades conviction is simple and effective. He hires expensive lawyers with political pull; and he bribes or shoots the witnesses. Sometimes the witness is poisoned or strangled or given a palatial home in Italy, but the results are uniform. President Frank J. Loesch of the Chicago Crime Commission declares that practically every important prosecution of gangsters fails because witnesses hide, leave the State, commit perjury, refuse to testify at the grand jury hearings, or, having testified honestly, change their evidence in open court. There is no reason to believe that the Lingle case will be different from the rest; so far this year not a single gangster-murderer has been even indicted. Last year there were six indictments but no convictions.

In these facts lies the explanation of the power of the underworld not only in Chicago but in every large city in America. As a class, the rulers and protectors of American cities are hardly, if any, more law-abiding than the criminals they are supposed to control. Money, or the power it brings, are first considerations. It is common knowledge that bribes, perjury, the crudest kind of graft, and even an occasional murder are employed by the "hard-boiled" citizens who control municipal government. Years ago it was customary and considered necessary for the head of the police force in any large city to maintain certain useful contacts with the underworld. Today, and for a different reason, officialdom, from the chief of police to the neighborhood cop, has such contacts, close or distant as they may be.

These are the underlying causes of the phenomenon of Chicago crime. It has passed through many phases. For a time the labor racketeers held the center of the stage. Its present, most bloody, phase began when prohibition, offering the possibility of enormous illegal profits, was enacted. At present, almost all the strife and certainly three-fourths of the killings are directly traceable to the liquor racket. The hijackers, beer-runners, and alcohol-cookers have stolen the show. Booze is king of the underworld.

Picture a city of more than three million which had 7,500 saloons before prohibition and which voted six to one against the dry law. Remember, too, that this city has been the traffic crossroads for a large part of the Middle West. Through it have poured the hogs, wheat, lumber—and booze—of a great stretch of the hinterland. Then remember that the sentiment of Chicago has swung farther and farther away from the spirit of war-time abstinence which brought the Eighteenth Amendment, until in the recent Literary Digest poll less than 14 per cent of the Chicago vote of 115,493 was cast for strict enforcement. Obviously, under such circumstances bootlegging becomes an accepted and honorable profession. City Treasurer Charles S. Peterson estimates that Chicago spends thirty millions a year for liquor, of which fifteen millions go for gangsters and bribery. Capone himself has estimated that thirty millions are spent for protection alone. The Chicago Daily News puts the total weekly liquor and racket bill at $5,785,000 distributed as follows:

Beer, booze, alcohol	$3,510,000
Gambling houses and handbooks	1,250,000
Disorderly houses, call flats, shady hotels	1,000,000
Labor rackets, bombings, arson, kidnappings	25,000
Total	$5,785,000

There is sufficient surplus profit in the liquor racket alone to buy up a half-dozen municipal governments. Of the alleged annual liquor bill of $182,520,000 at least three-fourths is profit—in fact the estimate of profit is much more certain than the estimate of total receipts because the costs and sale prices of Chicago liquor are public property. The Daily News estimates 600 per cent profit on beer and 350 per cent profit on whiskey for the average Chicago bootlegger before protection money is paid. The speakeasy proprietor's profit must come after that. An experienced Chicago attorney estimates that he can make $50,000 profit on alcohol in thirty days from one thousand-gallon still by paying $25,000 for construction, $25,000 for materials, and $50,000 for protection. Thus, if we ignore all the profits of gambling and prostitution and allow the liquor gangs a modest 300 per cent on their estimated total sales, we find that they have about $137,000,000 a year to spend upon themselves, the police, and the politicians.

The city is alleged to have 2,000 gangsters. When $137,000,000 is divided up astutely it will pay 2,000 gangsters an average salary of $20,000 a year each, it will give 10,000 policemen pocket money of $20 a week each, and it will leave $86,000,000 for the "big shots" of protection—the lawyers, politicians, judges, and prohibition officers. Private profit maintains and fortifies Chicago's gang wars.

Why Chicago's gang wars are worse than those of other cities has never been satisfactorily explained. There have been many theories, and some very good ones. Chicago's whole history has been turbulent, and when once a city has become a magnet for adventurous spirits its reputation continues to draw like to like. The Illinois Crime Survey, William Bolitho, and others have discussed the racial forces that underlie Chicago's feuds. I shall only mention them here. There are in Chicago great undigested chunks of Sicilians and Irish and others who have forsaken their old mores and not yet adjusted themselves to the politer ways of getting something for nothing which characterize American business enterprise. The era of gangsterism is for many of these foreign groups an interim between two cultures.

Chicago's cultural indigestion is more acute than New York's because in the latter city Tammany acts as a gang stabilizer. There is one district captain to see about the local policeman and one intimate of the city magistrate to use his "influence." Gang life in New York tends to dovetail into the one political machine and thus avoids the waste and duplication of the struggles for territorial control. In Chicago every election is a battle in which the power of gangland is increased by the dependence of both sides upon gang support. Despite its present excitement Chicago will probably accomplish as little in apprehending and punishing the murderer of Lingle as it has done in previous murders, for the simple reason that the upper world is too much involved with the underworld. and the upper world will not convict itself.

Women Go Free in Central Asia

By LOUIS FISCHER

Bokhara, May 8

UNLIKE the women of the rest of Central Asia, the women of Kazakstan go unveiled. The ugly black parandjah never hides their pan-shaped, Mongoloid faces. They work. The husbands smoke, sleep, sing ballads, and drink green tea while the wives tend the flocks, keep the household, and rear tremendous families. The men, almost living on horses—one sees them sitting, standing, crouching, dozing on their bony, shaggy mountain ponies—are unaccustomed to physical labor. Their delicate, almost lady-like hands bear witness to the fact. Proletarianization, now rapidly proceeding in Kazakstan—the Turkestan-Siberian railway will stimulate it—must remold the muscles and minds of a whole race.

Like their half-brothers in other parts of Central Asia (Uzbeks, Tadjiks, Kirghizi, and Turkomans), the Kazaks are Moslem. But the predominating outside social and ethnological influences in Kazakstan are Chinese rather than Arab, Turanian, or Indian as in Tashkent, Samarkand, Bokhara, and Khiva. The harem, therefore, never existed. Until the Soviet regime proscribed polygamy by law and extirpated it in practice, rich Kazaks owned three, sometimes four wives, to each of whom a typical circular, felt-covered, mushroom-like yurt was assigned. Yet women were not segregated as in all other parts of Turkestan. In fact, before 1917—and now too, though the evidence is hearsay—guests might avail themselves of a Kazak's spouse with his consent.

Nomad life, which the Five-Year Plan promises largely to abolish, and hard labor earn the Kazak woman greater rights and freedom than in the more western sections of former Turkestan. Given the cultural backwardness of these regions, however, the whole thing is extremely relative. In Kazakstan and throughout Central Asia kalim, or the selling of brides, for instance, still persists. At one station along the Turksib I stood in the midst of a large group of Kazak men and women—the men dressed in black, fleece-padded caftans and tremendous fur caps despite the semi-tropical sun, for the nights are bitterly cold; the women wearing colorful gowns and coats, with huge white hoods with turban-like extensions wrapped around their shining flat brown faces, punctured by smiling slit eyes. I asked one Kazak whether women could be bought. He answered in the affirmative, but drew his hand back into his sleeve—a quaint way of saying that since the revolution the purchases must be made secretly. He nevertheless made no secret of his own transaction. For in reply to my direct question he stated that his wife had cost him five hundred rubles which he was paying off in instalments. "Is she worth it?" I asked. He shook a vigorous "Yes" and called on the assembled multitude to bear him out. They did. "I doubt," he then added with Oriental slyness, "whether my daughter will ever afford me the opportunity of balancing the account. The ways of our youth are different."

A gigantic battle has been proceeding throughout Soviet Central Asia to eliminate kalim, child marriage, and the veiled woman. The scenes of bitterest struggle are Uzbekistan, Tadjikistan, and Turkmenistan—the former Turkestan, Bokhara, and Khiva. Legislation and economic conditions spelled the death of the popular institutions of harem and polygamy. But woman remained a subjected, inferior species until propaganda, education, and force opened the door to a new freedom.

The fight for the liberation of Eastern women has fed the sources of counter-revolution in Central Asia. Wives and daughters have been killed for discarding the veil. Villages have risen up in angry protest. The Bolsheviks were tampering with customs centuries old, rooted in a fanatical religion, and regarded as the pillars of family existence. Yet no respite was allowed, and although the war is by no means ended the issue is clear and the results are apparent. In Tashkent, Samarkand, and Bokhara, the three leading cities of this territory, I saw more women without than with veils. It is no pleasure to wear a thick, dirty rag between yourself and the sun, air, and outside world. If the women had their way all would bare their faces. But the men interfere.

In Bokhara I talked for two hours with an Uzbek actress, Halima Nazrekaz. Eighteen, pretty, full of character, she combined unbounded primitive frankness with the bashfulness of girlhood and civilization. From her I understood best the bitter antagonisms and the romance of this drive to raise women to the status of human beings. Her family unites the new and the old. Halima married one year ago a man of her own choice—an Uzbek Komosomol (young Communist) actor and playwright. Her sister, aged twenty-four, was sold to a patriarch of seventy-two by her father. Formerly, when Halima wished to visit her sister's rural home she donned a veil. In distant kishlaks, or Uzbek villages, an uncovered woman courts danger from the men, who fear the contagious effect of her example on their wives and sisters. Now Halima has abandoned the trips: on the one hand, she cannot bear the hypocrisy of veiling herself for special occasions; on the other hand, two actresses have been killed, and she must be more cautious.

The actress is kissed and embraced on the stage. She dances in public. Although a large mixed audience in colorful native costume seemed to enjoy the Persian musical comedy I watched in the Bokhara theater, many non-progressive elements of the population rebel against such "immoral conduct." A fellow-actress of Halima's went home to her peasant parents last year. The girl's father conspired with several neighbors. Together they hacked her into bits and hid the pieces. The odor divulged their secret several months later and the group were condemned to death—for counter-revolution. Another actress met a similarly gruesome end.

Halima calls herself a "new one"—a new woman. The local populations call the "new ones" "Russians." The influence from the West is resented, but by a diminishing number. The youth of the country staunchly support the Soviets in their attempt to free the female sex; the women themselves actively and passively cooperate; while the men either see the light or become reconciled to an inevitable change. To Halima, the Easterner, light comes from the West. Educated in the cursive Arabic script, she has already learned the Latin alphabet newly introduced for all Turanian nationalities in the Soviet Union. She has read Goethe and Schiller in translation, and the classic Russians in the original. Personally, too, she said, she liked Russian men better than Uzbeks.

She was stolen from her family at the age of twelve by a man now working in Meyerhold's theater. He carried her off to Baku to study at a dramatic technicum. "He was to me as a father," she assured us, knowing that we had heard of girl marriages at unripe ages, "and consecrated me to the art he himself loved." To dispel remnants of suspicion she may have seen in our faces she protested that she "did not go in to her husband for the first three months"—all this in the most natural tones. Then she took us to her dormitory and showed the Uzbek costumes which she wears at home in preference to her European street clothes. I asked about her family. Her father has never swallowed the bitter pill of a daughter on the public stage, and when she goes down to Ferghana to visit him he refuses to see her. The mother's heart is softer and more understanding.

Halima is not a member of the Communist Party. Yet her views, philosophy, and manners are Soviet. She knows no other life. "But for the revolution," she said, "I might have been one of many in an old uncle's harem."

On the day I met Halima I also visited the palaces of the former emir of Bokhara. The winter palace within the city was badly damaged in the fighting in 1920 which drove poor Said Mir Alim Khan to Kabul, where he now sells karakul. But its distinguishing feature is still pointed out—a spacious haus or pool where the harem women bathed while the emir reclined on a throne and made his daily choice. Custom permitted the emir to keep ninety-nine wives. Actually, however, he rarely had more than seventy-two, for his time and energies were also required by affairs of state.

Under such a government the Halimas and their sisters would have remained the toys of men. The backwardness of this feudal province made the Bolshevik revolution all the more necessary, and makes the resultant reforms all the more deep-reaching and irrevocable. When the fundamental conditions of personal and family life have been changed as in Soviet Central Asia with the approval of one sex and the sympathetic understanding of a large part of the other there is no return to the old. The doctrinaire may argue that primitive regions like Bokhara are not ripe for socialism. Actually, however, the social revolution has struck firmer root and provoked greater enthusiasm here than in some other sections of the Soviet Union.

The revolution has introduced Central Asia's women into the economic world. Formerly, woman's place was in the harem, or in the home, but certainly not in the factory or store and least of all in politics. Today, women have invaded all these fields. Indeed, we were officially welcomed to Samarkand by Shora Abidova. At the age of twelve her father had given her in marriage. Now she is vice-president of the Uzbek Republic.

A new silk factory in Bokhara is almost entirely "manned" by women—a normal situation in most places but unusual in Central Asia. Here as everywhere in former Turkestan one finds a leaven of Russian women who act as examples of higher culture and greater freedom. And since complete equality of nationalities permits of intimate interracial contact (in contradistinction to prerevolutionary days when the officially superior Russian was the hated colonizer), a natural exchange of ideas and social influences takes place which makes for progress and for more tolerance on both sides. The Uzbek ex-harem slave is grateful to the Russian who leads the way to personal liberty. This is an important political factor.

The factories and shops are used as nuclei of propaganda. There are stores for women only, served by women only; veiled women will not, without embarrassment, buy from men. But these stores do not merely serve the convenience of "old ones" who still wear the parandjah. I entered one in this city, once the "ruby of the East" but now faded, jaded, and down at the heel on account of the Bolshevik policy toward trade. There were three saleswomen: a Russian, a native Uzbek, and a beautiful Bokharan Jewess. When a veiled woman comes in she lifts her veil—no men are about. She is complimented on her looks. She is told the advantages of an uncovered face and head. "But my husband? How will my father react?" More propaganda. They urge her to come to the club that evening. "We will talk it over."

She listens to a lecture in the club. A woman agitator draws her into private conversation. The matter is a delicate one. A family may be destroyed. A woman may be beaten or killed. If she is convinced only half the battle is won. She may uncover and veil again under her husband's compulsion. Can they exert pressure on him? He may be threatened, or warned, or persuaded. If he is not a peasant or merchant public opinion can be mobilized against him.

The task is not easy. Every weapon is employed. Woman has been led into the school, the dispensary, and the hospital. Under the emir, no male physicians could examine a woman patient, and there were no female doctors. In extreme cases the husband described the symptoms to the physician, who then made his diagnosis on that basis. Today, however, that prejudice is completely swept away, and in Tashkent, Samarkand, and Bokhara I saw queues of women awaiting treatment at government medical centers. This may seem very little to the Western reader. In Central Asia it represents a cultural revolution.

The authorities try to reach the woman's heart and mind through her child. Despite the abundance of health-giving sunlight infant mortality is very great owing to primitive customs, ignorance, and lack of facilities. Scores of child-welfare bureaus have been established. Every baby saved by their advice means a mother won for more modern Soviet notions. I am told that in Kazakstan there have been opened ambulatory day nurseries which move with the nomads. Expeditions of physicians hunt out most remote human settlements, discover their diseases, and go away leaving behind them hitherto unknown miracle-working substances: iodine, borax, castor oil, soap.

Every doctor, every creche, every unveiled woman, every woman member of a Soviet, every economically independent woman is a propaganda unit for the liberation of the whole sex from a humiliating slavery consciously fostered by the old regime. The entire situation strikes at religion, with the aid of which the old bondage was maintained. And it creates an infection which is carried to other Moslem lands, for it is no accident that parallel movements for woman's elementary freedom have sprung up in the same decade in Turkey and Afghanistan, to some extent in Persia, and in Soviet Central Asia.

Babes in the Hoover Wood

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, June 21

THOSE babes in the wood who professed to believe up to the last fateful hour that Herbert Hoover would "prove his courage" and "vindicate his statesmanship" by vetoing the Grundy tariff are entitled to the sympathy and understanding of all who cherish Samaritan instincts. The fault in their reasoning was that it missed the point. That the bill violated the President's campaign pledges, that it flouted his recommendation to Congress, that it would reduce exports and increase unemployment, that it provided for indefensible rate increases—as statements of fact all these were incontrovertible, but as arguments that the President would not sign they were quite irrelevant. He did not sign the bill because it was a good bill, or the sort of bill he had requested, or wanted, for obviously it was neither. He signed it because the interests that wanted it, and would profit by it, and by whose lobbyists many of its principal schedules were written will exercise a powerful, if not the controlling, influence in the next Republican national convention and will supply the bulk of Republican campaign funds in the next Presidential campaign. Writing in The Nation of March 26, your humble correspondent stated:

> I venture to forecast that no matter what form the bill finally takes, it will prove to be the very bill that he [President Hoover] wanted all along, and that its enactment in the form in which it finally is enacted will be hailed as vindicating his leadership.

It was so hailed less than twenty-four hours after its passage by Mr. Hoover himself in terms of fulsome eulogy beside which the rustic tub-thumping of Jim Watson sounded like simple candor. As an experiment in political thinking, let me suggest to all earnest seekers after truth who have been perplexed by the Great Engineer's official acts that they try interpreting all the more important examples in terms of his anxiety to be renominated and reelected. That part of their bewilderment which remains thereafter can be explained on the ground of his political misjudgment.

* * * * *

THE White House case of prickly heat has not been improved by Dwight Morrow's spectacular victory in New Jersey. Despite the State's admitted wetness the stunning size of Morrow's plurality has vastly aggravated official doubts concerning the popularity of the Noble Experiment, and, infinitely more alarming, it has established Morrow beyond all cavil as the most formidable potential rival of Hoover for the Republican nomination in 1932. Whether Representative Franklin Fort was projected into the race in a deliberate effort to forestall just such a development may be more accurately determined when we see what happens to Mr. Fort. If presently he receives a dignified appointment in the Administration, jaundiced persons will be tempted to regard it as his solace and reward for making the great sacrifice. It is illuminating to observe the precipitate haste with which the President announced his purpose to support Morrow in the general election. Was this the result of two great minds being reconciled on the issues? Morrow was nominated, and will campaign for election, on a platform advocating repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. Hoover was nominated and elected on a platform promising maintenance and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. In other words, Hoover is supporting Morrow on a platform almost identical with that of Al Smith. Did Mr. Hoover secretly agree with Governor Smith, whom he opposed and defeated, or does he secretly disagree with Morrow, whom he is supporting? Two other explanations suggest themselves: that Mr. Hoover is more interested in party success than in the preservation of the Eighteenth Amendment, or that he is eager to secure Morrow in the bonds of obligation before the little man from New Jersey becomes too big. It will be recalled that the President did not hasten to announce his support of Mrs. Ruth Hanna McCormick when she was nominated, although she is just as good a Republican as Mr. Morrow and believes the Experiment to be just as Noble as Mr. Hoover believed it was when he was a candidate.

* * * * *

IN connection with Muscle Shoals legislation, the last pretense of sincerity has been stripped from the Old Guard leaders in the House by their refusal to accept the compromise offer of the Senate conferees. Their professed concern to utilize the property in the production of cheap fertilizer "for the benefit of the farmer" has been exposed as a smoke screen behind which they attempted to conceal their actual purposes—that of preventing government operation of the power plant under conditions that would disclose the extent of the profits now made by private power companies. The conference committee faced the fact that the bill passed by the Senate provided for government operation of the power plant and the nitrate plant, whereas the House bill provided for the leasing of both to private interests. The Senate conferees thereupon proposed a compromise whereby the nitrate plant would be leased to a fertilizer company and the government would operate the power plant, contracting to supply the private company with all the power required to operate the nitrate plant and reserving only the right to sell surplus power to municipalities, counties, and States. Obviously, this offer made every reasonable concession, and afforded every possible guaranty for the production of fertilizer up to the full capacity of the plant. Nevertheless, the House conferees rejected it. Why? Because the House bosses were determined (1) that the consumers now purchasing current from the Alabama Power Company must not be permitted to buy it from the government, (2) that a settlement of the problem must be staved off until circumstances were more propitious for an attempt to turn the whole property over to the power trust, and (3) that under no circumstances must the government set up a yardstick by which the cost of generating and distributing power could be accurately determined and made known to the public. Exposed and discredited, the power trust still has its way in the House, and the world may know that good old Claudius Huston did not labor and collect in vain.

* * * * *

NO one can accuse the writer of failing to appreciate the admirable accomplishments of the Senate Lobby Committee. Few committees of Congress have shed light in more places requiring illumination and sanitation. Consequently it is painful to acknowledge that the committee's abject surrender in the face of Bishop Cannon's contemptuous challenge constitutes one of the most ignominious spectacles witnessed by Washington in many a day. The two principally responsible for it were Senators Caraway and Borah. With little Arthur Robinson of Indiana they comprised the majority by whose vote the white flag finally was run up. After ascertaining from E. C. Jameson, New York capitalist, that he had given Cannon $65,300 to be used in carrying the South for Hoover in 1928, and that Cannon had accounted for only $17,000 of it; and after seeking and obtaining evidence that the reverend Bishop had lost large sums through a bucket-shop, the committee simply folded up in the face of his refusal to tell what he did with the remaining $48,300. The excuse that it lacked authority to complete the inquiry it had begun lost whatever force it might have had when Caraway, Borah, and Robinson voted down Walsh's motion to ask the Senate for additional authority. Not only had Borah indicated an intention to support that motion, but he actually had conveyed the impression that he would present the request to the Senate. When the vote was taken behind closed doors he was recorded in the negative! Caraway's maneuvers were even more difficult to follow. First he laid the groundwork for cross-examining Cannon by subjecting Jameson to a thorough grilling. Then he went to Arkansas to keep an engagement, where he issued a statement apparently upholding Cannon's refusal to testify. Next he returned to Washington and declared in an interview that his Arkansas statement had been "unhappily phrased" and "generally misinterpreted," and that he had assured Senators Walsh and Blaine of his loyal support. Finally, he voted against requiring Cannon to answer, voted against certifying him for contempt, and voted against asking for an extension of authority—in other words, his votes coincided precisely with the "misinterpretation" which had been placed on his Arkansas statement. Subsequently in the Senate he added the crowning touch by denouncing as "common liars" all who intimated that he had ever changed his position on the subject! Doubtless I shall incur the same epithet from other sources when I say that ordinarily Caraway is one of the most courageous and consistent men in the Senate, but it is true, and what happened in this instance conveys some idea of the pressure and intimidation that were exercised to halt the investigation. The one member who never wavered or winced was John J. Blaine of Wisconsin.

Southern Labor and the Law

By WEIMAR JONES

STRIKES. Violence. Court trials. That is the ordinary sequence of events in labor wars. And the Southern textile-mill strikes of 1929 ran true to form. The strikes—a sort of psychological spontaneous combustion that closed 350 mills in three States within a month—are history. The eight shot to death, victims of the conflict, have long since been buried. The third chapter was written when a jury returned a verdict in the last of the criminal cases growing out of the strikes, the State of North Carolina failing in its effort to secure convictions for the murder of Mrs. Ella Mae Wiggins. Mrs. Wiggins, the mother of five small children, paid with her life for daring to espouse radical political and economic doctrines; in all the bitterness of the trial she was charged with no other crime.

The purpose of this article is to present what was not possible until completion of this last case, namely, the record of the Southern courts in dispensing justice in the strike cases against unionists, anti-unionists, and officers.

Violence incident to the strikes began at Elizabethton, Tennessee, in April, 1929, three weeks after the first walkout; it culminated six months later at Marion, North Carolina, in six deaths. Any informed person in the South knows that there was lawlessness on the part of the strikers during this six months' period. But it is to the credit of the uneducated and underpaid Southern textile worker that he was not the first to flout the law. The first violence, at Elizabethton, was by an anti-unionist mob. Next it broke out at Gastonia, North Carolina—this time on the part of a mob that disapproved of both labor unions and radical ideas. And at Marion, North Carolina, the mills had been violating the State labor laws long before their operatives, working twelve hours and twenty minutes a day, at last rebelled. (This oft-repeated charge has never been denied, but the law-enforcement agencies have blandly ignored it.)

There were eight major cases of violence incident to the strikes. There was the "chamber-of-commerce" kidnapping at Elizabethton on April 4, when Alfred Hoffman and E. F. McGrady, of the American Federation of Labor, were taken from their hotel, carried into another State, and ordered never to return. But the organizers did return, and quoted members of the mob as saying they represented the Elizabethton Chamber of Commerce. Five prominent business men of the town were arrested, but the efforts of the courts ended with the arrests. The case remained untried for nearly a year, and on February 10, 1930, Judge D. A. Vines arbitrarily ordered it stricken from the docket.

At Gastonia, three weeks after the left-wing National Textile Workers' Union had called a strike at the Loray mills, union headquarters and a grocery store run for the relief of needy strikers were demolished with axes and sledge hammers in the hands of a masked mob. The noise proved insufficient to rouse from sleep the two companies of national guardsmen, quartered two blocks away, who had been ordered to Gastonia to protect property. Fourteen arrests were made, but the Gaston County grand jury, after examining more than one hundred witnesses, reported itself unable to find sufficient evidence to warrant indictments. The report added naively that after all the damage was "not exceeding $500."

The radical leaders established new headquarters and a tent colony for evicted strikers. This time they took no chances. They posted armed pickets about the camp. And it was here, on the night of June 7, that O. F. Aderholt, Gastonia's chief of police, was fatally shot. Three patrolmen who were with him and a union organizer were wounded at the same time. Out of seventy-one persons arrested, the authorities finally picked sixteen to charge with the murder of Aderholt and with assaults on his three patrolmen. (Apparently it did not occur to the solicitor's office that the wounding of the union organizer might be construed as assault.) This time the grand jury, after examining four witnesses, had no difficulty in finding evidence sufficient to warrant indictments against all sixteen.

There were three efforts to try the case. At the first, defense attorneys signed affidavits telling of threats made against them, and a change of venue was ordered. At the second, a mistrial was declared when a juror became insane. When the case came up the third time the charges were dropped against all but seven of the defendants, and the degree of the charge was lowered from first- to second-degree murder. On this charge each of the seven was convicted; they were also found guilty of assault on each of the three wounded patrolmen. They were sentenced to prison for terms ranging from five to twenty years, the most severe punishment falling to Fred Erwin Beal and other "outside" organizers. The case was appealed, but the decision has not been made at this writing (June 18).

There were two legal issues submitted to the jury: Was there a conspiracy? Were the defendants, if guilty of firing the shots that killed Aderholt and wounded his patrolmen, justified? The State's evidence tending to establish proof of conspiracy was mainly confined to reports of alleged threats. The defense, asserting that the strikers were justified in firing (if they did), pointed out that their first headquarters had been destroyed and no one punished; that the national guardsmen had been withdrawn almost immediately thereafter; and that Aderholt and his patrolmen forced their way into the camp without search warrants. On the question of justification Judge M. V. Barnhill charged the jury that "the occupant of private property has a right to guard same and to have guns on the property"; he pointed out, however, that only such force as is necessary may lawfully be used to eject trespassers, and he left it to the jury to determine if the officers were trespassers.

Careful reading of the evidence and the argument of counsel, however, leads to the conclusion that it was on neither of these legal issues, but on a third, that of communism, that the jury based its verdict. Once Judge Barnhill admitted communism in evidence, prosecution counsel never permitted the jurors to forget it; in their most vehement denunciations of the defendants, in fact, they forgot the murder charge and asserted that the safety of the government, American institutions, and the home virtually depended upon conviction of the men on trial. The truth is that the conviction of murder was merely technical; actually, the seven men face prison sentences because of their beliefs.

Anti-Communist sentiment ran high in Gastonia, and when the second effort to try the Aderholt case ended in a mistrial the anger of the townspeople knew no bounds. A mob formed. It raided "red" headquarters. It motored to Charlotte, where the case was tried, and repeated the performance there. It surrounded the residence of Tom P. Jimison, a defense attorney, and demanded his person—only to find that he was not at home. And then it took three union organizers from their boarding-house, carried them into the neighboring county of Cabarrus, and severely flogged one of them. The rite was interrupted by the arrival of two curious 'possum hunters—the mob took to its heels. All efforts to convict and punish the guilty persons ended in failure, and the attempts to secure convictions were marked by a series of the most shameful episodes in the history of the North Carolina courts. State's witnesses were arbitrarily jailed "for investigation"; the testimony of Ben Wells, the man flogged, who had identified members of the mob, was ordered stricken from the record when he denied belief in a Supreme Being (later, in Cabarrus County, a different judge admitted the testimony, but that trial ended in acquittal); Solicitor John G. Carpenter "neglected" to summon perhaps the one witness who could testify impartially, a Charlotte newspaperman who told the solicitor he could identify a Gastonia policeman as a member of the mob; and finally, after seven men had been held for the Gaston County grand jury, that body absolutely refused to return indictments—an action characterized by Judge H. Hoyle Sink as "a plain miscarriage of justice."

A week after the Charlotte kidnapping Cleo Tessnair, union organizer, was speaking at Kings Mountain, North Carolina. His open-air speaking stand was dynamited from under him, and that night he was taken from his home, carried into South Carolina, beaten, and ordered to run as bullets flicked the dirt at his heels. Authorities promptly announced initiation of three separate investigations—and the case ended there.

Mrs. Wiggins was slain near Gastonia on Saturday afternoon, September 13. She was one of twenty-one passengers on a truck that had started to an open-air strikers' meeting in South Gastonia. Announcement by strike leaders that the meeting would be held had been met with threats that it would not be permitted, but the threats apparently were not taken seriously. The truck carrying the woman came from Bessemer City, nearby. A mob which had formed halted it, ordered it to turn back to Bessemer City, and then followed it. A little later a car came from behind the vehicle, passed it, and cut sharply in front, causing a collision. During the confusion Mrs. Wiggins was shot and instantly killed.

At the investigation nine were held for the Gaston County grand jury. Again it refused to indict. Governor O. Max Gardner sent Judge P. A. McElroy to Gastonia to conduct a new investigation, and he held fourteen for action by the new grand jury that took office January 1, 1930. That body, after long deliberation, and under considerable pressure from the presiding judge, at length returned indictments against five of the fourteen. At the trial witness after witness positively identified Horace Wheelus as the man who fired the fatal shot, and the State connected each of the other four defendants with the crime. The defense's reply was what it termed "an air-tight, watertight alibi." Once again mill-paid attorneys rang the changes on communism, marriage, race prejudice, and atheism; and once again they won. The verdict was "not guilty."

Two incidents of the trial threw considerable light on the situation. The first was the attitude of Solicitor Carpenter in opposing a change of venue. The motion for the change was offered by Attorney General Dennis G. Brummitt, ordered by Governor Gardner to assist the solicitor in the prosecution, but Carpenter declared that the motion was a reflection on the citizenship of Gaston County. The other was a juror's explanation of how the verdict was reached. "The State just didn't have the witnesses we could depend on," he said, explaining that he had reference to "the type of witnesses offered." Most of the State's witnesses were on the truck with Mrs. Wiggins, and therefore marked with the brand of communism.

Two of the trials incident to the strike grew out of occurrences at Marion, North Carolina—the "furniture rebellion" and the "Marion massacre." In the first, fifty-three strikers were charged with "rebellion against the State of North Carolina," the State's first rebellion case since Reconstruction. The Clinchfield mills found inconvenient a promise not to import outside labor, and broke it. The answer of the strikers was to throw the furniture of a "scab" out of the mill-owned house in which it had just been placed. Sheriff Oscar F. Adkins attempted to replace it but failed, and he and his deputies retired amid jeers, sticks, and stones.

Of the fifty-three, the State put on trial only four—Alfred Hoffman, leader of the strike, and three of his lieutenants. The charges were non-suited by Judge G. V. Cowper at the end of the State's evidence. The warrants had been amended, however, to charge also "rioting and resisting officers." The four were put on trial on these two charges and convicted of the former. On account of ill health Hoffman was let off with a fine of $1,000 and a month in jail. The other three were sentenced to six months each on the roads. In these cases also, appeals are still pending.

At one o'clock on the morning of October 2 a new strike was called in the mill of the Marion Manufacturing Company. Dawn found the strikers picketing the mill; in the mill gate were Sheriff Adkins, most of his deputies, and a number of deputized "loyal" mill workers, prepared for trouble. In an attempt to disperse the crowd Adkins released tear gas. Just then shots were fired—a volley, another volley. It lasted about three minutes. When it ended, twenty-one victims lay in the village street, all of them workers. Three of them were dead. The other eighteen were taken to the hospital where three more died; not one of these was armed.

Adkins and fifteen deputies were charged with murder. At the preliminary hearing the sheriff and seven deputies denied firing and were freed; the other eight, admitting they shot at the strikers, were held. On trial these eight took the stand and testified that the strikers fired first; that the defendants shot in defense of their own lives; that they did not, as the State charged, fire at fleeing strikers, and that they shot only at those strikers firing at them. But they could not satisfactorily explain how it was, if they fired only at those shooting at them, that none of the wounded were armed, how it happened that many of the strikers were shot in the back, why they were struck by none of the alleged shots from the strikers, and why, if it was necessary for them to defend their lives, the other eight officers present felt no such necessity.

Strikers' testimony that they were unarmed and did not fire was corroborated in part by two disinterested witnesses, newspapermen, who gave it as their opinion that the first shots were fired by officers. The chief issue before the jury was: Did the officers use more force than necessary? That question the jurors answered in the negative, and the deputies were acquitted.

To summarize: Of eight slain in the three States, seven were strikers; the only murder conviction was of strikers for the death of an officer. In two of the major cases, strikers were accused and convicted. In five, anti-unionist mobs were accused and no one was convicted; and in one, officers (some of them mill-paid) were accused and acquitted. That is the record for the major cases. The percentages are the same in the dozens of minor ones. In every case where strikers were put on trial strikers were convicted; in not one case where anti-unionists or officers were accused has there been a conviction.

That is the record. Surely it speaks for itself.

In the Driftway

THERE is a widespread tradition that no small boy can face a sewing machine or an alarm clock without an immediate longing to take it apart. The Drifter must confess that he never felt this urge. Perhaps the sad tale of Humpty Dumpty made too deep an impression on his young mind, or perhaps screws and cogs simply produced in him a profound inertia. Certain it is that he never interfered with a sewing machine, no hapless clock ever strewed his nursery floor, and the ways of a machine—any machine—are still shrouded in mystery.

* * * * *

THUS the Drifter was agreeably surprised not long ago to learn that Big Ben, most reassuring of England's familiar spirits, is not above a simple remedy when it varies some fraction of a second from the Greenwich standard. There is a tray fixed about halfway down the pendulum, and whenever Big Ben runs a trifle slow the Astronomer Royal decrees the placing of a penny or a halfpenny on this tray. Big Ben responds, and even sometimes hurries a little more than necessary, in which case the penny is removed and put away in the Exchequer for another time. Somehow, the Drifter had imagined a complicated mechanism and much shaking of the head if Big Ben should stray, and it gratifies him to think that even he, the Drifter, could regulate England's minutes if he cared to.

* * * * *

NOT that the Drifter does care to. It matters to him very little just when Big Ben tosses down the hours so long as he is still allowed to go and sit on the terrace of the House of Commons, and drink his tea, and watch the people coming and going in "the best club in London." It is years since the Drifter first found his way to this haven. A kindly M.P. invited him to tea one day, and he took his courage in both hands and went. It needed courage, for the Drifter is alarmed by going out to tea. He has never mastered the technique, but stands about, teacup in hand, with a glassy smile. And once there he is unable to leave. But on the terrace of the House of Commons his fears vanished. He sat with his friend, absorbed in watching the members as they grouped and dispersed and regrouped themselves. He watched those who strutted with constituents in tow and those who walked alone. And about them all he felt that strange composite atmosphere which irresistibly draws back to Westminster those Englishmen who have once come under its spell; from the north and from the south; from the green counties and from the dark towns. It is an atmosphere made up of many things. There is in it responsibility and eagerness; self-seeking no doubt, and boredom too; but above all a sense of slow shaping, slow and steady as the current of the Thames itself which slips quietly past the terrace and past Big Ben.

* * * * *

BIG BEN is the guardian of another England too. The Drifter remembers one night when he loitered on Westminister Bridge in the small hours. The river boats loomed suddenly out of a light mist, making slow way against an ebbing tide. Parliament sat late that night, and the lights in the House were burning; but the bridge was nearly deserted. A forlorn old woman, with two brave feathers in her hat, shuffled by, pausing to look at a barge. The Drifter fell into conversation with a strolling bobby, and not far away from them the old woman looked up with a smile as Big Ben boomed into the night. "We do see some queer people waiting here for the hour," said the bobby musingly. And he added, with the unfailing politeness of his kind: "Not that I mean anything personal, sir."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Associated Press

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I note in Time the statement that the annual address of Mr. Kent Cooper to the convention of the Associated Press was accepted as a reply of the Associated Press to the article by Oswald Garrison Villard recently published in The Nation. The Associated Press is reported to be displeased with Mr. Villard's article. It may amuse you that I also was displeased with the article, for an exactly opposite reason. I beg to call the attention of your readers to the fact that very precise legal evidence of the mishandling of labor news by the Associated Press is available for those who want it. I refer to "The Brass Check," Chapter LVIII, which is entitled Poisoned at the Source. Let me point out that I was never able to get the Associated Press, or any Associated Press champion, to do so much as mention this chapter. The Associated Press publicly announced at one of its annual gatherings that it was preparing an answer to "The Brass Check," but it never published this answer, although I demanded it for several years thereafter.

The most ardent champion of the Associated Press was the late Professor James Melvin Lee, of the School of Journalism, New York University. I carried on a controversy with Professor Lee by letters, articles, and debates, but never once was I able to get him to open his lips on the subject of that particular chapter of "The Brass Check." The chapter happens to be invulnerable, because it is based upon the sworn records of the Associated Press, submitted under oath in a legal proceeding. In the fall of 1928 I ran into Professor Lee at a dinner at the Authors' Club, but even then, when face to face with him, I could not get him to discuss this chapter!

The Associated Press may claim that the question of its conduct in the West Virginia coal strike is out of date. But the fact is that it is reporting strikes today by exactly the same methods, and with exactly the same results. Anyhow, it is with history that Mr. Villard was dealing in his article, and 1913 is not such ancient history.

Pasadena, Cal., June 7 UPTON SINCLAIR

Comics and the N. A. N. A.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the article Standardizing the Daily, in your issue of June 4, Mr. Villard says of the North American Newspaper Alliance, "It gives plenty of attention to sports, but offers no 'comics.'" I should like to point out, perhaps at the penalty of one job, that recently the N. A. N. A. paid $600,000 for the Bell Syndicate, the principal business of which is to syndicate "comics." And you probably have noticed that the N. A. N. A. has revised Mr. Freud's latest so that it will not be offensive to ever so many polite editors.

New York, June 5 LOUIS BATISTE

Which Shall We Believe?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As an interested reader of your magazine, which appears to be the leading weekly in the campaign against hypocrisy and crookedness, I have at times been puzzled by your attitude toward the Communists, whose side you seem to take in almost every disagreement between them and the forces of law and order.

The chief argument I have against these trouble-makers is that the greater percentage of them are foreigners who being badly treated in their own countries come to the New World for refuge, and finding that they have to work hard for a living here as everywhere else, become discontented and attempt to make as much trouble among the satisfied majority as they can.

It will be noticed that the United States, especially in the larger cities, having a larger percentage of these aliens has more trouble with them than Canada, except perhaps in Winnipeg, which is the gathering place for such malcontents in this country.

If these people are not satisfied with conditions here, which are much better than where they came from, why don't they go back where they belong?

The United States is a free country except in the case of prohibition, but should be kept for her own people or for the better class of European who is willing to work hard and is not afraid to face the reverses which even the best of men suffer, not for the riffraff of Europe to make trouble where there was at least contentment before.

Montreal, May 15 GEORGE A. FLINT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I take this opportunity to congratulate you on the excellence of your paper, for as a leader of liberal opinion you have no peer. Nevertheless, I am forced to protest against your attitude toward the fighting arm of social reform, the Communists. Viewed realistically, a liberal paper has no value as a force for the promulgation of a revolutionary political program, for the field of liberal thought must necessarily be restricted to ideas and ideals, not action.

Yet it has been the habit of liberals everywhere to castigate Communists as "misleaders or worse" when in truth the Communist is striving for identically the same principles as the liberal. The lofty disdain with which the liberal regards the Communist is damaging to the very principles of liberalism. For the criterion of a liberal attitude is liberality, and if the liberal must "sit on the fence" instead of jumping into the field of battle, he should at least regard communism for what it really is.

Your often-repeated excuse for excoriating the Communist, that he is a blind follower of a rigid, uncompromising creed, is lamentably weak, for concerted action necessitates discipline —not argument.

Omaha, May 15 GRAYDON F. ILLSLEY

Joseph Wood Krutch

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation has paid its tribute to Joseph Wood Krutch but I should like to express the feelings of some of your readers, since I know that I do not speak for myself alone.

It is no exaggeration to say that the most keenly anticipated piece each week has been the criticism by Mr. Krutch. His soundness, sincerity, and penetrating critical judgment are a great joy. He illuminates everything he discusses, and even though one may not always agree with his remarks, they are always thought-provoking.

I am sure I join with many of his admirers in wishing for him high productivity on the Guggenheim Fellowship. It is our only consolation in losing him for this period.

New York, June 12 NICHOLAS KOPELOFF

IS RELIGION A ROMANTIC DELUSION?

Whether it is or not, it is still one of the major topics of thought. Were it not so, the clergy would be jobless and the seminaries empty. One book stands alone as a full, free and outspoken discussion of the whole religious question. It is:

TREATISE ON THE GODS

By H. L. MENCKEN

Certainly, it is no wonder that the whole country is buzzing with comment on this daring book. And at the rate that it is selling, it will not be long before people are going to be ashamed to admit that they have not read it.

A best-seller in every city in America

$3.00 at all bookshops

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · PUBLISHER, N. Y.

Red-Baiting in California

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: After a trial lasting three weeks in the Superior Court of Imperial County, California, nine men have been convicted on three counts of violation of the criminal-syndicalism law, and face terms in San Quentin of from three to forty-two years each. This is the first time in six years that the law against criminal syndicalism has been invoked in this State to curb the activities of the so-called "reds." The real "crime" of these men was their attempt to organize the cantaloupe workers of Imperial Valley.

In January last, attempts were made to form a union among the lettuce workers of the Valley, but they failed owing to the vigilance of Sheriff Charles L. Gillette and his deputies, who jailed the leaders on charges of vagrancy and disturbing the peace. This is the sheriff who assaulted me when I intimated that the men he was holding in jail had done nothing worthy of arrest. I brought charges of assault against him, and he was found guilty and fined $150. He appealed the case to the Superior Court.

Sheriff Gillette and the police of Brawley and El Centro have declared a moratorium on free speech and free assembly in the Valley. They stationed their men around an entrance of a hall where the International Labor Defense had arranged to hold a meeting recently, and allowed no one to enter.

Altogether, a serious situation confronts us in southern California. This trial may mean the signal for the revival of the criminal-syndicalism law in many places. These cases must be carried to the higher courts and publicity given to what has occurred. Money is needed. Will you who care for the preservation of our freedom send us contributions to carry on the fight we are waging? Make the checks generous, please, and send them to the American Civil Liberties Union, Southern California Branch, 1022 California Building, Los Angeles, California.

Los Angeles, June 17 CLINTON J. TAFT

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL BLANSHARD is preparing a study entitled "Racketeering High and Low—The Folly of Work" for the League for Industrial Democracy.

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, will soon publish "The Soviets in World Affairs."

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

WEIMAR JONES is a North Carolina newspaperman who has made an exhaustive study of last year's labor trials.

LOUISE TOWNSEND NICHOLL contributes verse to various periodicals.

JAMES TRUSLOW ADAMS is the author of "Founding of New England" and "The Adams Family."

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

EDA LOU WALTON is assistant professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University.

V. F. CALVERTON is the author of "The Bankruptcy of Marriage."

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

MARY AUSTIN, poet, novelist, and critic, lives at Santa Fé, New Mexico.

G. E. R. GEDYE, is Central European correspondent of The Nation.

Books

Without Shield

By LOUISE TOWNSEND NICHOLL

Art puts no slowing touch on silent Time:
I make a moment sure, in tiny box
Jeweled with vowels, riveted with rhyme,
Studded with iron consonants and locks—
But day flows on, bright river into death.
I must love living, not its monument,
Value not utterance but very breath,
For there will come an ultimate event
Which has no mate nor any medium
In earth which mines dark metal, precious stone:
Its meaning has no mortal idiom.
I will forge courage now to face alone,
Without my craft to serve as shield to me,
The unresolvable reality.

The Metaphysicians Confess

Contemporary American Philosophy. Edited by George P. Adams and William Pepperell Montague. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $12.

IT will probably be the fate of these two volumes to repose quietly on the shelves of reference libraries, there to be dusted and consulted occasionally by a few earnest students and specialists. This will be regrettable, for they are astonishingly rich in entertainment and stimulation. Designed as a companion work to "Contemporary British Philosophy," published in 1924, the present volumes contain the intellectual autobiographies of thirty-four present or quondam professors of philosophy. Each contributor was asked to state his principal philosophic beliefs, the reasons supporting them, and the manner in which he had reached them.

> An explicit confession [say the editors with engaging candor] of the temperamental sympathies and prejudices of a philosopher, and of such of his life's circumstances as seem to him to have been relevant in shaping his conclusions, may possess as much philosophic value both to the writer and to his readers as the conclusions to which they contribute. And the honest attempt to psychoanalyze one's mind may and should result in a wholesomely humiliating realization of the extent to which one's own beliefs (and not merely those of one's neighbors) are determined by subjective causes rather than by objective reasons.

And the contributors have to a surprisingly large extent met this candor with a candor of their own. The book, true enough, does not look inviting at first glance. The very names of some of these thirty-four professors of philosophy are unfamiliar except to other professors of philosophy, and such titles as The Philosophic "Credo" of an Absolutistic Personalist, The Philosophy of a Meliorist, A Temporalistic Realism, Confessions of an Animistic Materialist do not sound inviting. But when one actually begins to read one finds this volume full of fascinating human documents and admirably compact arguments; it is probable that even the minor figures have here written more interestingly than they have anywhere else. Even when one is not interested in a man's opinions, one may still be interested in how he came to hold them.

A typical instance is George Herbert Palmer, to whom these two volumes are affectionately dedicated. Palmer's chief historical importance lies in the fact that he was the senior member of that brilliant galaxy at Harvard of which the other members were James, Royce, Münsterberg, and Santayana—the most remarkable and influential single department of any kind that has ever appeared in an American university. Harvard itself seems to have rated these men in an exact reversal of their true importance. I am creditably told that before James's reputation came bounding back from abroad, and before Santayana had acquired his outside (although "The Life of Reason" had already been published), Palmer was considered the great man there, with the possible exception of Royce.

Palmer's philosophy is feeble and pietistic. He confesses frankly that "the philosophic influence which was supreme over my youth, and has left its honored mark on my age, was Puritanism." "Without the presupposition of God," he still finds, "science is fragmentary and baseless." His question, before accepting a religious belief, is: "Would it strengthen me if I, too, thought in that way?"—and not, for example, What reasons are there for supposing it true?

None the less, his contribution to the present volume is mainly autobiographical, and that autobiography is charming for its ingenuousness and humility, and for the depiction of a struggle that was, in its quiet way, heroic—an endless war against weak eyes, a bad memory, ill health. He was born a weakling, not expected to live from year to year. "Up to my fortieth year," he writes, "headaches were almost continuous, and I have never slept a night through in my life." It seems hard to realize that Professor Palmer, still with us at eighty-seven, was born in the same year as James and thirteen years before Royce. He speaks casually at one point of teaching some pupils who "afterwards served in the war." He is referring to the Civil War.

In most American colleges at the time of his student days, Professor Palmer recalls, "the little philosophy attempted was usually taught by the president, a minister." In the late seventies, when John Dewey was an undergraduate, this condition still prevailed. "Teachers of philosophy," writes Dewey, "were at that time, almost to a man, clergymen." Under such conditions one wonders how a Dewey could have arisen at all. He still expresses some preferences that will come to many of his readers as a surprise:

> Were it possible for me to be a devotee of any system, I still should believe that there is greater richness and greater variety of insight in Hegel than in any other single systematic philosopher—though when I say this I exclude Plato, who still provides my favorite philosophic reading. . . .
>
> Although I have not the aversion to system as such that is sometimes attributed to me, I am dubious of my own ability to reach systematic unity, and in consequence, perhaps, of that fact also dubious about my contemporaries. . . .
>
> Forty years spent in wandering in a wilderness like that of the present is not a sad fate—unless one attempts to make himself believe that the wilderness is after all itself the promised land.

Of all these confessions, Santayana's, as one might expect, has the highest literary charm. It helps to explain how one who lived in Boston and Cambridge from the age of nine till the age of forty could remain so detached, in temperament, ideals, and style, from Protestant American life. It was not merely that his mother brought over her Catholic and Spanish traditions, but that "thirty-eight fussy voyages" across the Atlantic kept him in ever fresh touch with European culture. "English," he remarks, "and the whole Anglo-Saxon tradition in literature and philosophy have always been a medium to me rather than a source." But his thirty years in this country, if they did not make him an American, at least made him a foreigner in Spain. "The life of a wandering student, like those of the Middle Ages, had an immense natural attraction for me—so great that I have never willingly led any other." He gratefully acknowledges his debt to the early James and his lesser debt to Royce, and in the course of his discourse there appears this confession, which seems to point both to the weakness and to the strength in his work.

> I have been willing to let cosmological problems and technical questions solve themselves as they would or as the authorities agreed for the moment that they should be solved. My pleasure was rather in expression, in reflection, in irony. . . .

A word, finally, must be said about the article contributed by Morris R. Cohen, who unites a remarkable literary gift with a fine philosophic penetration. The general temper and outlook of this article, and the compression of its argument, remind one strongly of Bertrand Russell, with whom Professor Cohen has many points of affinity. "To philosophize," he writes, "has always seemed to me as natural and desirable in itself as to sing, to dance, to paint or mold, or to commune with those we love."

I regret that I have not the space to discuss the other contributions. If few of them are deeply original, most of them are written with clarity and acuteness, and indicate minds that are genuinely alive. This admirable symposium, in brief, is rather impressive evidence that American philosophy at the moment, while it may lack the richness of contemporary British philosophy, is at least far from a state of academic stupor.

HENRY HAZLITT

A Defense of the Puritans

Builders of the Bay Colony. By Samuel Eliot Morison. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

NEW ENGLAND history has been so constantly and intensively tilled for nearly three centuries that it is almost as difficult to get a new crop from it as from the worn-out soil of a New England farm. We are more apt to find pebbles of antiquarian lore than corn for the historical mill. There is always a little something new turning up, however, and there is always opportunity for presentation and interpretation. We need not here deal with Dr. Morison's pebbles. The interest and value of his book lie deeper.

The form of presentation is wholly delightful. What the author has wished to give us is a convincing sketch of the life and spirit of the Bay Colony during its first score or so of years. Instead of narrative history he has used biography as his method, and in eleven chapters he draws the portraits of more than a dozen of the men and women of the place and period. The book is a sort of "corporation picture," such as used to be popular among the Dutch artists and may be seen at Amsterdam and Haarlem. He has not chosen his sitters for their historical eminence but for their personal appeal to himself and as representative of various aspects of life. They include such diverse personalities as John Smith, Hakluyt, Morton of Merrymount, the Winthrops, father and son, the clergyman Shepard, the college president Dunster, the apostle to the Indians Eliot, the poetess Anne Bradstreet, and others.

Dr. Morison has an easy style and a pretty wit, an irony which even when directed against myself I find infinitely relishable in a day when writing, like cooking, seems to have lost its seasoning. It is good for the blood to watch a gentleman flashing a rapier instead of dropping nickels in a subway slot. There is a good bit of the eighteenth century in Morison, and it gets into his style. As those who read his delightful "Maritime History of Massachusetts" know, his writing has none of the faults developed by American university education. It lacks Ph.D. orderliness. He wanders where he jolly well pleases, as in the first nine pages on Dunster, in which Dunster is only mentioned twice. It is this eighteenth-century trait that lends his work a charm in an age when even churches are organized by efficiency experts. His presentation is wholly admirable.

When we come to his interpretation, however, I not only believe him in part wrong but question his clarity of thinking. Having passed through various phases of thought in the past with respect to Puritanism, he has now become so convinced of its essential rightness that he has become somewhat of a special pleader for the various vagaries of its American representatives in colonial Massachusetts. Starting with the statement that "if ever a case could be made out for religious persecution, it was in early Massachusetts," he promptly abandons the "if" and plumps for the persecutors. A case can always be made out, only we are a bit surprised to find Dr. Morison engaged in it. From other parts of the book we discover that "early" Massachusetts was a very limited period, for by the end of the first fifteen years we find the author in a more congenial role approving the remonstrants against the rule of the Puritan leaders. The early period narrows down to about ten years, yet although the author claims to abhor that decade of intolerance from 1630, he makes the assumption, among others, that the reward for that intolerance was the emergence of Emerson, Hawthorne, and Thoreau in 1830 or so. I am quite as ready as Dr. Morison to appraise highly the value of Puritanism in its best sense, a mode of thought and conduct limited to no nation and to no religion, but I feel that the wish to think as highly as possible of the founders of his own State has led him into somewhat of an intellectual muddle. I wish a debate could be arranged at the Town Hall between Dr. Morison and Archbishop Laud. But it would not really be a debate. The arguments would be identical, merely in favor of different groups and causes. Puritanism is, and always has been, a living issue. Perhaps because of that, even historians cannot be wholly unbiased in discussing it and its adherents. (I presume I am myself as guilty in that respect as anyone.) If it were not for that, Dr. Morison would not have dropped that fatal "if" into his book like a fly into his soup. I recommend it, however, if the reader will carefully remove the fly, and a bit around it.

JAMES TRUSLOW ADAMS

Dead Cities

Ur of the Chaldees. By C. Leonard Wooley. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Dead Towns and Living Men. By C. Leonard Wooley. Oxford University Press. $2.

DR. WOOLEY has become famous as the director of the joint expedition of the British Museum and the University of Pennsylvania excavating the site of Ur. Among its outstanding achievements has been evidence to support the view that Sumerian civilization is older than the Egyptian, and that this civilization, already in a developed state, was brought by the Sumerians to Mesopotamia from some other center, perhaps the Indus valley. Of less intrinsic historical importance, but of great dramatic interest, was the discovery of a deep layer of silt between strata of different cultures, which obviously had been deposited by the "flood" of Biblical and other Near Eastern tradition.

Dr. Wooley has already incorporated these discoveries in his book "The Sumerians," which gives a history of Ur and the other imperial cities of the South Mesopotamian plain.

In "Ur of the Chaldees" he describes clearly and entertainingly the course of his excavations and how the more important discoveries were made, and presents pertinent insights into the excavator's procedure, which involves a planning of operations, extensive in space and delicate in detail, and the management of hosts of workmen commensurate with the founding of a new city.

In "Dead Towns and Living Men," a reprint of a book written before the war, we have a still more intimate work in which we learn that Egyptian laborers have become as self-contained and, to their archaeologist bosses, as uninteresting as his factory hands are to a manufacturer. In Mesopotamia, apparently, there is an archaeological frontier which makes the work more exciting; and the management of men becomes a patriarchal function highly pleasing to the heads of the expedition.

The material is always interesting and frequently amusing; particularly the anecdotes of the blundering and ineptitude of the pre-war Turkish officials.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

America—the New Found Land

New Found Land. By Archibald MacLeish. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $5.

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH is a master of verse form, and his new book "New Found Land," a volume of verse exquisitely printed by the Black Sun Press, Paris, for the American publishers, reinforces his position as one of the first of the classical school of contemporary American poets. The fine impersonality of his attitude and his perfect adaptation of form to subject, along with his simplicity and clarity of treatment, declare him at once a member of this group. In his earlier books there was over him the shadow of T. S. Eliot and "The Waste Land," and in this last there is the same sadness over the loss of a rich past that Eliot has expressed; but in "New Found Land" MacLeish has evidently accepted as necessary and worthy that background for his art, somewhat underestimated before, America. To be sure, he again reaffirms the loneliness in which the American artist must dwell, that nostalgia for something felt and never realized, for roots untraceable, but he no longer completely deplores this. Instead there is the affirmation that an artist must find this country his own country, and the poems Land's End, Reproach to Dead Poets, and American Letter are devoted to the statement of this feeling. Thus, from the latter, for example:

> This, this is our land, this is our people,
> This that is neither a land nor a race. We must reap
> The wind here in the grass for our soul's harvest:
> Here we must eat our salt or our bones starve.
> Here we must live or live only as shadows.
> This is our race, we that have none, that have had > Neither the old walls nor the voices around us,
> This is our land, this is our ancient ground,—
> The raw earth, the mixed bloods and the strangers,
> The different eyes, the wind, and the heart's change.
> These we will not leave though the old call us.
> This is our country-earth, our blood, our kind.
> Here we will live our years till the earth blind us—
>
> The wind blows from the east. The leaves fall.
> Far off in the pines a jay rises.
> The wind smells of haze and the wild ripe apples.
> I think of the masts of Cette and the sweet rain.

And MacLeish's only reproach to greater dead poets is that they have given us here in this land nothing to live by. He asks:

> Were there no words to tell with > to tell
> What lands these are
> What are these
> Lights through the night leaves and these voices
> Crying among us as winds rise . . . ?

His only comment on his own pioneer poetic attempt is in the poem Anonymous Signature:

> Think
> if you read these words in a better time
> Of the shape of my mouth forming the difficult letters.

Anyone reading even these quotations is able to observe that Archibald MacLeish is not of the rightly or wrongly named "verbal mystics," but given over, as is Eliot, to classic purity of form and idea. Throughout these fourteen perfect poems his basic rhythm, with but few exceptions, is quantitative, and although it may be scanned as iambic pentameter it depends for all its effects upon the perfect equivalence—in so far as this is possible in English—of the vowel lengths and the marked use of spondee. Back of this form lies, of course, a knowledge of Greek rhythms. Even the lyrics, with their intense though universalized passion, make use of this rhythm and this balance for structure rather more than they do of accent and rhyme. Take this stanza from Memory Green:

> You will not remember this at all you will stand there
> Feeling the wind on your throat the wind in your sleeves
> You will smell the dead leaves in the grass of a garden
> You will close your eyes with whom you will say
> Ah where

Or this from that beautiful poem Immortal Autumn, wherein rhyme is used but the quantitative effect prevails:

> But not in autumn with the black and outcast crows
> Share we the spacious world the whispering year is gone
> There is more room to live now the once secret dawn
> Comes late by daylight and the dark unguarded goes
>
> Between the mutinous brave burning of the leaves
> And winter's covering of our hearts with his deep snow
> We are alone there are no evening birds we know
> The naked moon the tame stars circle at our eaves

There are only fourteen poems in "New Found Land," but very seldom is there a book of verse written in which not only every poem but every line is perfect.

EDA LOU WALTON

Love and the Modern Age

The Evolution of Modern Marriage. By F. Müller-Lyer. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

IN Ninon de Lenclos's prayer "Dear God, make me a good man but never a good woman," we have an epitomized statement of what is rapidly becoming the modern woman's attitude toward morals and marriage. Women today are in revolt against what was long known as woman's creed. As a result of this revolt we have a new woman who demands the same rights and freedoms as man in marriage as well as out of it. It is this new woman who is the cause of the present chaos in moral life. The new morality, as it is now called, is scarcely new for men. It is new mainly for women. This new woman and this new morality have been possible only because of the disintegration of the family and the disappearance of its patriarchal ethic. The new moral order, which is personal instead of familial in character, marks a new epoch in the history of love—an epoch of new aspirations and fulfilments.

Such, in brief, is the thesis of this book. F. Müller-Lyer, whose studies in the history of social evolution have exercised a considerable influence on sociological thought, has pursued in this volume the same Marxian approach in his analysis of sexual relations that he employed in his earlier investigations of economic phenomena. The whole problem of sex and society is considered from an evolutionary point of view. Beginning with the absence of love in primitive society, he traces the development of the love emotion through later ages to what he believes is its great fulfilment in our era, where love has been personalized and freed of its economic fetters. In reference to this last observation, it is important to remember that this book originally appeared in Germany in 1913, which was a year before the World War began and five years before the aftermaths of that holocaust were felt in every part of the Western world. Today, in the personal epoch, such optimism has vanished. Love is viewed with less enthusiasm, and in much of the post-war literature of the last decade a kind of hard-boiled cynicism has taken its place. Nevertheless, the historical aspects of Müller-Lyer's thesis are not destroyed by the failure of his prophecy. There is no question about the correctness of his general analysis of the role that the love emotion has played in various phases of the past, or of his considerations of the social position of women and the evolution of marriage as an economic institution.

It is the differentiation of woman, which has come with her economic emancipation, that the author sees as signifying the beginning of the personal epoch. In the clan epoch, with its early, high, and late clan phases, and in the family epoch, with its three similar phases, woman was nothing more than a piece of property and love had no existence for her whatsoever. Hosea, who paid fifty shekels for his wife, is typical of the family phase in its practical form; Aristotle, who described woman as an aberration of nature and put her at the head of the monsters, is typical of the same phase in its more theoretical and philosophic form. Love begins with the decay of the family and the end of the family epoch. Marriage is changed from a family affair into a personal one. The individual, freed at last from the bonds of clan and family, can choose his loved object in terms of his own personality. But that is not enough. He must not only choose in terms of his own personality, but he must also protect his personality from intrusive invasion and destruction. Marriage in the personal epoch must above all respect personality. "Too great intimacy," the author argues, "blunts the edge of erotic emotion . . . the couples grow together like Siamese twins; every vibration of one is felt by the other. Daily irritations easily develop which (even among people who are sincerely attached to each other) slowly lead to mutual aversion."

And what is the solution that Müller-Lyer provides? In keeping with the wisdom of Jean Paul, he advises that lovers should "share everything with each other except their room." Love must be stimulated by brief separations. The free marriage which Godwin contracted with Mary Wollstonecraft is suggested as approaching something of the personal ideal that the author has in mind. Separate dwellings should be adopted wherever economically possible so that neither personality is able to infringe upon the rights of the other. In every case, of course, neither person is to be economically dependent upon the other, for it is of the very essence of economic dependence to create psychological subordination and enslavement.

Now there is scarcely any doubt but that a number of Müller-Lyer's suggestions will eventually be adopted. In fact a number of people have already adopted them. But what the author does not seem to see, despite his sociological approach, is that the success of such suggestions depends more upon that which is environmental than upon that which is personal. It is just at this point that his theory begins to weaken. It is true that he argues for new social controls, but the main emphasis in the concluding aspects of his logic is upon "the driving force [of] . . . the human will" instead of upon the driving force of the environment which shapes whatever we mean by the "human will." His faith in love, for example, is far more utopian than scientific. It is very possible that with the increasing changes in the modern world and the new emphases upon collective rather than individualistic factors love will be looked upon as a less significant emotion than it has been in the last few generations. Müller-Lyer's entire neglect of the birth-control factor in the love situation, for example, is most unfortunate, for it is such a factor that has more to do with the nature and expression of the love emotion than the "driving force of the human will."

V. F. Calverton

John Brown

John Brown: The Making of a Martyr. By Robert Penn Warren. Brewer and Warren. $5.

IF Mr. Warren thinks that his book is a credit to historical scholarship it would seem to be because he dissents from some of the principles and methods to which most American historians feel themselves bound to adhere in dealing with controverted matters. It was, no doubt, to be expected that Mr. Warren, born in Kentucky and educated in Tennessee, and too young to have known John Brown or any of Brown's associates, should have written of Brown with less sympathy than some Northern writers have shown, and had he done so he would have been wholly within his right. What he has done, on the contrary, is to produce a book which, aside from its failure to add much of importance to what was already known of Brown's career, is deeply tinged with bias and sneering hostility toward Brown and his supporters. To topple an idol from its pedestal was not enough; the idol must be hacked in pieces and the pieces trampled in the mud of innuendo and scorn.

Mr. Warren pays respectful homage to the excellencies of Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard's monumental biography, but one gathers that of the enemies to be routed Mr. Villard is the chief. Every student of the American slavery controversy knows that Mr. Villard, notwithstanding his sympathetic recognition of the moral and political significance of Brown's career, withholds no evidence that painstaking inquiry could discover and offers no extenuation of Brown's brutality and foolishness. Mr. Warren, on the contrary, sees in John Brown little more than a harebrained fanatic, an adventurer with eyes open for the main chance, a self-conscious poseur, a publicity seeker, a horse thief and miscellaneous plunderer, and a murderer. That the antislavery and abolition agitators could have been moved by any high moral purpose, however disastrous their resistance to government and laws might turn out to be, is something for which, apparently, he has only contempt, and his pages are studded with sneers and flings at Brown's supporters and the antislavery contingent generally. Frank Sanborn, for example, is pilloried as "an excessively earnest young man, confident of himself, and confident that he knew God's will; beyond this he possessed to a considerable degree that tight especial brand of New England romanticism which manifested itself in stealing Guinea niggers, making money, wrestling with conscience, hunting witches, building tea-clippers, talking about Transcendentalism, or being an Abolitionist." Regarding the letters that were written to secure funds for Brown's first journey to Kansas we are told that "when a letter would bring tears it would bring money. Harriet Beecher Stowe knew the trick, for her 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' had provided a tidy fortune." Emerson "was a man who lived in words, big words, and not in facts. . . . It is only natural that once or twice when he tried to deal with matters of fact words made him a common demagogue."

The crucial point of John Brown's career before Harper's Ferry, as far as moral quality is concerned, was the so-called Pottawatomie massacre. Mr. Villard accepts the "positive witness" of two of Brown's company, Henry Thompson and Salmon Brown, as well as of Brown himself, that Brown killed no one with his own hand, although it was "definitely established that Brown was, if not a principal in the crime, an accessory and an instigator." Mr. Warren thinks that it is "safer" to accept other testimony that "Brown began the bloody business by shooting old Doyle" than it is to take the testimony of Brown or Salmon. He is not impressed by Mr. Villard's conclusion that the motives behind the Pottawatomie affair were "wholly unselfish" and that Brown's aims "were none other than the freeing of a race"; the conclusion does not fit with Mr. Warren's judgment of Brown as a murderer or his caustic account of Brown's business record of "embezzlement, fraud, speculation, and self-righteousness." Nor can he agree with Mr. Villard's view of the Harper's Ferry attack as (to quote Mr. Warren) "only a badly planned and badly executed 'raid,'" with the projected Provisional Government back of it as "a harmless debating society." Mr. Warren has a right to his opinion if he has carefully and impartially studied the evidence at these various points, but the contrast between the scholarly temper of Mr. Villard's biography, sympathetic though his book is, and the patent iconoclasm of Mr. Warren is too sharp to permit us to put the two writers in the same class.

Mr. Warren's book will doubtless be acclaimed by those who insist that sentiment and moral conviction have as little place in history as John J. Ingalls once declared the Ten Commandments and the Golden Rule had in practical politics. Here or there some unreconstructed Southerner, ignorant of what has been written hitherto, may rejoice that the horrid truth about John Brown has at last been told. There is weighty authority for maintaining, however, that "as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," and the heart of John Brown and his antislavery supporters is a subject about which Mr. Warren's prejudices hardly entitle him to speak.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Mexican Folklore

El Folklore Literario de Mexico. Por Ruben Campos. Mexico City. Department of Education.

IN "El Folklore Literario" the Department of Education of Mexico has done something for the people it is supposed to educate that few modern nations have the wit to do, or the fundamental insight into the problem of education to do well. Facing the necessity of educating a population largely illiterate and, if schooled at all, for the most part simply battered into a superficial resemblance to modern intellectualism, the Mexican government begins directly with the content of the public mind. It collects widely and selects wisely the wisdom, the hopes, the traditions, the moralities of the people, the imaginations of their hearts, the voice of their unimagined desires, as these circulate orally or in such limited forms of print as are accessible to them. "El Folklore Literario" is an anthology of the riddles, anecdotes, songs, ballads, epigrams, fables, legends, pasquinades, dramas, hymns, prayers, and political bywords which are current and therefore influential in forming the opinions, prejudices, emotions, and activities of the Mexican people at large. Here you find an Aztec animal fable, a hymn in praise of the Beloved Jesus, a prayer for rain, a ballad of the death of Pancho Villa, a satire on official corruption, a song of personal passion, a sly anecdote, a child's lullaby, and a word-for-word treasured proclamation of a revolutionary leader, all of them arising securely from the fountain of tradition, from the secret wells of racial instinct. Except that they employ the Spanish language, very few of them are even remotely touched with the written tradition which has been pressed down upon the Mexican people for three centuries. They have, therefore, the primary quality of all literature—what we call literature because we find it worthy of preservation from generation to generation—sincerity of emotional content, directness of expression, and beauty of form. Although I should like immensely to see such an anthology of folk literature for the United States, I very much doubt that it could reach anything like the high level of this one compiled by Ruben Campos. The book is further expanded by the reprinting of many photographs and old engravings covering the period from 1525 to 1925, during which time the existing body of folklore arose. The music of many of the songs is included.

The temptation to quote is nearly irresistible, and indeed is restrained only by a realization of the burden of responsibility entailed upon the reviewer who would quote for a non-Spanish-speaking audience. If I thought it possible for an American reader to realize workingmen sitting down with the guitar during their nooning to sing carols in praise of the constitution—but no, it is not possible to imagine such a thing. The American public will have to read the "Folklore Literario" in the original. And that is no such task as the American public makes it. Anybody with a good grounding of Latin and a high-school Spanish lexicon could make out from this collection more about the spirit, the intellectual outlook, and the intimate ideals of the Mexican people than many histories would teach him.

One of the problems of folk literature here displayed overlaps our own—that is, the Negro contribution to Mexico. I read in an old Spanish chronicle of the sixteen hundreds that there were once two hundred thousand people of Negro extraction in Mexico—though that is probably an exaggeration—and here find songs credited to them as something out of the past, yet with curious distinctions from anything produced by Negroes among us. Again one notes that love songs, which are so many descancias on the way to the disappearance of the Spanish invaders in the Indian race, are much more strongly marked with Spanish than with Indian passion; and again that the compiler is for once, and once only, conscious of rejections of alien elements when he refuses the scores of Catholic Christian dramas of suffering and sacrifice which have been more or less forcibly popularized, and finds worthy of record only the lighter, joyous phases of folk Christianity. All these are indices far more worth attending to than political turnovers to one sincerely interested in knowing what Mexico is and what should be expected of her. By all means, buy a Spanish dictionary and read "El Folklore Literario."

MARY AUSTIN

Books in Brief

Year In, You're Out. By Samuel Hoffenstein. Horace Liveright. $2.

Samuel Hoffenstein has a reputation as a light-verse writer in America which we should be a little at a loss to explain were it not for the fact that American light-verse writers are, as a group, lacking in finesse and in facility of technique. Mr. Hoffenstein is, to be sure, often amusing—much more so when he develops his own topics than when he laboriously parodies a number of true poets. He is sometimes, in a literary fashion, even a very good singer of lyrics not intended to be humorous; but he very often errs in good taste, and he is often heavy-footed in his manner. We like his half-bitter, half-amused outlook; we like his recognition of this somewhat devitalized universe in which we live; we realize that his wit at its best is an intellectual wit. But we wish he would exclude about half the poems in this last the new FREEMAN

112 East 19th Street
New York City

I enclose check for $1.00 for which you will send a three months vacation-subscription to the new FREEMAN to:

.....

.....

.....

Don't Give Up Thinking

for the summer. It's all a mistake that your mind needs a three months vacation. No matter what statistics show, it is possible to play golf and think.

By taking a dollar vacation-subscription to

the new FREEMAN

you can stimulate your mind, on your holiday, as well as improve your form.

the new FREEMAN
112 East 19th Street New York City

THE DUTTON CLUE MYSTERY FOR JULY

THE TORCH MURDER

The New Leighton Swift Story

By CHARLES REED JONES

Once again Leighton Swift, that eccentric amateur of crime, has the New York Police Department playing Dr. Watson to his Sherlock Holmes in a fast-moving thriller that leads through a dance hall marriage to an astounding climax. By the author of The King Murder.

$2.00 at all bookstores

E. P. DUTTON & CO., Inc., 300 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

SOVIET RUSSIA

Students and Workers! Don't let this opportunity pass by. Become a member of our "Roughing it tour." $280 complete includes 7 days in Soviet Russia. Higher priced tours available.

Full information mailed on request, also rates, itineraries, etc., for future sailings.

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

175 Fifth Avenue., New York. Algonquin [redacted]

volume and give us only those which are neat and witty and amusing and not so many that fall short of their mark. If he had done this the reader might remember him for his best quips and pranks, his best ironic couplets, his compact and fine beginnings, which, alas, sometimes end too pompously. "Year In, You're Out" will be a popular book, for there are many modern readers with much the same slant on life as Mr. Hoffenstein's, but it might have been even more memorable.

Gallipoli Memories. By Compton Mackenzie. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

To convey in a note the charm, the extraordinary fascination, of this volume of memories is impossible. It is, as Mr. Walpole has said, "a work of art." And those reviewers who have failed to see the underlying seriousness hidden beneath its so typically British humor have missed something. Mackenzie served as an intelligence officer in the Levant, and after these many years, despairing of doing the seven-volume novel which he had planned, decided to do four volumes of memoirs instead. He himself says: "The first volume adds nothing of the least historical value . . . though in succeeding volumes I hope to shed some light on the situation in Greece. . . ." The future historians of the tragic conclusion to Winston Churchill's far-flung strategy, however, will do ill to overlook a book which conveys so subtly one observer's reactions to the spirit and atmosphere of the Gallipoli campaign. For the general reader, no matter how general, this book with its wealth of allusion, description, and character studies offers a literary feast.

The Women of Cairo. By Gerard de Nerval. With an Introduction by Conrad Elphinstone. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Two volumes. $7.50.

Since "Eothen" is so much admired and so securely enshrined as a classic, it is well that this book, so much more sensitive and charming, should be translated at last into English. Where Kinglake remained the Englishman commenting from the outside, de Nerval did what Kinglake could not have done; he lived as far as he could like an Oriental and even bought a female slave to be the respectable head of a family. The first of the two volumes describes his eight months in Cairo and his journey to the mouth of the Nile; the second volume, his travels in Syria, Palestine, and Constantinople. Without much in the way of adventure the book is frequently exciting and always interesting, for de Nerval had a flair for making life at all times an adventure, and is so good a writer that he can communicate his own ardors and all the discoveries of his lively and intelligent curiosity. The Turkish empire of the middle nineteenth century is brought before us in all its splendid decay, and just before it became influenced by the West. The publishers are to be praised for bringing to us this masterpiece of travel.

The Life and Letters of Joseph Pennell. By Elizabeth Robins Pennell. Little, Brown and Company. Two volumes. $10.

It is perhaps regrettable that Mrs. Pennell undertook this work. In "The Adventures of an Illustrator" Pennell described the most interesting of his experiences, and for the "Life and Letters" little was left but the general routine of his days. This routine was not uninteresting, but it was certainly not important enough to justify the minute chronicle Mrs. Pennell has given us. His letters also are usually lively and entertaining, but if Mrs. Pennell had omitted nine out of every ten printed in these two volumes, the reader would have an adequate understanding of Pennell's character and opinions. Throughout the two volumes Pennell reveals himself as a victim of "the pitiless pressure to do," very much an American despite his bitter attacks on the America of the post-war period.

Seipel Intrigues in Austria*

By G. E. R. GEDYE

DR. JOHANN SCHOBER, the Austrian Chancellor, who visited London and Paris late in April, was at first reported to be traveling as the "business representative" of his country to negotiate a loan. It was also reported that he wished to persuade the British and French governments to confer on the Austrian Republic the unique and undesirable distinction of being the sole exception in a Europe which is seeking disarmament, by authorizing his country to break the Treaty of St. Germain and embody her Fascist and Socialist irregulars in a state militia. Both of these reports were incorrect. It was known here in Vienna that the Austrian loan—at least as far as Britain was concerned—was assured. Downing Street, the Bank of England, and the Treasury were known to be in favor of the flotation of the Austrian loan at the earliest possible moment, which would not be until after the flotation of the German loan in June. As to the militia, it is certain that Dr. Schober, as the highest police authority in Vienna, could not favor so dangerous an application of the principle of setting a thief to catch a thief.

The project of turning the Heimwehr into a militia originated with the Landbund, or Agrarian Party, which fears above all things that the Heimwehr as it stands could one day be employed as a schwarz-gelbe (pro-Hapsburg) army in the interests of extreme clericalism to facilitate the re-creation of a great papal state in Southeastern Europe. It has long been, of course, the unvoiced dream of Monsignor Dr. Ignaz Seipel, the former Chancellor, to replace the vanished Roman Catholic polity of Austria-Hungary by such a block. This block would eventually recover Catholic Croatia from its present subservience to orthodox Serbia in Jugoslavia, rescue Catholic Slovakia from subservience to the Hussite and freethinking Czechs in Czecho-Slovakia, and submerge more thoroughly the Hungarian Calvinists—to whom the present Regent, Admiral Horthy, and the present Premier, Count Bethlen, belong—beneath the waves of Hungarian Catholicism, strengthened again by the recovery of Croatia. At the head would stand Catholic Austria—and, perhaps, Catholic Bavaria by her side—with Vienna restored to her pristine glory as the capital of this Catholic-state group.

As to the western mission of the Austrian Chancellor, it may be said that he traveled neither as a financial negotiator nor as an apostle of militarism but as the bearer of the Austrian olive branch. The visit to Paris was a result of the eternal Franco-Italian jealousy in Central Europe. Dr. Schober's earlier visit to Rome was necessitated by that strangle-hold of Signor Mussolini's on Austria's credit which has enabled him to block the path to a loan ever since the feeble protest two years ago in the Austrian Parliament against the brutal regime in South Tyrol brought his Caesarean wrath down upon the head of little Austria. Dr. Schober's Austrian enemies declared that on his visit to Rome he also visited Canossa and Caudium in order to pass through the Caudine Forks. Be that as it may, it is difficult to see what other course was open to a practical statesman but to placate those whose good-will was essential to the procuring of credits, more especially as Austria had proved quite unable to afford the least aid to her oppressed ex-subjects in South Tyrol. But because of the Rome visit, France, of course, became concerned for her influence in Middle Europe—hence the Paris visit. Dr. Schober's visit to London was intended to give formal expression to what has long been an informal fact—the restoration of that traditional friendship between Great Britain and Austria which was interrupted by the war. The little democratic mountain republic has not inherited much from the mighty empire of Central and Southeastern Europe, but the Chancellor went to London to claim at least the inheritance of that traditional friendship. The British government recognized this inheritance by its support of Austria's claim at The Hague to be freed from the paper burden of reparations which the world knew she could never pay. It is quite certain that the British Foreign Minister took the opportunity to put some searching questions to Herr Schober concerning that same urgent matter of the disarmament of the Heimwehr about which the League of Nations had just been manifesting curiosity. Austria's government promised the League to introduce a bill enforcing disarmament, but it kept this project secret from the Austrians until someone "spilled the beans" in London. Secret diplomacy, if it ever dies, should certainly be interred in Vienna, destined to be its last refuge.

Dr. Schober, since he took over the chancellorship at the stormiest period of the Heimwehr agitation on September 27 last, has proved himself no friend to Social Democracy, yet has been the savior and bulwark of conservative democracy in Austria. The threat of civil war had at that time become so acute that distrust of the currency had been awakened in Austria and a "flight from the Schilling" was beginning. The anti-parliamentary campaign of the Heimwehr—behind which stood the former Chancellor, Dr. Ignaz Seipel—had reached its zenith on September 29 with the threat to concentrate large Fascist forces threatening Vienna from four points. The Heimwehr leaders openly proclaimed that there would be a march on Vienna and an overthrow of Parliament unless the Socialists concurred in the passing of a bill to alter the constitution in a way that would have destroyed democracy and set up a form of absolutism in Austria. Dr. Ernst Streeruwitz, who was then Chancellor, did his best to hold the balance between the contending parties by producing the draft of a constitutional reform bill which his Socialist opponents would have accepted, but the Heimwehr would have none of it. Dr. Seipel, who dreamed of making Austria the cornerstone of a southern Catholic-state block—a sort of revival of the Hapsburg monarchy over which a Hapsburg or a Wittelsbach might one day rule—wished to see things go to extremes so that he might come back to power on the crest of a Fascist wave. At this moment the Landbund (Agrarian Party) took fright at the prospect of a Fascist-Clerical dictatorship. The banks and industrial concerns which had subsidized Dr. Seipel's Heimwehr army with the object of curbing the power of the Socialists in the republic became alarmed at the growing signs of financial distrust at home and abroad, and the Conservative-Nationalist and pan-German elements which feared the extreme clericalism of Dr. Seipel and his Heimwehr called upon the police president of Vienna, Johann Schober, to take office as the "strong man of Austria."

* On June 15 Major Waldemar Pabst, chief of staff of the Austrian Heimwehr, was expelled from Austria as an undesirable alien who was indulging in illegal political activities. Major Pabst is a German white terrorist who organized the Kapp Putsch and after its failure fled to Austria, where he later became military organizer of the Heimwehr. The pro-Heimwehr governments of Tyrol and Styria are reported as in revolt against the decree of expulsion of Major Pabst, and as threatening to invite his return in defiance of the central government at Vienna. These circumstances lend special interest to Mr. Gedye's article, written before the beginning of the present disutrbances.—EDITOR THE NATION.

He was immediately confronted with difficulties. Within a week of his becoming Chancellor, the financial crisis reached its height in the collapse of the Bodenkreditanstalt, the biggest bank in Austria. It was largely due to Schober's energetic conduct of the day-and-night negotiations that he was able to avert an appalling disaster and secure the payment in full of all depositors through the taking over of the Bodenkreditanstalt by Baron Rothschild's Kreditanstalt and an international group. The extreme Clericals set their hopes of a dictatorship on the Chancellor coming to blows with the Socialists, and saddled him at the outset of his term of office with a constitutional reform bill which the latter were bound to exercise their constitutional right of rejecting. From outside Parliament, the Heimwehr proclaimed that not one letter of the bill must be altered or they would yet sweep Parliament away. The Chancellor's position was rendered peculiarly delicate by the fact that while the Socialists secretly welcomed his accession to office—seeing in him their bulwark against civil war and fascism—they were unable to give him the least support, but on the contrary were compelled to express vociferous distrust because they had held him responsible ever since July, 1927, for the heavy loss of life which accompanied the suppression of the rioting of July 15. At the same time Dr. Schober was obliged to pay great attention to the demand of the Heimwehr, who had acclaimed him as "their man" though their leaders in reality were eagerly watching to see him fail in his task. This characteristically Austrian situation, in which the Chancellor's most vocal supporters are his real enemies and his hostile critics and would-be enemies the actual foundation of his power (the eternal Austrian necessity of "saving face" prevents either side from revealing its true colors), holds good in essentials at the moment. Undeterred by the clamor from Left and Right, the Chancellor, by his favorite method of informal negotiations with responsible leaders, arrived at the compromise constitutional reform bill which became law in December.

His firmness on two critical days in November, when the plans for violent action of the German "white terrorist," Major Pabst, the Heimwehr chief of staff, looked like maturing, saved the situation. For two nights police patrolled Vienna, public buildings were guarded, and police and military held in readiness to strike. The extreme Heimwehr, realizing that the ex-police president was neither to be bluffed nor terrorized, saw that the game was up.

Since then the political temperature in Austria has gradually cooled off. Dr. Schober's secret enemies have made several attempts to upset him, notably over the recent so-called "Anti-Terror" bill, designed to curb the power of the trade unions. The Heimwehr, and even Herr Vaugoin, the present Vice-Chancellor and Minister of War, the right-hand man of Dr. Seipel, repeated their performance over the constitutional reform bill, declaring that with the trade unions also there must be no compromise. Dr. Schober said nothing, but again came to terms with the Social Democrats, forcing them to surrender much of their power but obliging the extreme Right at the same time to accept the compromise which it had declared inadmissible. The retirement of Dr. Seipel in April from active politics is an admission that Herr Schober's policy has triumphed over the former's Clerical-Fascist aspirations. Dr. Seipel did great service to his country at one period, but it has been nearly counterbalanced by the harm which his Heimwehr campaign has done, and the last service which he can now render his country is to stick strictly to his retirement and make it an abstention not merely from open, but also from secret, political activity. Unfortunately the signs are multiplying that he intends to do nothing of the sort.

Dr. Schober bids fair to become the Hindenburg of Austria, the type of loyal, dependable servant of the state who, having served his emperor faithfully so long as he stood for that state, can with equal devotion serve the republic when called upon to recognize that times have changed. It is believed that on the ratification of the Hague protocols Morgan will float the new Austrian loan. If so, it will confirm Schober in power for many years to come and give pause to the Seipel intrigues.

Visits to Soviet Russia

Twenty days in the Soviet Union

Leningrad, Moscow, Nizhni-Novgorod, The Volga. Leader—ALFRED G. SMALTZ. Sailing from New York—S.S. EUROPA—July 5th. Price from New York—$635; from Lubeck, Germany—July 12th—$434; from Helsingfors, Finland—July 14th—$401. Registrations Open.

Special Educational Tour

Leningrad, Moscow, Kharkov and Berlin. Twenty days in the U.S.S.R. after autumn opening of schools and theatres. Leader—DR. DANIEL B. LEARY, Head of Department of Education, University of Buffalo. Sailing from New York—S.S. BREMEN—Aug. 21st. Price from New York—$710; from Kiel, Germany—Aug. 29th—$487; from Helsingfors, Finland—Aug. 31st—$455. Registrations Open.

Student Group

28 days in the Soviet Union traveling third class with Russian students and workers—Leningrad, Moscow, Volga, Caucasus, Crimea, Odessa and Kiev. Sailing from New York July 30th on S.S. AQUITANIA. Price from New York—$616; from London—Aug. 5th—$422; from Helsingfors—Aug. 10th—$360. Registrations Open.

SHORT TOURS

Itineraries from 5 to 14 days in Soviet Russia
Sailings July 5th, 17th, 24th, Aug. 14th

20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK

THE OPEN ROAD

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 9, 1930 No. 3392

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 27
EDITORIALS:
Unemployment: The President's Job 30
Rates While You Wait 31
Lowest of All 31
Work and Pray 32
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 33
MARTYRS TO MARRIAGE. A Personal Narrative 34
THE EMPIRE DIES HARD. By Richard B. Gregg 36
THE PRESS TODAY: VIII. MONTANA AND "THE COMPANY." By Oswald Garrison Villard 39
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 41
CORRESPONDENCE 42
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Hermit by the Dead Sea. By Sonia Ruthèle Novák 44
The Negro in America. By Walter White 44
With Scott at the South Pole. By Mark Van Doren 44
Lives of Two Poets. By Eda Lou Walton 45
Death of Humanity. By Pierre Loving 45
When Nothing Seemed Impossible. By Richard A. Newhall 46
A Colorful First Novel. By Fred T. Marsh 46
More "New" History. By Ralph Volney Harlow 47
An English Lawyer. By Newman Levy 47
Books in Brief 48
Films: At the South Pole. By Alexander Bakshy 49
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Mexico and the Harris Bill. By Carleton Beals 51
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 52

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

AT LAST HERBERT HOOVER has begun to fight back. Thus when the Senate cut the $250,000 additional appropriation for the Wickersham Commission on Law Enforcement to $50,000, the President announced that he would get $100,000 immediately from private sources. He has fought hard in regard to the Veterans' Compensation bill, his veto being sustained in the House by 188 to 182 votes. His memorandum accompanying the veto was one of the most effective documents he has put out. Whether the substitute bill which he will get will be satisfactory remains to be seen, but it is to his credit that he has let the country know that he is not at all afraid of the soldier vote. Finally, he continues unyielding in his demand that the Senate confirm the naval treaty in extra session early this month, and he is apparently not deterred by threats of the opposition that they will hamstring the Senate by sufficient abstention from attendance to make a quorum impossible. Whether one likes his particular brand of leadership or not, it is at least gratifying that the President has finally begun to try to lead.

WELL MAY THE GERMANS REJOICE over the final liberation of their land from foreign occupation. The whole needless enslavement of the Palatinate and the Rhine regions to the conquering armies was dictated by nothing else than a vindictive and unworthy revenge. It remains discreditable to Woodrow Wilson that he was willing to sign the name of the United States to any such policy, precisely as it is to the credit of our nation that our troops were withdrawn from Coblenz after so short a period. As for the French, their conduct in some of these years in Germany stamps their flag with an indelible record of dishonor. Not only did they violate the Treaty of Versailles as and when it pleased them to do so, but in the invasion of the Ruhr they treated the population with positive ferocity, at all times filling the jails with Germans tried by French military courts in which the presumption was always against the accused. More than that, in their effort to break down the government of the Palatinate they threw into prison hundreds of mayors and assistant mayors and minor town and city officials in order, as they hoped, to make way for the spurious Rhine Republic which they instigated, for which they supplied the funds. Finally, it will never be forgotten that during these entire eleven and a half years of the French occupation the German municipal authorities were compelled to supply in every town German girls for prostitution by the French troops, black, white, and yellow. We can only be grateful that at last this sorry chapter is ended.

HERE AND THERE tucked away in the dispatches from India are the nuggets of news which are the most significant after the non-resistance itself. It is reported by Negley Farson that the British department stores are empty; their customers were formerly 90 per cent Indian. British-owned newspapers are losing circulation very heavily and British banks business; the Bombay Indian factory-owners have voted to have no further dealings with British banks. Nearly all the British bankers and mill operators are now petitioning the Viceroy for a statement promising dominion self-government. The price of cotton has fallen one-third; heavy failures are expected on the next settlement day and one-half the Bombay mills will soon be on half time. The British-owned Bombay News declares: "If the trade decline continues owing to the political situation India is heading for a big economic crash." No fewer than 170,000 bales of cloth, half of them sold, are lying in storehouses, none being called for. Of imported cloth hardly any is released to individual customers. The imports of piece goods dropped from 215,000,000 in April, 1929, to 165,000,000 in April, 1930. "Boycott week" began on June 29. A Madras magistrate has actually made it a crime to wear Gandhi caps and spinning by hand in Madras is also reported to be forbidden. The British are organizing battalions of armed police and training them in military tactics; this move the Indian forces have met with the announcement that they are equipping three new hospitals to take care of the additional casualties they expect; in these hospitals all caste has broken down. Finally, not a single ruler of an Indian state or a single Indian minister has uttered one word favoring the Simon report, and it is declared that if the feeling against it continues to rise it will be impossible for delegates to leave India alive for the October conference.

AT LAST STANLEY BALDWIN has turned against the two British press barons who undertake to dictate the policies not only of the Conservative Party but of the British Empire itself. It was a letter from Lord Rothermere, of which Mr. Baldwin truly said that "a more preposterous and insolent demand was never made on the leader of any political party," which was the final straw. In this epistle Lord Rothermere declared that he would never again support Mr. Baldwin in his newspapers unless he was told in advance what the Baldwin policy was to be and was given the names of at least eight or ten of the most prominent ministers in the next Tory Cabinet! Doubtless, the noble press lord wished to see whether his name was on the list. To a conference of his party delegates Mr. Baldwin told this fact and also commented on Lord Beaverbrook's demand that the referendum on food taxes, to which Mr. Baldwin has assented for a later period, should be held at once. The building of a tariff wall around the Empire must begin forthwith, this peer demands. "If," said Mr. Baldwin defiantly, "the gloves are off we shall see who has got the dirty hands." The studied insolence of these press barons and their assumption of complete power is the price which England is now paying for the ennobling and dignifying of these men and the government's kotowing to them during the World War. Meanwhile, for all of Mr. Baldwin's outspokenness, his leadership trembles in the balance. He was saved in the party conference only by the intercession of Sir Robert Horne. If the issue of food taxes is forced the party will surely split, which will be a great piece of good luck for the Labor Party, almost the first, indeed, since it has taken office.

THE STUDY OF REAL WAGES undertaken by the International Labor Office at the instance of Henry Ford is likely to yield some unexpected results. Mr. Ford now has plants in Manchester, Berlin, Helsingfors, Warsaw, Istanbul, and a dozen other European cities, and he wants to know how much he must pay his employees there so that they may enjoy the same living standards as workers under his seven-dollar-a-day minimum in Detroit. The federal Bureau of Labor Statistics, which is cooperating, has just made public a study which shows that the average annual wage in Ford families of four or five in which the husband is the sole wage-earner is $1,711.87. Even seven dollars a day scarcely means affluence. Having found out what the typical Ford family gets with its $1,711.87, the International Labor Office has now shipped two trunks full of Detroit clothing and household equipment to Geneva, whence they will make the rounds of Mr. Ford's seventeen European cities to find out just what goods of the same quality would cost there. The study is a difficult one, and its results will have the highest value both scientific and practical. European manufacturers, it is reported, have flooded the International Labor Office with protests, first against making the study, and second against publishing the results. They are said to fear the introduction of a high-wage policy in the European Ford plants. Fortunately their protests have proved unavailing; nothing but good can come out of a study that will help dispel some of the illusions on both sides of the Atlantic concerning the living conditions of American labor and "the pauper labor of Europe."

FROM THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS in Geneva come the 1929 figures for the armaments of the world. Approximately $3,750,000,000 was what the fifty-three nations, Christian and otherwise, spent in preparation for the next war, our country bearing the dishonor of spending $668,297,000 for this purpose—much more than any other country. Together Russia, the United States, Great Britain, and France were responsible for no less than one-half of this dreadful waste. Italy and Japan each accounted for another $250,000,000. The League of Nations officials are reported to be optimistic because the disarmament bill for 1929 is only $100,000,000 more than that of 1928. They must indeed be professional optimists to remain cheerful in face of these huge arms outlays, and also in view of the result of the London conference, which bids fair to add another billion to our own naval bill. It surely ought to dampen their feelings of cheer somewhat to read that the world launched 50 per cent more cruisers in 1929 than in the year before the war, 1913, and had three times as many building. What a pity Mr. Wilson is not alive that he might see the results of the war to end war and to smash militarism and might note how the United States and its Allies, breaking faith with the disarmament pledge in the Treaty of Versailles, are increasing instead of decreasing their fleets. He would doubtless be especially interested to know that in the world's trade in tools of war England led in 1928 with 54 per cent of the total and the United States came next with 18.2 per cent.

AN OPINION OF GREAT IMPORTANCE in regard to military training in colleges has just been handed down by the Attorney General of the United States in connection with the land-grant institutions which have benefited by the Morrill Act of July 2, 1862. Our militarists have for years maintained that this act made military training compulsory upon all students. In 1923, however, the University of Wisconsin placed military drill on an optional basis—to the anger of the War Department. The Department of the Interior held, however, that the university was legally entitled to take this step, and its position has now been upheld by the Attorney General. The effects of this decision may be far-reaching. Most of the students who now take the military courses do so under duress. In the more enlightened land-grant colleges there has been a desire to follow the example of Wisconsin, but fear that Wisconsin might have erred in its position has prevented similar steps. Indeed, the council of the militarized University of Illinois published in the Illinois Law-Review for November, 1929, an extended argument to prove that the land-grant colleges were morally and legally compelled to continue compulsory military training forever. With the seal of the Attorney General of the United States put squarely upon the opposite policy we should hear no more of the argument that all land-grant colleges must regiment their men whether the students wish to learn mass murder or not.

A LYNCHING WAS PREVENTED in Beaumont, Texas, on June 28 and June 29, although the Negro in question had confessed to eight assaults on white women; and it was prevented solely because Sheriff W. W. Covington and those under him were determined that the law should be upheld and that the lynching mob should not have its way. The Negro was taken from Port Arthur, Texas, to Beaumont in the rumble seat—with the top down—of an automobile which covered the twenty-two miles in fifteen minutes. Although a crowd attempted to drag him out of the car, he was whisked away in time. In Beaumont, where he was lodged in jail, the sheriff successfully protected him. Armed aides were stationed about the jail; tear gas was used once or twice. And as a last gesture, to show that a mob is a coward and fears a brave man, the sheriff routed its leader with no other weapon than his bare fist. It is a pity that such forthright tactics were not used several days before in South Carolina. In the town of Union, in that State, a Negro was shot to death by a mob after he had been identified by two white women as their attacker. The sheriff was not in evidence; he "did not recognize any of the mob." The National Guard arrived half an hour too late. In other words, the sheriff was not willing to do his duty; in Texas the sheriff was willing and therefore able. We shall have fewer lynchings when we have no more sheriffs who ally themselves with the mobs.

CHEAP WOMAN LABOR? Certainly, help yourself. The Birmingham Industrial Board, "for the industrial development of the Birmingham district," has issued a seductive pamphlet entitled "A New Reservoir of Woman Labor," designed to attract manufacturers to the thriving Southern metropolis. We discover that out of 147,249 females ten years of age and over "in the metropolitan area" no less than 106,608 are "unemployed." They probably have no occupation aside from keeping house, cooking, washing, ironing, cleaning, and sewing, bringing the babies into the world, and taking care of them after they get here. We sincerely hope that these idle women can be put at some really useful work. Of the 106,000 "unemployed," 73,124, it appears, are white—which, we gather, is all to the good. "A large percentage of these unemployed women are interested in securing work. Pay of from $10 to $15 per week will prove attractive to nearly all of them. Some could be employed at even lower rates." We commend the last sentence to manufacturers interested in the industrial progress of Birmingham and the advancement of American womanhood.

LATEST IMMIGRATION FIGURES suggest that foreigners no longer look across the ocean to the United States as a land flowing with milk and honey. David L. Selke, president of the Congressional Information Bureau at Washington, announces that 16,946 quota visas remain unapplied for out of the 153,714 allotted to the seventy-one nationalities for the fiscal year 1929-30. Figures for some of the individual countries have interesting implications. Under the Japanese exclusion act of 1924 Japan is allowed 100 visas a year (the minimum quota for any country), whereas if the national-origins quota plan were applied the Japanese quota would be about 200. For six years the United States has bitterly offended the Japanese by this discrimination, and yet in 1929-30 only 16 of the possible 100 Japanese visas were applied for. Another striking figure is that of Great Britain and northern Ireland, where 10,068 have been left unused out of a quota of 65,721. The American who hears distressing tales of nearly 2,000,000 unemployed in England will wonder at these figures, forgetting perhaps, our own unemployed millions.

THE CRAZE FOR "SHORTS" has by now reached several men's colleges. May it grow—as an entirely defensible mode of attire for young men in warm weather, outside of the cities. We ourselves would, at the risk of again being accused of bolshevism, like to put in a word for the Russian blouse for men. Women have long worn it—in adaptations. For men there is no garment comparable to it in comfort, for it does away with coat, vest, collar, and necktie, conceals the belt, and removes the reproach of appearing in shirt-sleeves. Only one thing stands in the way of its immediate acceptance—that it goes over the trousers instead of inside, which to the American smacks of the exposed shirt-tails of the Oriental; but this method of wearing the blouse is one reason why it is so cool. It looks extremely well on all but stout men. If only a few hundred college Americans would don it, as they have the shorts, we believe that victory would be won.

THE BANNING in England of Marc Connelly's "The Green Pastures," that extremely moving and genuinely reverent play dealing with religion, God, and heaven as interpreted through Negro eyes, seems to us to illustrate more than is usually the case the inherent weakness of any censorship. We cannot for a moment believe that if this censor had seen "The Green Pastures" as it has been played on Broadway he could have the slightest question as to the desirability of its production. He would find that the audiences come away from this Pulitzer-prize play deeply moved and impressed by its profoundly religious spirit. Instead, he has perhaps let himself be misled by the text and yielded to the old theory that God must never be represented on the stage—a prejudice fortunately overruled in New York. But when you put in the hands of one fallible person so grave a decision you must expect that he will err once in so often. Thus the British public is deprived of the right to see a great and lovely work of art, an earnest, sincere, and touching production, profoundly satisfying and deeply suggestive to all who know the Negro race.

PROFESSOR KUNO FRANCKE, of Harvard University, who died on June 25, was for thirty-three years one of the foremost teachers of German literature in the United States, and after becoming emeritus still kept up his unceasing activities on behalf of Harvard's Germanic Museum, of which he was curator and honorary curator for twenty-eight years. Indeed, he was really its founder and through him came many of the great gifts which have enriched that institution. Hard hit as it was by the war with Germany, it has none the less continued on an even keel. Professor Francke's own loyalty to this country was never questioned. Deeply as he suffered to see one of his own sons going forth to fight against the Fatherland, his courage never faltered; nor could anyone question where so good a liberal stood on the basic issues. He represented in short that liberal German tradition which flowered in Germany a brief moment in 1848 and again in the eighties and nineties until it was crushed to earth by the Bismarckian policies. Professor Francke was a prolific writer, a profound student, a man of great modesty and understanding, with a rarely sweet spirit. For more than forty years, to the day of his death, he was a valued contributor, reviewer, adviser, and friend to the editors of this journal.

Unemployment: The President's Job

THE gloom of the business outlook continues unbroken. Among responsible industrial leaders there is no longer any attempt to minimize the gravity of the situation, and it is at last generally recognized that we are in the midst of a world-wide depression. Wholesale prices continue to decline, and retail prices, which since the war have remained obstinately out of relation to wholesale ones, share in the loss. The volume of industrial production, according to the Federal Reserve Board, again declined in May by about as much as it increased in April, and factory employment fell in May more than is usual. Despite the overtime operation of the President's conference and publicity machinery, building-contract awards during that month were substantially smaller than in any other year since 1924. Stock prices continue to crash with monotonous regularity, and it is coming to be recognized that there will be no genuine market recovery until liquidation has been completed. The ordinary man's golden dream of something for nothing is past; he is back in the old hard world of work and saving, or worse yet, of no work and starving. Money is at 2½ per cent with no takers; the heroic efforts of the Federal Reserve Board to set things going by expanding credit have failed completely. In the face of such failure we find the Royal Bank of Canada in connection with its July Monthly Letter declaring:

> The continual downward movement of commodity prices is steadily accentuating the severity of the world-wide depression. . . . We believe that if the Federal Reserve Banks do not force an immediate increase in circulation the present depression will assume proportions similar to that of 1920.

We do not indorse either this alarmist view of the future or this plea for a violent inflation; but we do call attention to the state of opinion induced among certain financial leaders by the stubborn facts of the past eight months.

In face of these facts, how pitiable is the position of the Hoover Administration, which not only persists in trying to make people believe that the facts do not exist, but actually blocks intelligent public effort to do something at least toward meeting the disaster. On June 5 Secretary Hyde said:

> No greater triumph has ever been scored in peace time than the victory Herbert Hoover has won against panic. . . . The President . . . resolutely began to rebuild public confidence. The result was that the unemployment which threatened to freeze the activities of the nation has proved to be little more than seasonal unemployment. There was relatively little distress.

This is plain and unqualified untruth; we had almost said falsehood, for if Mr. Hyde does not know any better than this he is ignorant almost beyond belief. Two weeks after Mr. Hyde spoke, Secretary Mellon, Secretary Lamont, and Assistant Secretary Klein, three more of Mr. Hoover's chief Happiness Boys, on successive days gave out tariff prosperity statements that moved even the long-suffering New York Times to impatient protest. Is there no limit to the effrontery of the President and his official associates in their effort to deceive the public by denying the most patent and notorious facts?

But that is not the worst. The business collapse has plunged us into a period of widespread and disastrous unemployment, as everyone knows. For two years now Senator Wagner of New York has been manfully striving for the passage of three well-considered and carefully drawn bills whose enactment would mark the beginning, at least, of a national unemployment program. The best scientific opinion of the country is behind the measures. Senator Wagner's efforts have steadily met with indifference or active opposition at the White House. Despite such opposition, the bills were finally driven through the Senate. In the machine-controlled House what happened? Let Senator Wagner, who is not given to loose statements, answer the question:

> The President still refuses to let Congress provide the necessary machinery for the prevention of such disasters in the future. . . . The bill providing for the cooperative establishment of employment agencies has been sent to die in a subcommittee. [It was reported out on June 25.]
>
> The amendments proposed in the long-range planning bill strike at its very heart. First, the President would eliminate the preparation of the index of unemployment. . . . He would strike out the provision for the acceleration of public works. . . . He would strike out the provision for advance planning. . . .
>
> The bill as amended is largely an empty shell, dependent for its content on the whim of the Executive. The President could not have more completely destroyed the bill if he had vetoed it.

In the face of Senator Wagner's statement and the protests of economists, business men, and social workers the country over, President Hoover sits silent. We desire to be wholly fair in the matter, but it is hard to resist the conclusion that he has actually desired the defeat of the Wagner bills. Certainly he has lifted no finger to help them. Apparently he will aid no program but his own.

So long as the President holds this position, so long, apparently, is the war on unemployment relegated to the States and to private industry. With the best will in the world they alone cannot carry that war to a successful conclusion. "It is ridiculous," said Owen D. Young recently, "to speak of unemployment as a necessary condition of human society. It is nothing more than a maladjustment of its machinery. It is a blot on our intelligence." True enough; and private industry, happily, is coming to recognize its responsibility to regularize employment as well as dividends. The General Electric Company, for example, has just announced a noteworthy plan for stabilizing employment and providing unemployment payments of 50 per cent of regular wages to employees entering the plan. Some States and cities are making intelligent beginnings in a public employment policy. But all this is not enough; federal action, too, is required. Will the President in these trying days stubbornly refuse to lead a willing people forward toward the abolition of the chief curse of modern industry?

Rates While You Wait

BACK in the campaign days of 1928, if we remember rightly, Mr. Hoover announced, with the accent of finality that seems to go with the contemplation of high office, that the business of legislation belonged to Congress and that the executive should not intrude its views upon the lawmaking branch of the government. Some doubters made bold to point out that unless the President took a hand now and then, at least to the extent of saying what he did or did not want, a leaderless Congress might go woolgathering and fritter away its time, but the pronouncement had been made, Mr. Hoover was known to be a bit stubborn, and there was an uncomfortable suspicion that he might stick to his ground and let Congress take the consequences.

We know now, of course, that the self-denying ordinance was not without elasticity. When the Senate in June, 1929, stood out for the debenture scheme in the agricultural-marketing bill, Mr. Hoover put his foot down, announced that he would not have it, and the scheme was dropped. On June 16 last, in a statement giving notice of his intention to sign the tariff bill, he declared that while Congress must be responsible for the bill because no President could possibly examine personally all of the 3,300 items in the schedules, he had nevertheless "insisted" upon having the kind of flexible-tariff provision he wanted. On June 24 he let himself go in a really vigorous fashion about the veterans' pension bill, denouncing the bill as "just bad legislation," charging that it made provision for certain veterans "in the most wasteful and discriminatory way conceivable," and declaring that it contained things which "violate not only the fact but the very integrity of government." Passing over with mere mention such obvious comments as that the debenture scheme was really mischievous, that the objections to the veterans' bill were several weeks overdue, and that the enormities of the tariff bill might have been tempered if Mr. Hoover had "insisted" upon getting rid of them as he "insisted" upon having the flexible provisions shaped to his mind, it would appear that Mr. Hoover's policy in regard to pending legislation is not to keep his hands off, but to put them on when there is something that he specially wants.

The flexible-tariff provision, as it happens, sheds a good deal of light upon Mr. Hoover's mental processes and his views of how best to treat business. He "insisted" upon the flexible arrangement in the Smoot-Hawley bill, he declared, because the old provision was clumsy and largely inoperative, whereas the new provision intrusts the task of tariff revision to a "definite rate-making body acting through semi-judicial methods of hearing and investigation, by which items can be taken up one by one upon direction or application of aggrieved parties." In this dignified way, without haste, without rest, revision "can be accomplished without disturbance to business" and even the complaints of foreigners can be remedied.

The argument does not leave Mr. Hoover in a very good position as an efficiency expert. The Senate promptly gave him a hint of how the "one by one" method would work by passing a resolution calling upon the Tariff Commission to reconsider a whole handful of duties, and the House shortly indicated that it, too, saw the possibilities of the game. What with the embattled Senate and House, the protests of forty-odd foreign businesses or governments, and any number of American businesses which either resent the new tariff or go the whole hog with Father Grundy in demanding still higher rates, the labors of the commission bid fair to progress about as rapidly as does a horse-drawn truck in a traffic jam.

This is not the worst aspect of the matter, however. Thanks to Mr. Hoover's "insistence" the whole business of rate-making is now up in the air. Under the old system the tariff schedules, good or bad as one might think them, were at least fixed save as a slow and rather clumsy action of the commission and the President might occasionally alter a rate. Under the new system which Mr. Hoover praises so highly the whole list is open to attack at any time by anybody who chooses to file with the commission a request for a revision. Instead of leaving business to get on as well as it can under rates upon whose stability it may reasonably count, the business of the country is to be continually disturbed, our commercial relations with other nations are to be kept in constant agitation, and the politicians and lobbyists are offered a heyday. This is flexibility with a vengeance, with the Hoover sign manual to attest its excellence. If the Democrats have so much as a grain of political sense they will eviscerate the tariff bill and Mr. Hoover's defense of it in every Congressional district and in every State in which a Senator is to be elected, and let the country know what it is in for now that the tariff has been "taken out of politics" and Mr. Hoover and the Tariff Commission are to run the show.

Lowest of All

OF all police tricks the lowest without question is to us the use of detectives to obtain evidence against women by cohabiting with them. The employment of stool pigeons is degrading enough; the buying up of accomplices sufficiently disreputable. But this inducing women to commit the so-called "crime" for which they are subsequently punished is, to our mind, to put the police just above the footing of that most degraded of mortals, the pimp. Indeed, we sometimes wonder if the moral degradation of the police is not just about the same; for these are officials sworn not to violate the law but to obey and to enforce it. They are no more licensed to violate it than are any private citizens—and they ought to go to the reformatory with their victims after they have admitted their guilt. More than that, the policeman is guilty of another offense in that his solicitation of the woman constitutes that incitement to wrongdoing which the law describes as in itself a crime.

We are moved to these remarks by some recent cases in New York. In one of them an unfortunate woman bearing a name once very well known in theatrical circles was haled into court by a policeman who had invaded her room in her hotel and charged her with solicitation and accepting his money. Another case was that of a registered nurse who accepted a marked bill, according to her own statement, as a nursing retainer, and was then immediately arrested. The first case aroused the sympathy and interest of a number of women who inveighed against the methods of the police. Several police magistrates then came to the rescue of the vice squad and declared it to be both honest and efficient. To this Mrs. Mary Hamilton, lately director of the women's bureau of the police, replies that there are many cases of innocent women being "framed" and says: "We have got to abolish this system of official procurers, of using stool pigeons and 'squeals' to secure evidence. It is not done in any other country and clears the way for all kinds of blackmail and persecution." Exactly. Yet the practice goes on with magisterial approval.

Take another case upon which the sensational press has dwelt with great gusto. In this instance two detectives lived at intervals with a young woman and after winning her confidence succeeded in unraveling a murder case. This is called smart detective work, but no one stops to question the effect upon the police or the morality of the payments for the entertainment and support of the woman in the case. It is simply assumed that this is the only way to capture crooks and that therefore it is excusable—just as other kinds of police lawlessness, such as the third degree, are defended on the ground that you have to do such things to get ahead of the underworld. As a matter of fact this is one of the steady causes of the demoralization of our police forces and one of the reasons why they are so cursed with graft and corruption. Whenever, the world over, men are hired to spy upon the morals of women and to hale them into court for what is called a moral delinquency the morale of the force invariably suffers. Even the magnificent London police have suffered in this regard. In Europe whenever you find a morals squad you are pretty certain to find a squad of corrupt rascals showering their favors on some women and persecuting others. Invariably, in America, the policeman's word is accepted against the woman's.

It is not a new practice in New York. Our memory goes back to the days when the police of New York were governed by four "bipartisan" commissioners, of whom the two Republicans were Frederick D. Grant and Theodore Roosevelt. When bills running into thousands of dollars were once presented to the board for its approval, for the expenses of the police in cohabiting with the women they arrested, it was not Theodore Roosevelt but Frederick Grant, son of the victor at Appomattox, who first protested and then resigned. Although Grant had a considerable family and no income whatever save his official pay, he felt that his personal honor forbade his paying the bills of these agents provocateurs who were thus officially encouraged to indulge in that relationship which the State declares to be an offense against society. We have always felt that General F. D. Grant deserved a monument for his stand on this occasion and have always marveled that Theodore Roosevelt could not have seen eye to eye with him.

In no other field of private morals is the use of the police power more dangerous, more certain to result in abuses, more demoralizing to those who exercise the police power, and more repugnant to decency and to official honor. Are the moral standards of our cities to be upheld by commissioning and paying men to do the very thing for which their partners are sent to jail? By no means. That way lies only official degradation. It is time for American cities to put an end to such practices.

Work and Pray

JOHN E. EDGERTON, Tennessee textile king, is already famous as president of the National Manufacturers' Association, that group of employers whose zeal for the open shop is exceeded only by their devotion to the closed mind. But Mr. Edgerton will probably go down even farther in history as the Man Who Made Prayer Pay. According to a Federated Press dispatch Mr. Edgerton was invited recently to appear before the summer conference of the Methodist Federation of Social Service and criticize the federation's social program. Mr. Edgerton accepted; and Mr. Edgerton went straight to the point. The churches, he said, were straying away from their most important task and making themselves social instead of spiritual institutions.

> There is too much talk [said Mr. Edgerton] about labor's rights, a living wage, social justice, and the like. It's a bad thing to set aside Labor Day because it creates class feeling and impedes the true spirit of brotherhood and so is contrary to the teachings of Jesus.

When someone was untactful enough to mention poverty, Mr. Edgerton admitted its existence, but said that it should be abolished by cultivating a sense of individual responsibility in the workers so that they would save enough while employed to carry them through "those inevitable periods in our economic life when there is unemployment."

But Mr. Edgerton's real contribution to the meeting was the account of his discovery and perfection of prayer as an aid to production. Some years ago he inaugurated the "prayer system" in his factory. Each morning now, before the workers start the day, they pray. And the effect on production! But let Mr. Edgerton tell it:

> I am proud to say that the morning-prayer exercises in my factory have had the finest economic effect. Workers are producing far more goods than before the prayer system was started some years ago. We have made it almost impossible for anyone but a Christian to get a job. We examine applicants for work to see if they have any dangerous ideas. We have been able by that process to keep our plant free of trouble.

There is even a rumor, unfortunately not confirmed, that Mr. Edgerton's system of prayer, combined with his wage arrangements, has been so successful in creating a spiritual outlook among his employees that they hardly notice the money they get on Saturday night in what they piously call their pray envelopes. The happy time will come, perhaps, when they will not want any money at all, but will go cheerfully home without any, singing hosannas.

Mr. Edgerton's prayer system will undoubtedly spread, as it certainly deserves to, in the present "inevitable period" of unemployment. In these recent materialistic years the workers have suffered from the scourge of work without faith. If prayer has aided production as much as Mr. Edgerton indicates, we see no reason whatever why with proper faith it should not prove equally effective as an entire substitute for production in difficult times like the present. It is high time in any case that the workers learned to live by faith, not work. As for those weaklings who may fall by the wayside and starve to death, let the county bury them under the epitaph: Better Dead than Red.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

EVERY now and then somebody asks me to contribute to a fund for Better-Speech Week or National Enunciation Day. And I never do. I'm not really for it. People who talk too precisely and seem to be aware of it give me a sinking sensation in the pit of the stomach. Possibly perfected speech would be well enough if any one of us had grown up with it from the very beginning. But it is invariably an acquired art. As a matter of fact, I am much more interested in hearing what people have to say than in listening intently for such particular tones and cadences as they use to ornament their speech. And, in all frankness, I may as well confess that my attitude of tolerance is necessary for self-preservation. My own utterance and diction lie but little this side of the shameful.

One of the reasons why my own pronunciation is so slipshod is that I had a better-speech teacher when I was a small boy in school. When she said something, we all had to repeat it right after her. Every word had to come right off the tip of the tongue and linger for a split second on the end of the two front teeth before it was allowed to escape into an expectant world. And just the week before the better-speech class started I lost one of my important front teeth. That meant that no matter how hard I worked, 50 per cent would be the highest mark I could possibly get. I was disgusted and decided that I'd just as soon flunk in better speech. I did. I used to say "noosepaper" and "Toosday" just to annoy her. And the fact that I have a tendency to carry the final "r" over after a "w" didn't help much either. I mean that unless I watch out very carefully I always say "I sawrit." It ought to be "I saw it."

But even if I had owned that missing and very necessary front tooth I think I might have gone on strike against better speech just on principle. I hated that teacher. She used to begin, "Good morning, little gentlemen and ladies. Allow me to welcome you to better-speech hour." That was enough to start the day all wrong for me. I didn't think of myself as a little gentleman and I certainly didn't think of the girls I knew in that class as little ladies.

Whenever our teacher spoke I was reminded of a fairy story I had read about an old witch and a good little girl and a bad little girl. The witch put a curse on one and a blessing on the other. Whenever one little girl spoke a gold piece came out of her mouth. And when the other little girl spoke toads dropped out. I used to look at the teacher—we'll call her Miss Spencer because that wasn't her name at all—I used to look at Miss Spencer forming a syllable way back in her larynx and leading it gently along to the tip of her tongue and the end of her front teeth. It was fascinating. She took so much pains with it. I wasn't looking for either toads or gold pieces but it wouldn't have surprised me if after all that effort she had disgorged a cream puff. And if she had, and if I hadn't been a little gentleman, I'd have flung it right back at her.

I don't know why so many better-speech and elocutionary people feel that everything they say should have quite so much sugar and honey in it. I was at a party once where two actresses were guests. They'd both been chorus girls together but one had risen to be a star and she'd married a millionaire and she had a white fur coat. She was just elocuting and enunciating all over the place: "It was so delightful of you to ask me and I was so happy to attend the festivities." The chorus girl who didn't have a millionaire or a white fur coat looked at her old friend in amazement for fifteen minutes. That was as long as she could stand it. Then she marched across the room and gave the elocutionary guest a resounding slap on the back. "Come on, dearie," she said; "ain't you ever common?"

I think it's a fair criticism. I think that a little bit of slang and a little bit of dialect and maybe even a pinch of mispronunciation is needed to keep a language alive. It must grow. It has to have roots, and roots have to get down into the earth. I think Al Smith would have been an excellent President even if he did say "raddio."

And greatly do I fear that better speech and even standardized speech will soon enough be America's portion. Imitation is the tribute which we pay to our famous citizens. In the days of the silent drama Mary Pickford alone was enough to make two curls grow upon young foreheads where there had never been curls before. And now that vocal models have been set before us I think that the majority of youthful Americans will be equally eager to fall into line. I refer less at the moment to the tones which thunder out from the talking screen than to the crooning whispers of the radio. The day of the jazz band has begun to decline. Today each tooth paste has its own articulate announcer. And the better-known performers are heard from Maine to California at one and the same moment.

Accordingly, America is likely to select one of these far-flung voices and seek to emulate it. In another twenty years we may all be talking in precisely the manner of Will Rogers, or of Amos 'n' Andy, or of Floyd Gibbons. This last fantasy has distinctly friendly facets. If this slow-paced land of ours could be speeded up into a Gibbonic whirlwind, business conferences might easily be cut from two hours to three minutes. An after-dinner speech should hardly require more than thirty seconds.

But though I think the radio will inevitably wipe out local dialectic differences the result seems to me less than utopian. I do not long for the day when there are no young ladies left to talk Southern in the moonlight. Nor can I say that the radio voice as it has been standardized by most announcers is altogether to my liking. The combination of strained honey and whipped cream comes at last to fall annoyingly upon the ear.

And if we all are fated to talk in the manner of some man saying, "Desbrosses dentifrice preserves your gums," blame should not fall wholly upon those who control the destines of radio. They have been aided and abetted by the American Academy, which gives each year a gold medal to the announcer doing most for the purity of English diction. Once the medal has been pinned upon the breast of an unfortunate he becomes a doomed man and never again will draw a natural breath. And so I say that we also shall be enslaved to purity of speech—bound forevermore to the tip of the tongue and the two front teeth.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Martyrs to Marriage

A PERSONAL NARRATIVE

I AM the daughter of parents who were, after the first few months of marriage, never companionable or happy together, of parents whose code decreed that they must remain together for their children's sake. For more than twenty years I suffered the consequences of their decision against divorce, and my life has been most unhappily influenced by a martyrdom that was undertaken expressly for the benefit of myself and my brother and sister. My sister, three years my junior, escaped the worst effects of this martyrdom, largely, I suppose, because she has always been at ease in a robust out-of-door life. My brother, ten years younger than myself, as a result of his observations has developed an abnormal dislike for his father.

Both of my parents were intelligent people of some education. My mother was a violinist, my father a professional man who came finally into rather important political office. But they had no interests in common and were totally unlike in temperament. My mother was religious and completely dominated by her feelings; she had been reared by a narrow-minded mother and had never rebelled against her upbringing. My father had been subjected to the same Puritan training, but from boyhood he had fought against his mother's discipline, and had finally come West to escape it. He had known responsibility much too early. When he was only fifteen the death of his father had made it necessary for him to go to work to assist in the support of his mother and sister. He became a skeptical realist, an unbeliever. He had no appreciation of my mother's artistic desires nor of her childish dependence on sentiment; my mother did not share his ambitions, and her training had not prepared her either to understand or to forgive his weaknesses.

They married much too young—my mother was only eighteen, my father not yet twenty—and I was born a year later. Thus, before he was twenty-one, my father had two families dependent upon his support. My mother did all she could to help him: she gave violin lessons during all the years we children were growing up. But at heart he always resented the fact that he needed her assistance. My father was nervous and rather sickly. He cared for none of the things that interested my mother. His aversion to any kind of social intercourse cut her off from all the other women in our little town, for no married woman was ever expected to attend a social gathering alone. My mother's life, therefore, was limited to her home, with the result that she concentrated all her affection and interest upon her children to the exclusion not only of the world at large but of her husband as well. My father was never at ease in his own home. In his club and in his office he found his only satisfaction, and politics soon became his sole interest.

These differences in temperament were quite enough in themselves to drive my parents apart. But another, more serious, problem presented itself within two years after their marriage. In the West of that day, most business was conducted in saloons. My father, nervous by temperament and unhappy at home, turned more and more to whiskey for release and relaxation, and in time became a periodic drunkard. My mother, of course, had a deep horror of drinking. It never occurred to her, nor would it have occurred to most of the women in that town, to advise her husband to do his drinking at home. Had she taken this more lenient attitude, had she even taken a drink with him occasionally, she might have been able to control his habits.

I was not more than four years old when I first became acutely aware of the tragedy in my home. My sister was a tiny baby and both of us slept in my mother's room, my father occupying the only other bedroom in our small house. I began at this time to wake up at night terribly frightened, yet unable to explain my fright. Something restrained me from calling to my mother, although I knew she was awake and frightened, too. Gradually I realized what it was we both feared. When my father was drinking my mother lay awake night after night listening for his step or for some telephone call which might bring word of an accident. In those days drunkards did not always reach home safely; they were killed and robbed if they carried even small sums of money. The horror which hung over my mother communicated itself to me. Neither of us was free of it for long at a time, for even when my father was not drinking, we never knew at what moment he might begin again.

Meanwhile he was succeeding politically, which meant that he was spending more and more time in his office and with men—more time and more money. My mother now grew painfully economical. My father spent a great deal on liquor and complained that home was unpleasant and a place to stay away from. My mother, who had been a rather beautiful woman, had become a disappointed drudge. Religion was her only solace.

I had come to feel every detail of the domestic situation, without being in the least capable of analyzing or understanding it. My mother tried to hide her feelings from me but without success. I was supersensitive and delicate. I stayed much in the house because I was afraid of other children. Thus, I spent many hours of each day with my mother. When I was six years old I became very ill and was unable to walk for more than a year. No doctor could explain my illness. I simply could not walk. I believe now that this illness was only my rebellion against a situation too difficult for a child to bear. Perhaps, also, I was trying unconsciously to draw the attention of my parents toward myself in order that it might be a little less upon themselves. But my attempt failed; I grew stronger in spite of myself; at last I got about again, to learn that matters were worse than ever. My father's drinking had seriously depleted our finances and doctors' bills had not improved matters.

After my illness I began to understand the arguments late at night between my parents. My father, coming home drunk, would try to persuade my mother to go to his room. My mother, with her intense dislike of drink and her prudish training, of course refused. My father, infuriated, would break into drunken tears, while my mother wept for a different reason. No wonder that I, lying awake and listening, came to feel that the relationship between men and women was horrible.

Gradually my mother lost all ability to control my father's actions. Before I was ten years old I had come to be the only person who could manage him at all. We were very much alike in disposition and probably for that reason he yielded to my authority. He allowed me to put him to bed and to take care of him when he was ill. He would not have my mother near him. Seeing that she could no longer hide anything from me, my mother now made me her confidante. My father, especially when he was drinking, was even more frank than she. While my mother assured me over and over again that although my father was a weakling, she could forgive him much, since she knew he would never be untrue to her, I knew definitely from my father that he had many times been unfaithful and was in love with another woman. I alone knew the details of his life, and I have never been sorry that he talked to me honestly, although I suppose no young girl has ever heard more amazing tales of tangled lives than I heard from him. Since he was by nature sympathetic and understanding, and since he had no fixed standards of right and wrong, most of the comedies and tragedies of the town were poured into his ears. These stories he repeated, in his half-sober moments, to me.

Meanwhile, the young doctor who had attended me had fallen in love with my mother. She was badly frightened when she learned of his feeling for her. In her naive way, she went to my father for advice; and my father, absurd as it may seem, became jealous. Later, he confessed to me that he had been a fool, that this was the one opportunity my mother had ever had for happiness. I do not know that she would have taken it, even had my father advised it, but his bad temper and sulkiness put an end to her new friendship. I pleaded with her to get a divorce; I stamped my foot and jeered at my father for his jealousy; but neither of them would take any legal action. They told me that they must stay together until we children were safely reared. I remember laughing very bitterly at their decision and reminding them that since my brother was still an infant, they would have to remain together a good many miserable years. I conceived a vivid hatred for all human relationships excused under the name of love or marriage.

Once she had renounced any chance for happiness, my mother centered every emotion upon her son. He became, in fact, although she would not recognize the psychology, her lover, and remained so always, to his own detriment. My father, who had long desired a son, was pushed out of the picture. And this fact embittered him perhaps more than anything that had gone before. And because he blamed himself as well as my mother he found in drinking his only relief. Meantime, I was approaching adolescence. My mother's prudish warnings frightened me and gave me no knowledge of my own state of health and emotions. Her statement that she would some day have something more to tell me I construed as a forecast of some catastrophe such as death or disease which had fallen upon one of my parents. I lived a year in this terror. I grew very thin and very ill. Mentally, I was decidedly unbalanced. Finally, a wise doctor sent me away from home for a year. At once, in a different atmosphere, I began to recuperate.

I was called home to what was believed to be my mother's deathbed. I arrived to find that my father had disappeared and could not be found; and that he knew nothing of my mother's condition. He had run off on one of his drinking bouts. I knew, fortunately, where I might locate him and succeeded in doing so. But he did not come back until after the crisis, and I had to watch it out alone with the doctors and nurses. And now, despite his bad health and bad habits, my father won his first really important political race and became a man of some prominence. He was supported in the race by my mother, largely for fear of what people would think if she did not. My mother looked upon his success as merely another opportunity for him to escape from home. She had little appreciation of the fact that for years her influence on his life had been totally bad, not because of what it was, but because of the type of man toward whom it was directed. She had become a religious fanatic and was training my brother toward the same religious intensity. Although she would not confess it, she feared my father's absences. I knew that away from home or not my father had come to care much more for his mistress than for his wife, and I could not entirely blame him.

Then came a period of years during which my father's career went forward steadily and during which the gap between my parents widened steadily. When I reached college age I persuaded my mother to come with me to a larger educational center and to bring along my sister and brother. Here for a time she was happier. She began studying the violin again and became less interested in her religion. I was saner and happier than I had ever been.

But I knew that trouble might break at any moment. I knew how my father was living, and I was afraid my mother would decide to return to him. One day she did go—to surprise him. She returned almost as soon as a train could bring her back and I knew, when I saw her face, that she had had a shock from which she would never recover. She knew at last of my father's mistress. Every support was now gone, and she was in a state of nervous collapse. I spent the year nursing her. My brother, now adolescent, came, in that year, to hate my father bitterly. I began again to argue for divorce, but my mother would not listen. A father should do his duty and educate his son and she had no intention of allowing him his freedom now after all these years of her sacrifice. Meantime, my father was begging me to persuade her to get a divorce; his health was bad and he needed to get out of hotels and back into some kind of a home, and he needed the care of the woman whom he loved. I reminded him of his mistake years back when he had been jealous of the young doctor who had loved my mother. I think I was very bitter and hard myself. I was through college now, and at work. My brother was in college, and both he and my mother were with me. I saw my father occasionally. He was a sick man and had few years to live. He clung to me and pleaded with me never to allow my mother to come back to him.

Not until my brother had finished college did my long argument have any results. When it was too late, my parents were divorced. By that time neither had the strength or the spirit to rebuild his life. My father died a year later. My mother found solace for a time in her son and her religion.

And what have all these years meant to the children of parents who would not consider divorce? I have always been a sickly and nervous woman. I married a sick man, thinking I could at least pity and take care of him even though I seemed incapable of love. I left him a few weeks later, and promptly got a divorce. Other lovers have come into my life, but I have never remarried. My sister, after ten years of marriage, is now divorced. My brother married in a moment of rebellion against my mother and was divorced within a year. Evidently, if life has taught us anything it has taught us that divorce is preferable to an unhappy marriage. Very probably, our childhood has made it impossible for us to find happiness in marriage.

Divorce would have been better. My father and I could have lived happily together. My sister, my mother, and my brother would have made a congenial family. And had my mother remarried as a young and attractive woman, she might not have centered her life in her children, and they might have grown up into happier human beings.

The Empire Dies Hard

The Simon Commission's Report on India

By RICHARD B. GREGG

VOLUME I of the Report of the Simon Commission is a careful, detailed, and persuasive presentation of facts in the Indian situation. There are in it some distortions of emphasis amounting almost to omissions of pertinent facts, but these were probably intentional. The impression it made upon England and upon the United States was that India presents a problem of tremendous extent and complexity. The London Spectator aptly describes it as a "Book of Difficulties." The picture of India split into a medley of divided castes, religions, sects, parties, and classes was eagerly received by British opinion. It coincided with prior reports and unconscious British hopes.

Volume II, as a piece of constitutional planning, is remarkably skilful and thorough—indeed masterly. In its attitude and implications it is a monument of British firmness. But we are not now interested in description or constitutional theory. The question is: Does the report fit the political facts in the situation? What effect will it have? The newspapers have given us summaries of both documents. What are the important items, and what are the probable or possible reactions to them?

In Great Britain the effect of the first volume will probably be to make everyone feel cautious in making any advance in a field so complex and difficult. This will tend to provide wide support for the commission's policy of "gradualness" in surrendering power to India. The report as a whole is so comprehensive, detailed, and convincing as to create a strong feeling in England that nobody there is competent to propose any radical changes in it. Almost certainly the Labor M. P.'s will be timid in that respect.

Except for Indian opposition, Parliament would be inclined, I think, to accept the governmental scheme proposed in the report almost without change, though the Tories would fight hard to have the Indian police kept under British control instead of being placed in charge of ministers who may be Indian, as the report proposes. But without Gandhi present, no Indian pleas in conference would be strong enough to alter British plans essentially.

To understand the Indian attitude we need to note some characteristics and specific items of the report. An examination of the index gives an idea of the commission's sense of proportion. Apparently Finance is the most important subject, for under that title in the index there are 41 items or subheads, occupying two full double-column pages. Defense of India apparently loomed next largest in their minds, as its subheads fill one full page. Taxation occupies an additional column. Communal Representation has 34 subheads, Mohammedans 25, Europeans 23, Depressed Classes 16, Anglo-Indians 15, Christians 12, Hindus 12, Swarajist Party 10, Non-Cooperation 3, Gandhi 3. If we are struck by these last two items, we find on further examination that out of a total of 725 pages of text in both volumes of the report, Gandhi and his 1920-21 movement are given 4 pages, and the history of Indian politics since 1920 occupies 12 pages.

The report does not offer any real advance in self-government by Indians, but probably in effect would reduce what little they now have. Not only are the existing limits as to "votable" and non-votable" items of expenditure maintained in both central and provincial governments, but also the governors of provinces, at their discretion and with the Viceroy's assent, may assume absolute control over matters of finance, police, and executive and legislative action. These are called the governors' "overriding powers." The Viceroy is to have complete control over the army, subject only to some direction from Great Britain and advice from the Commander-in-Chief. The British Central Executive in India is to continue to have the power of initiating measures of taxation for the Indian central government. The Council of State and the Federal Assembly may reject or amend a bill, but when the Viceroy considers that its passing is essential for the safety, tranquillity, or interests of British India or any part thereof, he may certify the measure, which thereupon has all the force of law. "Non-votable" items of expenditure are the cost of defense, the debt charges, and the salaries of All-India services. Over them the legislature has no control. Provincial governors would be given "overriding powers" for five purposes: (1) in order to preserve the safety and tranquillity of the province; (2) in order to prevent serious prejudice to one or more sections of the community as compared with other sections; (3) to secure the due fulfilment of any liability of government in respect of items of expenditure not subject to the vote of the legislature; (4) to secure the carrying out of any order received by the provincial government from the Government of India or the Secretary of State; (5) to carry out any duties which may be statutorily imposed on the government, such as duties in connection with some service questions and with responsibility for backward tracts. The police are, it is true, to be placed under provincial ministers, who may be Indians (if Parliament consents), but the governor's overriding powers permit him to assume complete charge of the police whenever he thinks he needs to.

All this would seem to spell steam roller. The Indians are to have a modicum of provincial self-government so long as they are good children, but the instant they become naughty the British control is clamped on tight. In other words, the Indians may do the work of government and furnish the money and keep the brakes and guns all ready for their masters to use if anybody gets obstreperous. A suspicious Indian might consider that purpose number 2 of the overriding powers would provide an opportunity to create troubled waters in which the government could fish.

The proposed Council of Greater India, in which the Indian states would have delegates sitting with those from British India, together with the invitation to the states to join Federal India some day when they feel like it, is coupled with this statement: "The necessary conditions for bringing a fully federated constitution into being are not yet present. The provinces must first become political entities." To an Indian this device might look like an excuse for delaying self-government for another century.

At first glance it might seem that Mohammedans would be pleased because the new proposals would, for purposes of representation in the central legislature, create eleven provinces instead of the existing nine, and in five of these eleven—Punjab, Bengal, Sind, Northwest Frontier Province, and Baluchistan—there would be a strong Mohammedan majority. But on closer examination we find that owing to the method of choice of representatives, the proportion of Mohammedan representatives in the central legislature to those of other communities would not be increased over what it now is—about 30 per cent. That is the way the commission estimates it, anyhow. Also, the proposed reforms in the provincial legislatures would not increase Mohammedan power there except in the proposed new province of Sind. In the provinces also they hold about 30 per cent of the seats. In the population of British India the Mohammedans number 59,500,000 and the Hindus 163,000,000. This means that Mohammedans are a little over one-quarter of the population. But the scheme would probably supply more administrative posts for Mohammedans and might yield them more legislative power also. So as a piece of gerrymandering this may please them.

Landowners are deprived of their special seats in provincial legislatures, but it is provided that if in the elections they do not secure as large a proportional representation as they have at present, the governor may allow them enough more seats to preserve their quota intact. This may anger some of the landowners, but it will surely make them very cautious never to displease the governors. Thus does Britain propose to cement her power.

Quite naturally, all sections of Indian opinion, with one exception so far as the first cables show, are strongly opposed to the report. Such influential Mohammedans as Mr. Jinnah and Zufar Ullah Khan; influential liberals, moderates, and business men such as Sir Phiroze Sethna, president of the Western Liberal Federation, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, president of the National Liberal Federation, Sir Ramaswami Iyer, Pandit Malaviya, Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, who has been one of Gandhi's strongest opponents, Mr. C. Y. Chintami, Mr. Mody, and Mr. Lalje—all condemn it. Even Mohammed Ali cannot praise it, but now merely says he pins all faith on the Round Table Conference. Several moderates have similar hope. Nationalist leaders like Motilal Nehru and V. J. Patel disregard it as only what they expected. They say it merely vindicates the prior boycott of the Simon Commission. The only voice of approval is Shaukat Ali, a Mohammedan.

Before considering the question of what may happen next, let us discuss another feature of the report. On page 408 of Volume I the commissioners write:

> We should say without hesitation that with all its variations of expression and intensity the political sentiment which is most widespread among all educated Indians is the expression of a demand for equality with Europeans and a resentment against any suspicion of differential treatment. . . . It is a great deal more than a personal feeling; it is a claim of all the East for due recognition of status.

They add that Indians in government posts, members of minority communities, and moderates "all alike are in sympathy with the demand for equal status with the European and proclaim their belief in self-determination for India." They say in the conclusion of the report: "We hope . . . that our Indian fellow-subjects . . . will find that what we have put forward has been written in a spirit of genuine sympathy." Yet the commissioners refuse to give the Indians self-government, never mention dominion status, and say, "We cannot do more." Again on page 12 of Volume II the commission speaks thus of nationalism:

> Whatever may be its shortcomings and however distasteful some of its manifestations, it appears to be the one force in Indian society today that may perhaps contain within itself the power to overcome the deep and dangerous cleavages that threaten its peace. . . . Indian nationalism is a phenomenon which cannot be disregarded by the rulers either of British India or of the Indian states.

Yet they allot to Gandhi and non-cooperation only four pages out of a total of 725, and in their twelve-page discussion of Indian political history since 1920 they give small notice to the Swarajists. And in the conclusion they say:

> In writing this report we have made no allusion to the events of the last few months in India. In fact, the whole of our principal recommendations were arrived at and unanimously agreed upon before these events occurred. We have not altered a line of our report on that account, for it is necessary to look beyond particular incidents and take a longer view.

Further they add this flourish of pride:

> No one of either race ought to be so foolish as to deny the greatness of the contribution which Britain has made to Indian progress. It is not racial prejudice, nor imperialistic ambition, nor commercial interest that makes us say so plainly. It is a tremendous achievement to have brought to the Indian subcontinent and to have applied in practice the conceptions of impartial justice, of the rule of law, of respect for equal civic rights without reference to class or creed, and of a disinterested and incorruptible civil service. . . . In his heart, even the bitterest critic of British administration in India knows that India has owed these things mainly to Britain.

Leaving aside for the moment the contrast between these British phrases and the recent events in India, and the undoubted effect of both on Indians, what is the meaning of all these contradictions between words and deeds in the document itself and why this apparent tactlessness? The members of the commission are not fools nor are they inexperienced in politics.

It seems probable to me that the commission, after due consultation with those now or previously in control in India, is convinced that there is not yet enough unity and power among the groups and parties of India to enable them stubbornly and successfully to oppose British power. This idea peeps out on page 12 of Volume II, which reads as follows: "Sectional interests—racial, religious, caste, or provincial—still tend to absorb the energies and devotions of the majority of Indians, and there are too few signs yet of a willingness to surrender such claims to the common good." This idea is confirmed by the interview which Mr. Benn, Secretary of State for India, gave to the United Press correspondent on June 20. Among other things he is reported to have said: "So far from being homogeneous, the population is sharply divided into religions and castes." This idea is further confirmed by reading the articles on the Indian situation in the March and June numbers of the British quarterly the Round Table, and the article entitled The Present Situation in India, by J. Coatman, recently Director of the Department of Public Information in the Government of India, published in the June number of The Nineteenth Century and After.

Upon this assumption the commission seems, in effect, to be saying on the one hand to England: We do not intend to surrender our control over India, but rather to readjust matters so as to handle future disturbances more effectively. We must try not to outrage world opinion by our manner. The present outburst may give us some rough sailing for a year or so but it will wear itself out as it did in 1920-21. Don't be too much worried. Remember our past achievements. The Empire will weather the storm.

To the Indians, the report may be said to imply: We don't disregard your nationalism but we believe we can defeat it, and we are determined to do so. The British are your masters and superiors. Here is what you can have and in fact what you will get. If dominion status is your goal, it is only a goal. You are in a rage now but after you feel the mailed fist a little longer you will subside and accept this. Perhaps you may get more some day, but not until you are so drilled in Western ways that we can trust you to do our will always.

Such an attitude is not surprising. The effective life of the British Empire is at stake. We need not brandish adjectives over this attitude, but we should understand its consequences. It must be admitted that up to last March there were some reasons for Englishmen to think that they could carry out their plan. But since then the ground has been steadily slipping from under them. Indian liberals and moderates have weakened their support to the British very markedly, and the Mohammedan rank and file, especially in Bombay, Sind, the Punjab, and Northwest Frontier Province, are now largely pro-Gandhi. Several sections of the non-Brahman party have switched to Gandhi. The group in British India upon whom the government seems now to be counting for support is the large landowners. I judge that their attitude is that, regardless of forms of government, if the existing "law and order" can be preserved, their incomes will be safe. Therefore they and certain politicians who represent them are still willing to go and talk at a Round Table Conference in London. It is quite possible, however, that some of the landowners may melt and join Gandhi. There have been several indications that the government will soon impose martial law over several of the provinces, probably in order to try to collect its land revenue. But that may prove dangerous to the morale of the troops and police.

In regard to the proposed Round Table Conference, it looks as if the government believes that its show of firmness will compel Indian liberals and moderates to come to London. But Gandhi's strength has now grown so great that by October 20 I think many of the liberals and moderates who might still like a conference will be afraid to go to London lest they seem traitors to India. They are not wholly hard-boiled. Refusal to pay taxes will increase British harshness, resulting in more accessions to Gandhi from all quarters. Furthermore, it is doubtful whether the present pro-British Mohammedan leaders will be able to carry a majority of their rank and file with them. Practically nobody would be left for a conference but princes who cannot speak for British India, puppets, and some landlords able to speak for no one but themselves. They might agree to anything in London, but perhaps they could not put it into effect when they returned to India.

When, on March 26, 1930, the Prime Minister wrote to the Viceroy proposing the Round Table Conference in London on October 20, he said:

> Those who will speak for British India should fairly represent the different parties and interests concerned. His Majesty's Government will welcome your advice as to the best method of achieving this end after such consultation as you may think necessary.

The Viceroy replied on April 17 as follows:

> It is important that the representation of India in the conference should be fairly distributed among the sections of those who desire and have a title to be heard, and after examining several alternative methods and discussing the matter freely with men of widely differing opinions, I have found the predominant view to be that a fair distribution of representation cannot be assured by any process except that of invitation, in consultation, where possible, with the interests concerned. After careful reflection, I am disposed to reach the same conclusion.

It is true that Mr. Benn, in his interview of June 20 above referred to, is reported to have said, "The next stage in the pursuit of British policy will be the holding of a conference to which all sections of opinion in British India and the Indian states are to be invited." Mr. Benn may wish to have all sections of Indian opinion invited, but the Viceroy prefers to pick and choose. Probably "the man on the spot," i. e., the Viceroy, will have his way.

During the next few months comes the real test: Gandhi and the Indian Congress versus the British Empire. We of the West have yet to learn the tremendous power of Mahatma Gandhi's method. We must remember that Gandhi's idea is working on minds steeped in ideas of nonviolence for the past 2,500 years. And Gandhi's own concepts have permeated all classes.

The Press Today

VIII. Montana and "the Company"*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE great Commonwealth of Montana is a dual entity. There is the State, supposedly a free and independent part of the Union, and there is "the Company," otherwise the Anaconda Copper Mining Company. It is not always easy to differentiate between the two, for sometimes what appears to be the State is the Company and sometimes the Company seems to be the State. Certainly the influence of the Company runs all through the State of Montana, penetrating every aspect of its business, social, and political life. It has long since outgrown the State of Montana; that was too small a field for its activity. It has now stretched its tentacles across the continent as far as Connecticut, where it has recently acquired some of the largest brass companies in that brass-bound State. Nor has it confined itself purely to manufacturing or mining or controlling directly or indirectly the water powers and other resources. It has annexed a very considerable portion of the daily and weekly press of Montana. Why not? When you are really something bigger than the State itself why shouldn't you control the organs of public opinion? The people ought to get the truth; who could give it to them better than those whom chance and nature and good business enterprise have made controllers of the destiny of the Commonwealth?

Conditions in the State of course made this control of its public opinion very easy. It has only about 600,000 inhabitants, unless the new census should give it more. There was in 1920, when there were only 548,000 inhabitants, just one citizen to every 170.4 acres. Aside from the mining industry, the private possession of the Company, the State is chiefly interested in farming and ranching. The largest city is Butte, with between 40,000 and 50,000 people; in 1920 there were only twelve towns with more than 5,000 inhabitants. The capital, Helena, has not in many years increased its population of 12,000. All of which made it easy for the Company to bag the bulk of the daily papers and at least 30 out of 140 weeklies. Of these 140 weeklies 43, of which one is distributed without charge, list themselves as Republican, 11 as Democratic, 58 as independent, 11 as independent-Republican, and 5 as independent-Democratic. Five wise and happy editors declare that they are beyond and without politics; 3 papers are labor journals, 1 is interested only in petroleum, and 3 bleed solely for the farmer. If party and press designations really meant something in Montana, one might think that this was a wonderful showing for the freedom and independence of the American newspaper.

There are 16 dailies in the State, one of which also prints an evening edition. Here, too, we have Republican, Democratic, and independent journals. But what do we find? A marvelous example of the kindness, toleration, and true Americanism of the Company. Realizing as it does that this is a two-party government and that American citizens are entitled to hear both sides of every question, it generously runs both Republican and Democratic dailies. More than that, in the interest of efficiency and economy it arranged some years ago in the town of Missoula that the same man who wrote the Republican editorials in the morning should also write the Democratic editorials in the evening—its critics say with the shadow of the Company upon them both. Ostensibly, of the 16 dailies, 6 are Democratic, 4 are Republican, 5 independent-Republican, and 1 is independent. Those owned outright by the Company are the Montana Standard and the Daily Post of Butte; the Anaconda Standard of Anaconda; the Helena Independent and the historic Record-Herald published at Helena; the Missoulian and the Sentinel published at Missoula; the Billings Gazette, morning and evening editions; and the Livingston Enterprise. True, the Company has never officially admitted that it owned these journals, but the Montana Free Press, a deceased daily of which more anon, for weeks kept standing on its first page the names of these dailies with a statement that they were owned and published by the Company and asking the reason why. They naturally carry the names of separate companies and of their staffs upon their mastheads, but not one of them ever denied the allegation of the Montana Free Press, nor did the Company itself. Certainly some large resources stand behind this section of the press of Montana, for some of these dailies are run at a heavy loss. No one ventures to enter into competition with them, for people realize that if competition were started the rich owners of the rival company newspaper would stop at nothing to kill the competition.

Examine this list of company dailies and you will find that it covers the largest cities and towns with the exception of Great Falls, where the most influential daily in the State, the Tribune, is published and owned by two great friends of the Company. Here again we have the bi-partisan racket, for the Tribune owns the evening Leader and the Tribune is Democratic while the Leader is Republican. It is not fair to say that these papers are wholly subservient to the Company. There are times when they go counter to its wishes, but there is general agreement that in the main they are extremely well disposed to the supergovernment of the State, and to the Montana Power Company, which they oblige by doing much of its job-printing work, amounting to many thousands of dollars a year. At Bozeman, too, there is a Democratic daily which belongs to the owners of the Tribune and Leader. It, too, has the reputation of being very kind to the Company and understanding clearly the essential rightness of its intentions, the breadth of its vision, and the range of its patriotic service. This leaves of the entire daily group only four papers. Of these the Havre News now, as formerly, goes along with the Company; at Kalispell the Inter Lake leans to the Company on those rare occasions when it takes any particular political stand; at Lewistown the Democrat-News, a pretty good paper, is always ready to pinch-hit for the Company if a need arises. There remains but one really independent paper, the Miles

* This is the eighth of a series of articles on the American press. The ninth will appear in our issue of July 23.—Editor The Nation.

City Star, the property of Joseph Scanlan, but even here there are those who declare that during the past three or four years it has made no attacks upon the Company but has kept very quiet lest the Company come into this lively town of 7,000 people and start a rival daily. Long live the press of Montana! Who shall say that it does not do the will of its patrons? Who refuses to believe that it is free and untrammeled?

However that may be, the truth is that the daily press of Montana is in politics with a vengeance. It is doubtful if in any other State the press is itself so deeply involved in the great economic struggle which is at the bottom of our political life. The one test of a daily or a weekly, and for that matter of every politician in the State, is whether it or he belongs to the Company. There may be vital national issues; we may have exciting struggles in Washington over tariffs and foreign policies, whether the flag shall follow the dollar, and whether or not we shall get mixed up in an unsuccessful effort to purge Europe of militarism. In Montana such things soon fade out; they are ephemeral, of minor significance. You come back inevitably, whether you are a man or woman, white or Indian, to the battle against the Company and the Montana Power Company. It is like a bit of the Middle Ages over again, with the patient serfs trying every now and then to drive out the feudal barons that bestride the State and order the life of the State to their sweet will. Every man in political life is watched as if by hawks. I do not suppose there is one, certainly not Senator Wheeler or Senator Walsh or ex-Senator Joseph M. Dixon, now Assistant Secretary of the Interior, who has not at one time or another been charged with having surrendered to the Company. If anything you do not like takes place in Montana life, the Senators and Congressmen have sold out. If they vote in any way contrary to your thought and belief, the Company has "got them." I have had repeated assurances of late that both Senators have sold out to the Power Company in the matter of the Flathead power lease. I don't believe a word of it, but it is very hard indeed to get a reformer in the State of Montana not to suspect the worst in every act of every man in public life.

This is not surprising. From its very beginning the State has been the prey of the great mine-owners and the press has been their tool. Thus, the Butte Miner, now the Montana Standard, was formerly owned by the late Senator William A. Clark, the possessor of the greatest of the Montana fortunes. The Anaconda Standard was established by Marcus Daly, Clark's political and business rival in the Democratic Party. The Butte Post was established by former United States Senator Lee Mantle. The late Senator Thomas H. Carter, long the Republican boss of the State, was also deep in politics and hand in glove with the great corporations and their newspaper tools. It has been a long trail of this same sort of thing from the very beginning of statehood. Today our great and beneficent Company, the heir to these earlier pioneers, has developed a technique far beyond anything they thought of. Today the influence and power of the Company are not confined to its newspapers. Besides its mines and smelters it has lumber interests, owns great tracts of land and forests, wire mills, mercantile establishments, banks and their allied interests in all the leading cities, is identified utterly with its sister-company, the Montana Power Company, whose lines serve more than one hundred towns in the State, and is in friendly contact with the leading people in every place of importance. Served by a legion of political aides in every community, it is well-nigh invincible when it sets its heart on anything. It permeates the social life of the entire State and can accomplish great things merely by starting a whispering campaign against those whom it opposes.

None the less the Company has been successfully challenged a number of times. Senator Wheeler fought it to a finish in his first election, despite the fact that the whispering campaign made use of his well-known opposition to the war, cast upon him every possible slur, and tried to impugn the honesty and patriotism of his administration of his office of district attorney. Then there was Mr. Dixon, successively Congressman, Senator, and Governor. It is his term as Governor that the people of the State like best to recall, for in that office he rendered valuable service in initiating and putting through an increase of revenue for the State through the passage of the Metal Mines Act and the creation of taxes on oil, coal, cement, express and freight companies, gasoline, inheritance, and the like. When Mr. Dixon took office there had been a deficit of $1,200,000 a year. Under the old mining laws, if a mine showed a $100,000 profit for the year it paid a tax on $100,000. If it showed no profit it paid a tax of $1, which was actually the amount that the great Anaconda and Clark mines paid in the years 1921 and 1922, although their properties were valued at tens of millions of dollars. The unlucky farmers, the railroads, the banks, and the cattlemen paid on valuation, whether there were net proceeds or not. Mr. Dixon demanded the abolition of this fraud and the substitution of a 1 per cent gross mining tax on the amount of metal produced. The majority of the House was with him; the Company owned the Senate, and the proposals were defeated. Again and again the Governor campaigned over the State telling the story, finally initiating the Metal Mines Tax bill under the initiative law of the State. At the same time he was renominated for Governor. At the polls a tragic thing happened: the people voted the Metal Mines Tax by a heavy majority and in the same booths turned round and defeated its originator, for Governor, by a 12,000 hostile majority. During this struggle all the great companies save one fought the Governor tooth and nail and there were only two of the daily newspapers of the State that gave him aid—the Helena Record-Herald, then owned by two independent citizens, and the Miles City Star. It was against these great odds that he fought and won and lost.

Curiously enough, the gage was once thrown down to the Company in the journalistic field. What is more remarkable is that the effort to establish in the State one fearless and independent newspaper was made on September 17, 1928, by W. A. Clark, Jr., the son of the great copper Senator. Just what his motive was has never become wholly clear. There was a magnificent opportunity at that time, when the Helena Record-Herald had just been sold to the Company, for a brave and honest and outspoken paper, and it looked at first as if the Montana Free Press of Butte were going to be just what its name implied, for it was at once aggressively opposed to the Company's political program. It played quite a role in the Presidential election despite the fact that it was in its infancy. When the legislature met in January and February, 1929, the Free Press sent an able and courageous editor, James W. Scott, to Helena to put a searchlight upon what was going on and to demand more taxes upon the great companies. Steadily its circulation grew as the winter progressed, but so did its deficits. The Company used the familiar technique against it. It was whispered about that the Free Press was the whim of a multimillionaire who spent a lot of his time in Paris and would soon drop it; that advertisers would be foolish to patronize it. The Company had bossed Butte for decades; it was a $600,000,000 corporation and the Power Company a $100,000,000 one. Was it possible that they would let "Willie" Clark get away with this adventure? The paper was losing $30,000 a month; $400,000 had been poured in during the first five months. By the spring of 1929 the loss had been cut down to $22,000 a month. But by May Clark was through; the whispering campaign had been right; there were other things in life for him than running a losing newspaper—residence in Paris, for instance, and in Los Angeles, where he had founded in 1919 the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. Had he held on, had he known how to run a daily, had he had the right business management, had he stuck to the job, and had he really understood what it was all about, the paper would undoubtedly have succeeded. But he had a bear by the tail and did not at first know it. Yet he did know how to let go successfully; the story is that he sold his plant to the Company in a way to break nearly even. Curiously enough, he brought his orchestra from Los Angeles to Butte and had it play there to a crowded house—this before the paper had ceased. He received an ovation and did not realize that it was in large part because of the Free Press. Had he told that audience then and there that he was in the fight to stay and to win if it cost him millions, the Free Press, many people think, would have succeeded, for the golden opportunity was at hand. Only the fighting leader was lacking; Clark went back to Los Angeles and to Paris.

And so the Company continues to be the supergovernment of Montana, continues to rule the State. There are some excellent fighters in the weekly field—usually denounced as cranks and malcontents. There is Dan Whetstone, of the Cut Bank Pioneer Press; there is Sam W. Teagarden, of the Denton Recorder, who makes a great many people uncomfortable and mad because he takes no stock in either the Republican or Democratic Parties and refuses to bow down before the Company. There is a tremendously radical paper, the Producers' News of Plentywood, also very courageous and consistent in its attacks on the Company; and finally there is the Chinook Opinion of Harry Brooks. Brooks and Whetstone fought admirably for the tax reforms of Governor Dixon, and so did a few other weeklies. But in this field, too, the Company knows what it is about. There is a company at Great Falls which prints "patent insides" for about eighty of the Montana weeklies. It is very good of its kind, carrying among other things first-class historical matter. But with it goes Company propaganda of a most insidious kind, able and effective in controlling public opinion. Even the independents like this service because it is so well done.

Meanwhile the Company goes ahead. Its newspapers continue to boost all their friends and ignore their enemies, and they are silent about all the really vital issues. The good plain common people are plucked, and plucked, and plucked. What chance is there for the proposed workmen's-compensation act? What chance that the gasoline overcharge of at least $5,000,000 a year will be ended in the interest of the motorist? What chance is there that the Company will be —but who can name the day of the revolution to give back to the American people the things that are theirs and to destroy the supergovernment not only in Montana, but in all of the Commonwealths?

[I have learned from two sources that a reference of mine in my article on the United Press to the unskilled men sometimes used by it in its foreign offices has been coupled with the succeeding quotation of an unworthy dispatch sent from the Berlin office. There was not the slightest intention on my part to reflect on the able men in the United Press Berlin office, save to point out that even from this source we get dispatches that should never burden the wires.—O. G. V.]

In the Driftway

THE Drifter stopped relating his dreams when Mr. Freud became so insulting a few years ago. But now that the claims of the Freudians, like the styles in women's clothes, have become more modest, the Drifter has emerged once more from his shell, trailing his dreams behind him. And apparently telling one's dreams improves their quality, just as mowing one's lawn encourages a finer growth of grass. At any rate, the Drifter has lately been vouchsafed a dream that has proved a great social success.

* * * * *

THE scene of this dream was Westchester County, but it was not the Westchester of today. There were no houses; there were no roads. It was densely wooded and wild except that it was nicely trimmed underfoot. The Drifter remembers thinking at the time that it was rather strange to find this parklike floor in what was evidently a primeval forest. Threading the woods were many neat paths, some of them very narrow, others wide enough to accommodate four men abreast. It was on one of these wide paths that the Drifter discovered himself at dusk, walking briskly in a distinctly military way, bound on some very important mission military in character and requiring great speed.

* * * * *

THE Drifter had pursued his brisk way along the wide path for some time, when suddenly the path turned sharply to the right, proceeded in the new direction for perhaps ten feet, and then turned as sharply to the left again, continuing in the original direction. It must be remembered that the Drifter was in a great hurry. It was quite natural, therefore, that he should have cut the corner and struck off across the grass to regain his way. But just as he reached the path again he was brought up short by a crisp voice from the rear commanding him to halt. He halted, about-faced, and returned the salute of an archaic soldier standing before him. "The General would like to see you," said the aide de camp. Until that moment the Drifter had not even noticed the General, but now he observed that there was someone in an armchair not far from the jog in the path. As the Drifter approached the presence of the General, following the aide de camp, he perceived that the armchair was very ornate, but such is the nature of dreams that it struck him as only mildly strange to come upon a general sitting in a high-backed, carved armchair in the middle of Westchester County at dusk with not a regiment in sight. He was hardly more surprised to find that the gentleman in the chair was General George Washington, looking like a composite of all the portraits the Drifter had ever seen of the Father of his Country.

* * * * *

THE Drifter came to a quick and stiff salute. The General seemed tired and looked at him with sad resigned eyes. That winter at Valley Forge, the recalcitrance of the Continental Congress, and the difficulties of inducing some of the home-loving ancestors of the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution to walk more than a mile to meet the enemy—all these had left their mark. In quiet, kindly tones he asked the Drifter what he was doing and where he was going. When the questioning was over, he fell silent for a moment. The forest was very still and the dusk had turned to darkness. The Drifter waited nervously. Finally, with a sigh, the General spoke. "Son," he said, shaking his head in gentle reproof, "I have been fighting over this ground for forty years now, and I have never yet had occasion to walk on the grass."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Why Senator Simmons Lost

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When you ascribe the defeat of Senator Simmons in North Carolina solely to party regularity you are as myopic as when, in the same issue, you predict Ambassador Morrow's defeat. Simmons could not have been beaten but for the waning importance of the issues on which he was able to carry his State against Smith in 1928: namely, race, rum, and religion. The successor of Simmons in the Senate will be Josiah William Bailey, a broad-minded man and a brilliant orator, who was a Smith leader in 1928. The Presidential campaign of two years ago was fought all over again this May and June—the big issue being whether it was patriotic or treasonable to have resisted "control of the Democratic Party by Tammany, Smith, and Raskob in the interests of the Pope and the rum power."

Bailey, as well as Simmons, was charged with irregularity. He was attacked for having once supported a Republican, for having defended independent voting, for having been appointed to office by a Republican legislature, for having predicted the failure of national prohibition and urged home rule or local option in its stead, and for having opposed Negro disfranchisement and "Jim Crow" legislation. The tom-toms were beaten vigorously, and the prohibition question secured many women's votes for Simmons, but the younger generation refused to see any perils in Bailey liberalism. New Jersey and North Carolina have both recorded victories for tolerance.

I would not presume to question your conclusion but for my intimate personal contact with conditions in Carolina, my native State, both in the 1928 campaign and in the recent one there. Your discernment is usually admirable.

BENJAMIN BOISSEAU BOBBITT

Long Branch, N. J., June 19

An Important Neglected Event

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On February 9 of this year presidential elections took place in Colombia. There never was such a tremendous landslide in the political life of this country. A party which came to power as the result of war and treason had controlled the government for all of forty-five years. Rapacity, meanness, incompetence were the most visible qualities of their representative men. Submission to Rome was consecrated by a treaty. The Catholic clergy dominated the country all through those forty-five years by means of the school, the lyceum, and the pulpit, where they ruled supreme.

Mournful prophets of the party in power and the clear minds of the Liberal Party began to foresee an imminent change. The Conservatives smiled and went on exploiting the credulity and ignorance of the people—ignorance, of course, which they carefully maintained: the percentage of illiteracy amounts to something like 35 or 40 per cent.

The Conservatives put up two candidates. Half a century of immoderate rule had made a split in the ruling party. The Liberals concentrated on a single personality. The Liberal candidate won the election. This may or may not mean a substantial change in the methods of administration and in the progress of the ruling machine, but at any rate it is a sudden and unexpected change.

The Nation, a paper that seems to have always had a sympathetic eye on South American politics, has not dedicated a line of comment to these happenings. I wonder what the reason for this silence might be. The landslide is comparable to the one that took place in England in 1906 or in the United States when Cleveland was elected. It means for Colombia more than a political change. It goes to show that there are several South American republics where democracy has a meaning and can influence political life.

Besides, Colombia means something geographically. We Colombians are 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 people scattered over a territory of more than 400,000 square miles. Our struggles, both cruentous and bloodless, for liberty have been numerous and persistent. We are in the center of world traffic with coasts on both oceans. Why, therefore, has The Nation, so interested in things South American, ignored our existence in a most significant moment of our life?

Bogota, May 13 B. SANÍN CANO

"Improvement or Explosion"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish I knew who the J. G. Curtis is who wrote the article on Big-Business Brains in The Nation for June 11. It seems to me that he has gone right to the core of the matter. His idea may be parallel, though not identical, with that of the Socialists generally, namely, that the trusts and monopolies will gradually get all business in their hands and have it in first-class shape against the time when conditions become so very bad that the government will have to take over all industry and manage it in the interests of the people.

Certainly, the gross and constantly increasing injustice of our industrial system cannot continue forever. I hope it may be righted by evolution rather than revolution. There is always such a tremendous loss in reforms brought about by revolution. But when the enormous rewards that come to those engaged in industry are divided so inequitably that the great mass of the producers get little better than starvation wages and go a good share of the time without those wages through unemployment, while a few at the top, who in many cases contribute nothing whatever to production, receive the bulk of what is produced, there must be either an improvement or an explosion.

Long Beach, Cal., June 16 F. Darwin Smith

The Morrow Victory

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of June 11, under the caption Prohibition Flares Up, you say in part:

> The wet split in New Jersey probably means the defeat of Dwight Morrow in the primary, and the country will lose the services in the Senate of one who really shows some desire to lead and the courage to take a position, even if that position is no more practical than most of those taken by the other side [my italics].

Well, the New Jersey primary is over, and in view of the returns your conjecture seems a trifle ridiculous.

I wonder why a periodical like The Nation, which I have read with pleasure, profit, and enthusiasm for five years or so, has not uttered one word of protest against sending to the United States Senate a man who comes from one of the most reactionary groups in America.

Why strive for converts to government ownership (or to increase the circulation of The Nation for that matter) when an associate of the House of Morgan has the mantle of Abraham Lincoln placed on his shoulders by the wet and Wall Street-controlled press of New York City?

While the good citizens of New Jersey (those that voted for Morrow) are standing with eyes transfixed and arms extended for the countless glasses of imaginary lager promised them, the monopolies, particularly the power trust, will be licking the platter clean.

Oradell, N. J., June 18 Henry T. Bellew

Health Insurance in Austria

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The letter from Vienna written by Dr. Ernst Kulka about health insurance in Austria in your issue of May 14 was very interesting and instructive. The question of health and old-age insurance must sooner or later come to the front in the United States, and it is most appropriate to inform your readers concerning such insurances in other countries; how they are managed and how they work in a practical way. I hope you will continue with similar articles from Germany and the Scandinavian countries.

Pasadena, Cal., May 18 A. H. Bornfell

To California Liberals

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Members of the League for Independent Political Action residing in Southern California and others in this district interested in the project to create a new political alignment in harmony with the realities of American life are invited to communicate with me at 538 Bradbury Building, 304 Broadway, Los Angeles, California. A branch of the league is being organized with headquarters here.

Los Angeles, June 7 Oscar L. Triggs

READ INDIA'S SIDE!

THE SIMON REPORT ANSWERED!

At last the world is given the Simon Commission's Report on India. It presents officially Great Britain's side of the Indian situation. What is to be said on the other side? The Report is answered, answered thoroughly—every important point it makes in support of Great Britain's continued domination of India is fully considered and replied to in the light of overwhelming facts.

INDIA IN BONDAGE

By Dr. J. T. Sunderland

This book is strongly endorsed by Mahatma Gandhi, Rabindranath Tagore, C. F. Andrews, Mrs. Annie Besant, the Presidents of the Indian National Congress, and practically all India, as true, just and fair.

"A Monumental Work—

Its publication at this critical period in Indian affairs is fortunate," says the New York Telegram.

To understand what is now going on in India, every well-informed person must read INDIA IN BONDAGE—The Book of the Hour!

Send for it NOW—order on coupon below

To your Bookseller, or, N
LEWIS COPELAND COMPANY,
119 West 57th St., New York, N. Y.

Send me at once . . . copies of "INDIA IN BONDAGE," by Dr. J. T. Sunderland, 556 pages, illustrated, handsomely bound, at $4.00 per copy, postage prepaid.

☐Check enclosed ☐Send C. O. D.

Name .....

Address .....

City .....State .....

Books and Films

Hermit by the Dead Sea

By SONIA RUTHÈLE NOVÁK

Safe in the grotto of my reasoning,
I hear the rain. But I am dull and cold
As all become on Dead Sea fruit. The mold
Of peace has formed upon my hem. No sting
From salt unrest can reach me here. No fling
Of spume can splash me with its yeast. No bold
Or wind-spawned danger dares approach. No fold
Of canvas need fill out its width to sing.

For wild and weird as this fierce will of rain
Comes down, its slanting spears of appetite
Beat futile rhythms to assail my brain!
My cumbrous feet shall never more take flight
From them; nor shall my mummied heart sustain
New piercing from their scar-remembered might.

The Negro in America

The Negro in American Civilization. By Charles S. Johnson. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

OF all the problems which face America none has been discussed at more length, with greater heat, and with less exact information than the race problem. Every intelligent American knows that Negroes suffer from lynching, disfranchisement, Jim Crow cars, unequal apportionment of school funds, grossly unfair economic opportunity, segregation, and contumely. Few Americans, however, know exactly why these things occur or what can be done about removing them from American life.

Realization of this situation led to the formation in 1926, by sixteen national organizations interested wholly or partially in the race problem, of a central executive committee to gather together all available information and to ascertain just what additional data needed to be gathered. A research committee was appointed having as members some of the outstanding authorities of the country. Of that committee Charles S. Johnson, of Fisk University, formerly editor of Opportunity: A Journal of Negro Life, served as secretary. To him and to Mary Van Kleeck of the Russell Sage Foundation, who served as chairman, is due much of the credit for the success of the National Interracial Conference, held at Washington in December, 1928.

"The Negro in American Civilization" is the result of that conference. It covers in its 522 pages practically every aspect of the problem of relations between white and colored people in the United States. The Negro's problem as a workingman, the attitudes of employers toward Negro labor, the Negro in agriculture, the Negro's health, with especial emphasis on causes of Negro mortality and morbidity, education, home ownership, the protection or lack of protection of the Negro by the law, and allied aspects of life for eleven million American Negroes are treated in great detail. For some reason, however, two important aspects of race relations are omitted—the influence of the press, both white and Negro, on race relations, and the responsibility of the church in respect to race prejudice.

The second half of the book contains papers written for the Washington conference by such authorities as W. E. B. Du Bois; Herbert Adolphus Miller, of Ohio State University; Thorsten Sellin, of the University of Pennsylvania; Louis I. Dublin, of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company; and Niles Carpenter, of the University of Buffalo.

The volume is almost wholly a factual presentation, and the critical attitude is largely missing. This is to be regretted, as Professor Johnson's calm and scientific approach to the race problem would give especial value to more pointed indications of what is needed to help solve the problems presented. For example, the facts regarding lynching are set forth at considerable length, but one does not learn what lies back of the lynching evil, nor does one have much guidance toward possible elimination of this terrible pastime. In brief, there is no linking up of the economic problems of the Negro, of exploitation North and South, of labor-union discrimination against the Negro, and of the other economic factors largely responsible for lynchings in the United States.

The book is carefully done and contains an immense amount of statistical material. Factual errors creep in so rarely that they stand out all the more, as in the statement "The Mayor and Mr. Clarence Darrow were retained by the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People" to defend Negroes charged, in Detroit in 1925, with having killed a member of a mob which attacked the home of a Negro physician. It is obvious that a mayor could not have been employed as defense counsel in a case of this sort, and a little more careful inquiry would have revealed that the Civil Liberties Union did not participate in the defense. Such errors, however, are, fortunately, few. The work is a carefully documented, moderate statement of facts. Sober consideration of the material presented can do much toward bringing thought on the race question out of the realm of hysteria and into "the light of social research." No person who is interested in this grave question or who has a regard for the good name and well-being of America can afford to neglect reading this book.

WALTER WHITE

With Scott at the South Pole

The Worst Journey in the World: Antarctic, 1910-1913. By Apsley Cherry-Garrard. The Dial Press. $5.

IT would be impertinent for anyone I know to praise the bravery of this book, as it would be ridiculous for him to attempt even to suggest the richness of its content. I shall do neither, though the temptation is great. I shall simply say that it is the first American edition of a work which eight years ago gave the English public a more or less complete account of Scott's last expedition to the South Pole; and that it is one of the most interesting books I ever have read or expect to read.

Mr. Cherry-Garrard, who was a member of the expedition and an eyewitness of much that he tells, believes he is not an effective writer. He had to call in Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Shaw for advice and assistance. That would help, but it is plain to me that as good a book as this could never have been written with the aid of other persons. An author who needs help badly is seldom worthy of the help; the result will be patchwork. Whereas Mr. Cherry-Garrard, maintaining always a certain detachment from the terrible events he describes after a silence of nine years, a certain dry, cold humor, a certain sincere yet bitter eloquence, has got through a very long book with no failure, so far as I can see, to do its subject justice. Mr. Shaw himself has paid his friend the proper tribute, saying:

> The most fascinating books in the world are those which record, at first hand, the extremities that humanity can endure in extraordinary and appalling experiences under the strangest circumstances. Such books are very rare, not only because such experiences are rare, but because the accident of their occurring to anyone with the still rarer literary talent needed for a vivid description of them is almost a mathematical impossibility. It was perhaps the only real stroke of luck in Scott's ill-fated expedition that Cherry-Garrard, the one survivor of the winter journey, happened to be able to describe it so effectively.

The winter journey of which Mr. Shaw speaks was only one of many journeys undertaken by members of the expedition, and the story of it occupies only one of nineteen chapters here; but I can believe that it was "the worst journey in the world in the interest of science," or at any rate the worst journey ever survived. Ten chapters, naturally, are devoted to the polar journey from which all of the depot parties returned but from which, as the world knows, Scott and his four companions—Wilson, Bowers, Oates, and Evans—did not return. That was bad enough, and the story of how three of their bodies were found in a tent is of course harrowing enough. Yet there lingers a unique horror about the other journey, undertaken the first winter by Wilson, Bowers, and Cherry-Garrard in order to secure some embryos of the emperor penguin—valuable, it appears, to science. The only rookery of this bird then known was > on the sea inside a little bay of the barrier edge at Cape Crozier. Chicks had been found in September, and Wilson reckoned that the eggs must be laid in the beginning of July. And so we started just after midwinter on the weirdest bird's-nesting expedition that has ever been or ever will be.

That is to say, the emperor penguin breeds in the depth of the polar night, warming its eggs as best it may by keeping its feet between them and the ice and by pressing a certain unfeathered portion of its body upon them from above. And that is to say, three men walked five weeks in darkness for a few of these eggs, in temperatures ranging regularly between 50 and 75 degrees below zero, across snow and ice and down crevasses; slept at "night," or pretended to one another that they slept, in a little tent, in frozen sleeping-bags that sometimes took hours to get into; pulled two sledges weighing together 757 pounds; lost their tent in a blizzard and found it again; existed for five weeks in misery that Mr. Cherry-Garrard admits without reserve; and got three eggs.

That was five weeks. The expedition lasted three years, and consequently Mr. Cherry-Garrard has told a thousand times more things than one could mention. I can only record my feeling of confidence that he has got practically everything in—the winters in the safety hut, the astonishing beauties of the sky, the amusing ways of seals and penguins, the unspeakable visitations of dysentery, scurvy, and chilblain, the persistent troubles with the ponies, the dogs, the mules, and the sledges, the thrill of discovery, the sense of disaster, the compensations of friendship.

Mostly, I gather, it was misery. It was heroism also, of a high degree. But I am interested in the title of the last chapter, which is Never Again. Mr. Cherry-Garrard is not one of those heroes who pretend altogether to relish the memory of what they did; and he is not the kind of man to say that other men should have his hardships. His last chapter—published eight years ago—expresses the hope that the next expedition will go to the pole with airplanes and in comparative comfort. I think he cannot be one of those today who complain that Byrd went south with too much equipment.

MARK VAN DOREN

Lives of Two Poets

Life of John Keats. By Albert Erlande. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning. By Louise Schulz Boas. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

HERE are two more literary biographies, dealing with the lives of two of the most interesting poets of the nineteenth century. Mr. Erlande's "Life of John Keats" (written in French and translated by Marion Robinson) is the better of the two both in style and in subject matter. With all the facts at his command, Mr. Erlande has given us a delightful narrative which should explain and endear Keats to many readers unacquainted with the usual more scholarly biographies. He acknowledges frankly that he has no new data, that he is using only the well-known sources plus the later work of Amy Lowell and the interpretation of Middleton Murry. His purpose is good fictional biography, and this he writes very well. If Mr. Erlande errs at all it is in taking rather too seriously Middleton Murry's psychoanalysis of Keats and therefore explaining many of the poet's actions as the result of his smallness of stature. No such simple inferiority complex can explain Keats. This "Life" is, however, a commendable piece of work.

Mrs. Boas's biography of Elizabeth Barrett Browning suffers somewhat from too much sentimentalizing over the invalid poetess and her rescue by the robust Browning. The romance is, of course, the main theme of the volume. Here, again, facts are cast into an interesting narrative, and the story, which is a very general favorite, is as good reading as most novels. If the style is less careful and illuminating than Mr. Erlande's, Mrs. Boas has nevertheless held the reader's interest.

Neither of these two biographies can be said to have the authority and scholarship, or the vivid method of presentation, of Ethel Colburn Mayne's brilliant studies of Lord Byron and of Lady Byron. Both tend a little too much toward simple story-telling rather than toward the imaginative and critical analysis of a poet's character and work.

EDA LOU WALTON

The Death of Humanity

Flood. By Robert Neumann. Covici-Friede. $3.

BOTH the theme and the background of "Flood" predetermine its staccato tone, its ugly photography, and its passionate fury. It is one of the most searing novels that have of late come out of post-war Germany; but it is well to remember with respect to books of this class, as "All Quiet on the Western Front" bears accusing witness, that the horror exists in the mind of the author as well as in the scene he is portraying. Remarque, like Dostoevski, gives us human pity and relief; Neumann yields us none; in him there lives nothing but the most hopeless bitterness and despair.

While the novel opens in the period that just preceded the war it deals chiefly with the reconstruction epoch, which was marked by the crash of the mark and the rise of the Schieber. The reiterated themes are impoverishment of the middle classes, general moral dissolution, unemployment, sex aberration, and starvation. Little more than an empty shell of the comfortable German bourgeois structure built up in the course of forty years was left. Within this shell the human maggots crawled, and Whirl was king.

"Flood" is a natural enough outgrowth of German expressionism, which, it had seemed but yesterday, was dead or dying. It shares with the expressionist poets and playwrights at least one admirable quality: it is honestly and passionately written. It is also class-conscious. While it does not explicitly state that the world will be saved by the peasant on the land, it nevertheless draws its types of wrecks, blackguards, and wastrels from urban society. The protagonists are not so much individuals as members of a certain class, helpless and doomed. The tenement they dwell in is a kind of vertical inferno, a silo of degraded ferment, a Gothic tower of greed, hysteria, and lust.

Samuel Klein, the Jewish Schieber whose financial genius and daring lifted him from the trade of shoepaste-peddler to a position of immense wealth and power within a few years; his curiously degenerate family; the lascivious and brutal Birekmeier; prostitutes and brothel-keepers, male and female; a group of spiritualists; a men's rooming-house—all combine to give an overwhelming picture of social and human disintegration which leaves the reader fatigued and discouraged. The book shows, as I have said, little restraint; and in this it resembles "Death of a Hero"; but unlike Mr. Aldington's war novel it lacks any kind of relief and the sharpening of story interest. It is quite futile to compare such books as "Flood" with Dostoevski, for the Russian novelist, as everybody knows, permitted a ray of human nobility and pity to illumine his darkest scenes: the spaces of the human soul are, for him, muddied but ultimately pure. "Flood" is a rather mechanical and soulless book. If it fails to shock us into a catharsis it is largely because the chiaroscuro of art is unfortunately absent.

PIERRE LOVING

When Nothing Seemed Impossible

The Dialogue on Miracles. By Caesarius of Heisterbach. Translated by H. von E. Scott and C. C. Swinton Bland. With an Introduction by G. G. Coulton. The Broadway Medieval Library. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Two volumes. $10.

THE publication of the "Chronicle of Jocelin of Brakelonde" in 1840 inspired Carlyle to write "The Ancient Monk," and no doubt many people still get their ideas of medieval monasticism through this Victorian medium. Jocelin's chronicle was translated some years ago but its picture of monastery life and thought is by no means complete. Persons interested in medieval asceticism should be grateful that Caesarius of Heisterbach is now available in English, so that close acquaintance with the past need not remain the monopoly of specialists. The spirit and temper of ordinary monastic life are more vividly set forth here than in Jocelin's narrative; and when we remember the significance of the ascetic ideal to the medieval mind, this opportunity to investigate easily the life and thought of the professional ascetics will be doubly welcomed by all students of the past.

Caesarius does not present his readers with stock traditions culled from the lives of the saints. He specializes in the current tales of his own time told to him by trustworthy persons. He shows us the kind of edifying events which apparently were going on all the time, report of which was eagerly handed about by the religious from one monastery to another. Many of these anecdotes still carry the echoes of contemporary events —of the Guelf-Hohenstaufen struggle, of the Crusades, of the Albigensian war, even of the Becket controversy—but it is indicative of the point of view that these great worldly happenings serve only as an accidental background for the manifestation of God's power over some obscure individual.

The modern psychologist or the person looking for varieties of religious experience will find in these volumes a very considerable mass of data; indeed, we may perhaps see here an opportunity to interpret in psychological detail some of the phenomena of medieval religion. There is an enormous number of visions; one of the twelve books even attempts to put them in their proper categories. The desire for revelations was evidently very strong, and it was one which might be gratified after fervent prayer. It is notable that visions with great similarity of motif seemed to come frequently to the same persons, often giving them the reputation for sanctity. The reader also finds himself suspecting that many of the visions of the dead were pious frauds intended to persuade a living person to do something which some churchman thought should be done. In one case recorded the sons preferred to leave their father in torment rather than to restore the property which he had gained unjustly.

Here, too, we glimpse something of the quality of the monkish mind. There is a kind of naive priggishness alleviated by signs of real spiritual aspiration. The fear of sin and the desire to be sinless are ever present. Yet even excess of zeal is a sin, while success in virtue begets vainglory. "It is a terrible thing," says the novice, "that God so severely punishes faults that in our judgment are so very slight." Devils abound in great numbers, often disguised as angels; their activities are a matter of great interest, and ability to see them is recognized as a gift from God. Some of them are rascals, but others are quite reliable. Can they beget children? Miracles are accepted as daily occurrences, only requiring proper interpretation to be edifying. There are interesting indications of the kind of questions which troubled the religious mind; for example, what does a soul look like? Finally, a continuous reading of these two volumes will leave an impression of the tedious monotony which must have been a phase of monastery life.

RICHARD A. NEWHALL

A Colorful First Novel

Pilgrim to the Abyss. By Axel Eggebrecht. Translated from the German by M. M. Bozman. Alfred H. King. $2.50.

IN this first novel a young German writer invades the no man's land that separates popular biography from the historical novel. The prototype of his Princess Olga is a Russian noblewoman who was at one time a well-known figure in the international social life of Europe and who is now living in obscurity in Soviet Russia. Herr Eggebrecht, however, has risen superior both to the Ludwig kind of biography and to the usual run of historical fiction. He has written a true novel, a powerful and dramatic story of human lives acted out before colorful, shifting backgrounds—the old Russia and the new Russia, the Revolution, and centers of cosmopolitan society scattered over the face of Europe.

In the Princess Olga Herr Eggebrecht has done the portrait of a woman who, for all her sufferings, her wide travels and many contacts, her wealth, experience, and station, never knew life, never quite understood. Her coolness of mind, her imperviousness, her acts of cruelty—all arise from ignorance, a profound ignorance of true emotional values. Her heart remains a blank. The early chapters which describe the repressed, prison-like childhood of this proud woman and those describing her marriage, which instead of effecting her release only added torture to imprisonment, lay a firm foundation for the character and career of the woman who finally escapes to become an international celebrity. Like Feuchtwanger's Jew Süss she understands only power. She is all woman; but a woman who has learned through bitterness to stifle her emotional nature until it remains locked deep within her, inaccessible. The Revolution catches her and strips her. She never gives up. An old women, she gets on her feet once more—unbeaten.

The novel is, however, much more than a character study. There are unforgettable scenes, scenes in which unbridled passions run their course. And there are many characters. Not all of these are successful: Nolken, the weakling; Dolichen, the schoolteacher-anarchist; Henrietta with her dreams of play-acting; some of the others—they seem dim, sketchy. But there are a few characters who live with extraordinary vividness: the cruel, imperious mother who hates her child; the bluff General Kubileff, a drunken, lecherous old man who dandles the child Olga to feel her little body, but who is kind to her and becomes therefore the first, almost the only love of her childhood; the half-mad husband who is wholly in the power of his stronger brother; that brother himself, the sadistic, the unspeakable Vladimir. And there are revolutionists, diplomats, royalties, internationalists; for Herr Eggebrecht is always mindful of his historic backgrounds.

In spite of its many superior qualities, "Pilgrim to the Abyss" has some grave faults. It could well have been made longer. Some of the incidents are so lightly sketched in that they seem pointless, and the end of the story is weakly executed. The author descends, after the manner of certain biographers, to catch up loose ends, disposing of them as speedily as possible. Perhaps he was not at all times sure whether he was writing biography or fiction. But a strong novel has resulted from his method, and Herr Eggebrecht will bear watching.

The diction in this English version and the splendid rhythms that carry along the more dramatic moments reveal a translator of exceptional qualifications.

FRED T. MARSH

More "New" History

The Coming of the White Man, 1492-1848 (A History of American Life, Volume I). By Herbert Ingram Priestley. The Macmillan Company. $4.

ALTHOUGH probably not designed as such, this book is in a way an answer to a certain challenge issued to the "new" history by its opponents. One of these last suggested not long ago that if the members of the new school would only write some of their product instead of spending so much effort in writing about it, all parties would be better pleased. In the "History of American Life," of which this volume is chronologically the first, the authors and editors are attempting to make available those parts of the "new" history which concern the United States. Professor Priestley's theme is the three distinctive, non-English civilizations, Spanish, French, and Dutch, which were established in North America during the early periods of colonization.

Admirers of Prescott and Parkman who may chance to read the book will probably be a good deal surprised at what the "new" historians are doing. The old heroes and their deeds are gone; history is brought down to earth; the commonplace is exalted; in fact, the very world itself seems turned upside down. For example, Cortez is barely mentioned, while the rousing tale of Spanish conquest finds no place whatever. Instead of wars, Indian uprisings, and the doings of the soldiers the author presents the story of the transit of Spanish civilization; the characters of the story are miners, farmers, missionaries, and here and there a public official. It is significant that the frontispiece of the volume is a portrait of neither conqueror nor explorer, but of one Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, a scholar—feminine at that!—of New Spain in the seventeenth century. Count Frontenac appears once, and then merely as an official who became restive under a too complete control by the clergy. In the space made available by the omission of the explorers and the warriors of New France appears the habitant, living in his unventilated house in the midst of dirt and bugs. Curiously enough Peter Stuyvesant is mentioned more frequently than are some of the former celebrities of New Spain and New France, but only because he had social as well as military and executive interests, not because the author permits himself to relapse into politics. In spite of the relatively numerous references to Stuyvesant, the reader will find more information as to how the Dutchmen in America built their houses, how they skated, played golf, and got drunk, than how they lost their highly valuable little colony. It may be, perhaps, just as important for this generation to know that the colonial Dutchman slept between two feather beds as it was for an earlier one to know the details of political history. "De gustibus non disputandum" is an old adage, and the woman had a perfect right to kiss her cow if she pleased.

Mr. Priestley's volume is an excellent illustration of the "new" history at its best; and also, because it is so well done, it serves to emphasize all the more clearly the weaknesses of this type of approach. The book contains an admirable account of Spanish, French, and Dutch life in North America; the material is clearly organized, well proportioned, and presented in the best of taste. The work is dignified and scholarly throughout. The analysis of Spanish culture in particular will be welcomed by every teacher of American history. Nowhere else in a single volume can one find such an array of information on the subject which the author has chosen. And yet, in spite of its excellence, the work seems incomplete, entirely apart from an unexplained omission of all reference to the German immigrants. The deeds and accomplishments of the warriors who are so unceremoniously cast into the discard were an essential part of this early American civilization in the sense that they made it possible. One may wish as hard as one pleases that European culture could have been planted here by more peaceable means than it was, but the wish is not fulfilled merely by ignoring the soldiers and their generals. Some facts are undeniable, and all kinds of facts went into the making of colonial society. To ignore one group of these is to distort the picture and commit the sin, grave among historians, of conveying an inaccurate impression.

RALPH VOLNEY HARLOW

An English Lawyer

For the Defense: The Life of Sir Edward Marshall Hall. By Edward Marjoribanks. The Macmillan Company. $5.

"FOR the Defense" is the life of Sir Edward Marshall Hall, one of the foremost English criminal lawyers during the past half-century. For the layman the book has all the fascination of a series of interesting detective stories told around a central figure of great charm and magnetism. For the lawyer it is, in addition, an interesting exposition of how law is practiced and how criminal trials are conducted in England, in striking contrast with our own system of criminal procedure.

Marshall Hall was not a great lawyer, but he was, evidently, a great personality. Throughout the book we have a picture of an ardent, dynamic man, impatient of the hampering rules and technicalities of trial procedure, swaying juries by his dramatic fervor, and winning cases in spite of apparent limitations as a lawyer.

In America we are accustomed to regard the English courts, and particularly the criminal courts, as examples of a dignity and decorum that are often lacking here. We look upon the English bar as exemplifying standards of conduct somewhat higher than our own. It comes as somewhat of a shock, therefore, to find Marshall Hall behaving repeatedly, and with apparent impunity, in a manner that would have brought down upon him in this country the severest judicial censure.

Lord Birkenhead, in an introduction, points out that Hall's behavior is not typical. It is strange, however, that it was tolerated at all. It is particularly astonishing to find that Hall could build a career resulting at last in knighthood upon practices that would mean inevitable ruin to an American attorney. In one of his earliest cases he managed to get a friend with whom he had played cricket on the jury. "There was a friend," he said in telling about this incident. "I knew he was a friend; and oblivious to all the other eleven occupants of that box (if indeed there were any others) I talked to that man for all I was worth for three-quarters of an hour. . . . But the result justified the means. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty." Mr. Marjoribanks's naive comment on this is: "But how few of us ever have the luck to see an old friend in the jury box."

Marshall Hall indulged in practices that would result in immediate disciplinary proceedings if attempted here. There was, for example, his habit of stating as facts his personal beliefs and opinions. In an insurance case in which the issue was whether the deceased, who had been shot, had died by suicide or accident, Hall, to save the expense of a pistol expert, offered to show how the revolver worked. He then "proceeded to explain to the jury that he was the greatest expert on revolvers in the country . . . and how, to his personal knowledge, a young officer had died as the result of an accident with this type of revolver in just such circumstances as in the case in question."

"If it hadn't been dear old Marshall," said Sir Douglas Hoag, his opponent, "I should never have forgiven such a thing." If dear old Marshall had tried that in New York Sir Douglas would have been on his way to the Grievance Committee of the Bar Association before the jury had brought in its verdict.

Perhaps it is unfair to Hall's memory to emphasize these professional aberrations. He was more than a mere court charlatan; he was an advocate of great zeal and force. But these instances that have been pointed out are told by his biographer rather casually and with a certain degree of admiration. They are of striking interest to American lawyers as illustrative of the standards of professional behavior, not necessarily lower than ours but certainly different, that seem to exist at the English bar.

Of even greater interest and significance is the respect that is paid to the successful criminal lawyers in England. In America the practice of criminal law has become déclassé. Self-righteous lawyers regard the criminal courts as a sort of moral pest-house, and look with contempt upon the practitioner who defends persons charged with crime. The criminal lawyer is regarded by many of his professional brethren as a sort of cross between a pickpocket and a bootlegger. Many of the evils in the administration of criminal law that are now engaging such zealous amateur attention may be attributed to this supercilious attitude toward the practice of criminal law. It is splendid to find in Great Britain this fine respect for an able advocate who did not regard the defense of unfortunates as something degrading.

There are a number of excellent stories in "For the Defense" that are worth while for their own sake. The Camden Town case, the Fahmy case, the Seddon case, and the celebrated George Joseph Smith bathtub case have given the book a deserved popularity in this age of interest in stories of crime. But it is as a portrait of a vivid, fearless legal knight-errant that the life of Marshall Hall deserves to be regarded as one of the most fascinating biographies of the past year.

NEWMAN LEVY

Books in Brief

Enfants Terribles. By Jean Cocteau. Translated by Samuel Putnam. Brewer and Warren. $2.50.

Paul and Elizabeth are brother and sister, orphans. Their life together is lived in a mad, fantastic play-world of their own. Utterly irresponsible and undisciplined, completely isolated except for the two friends whom they come to admit into their unearthly atmosphere and whom they dominate, they live quite outside reality. And because such an unregulated existence is intolerable on an earthly plane they are a doomed pair. Life and they can no longer either ignore each other or tolerate each other. Jean Cocteau, like Guy de Maupassant in his day, twangs a single string in each of his stories, seeking to achieve perfection within a limited space and with great economy of means. The wide difference between the two lies in the difference between their respective generations. Those who will most like this book are those who have traced the way, in their reading of a certain genre of French novels, from Flaubert to the present, and have delighted in observing the continued process of sloughing off flesh until the nerves alone, strung on the delicate skeleton, remain exposed. "Enfants Terribles" is peculiarly an exposure of nerves.

The Hound of Florence. By Felix Salten. Translated by Huntley Paterson. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

To attempt to review in a paragraph Felix Salten's delicate, mournful, and symbolic fantasy laid in the Florence of the waning Renaissance, to attempt to outline its slight story, to describe its characters, or to wax profound over its implications would be a most ungrateful task. One prefers merely to recommend it in its fine translation to all those who are lovers of the exquisite in books. By way of introduction it may be said that "The Hound of Florence" is not, like "Bambi," about animals. And it is fitting to quote the theme, taken from the writings of an ancient hermit: "If so be thou art poor on this earth, thou must be a dog for one half of thy life; then mayest thou spend the other half as a man among men."

The Thistles of the Baragan. By Panaït Istrati. Translated from the French by Jacques LeClercq. Vanguard Press. $2.50.

Panaït Istrati's fierce indictment of the Rumanian government for its mistreatment of the peasantry and its bloody repression of the revolution of 1907 is not a novel at all in the conventional sense. It is probably more nearly accurate than many so-called histories, and it is ostensibly innocent of any novelistic plot-weaving. But the reader will find it more difficult to abandon unfinished than any of the "sealed" mystery stories which a prominent American publisher is issuing. The enormous Baragan thistles, blown westward in millions by the pitiless winds from southern Russia, are followed by the starved, restless boys of the sterile East Danubian plains, who seek opportunity in the more favored country farther west. The boys of Panaït Istrati's story find only further suffering, tyranny, and ghastly bloodshed; but the author himself out-traveled the thistles and became the most cruelly absorbing writer now alive in France. Here, as always, Mr. LeClercq has made a fine, strong translation.

Seed of Liberty. The Story of the American Colonies. By E. Keble Chatterton. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

The most charitable thing to say about this volume is that it must have slipped past the publisher's editorial department when someone was nodding. The book deals with selected aspects of American colonial history, but it is far from being what the subtitle implies and as a survey of the causes of the Revolution it falls considerably short of the demands of modern historical scholarship. There is nothing new in the work, nothing which is not easily available and more accurately handled elsewhere. The author not only accepts but defends the John Smith-Pocahontas story. He shows also a predilection for time-honored stereotyped generalizations—Spain "never had the genius for governing"—or for equally bad ones of his own making. A smooth style is a priceless asset for a historian, but it is not a substitute for history, and the blurb on the jacket is no guaranty of quality in the text.

Survey of International Relations, 1928. Edited by Arnold J. Toynbee. Oxford University Press. $7.50.

The sixth volume in this, the most important series of international yearbooks, maintains the high standard of its predecessors. It opens with a detached history of the Kellogg pact and concludes with a summary of the events of 1927-28 in China; but the most striking section is that dealing with the Islamic world. Here Mr. Toynbee is peculiarly at home, and while the stories of the British negotiations with the Egyptians and with the Arabs of the Nejd occupy more pages, the general reader will be most impressed by the chapters on the Westernization of Islam—the separation of church and state, the sudden emergence of women from the veil and the retirement of males into frock coats and striped trousers, the abandonment of the fez, and the immensely significant adoption of the Latin alphabet in place of the Arabic script.

Twentieth-Century Poetry. Edited by John Drinkwater, Henry Seidel Canby, and William Rose Benét. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

A Junior Anthology of World Poetry. Edited by Mark Van Doren and Garibaldi M. Lapolla. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.

Mr. Drinkwater's section of "Twentieth-Century Poetry" is depressingly conventional. Almost all the familiar anthology pieces are present, and the notes are pleasantly chatty. Messrs. Canby and Benét have done better with their half of the volume, having excluded a few of the old favorites in order to make room for less familiar and more meritorious poems, and having taken the trouble to make their notes instructive and reasonably discriminating. The superiority of the American section, however, is perhaps as much due to the actual superiority of American to British verse in the twentieth century as to the superiority of the American editors. Mr. Lapolla has performed strange feats of excision upon Mark Van Doren's "Anthology of World Poetry" in order to make it suitable for young boys and girls. Perhaps he knew what he was doing, but the only clear reason for preferring the abridgment, either for children or for adults, is that it costs half as much as the original.

The Jade Mountain. A Chinese Anthology. Translated by Witter Bynner from the Texts of Kiang Kang-Hu. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

This volume of translations from Li Po, Tu Fu, Po Chü-Yi, and many other poets of the T'ang dynasty has been long expected—so long, indeed, that it comes with diminished effect. For in the meantime Arthur Waley has sent a number of brilliant volumes into the field, and Amy Lowell, collaborating with Florence Ayscough, has swept it with equal energy. Mr. Bynner's verse, however, based upon the spade-work of Dr. Kiang, is sensitive and highly interesting, and the volume as a whole takes its place quite properly alongside those just mentioned. Mr. Bynner's introduction is valuable among other things for the account it gives of his discovery of Chinese poetry and for its analysis of the perennial vigor which that poetry possesses.

From Centaur to Cross. Being the Hitherto Unpublished Letters of Maurice de Guérin. Edited by H. Bedford-Jones. Together with a New Translation of de Guérin's "The Centaur," with an Introduction and Notes by Gilbert Chinard. Covici-Friede. $3.

Stamp-collecting, like other hobbies, may lead in strange ways. To the curiosity of a collector is due this gathering of letters of Maurice de Guérin, translated by the owner, H. Bedford-Jones, with an introduction by Gilbert Chinard, who, first recognized their value. While little new knowledge of this young romantic, friend of Barbey d'Aurevilly, is here afforded, his words are themselves vivid and his relations with his sister form interesting psychological material. Guérin died at twenty-nine with—save for a few poems—but one finished work, "The Centaur." Although lacking the ironic tone of Laforgue's moralities, this sketch equally well recreates the atmosphere of Greek dryad days, and the somewhat stilted translation accentuates its chiseled style. Like Baudelaire and other pagans of the "diabolical" school, Guérin died with a cross on his lips. But in his letters he is thoroughly alive.

An Elizabethan Journal. Being a Record of Those Things Most Talked of During the Years 1519-1594. By G. B. Harrison. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $5.

From many authentic sources Mr. Harrison has patched up an imaginary journal such as, say, Edward Knowell might have kept during the years when Marlowe flourished and Shakespeare took his first steps in literature. The emphasis is by no means literary; politics, murder, religion, the weather, and the plague are always in evidence as well; and in general Mr. Harrison seems to succeed in his aim, which was to show what moved in the minds of Englishmen when Shakespeare became conscious of his world. The book is rewarding to both the student and the reader seeking entertainment.

Films

At the South Pole

SO thanks to Admiral Byrd and his companions we can now actually look at the South Pole. And what a desolate place it is! No enchanted castle hiding a sleeping beauty, no dragons, no monsters of any kind—only a wilderness of snow, bleak and dreary. I doubt that the place is interesting enough to attract the tourist even were trips there as cheap as they are to Paris. But that is the trouble with so many of these mysteries of the world. Stripped of their secrets they are so utterly unexciting.

This is not to say that Byrd's adventure lacked in excitement. There were perils enough and to spare, and the Antarctic blizzards were as much on their guard to balk the intrepid explorers as any dragons could have been. It was only by a long and careful study of their habits that Byrd succeeded in slipping through and reaching his goal. Even then he had to dash back as fast as he could to escape their fury. A glorious adventure! As tensely dramatic as any exploit of ancient heroes. To have preserved its thrill by means of an authentic record on the film would have been a service to humanity. "With Byrd at the South Pole" (Rialto) does not quite convey this thrill, although it tries to make up for the missing drama in its record of the last flight by a machine-gun rattle of spoken comment. But if the climax of the film is somewhat flat, there is a great deal that is exciting as well as amusing in the rest of it. One recalls the magnificent views of the barrier, the amazing scene of whales popping out of the water within a few feet of the

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □

THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS
The NEW GARRICK GAIETIES
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

"LYSISTRATA"
"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockridge, The Sun.
FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre W. of B'way, Eves. 8:30 Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:30

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street
Cooled by Refrigeration
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

"New York's Distinguished Intimate Cinemas"
THE PLAZA
58th Street East of Madison
SAT. to TUES., July 5-8
WARNER BAXTER in
"THE ARIZONA KID"
Wed. to Fri., July 9-11—
Al Jolson in "MAMMY"
LITTLE CARNEGIE
57th Street East of Seventh
SAT. to TUES., July 5 to 8
GEORGE BANCROFT in
"LADIES LOVE BRUTES"
Wed. to Fri., July 9-11—
Gary Cooper in "THE TEXAN"
Direction Leo Brecher

"EVOLUTION"
GRAPHIC FILM REVELATION—SIMPLE COMPLETE—INTELLIGENT ALSO
"DOCKS OF HAMBURG" UFA FILM
8th Street PLAYHOUSE STARTS
Jos. R. Fliesler Director
52 W. 8th St., SPRing 5095
JULY 5
LAST DAYS NOW—CHILDREN OF NEW DAY—LATEST SOVIET FILM

"MIGHTIEST WAR DRAMA EVER SEEN"
—N. Y. American.
"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"
A Universal Picture presented by Carl Laemmle
Directed by Lewis Milestone
"A notable achievement, sincere, earnest, vivid and graphic. Better than anything so far done."—Mordaunt Hall, N. Y. Times.
"Enormously compelling talking motion picture. As a show something to get definitely excited about! A very fine motion picture."—Howard Barnes, Herald Tribune.
CENTRAL THEATRE, B'dway and 47th Street
Twice Daily: 2:45—8:45.
3 times Sat. & Sun., 2:45—5:45—8:45

members of the expedition, the all-but-human penguins taking stock of the invaders, the amusing glimpses into the family life of seals, the wonderful dogs. The film records innumerable fine scenes of the little band of adventurers building their homes, fighting the blizzards, exploring, studying, constructing, indulging in the amenities of social life in the Antarctic, and all the time displaying the superb determination which eventually brought them to their goal. As a travel picture "With Byrd at the South Pole" is one of the best.

"The Big Pond," which preceded Byrd's picture at the same theater, is the third talkie featuring Maurice Chevalier and, it must be said, the least satisfying. Chevalier is not a character actor. His forte is his personal charm, and he is at his best in the breezy Parisian songs which he sings with a verve and a mischievous jollity that are irresistibly infectious. To make him sing in English is to take away at least half of his charm; to turn him into a drawing-room lover is to take away most of what is left. As Hollywood comedies go "The Big Pond" is entertaining enough, but it would have been a better comedy if it had something of the sprightly whimsicality that made "The Love Parade" so delightful a picture.

Even more heavy-footed in its fun is "Caught Short" (Capitol), in which the stalest jokes and situations are served up with much gusto by Marie Dressler and Polly Moran. In farcical comedy Miss Dressler is a very bright star indeed, even if her range of expression is limited to a few mannerisms which do service on all occasions. In straight comedy, particularly when shown in close-ups on the screen, this overacting strikes a harsh note that takes away from the humor of the situation by its forced emphasis of the obvious. There are a few occasions in "Caught Short" where Miss Dressler is not trying to be funny, and those are the true evidences of her talent. Polly Moran's acting is more in keeping with the spirit of the play.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

‡Fifty Million Frenchmen—Lyric—W. 42nd St.
‡Flying High—Apollo—W. 42nd St.
†Lost Sheep—Selwyn—42nd St., W. of B'dway.
†Lysistrata—44th St.—44th St., W. of Bway.
†Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47th St., W. of B'dway.
*The Last Mile—Sam H. Harris—42nd St., W. of B'dway.
‡The New Garrick Gaieties—Guild—52nd St., W. of B'dway.

FILMS

All Quiet on the Western Front—Central—47th St. and B'dway.
Evolution and Docks of Hamburg, Beg. Sat. July 5; Eighth St. Playhouse, 52 W. 8th St.
Journey's End—Gaiety—46th St. and B'dway.
Ladies Love Brutes, Beg. July 5; The Texan, Beg. July 9, Little Carnegie, 57th St. E. of Seventh Ave.
News Reel—Embassy—B'dway and 46th St.
The Arizona Kid, Beg. July 5; Mammy, Beg. July 9, The Plaza, 58th St. E. of Madison Ave.
The Big House—Astor—B'way and 45th St.
The Girl Said No and Flight, Beg. Sat. July 5; Paramount on Parade, Tues. July 8, to Sat. July 12, 5th Ave. Playhouse, 66 5th Ave.
Yoshi Vara, Beg. Fri. July 4; 55th St. Playhouse, E. of Seventh Ave.

EVENTS ABROAD

Bayreuth Festival Plays—Muck, Toscanini, Elmendorff, Siegfried Wagner, Conductors—July 22 to Aug. 21.
Oberammergau Passion Play—Munich—May through Sept.
World's Fair—Antwerp—Dorland, 205 E. 42nd St. for information.

*Drama. †Comedy. ‡Musical.

Mexico and the Harris Bill

By CARLETON BEALS

MEXICO promises to become the "morsel left half-cold on Caesar's plate." The new American good-will technique toward Latin America has been decidedly blunted by the Harris bill. Mexico is convinced that the passage of this bill by the Senate is a direct thrust, as a leading newspaper remarks, "a proof and revelation . . . of the opinion which the North American people hold of our irremediable inferiority." Whatever the final fate of the proposition to restrict Mexican immigration, Mr. Harris has nipped this season's crop of Ambassador Morrow's tree of friendship which he so carefully watered. The whole petroleum controversy did not excite the bitter comment that has now broken out in an ugly rash over the pages of the Mexican press. The Mexicans could quite understand our greed for petroleum; pride is cut deeper when you are told that you are not wanted in your neighbor's house.

El Nacional Revolucionario, the official daily organ of the National Revolutionary Party and hence of the government, says editorially in praising a labor-union proposal to boycott American goods:

> This Senatorial action is an insult, it is debasing, it is hostile to Mexico, it is an affront to every man who struggles, it is symptomatic of the spirit of aggression and humiliating disdain which should not be tolerated. . . . The Harris bill once and for all has stripped off the mask of these good-will visits, these sensational air flights and the like, these insubstantial diplomatic gallantries. . . . It is necessary to see clearly, without prismatic lenses, the spirit of aversion, of disdain, with which we are viewed by the United States.

The quick-witted Mexicans have hastened to suggest overt retaliation. Promptly agents of the Department of Interior raided the American school and seized all the textbooks, publishing excerpts which put Mexico in an unfavorable light by telling a few unpleasant partial truths.

A few more incidents such as these, and Morrow's well-watered tree may wither beyond recovery. Yet if too much acrimony does not grow out of these incidents, a little honest stock-taking all around might divest both good-will and ill-will of a deal of political camouflage and career-making. Unfortunately under our party system, dubbed "democracy," our foreign policies are frequently referable to domestic politics rather than to a statesman-like long-range vision. Except for part of the regime of Porfirio Díaz, our relations with Mexico since that country achieved its independence in 1821 have been unsatisfactory. Most American Presidents, whether Democratic or Republican, have been faced at some time or other with a "Mexican problem." This was true of Lincoln, of Harrison, of Taft, of Wilson, of Harding, of Coolidge, to mention but a few outstanding instances. It is likely to be true of Hoover. In the face of a national election, the Mexican question has been hurriedly patched up toward the end of each administration through a sudden volte-face of Washington or the sending down of a new friendly ambassador (Morrow was not the first). This has prevented any calm evolution of our Mexican relations. Almost as soon as this temporary last-minute patching had been done and our national election finished, the Mexicans —or our own interested citizens—promptly kicked the covers off again. In Hoover's case, thanks to Morrow, the Mexican pot has been slow to boil over, but it would flavor his doddering Administration with irony if after his good-will trip to Latin America and his effusive embracing of President Ortiz Rubio the end of his term were upset by new difficulties with Mexico. Add to these a possible recrudescence of acute trouble in Nicaragua, perhaps serious problems elsewhere in the Caribbean and in Cuba, and a revolution in Venezuela, where Gómez is tottering to his grave in the black shroud of petroleum concessions, and the good-will technique may have its seams seriously sprung.

In view of past diplomatic history, the ultimate test for Mr. Morrow's work is obviously its endurance. In any case he deserves full praise for edging us back from the brink of a warlike chasm. His truce in the religious war promises to mature into fairly enduring peace. He slowed up the land program, but justly, for the program was poorly conceived, badly executed, and already corrupted by political chicanery, while it was dislocating large blocks of the population without providing for them the proper productive bases. Papini declared: "True revolutions begin in the head, not in the barricades." In Mexico the head has never quite caught up with the barricades. It attests to Mr. Morrow's astuteness that he is the first figure in two decades to get a jump ahead of the Mexican barricades.

Undoubtedly when Obregón clutched the apple of military supplies from the United States government during the de la Huerta revolt in 1923 he was preparing to depart from the stormy Eden of nationalistic and revolutionary isolation. His acceptance of a loan of ten million pesos in the form of advance taxes from the Huasteca Petroleum Company, presumably in return for a promise to straighten out the contested Juan Felipe titles, was an engraved announcement of future nuptials with the American government and American capital. For a brief interlude Calles backfired, but reversed for Morrow and Lindbergh and Will Rogers; and in the revolt of March, 1929, American munitions were again utilized. The Portes Gil administration saw the rapid crystallization of the pro-American tendency, the crushing of existing labor and peasant organizations, and a decided concentration of federal power. The climax of glad-handing came with Ortiz Rubio's trip to Washington and his distinct promise to modify the agrarian policy. For two years this new accord was quickstepping to an increasing fanfare of good-will.

This good-will never got deep below the Mexican skin. Most Mexicans feared a joker up the American sleeve. Now they are convinced. And in Mexico the psychology of the weak versus the strong, the poor versus the rich cannot help but operate. Also, there is the long historic tradition of anti-Americanism, the unforgotten war of '47, the agitation against the Monroe Doctrine, the anti-foreign sentiment involved in the overthrow of pro-foreign Díaz, the bitterly anti-foreign labor movement, the anti-capitalist and the new nationalistic urge; these are deep-rooted things.

Mexicans stood the good-will strain as long as they could. Then, when Morrow left, a subtle reaction to his influence set in. There was the incident of the Laredo consulate. The press revived its former heckling of American imperialism, materialism, and greed. The epithets "Yankee," "Gringo," "blond beasts," "Colossus of the North" began to crop up like sore thumbs in the best newspapers. Once more the five-year-old campaign in the press about the horrible treatment of Mexicans in the United States blazed day after day. The students of the National University broke up a reception to their own guests, students of journalism from Oklahoma, with insulting shouts of "Imperialism!" Foreigners were harassed by repeated registrations. The "thirty-three," or arbitrary deportation of undesirable aliens, works as unceremoniously and cruelly as ever before, and the American school is raided for hostile textbooks.

This is all quite explicable and normal. The differences of a century with their deep racial and cultural roots, the more acrimonious differences of the past two decades—these cannot be set aside in two years. The two countries perhaps rushed into each other's arms a bit too enthusiastically. Good-will cannot be a gourd vine that shoots up quickly and gaudily and then withers; its growth should be a sturdy and slow one, capable of standing a few whirlwinds of nationalistic chauvinism from both sides. I hope that this is the sort of tree Mr. Morrow planted.

For behind the present Mexican regime, so desirous of currying our favor, is the whole impetus of a long revolutionary period, which cannot be dammed too suddenly or too widely deflected. Mexico is swinging into that twentieth-century heaven—normality—but not even the catchwords can be changed overnight. Mexico's sudden attempt to be good has resulted in a certain amount of psychological confusion among its leaders. Most of the bigger guns have come to the conclusion that roads, airlines, tourists, American capital are the only hope for a prompt reconstruction of the country. But it is a bit upsetting to find that American dollars are still a little skeptical and that American politicians can so casually concoct and accept a Harris bill. The Mexican officials who so suddenly determined to place their wares on the bargain counter must feel at least chagrined to find that there was not more of a financial rush.

Doubtless there are Mexican officials with Mr. Harris's mentality who will retaliate in various ways on Americans. It would be only human nature for Mexico to reply by an exclusion act directed specifically against Americans. Probably economic dependence upon us will prevent this logical but foolish step. If the Harris bill is defeated and if it is not followed by further irritating incidents it may have the good effect of clearing the atmosphere and bringing both countries to a sober realization of the economic forces at work. For we shall always have a "Mexican problem" and Mexico will always have an "American problem," and something more scientific than good-will is necessary to solve them.

On their side the Mexicans, regaining their sense of humor, will realize that this is just a new addition to the American Roman Wall to keep out the "barbarians," that it is directed against Mexico not so much because Mexico contains Mexicans as because that country is hard by and supplies the great bulk of foreign immigration, that Mexico is at present the only important gap in the wall through which the hordes swarm, that the Ku Klux Klan fears more Catholics, that labor fears for its jobs in a period of grave unemployment, that new Congressional elections are approaching and Mr. Harris needs fame to be reelected, and, finally, that Mr. Harris is Mr. Harris and the American Senate is the American Senate.

The Mexican will realize that his government has also set up its own little wall. It is almost impossible for any foreigner to come into the country who is proposing to do a job which a Mexican can do. Even important and necessary technicians have difficulty in entering. For all practical purposes this is a regulation specifically directed against Americans, for they are the only numerically important emigrants from the Western Hemisphere into Mexico. And, finally, for years the Mexicans have been complaining bitterly of the drastic, intolerable, and discriminatory way that Mexicans are said to be treated in the United States. Thus they should welcome a measure which will prevent the present Mexican population of nearly three million north of the Rio Grande from increasing and exposing itself to this alleged cruel exploitation.

As for ourselves, we should be ashamed of our weak intelligence in supporting such a clodhopper bill, just as we should have been ashamed of ourselves for not having put the Japanese on the quota basis. Could the few hundred Japanese who would have entered annually menaced our sacred and apparently powerful institutions? In the case of Mexico there were many possibilities. Why not, for instance, a quota system for all the New World based not on past emigration, but on the existing population of the various countries. Mr. Harris's head, it seems, has not caught up with his barricades. Surely, if we needed to close the gap in our Roman Wall there was a way to do it without affronting a country which, though weak, we have consistently for the past two years called our friend, and with which, because of geographic proximity if for no other reason, we should increasingly seek to live in harmony.

Contributors to This Issue

Richard B. Gregg, author of "The Economics of Khaddar" and "The Psychology and Strategy of Gandhi's Non-Violent Resistance," spent nearly four years in India.

Sonia Ruthèle Novák is a contributor of verse to various periodicals.

Walter White is assistant secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Mark Van Doren is editor of "An Autobiography of America."

Richard A. Newhall is professor of history at Williams College.

Ralph Volney Harlow is professor of history at Syracuse University.

Newman Levy is a New York attorney.

Carleton Beals is in Mexico, where he has for many years been making a study of social and political institutions.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 16, 1930 No. 3393

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 53
EDITORIALS:
The Right to Revolution 56
Aliens and Citizenship 57
Wandering Students 57
Coolidge Wisdom 58
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 59
OUR SUPER-BABBITT. A RECANTATION. By Robert Herrick 60
SEX PURITANISM IN RUSSIA. By Charmion von Wiegand 62
NEGRO BARBERS IN THE SOUTH. By Virginius Dabney 64
THE POWER TRUST WINS AGAIN. By Paul Y. Anderson 66
NOW SUMMER. By Ruth Langland Holberg 67
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 67
CORRESPONDENCE 68
BOOKS:
Cathemerinon. By Dudley Fitts 70
An American Dynasty. By H. L. Mencken 70
Men in Battle. By Horace Gregory 71
A Cultural Survey. By William MacDonald 71
Religion as a Literary Affair. By Herbert W. Schneider 72
Women in Germany. By Theresa Wolfson 73
Father and Son. By David Ewen 74
One Kind of Patriotism. By C. Hartley Grattan 74
Books in Brief 75
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Ferment in the Arabic World. By Felix Vályi 77
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 79

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

ENCOURAGING AND SURPRISING is the Italian answer to M. Briand's proposal for a United States of Europe. Coming from the Government of Mussolini it is nothing less than startling to find this document pointing out to the French that the true basis for such a new organization of Europe should not be security but disarmament. While willing to join in the discussion of the proposal, the Italians wish it understood that they favor no organization which will overlap, or interfere with, the League of Nations, in its important task of wiping out the last remaining demarcation between the victors and vanquished. More than that, Italy demands that the Soviet government and Turkey be likewise included from the very beginning, lest their exclusion at the first make it difficult or impossible to get them into the union at another time. The note also takes the part of the smaller nations and insists on equal representation of every state on a single council, so that there shall be "conditions of absolute equality between all the states." Of course, there is a safeguarding clause that "federal ties must not in the slightest harm the sovereign right of member states," and there is the heartiest approval of the French proposal that the new league should be based "on the idea of union and not on the idea of unity." This is genuine and enlightened statesmanship. But how can it be reconciled with the utterances of Mussolini himself?

MUSSOLINI, for example, has just spoken out regarding the peace treaties, and Europe wonders what he has in mind. "The nations which emerged victorious from the war," he writes in an article in a Paris newspaper, "are not satisfied with what victory has given them, and before tranquillity is restored the retouching of the pacts, which are at the base of European relations, must take place." This is rather cryptic. Does Mussolini mean that the victors got too little plunder and must have some more? Or does he mean that the Allies got a few things they would be better off without, and now want to be rid of them? Or is the declaration only Mussolini's way of saying that Italy is not satisfied and that its hunger must be appeased? The French press inclines to the latter interpretation, incidentally showing a good deal of chagrin over the way in which Mussolini has led off on a great issue, and much concern over the prospect that Italy may desert its former Allies and go in for a little international readjustment on its own account. The situation is interesting because of the systematic efforts which Italy is making to strengthen its influence in the Balkans and its refusal to yield on the question of naval parity with France. It is difficult to think of Italy as very altruistic about the peace settlement when one remembers the secret treaty that brought it into the World War, but revision would be welcome even from Italy if it meant the righting of grievous wrongs.

AIDED BY HIS SUCCESS in wresting from Congress the money he asked for the Wickersham commission and a revision—however small—of the pension bill, Mr. Hoover has addressed the extra session of the Senate with a statement of his views, badly written as usual, but with some force, stressing chiefly the threat of a race in armaments if the treaty should not be ratified. Why that should be inevitable we cannot see. By no section of the American public has Mr. Hoover been told that it desires a naval armament race if this treaty cannot be ratified. Nor has any other politician had such a message. The treaty itself is pitifully inadequate at best, and at worst an enormous and unnecessary expense. But the opposition in the Senate, for example, the big navy men, everywhere bases its fight on the "betrayal" of the nation by our yielding too much to the others. We do not believe that these jingoes will succeed and we are delighted that the President continues to show an aggressive spirit, in marked contrast, by the way, with his timidity as to the necessary dismissal of the besmirched Republican National Chairman, Claudius Huston. As for the session of Congress which has just expired, it did little honor to itself or the country and will for years to come be branded with the shame of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill.

THE TARIFF POT ought to boil vigorously now that requests for rate revision have multiplied at home and retaliation is taking shape abroad. Mr. Hoover had hardly had time to sign the tariff bill when the Senate adopted Senator Borah's resolution asking the Tariff Commission to investigate the new rates on some seventeen classes of articles, from shoes, furniture, wire fencing, and cement to shovels, rakes, scythes, corn knives, and drainage tools. On July 1, at the solicitation of Senator Bingham of Connecticut, it added lace to the list, and on the same day accommodated Senator Goldsborough of Maryland by including umbrellas, parasols, and parts thereof. This should keep the commission busy for a time. Meanwhile Ogden L. Mills, Undersecretary of the Treasury, who slipped off to Paris just on a vacation, you know, to feel the pulse of France and other countries under the new tariff stimulus, had the pleasure of learning en route that Italy had jacked up its duties on imported motor cars, most of which come from America, from 100 to 167 per cent, and that fourteen British financiers of the first order had come out for reciprocal trade agreements between the members of the British Empire, with duties on "all imports from other countries." As the farmers seem unable to discover any benefit, actual or prospective, from a tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, and American foreign trade keeps right on going down hill, the Republican campaign pledge which Congress has so nobly fulfilled should give Mr. Hoover something to think about this summer on his proposed trip to the West.

SECRETARY HYDE is a great man. After first telling the country in a radio speech what a "distinct gain" the new tariff offers to agriculture, he turns on the wheat-growers and announces bluntly that if they want better prices for their wheat they must reduce their acreage and cut production costs. What is more, they must do this not for the coming season but for "the next six to ten years." It is gospel truth, of course, but it is discouraging doctrine to preach to people who have been brought up to believe that agriculture is the foundation of national prosperity, and that nothing but the Republican Party can keep them from being ruined by low-wage labor abroad; and it certainly does not seem to fit in very well with the grandiose plan of buying up huge quantities of wheat and holding it to steady the market. Already the Governor of Kansas is out to fight the proposal; the soil of Kansas, he is reported as declaring, is adapted only to wheat (we had thought, until His Excellency spoke, that Kansas grew pretty good corn), and unless wheat can be grown the farmers will have to go back to cattle-raising. We look for lively times when Secretary Hyde and Mr. Legge, chairman of the Federal Farm Board, who takes the same view of the matter, undertake to convert the inhabitants of the wheat belt.

MR. MULROONEY HIMSELF went to the funeral of Gonzalo Gonzales, Mexican Communist shot to death by a policeman in New York City on June 28, and heard "New York's finest" called bad names by Communist orators. The new Police Commissioner of New York, when asked how long he would permit the funeral orators to go on, replied, "Until they get tired." This, we submit, is as good a principle for a police commissioner in dealing with the "red" menace as could be found in a day's walk. The funeral went off without any fireworks except those illegally purchased by small children to celebrate the Glorious Fourth. The police stood around; Mr. Mulrooney was invited to purchase some Communist leaflets; the Communist orators orated; their followers and the more curious of Harlem's population listened. After a while everybody went home. Both at the funeral of Gonzales and at that of Alfred Luro, a Negro declared by the Communists to have been beaten to death by the police a week earlier, there was no trouble between the police and the demonstrators. While not excusing in any respect the violence of the policemen at whose hands these two men met their death—if Luro did—we wish to commend Commissioner Mulrooney for refusing to follow in the footsteps of Mr. Whalen, who found that Communist demonstrations—accompanied by all the appurtenances of police war—seemed somehow to result in trouble. Mr. Mulrooney is willing to avoid trouble. Every New Yorker should thank him for it.

THE SUPREME COURT of California has rendered its decision on the pardon petition of Warren K. Billings, now in his fourteenth year at San Quentin prison for the killing of ten persons in a Preparedness Day parade in 1916. The court refuses the pardon, and Billings and his companion, Tom Mooney, also refused a pardon by the California State Pardon Board, will continue to sojourn at San Quentin. After declaring that Billings made no attempt to "make an affirmative showing that in relation to the Preparedness Day tragedy" he was an innocent—or in less legal language that he merely tried to prove his innocence in the bomb-throwing by showing that the testimony which convicted him was perjured—the decision points out that Billings kept bad company. He was "the friend and associate of an organized group of persons . . . engaged in plotting, attempting, and even executing crimes of violence against both property and persons . . ." And therefore, in a final burst of judicial reasoning,

> It is fairly inferable from his past and present affiliations that Warren K. Billings was familiar with the plots and plans of this group of his most intimate associates, and this being so it is an almost irresistible conclusion that if Warren K. Billings did not himself prepare and plant the deadly time bomb of the Preparedness Day disaster, he and his intimate associates and codefendant, Mooney, know, and have always known who did . . .

Unfortunately Billings and his codefendant Mooney are not serving life terms for being familiar with plots and plans, or even for knowing who threw the fatal bomb, but for murder in the first degree. With such a capacity for making irresistible inferences, the court ought not to have overlooked that important fact.

SIX DEATHS SO FAR make up the toll of race riot since July 4 in Emelle, Alabama, a small town near the Mississippi border. Trouble started in a quarrel over payment for the battery of a car, and a Negro shot down a white man. The Negro escaped, but his brother fell into the hands of the mob, which held him till night, then took him to the woods and hanged him to a tree. Not content with that, the sheriff and deputies, who arrived later, pushed on with the mob to the cabin of the lynched man's uncle, demanded to search it, and were met with gunfire which killed a member of the posse. Thereupon the crowd stormed the cabin, fired it, and shot the Negro. Since then roving bands have searched the countryside for four other Negroes, all members of the same family, and one of them the man who did the killing for which his brother was lynched. Two innocent Negroes, one a woman, both entirely unconnected with the quarrel, have been killed in the course of the search. Ten lynchings was the previous record in the South this year: three in Texas, two in South Carolina, two in Georgia, one in Florida, one in Mississippi, and one in Oklahoma. Now Alabama has added its share to a story already grim enough. Meanwhile, in Texas there is a ray of encouragement. We commented last week on the courageous way in which the sheriff of Beaumont prevented the lynching of a Negro who had confessed to eight assaults on white women. Since then a Texas lawyer who refused to accept the assignment of the Criminal District Court to defend this Negro has been fined $250 and remanded to jail for contempt of court, after which he agreed to take the case.

PLAINLY THE RUSSIANS are affected by the same inability to understand conditions abroad which was so largely responsible for the downfall of Germany. Thus Pravda, one of the leading Moscow dailies, announces that this is the time for the new Communist leadership in the United States to battle actively for the world revolution. It is to take advantage of the stock-market crash, the unemployment, and the dire plight of the farmer to proselyte vigorously for the Communist millennium. Stalin, too, is quoted as saying that "the Communist Party in America is one of those few in the world on which history imposes problems of decisive importance." We beg leave to differ with the Russian dictator. The Bolsheviki should understand that we have had industrial crises in America before this without their leading to serious political or revolutionary developments and that in times like these the American who has a job is by no means anxious to jeopardize it by going in for political agitation. The only way the Soviets can hope to further communism is by making a success of their economic system at home; everything else they do, like this Pravda editorial, merely strengthens the hands of the reactionaries and red-baiters. Stalin ought to be the more willing to leave the rest of the world alone because he has again scored tremendous success in the Communist Party convention, has made his opponents publicly humiliate themselves and recant, and is now as firmly in the saddle as dictator of Russia as Mussolini is in Italy. In addition he was able to report that Russian industry had doubled in two years and that agriculture was 14 per cent above the pre-war level.

SOME OF US are old enough to recall the horror that swept this country a third of a century ago when news drifted up from Cuba of the cruel Spanish policy of collecting the Cubans into concentration camps. There will be no such wave of horror at the news from Nicaragua. In the first place, the American newspapers do not print news from Nicaragua, except Marine Corps propaganda; in the second place, we have grown callous as a nation. But the fact is that the marines, unable to conquer the proud patriots who are still in revolt in northern Nicaragua, and faced by the unanimous hostility of the countryside, have adopted the extreme measure of ordering all the country people to flock into the towns where the "National Guard," officered by Marine Corps men, can watch them. El Sol of Tegucigalpa, Honduras, for June 4 prints the proclamation issued on May 17 by Colonel Robert Denig of the National Guard, declaring in the name of President Moncada and by virtue of the state of martial law in the Segovias that the entire civil population within a designated area is ordered to move by June 1 into Jicaro, Jalapa, Quilali, San Juan de Telpaneco, Telpaneco, or Palacaguina; and anyone found within the prohibited zone after that date will be treated as a bandit, which is to say, shot. The civilian exiles are ordered to present themselves to the local chief of the National Guard, who will find them lodging and work. It sounds to us extremely like the introduction by the United States of the Spanish system which once stirred us to such indignation.

WE ARE GLAD to know that the Experimental College at the University of Wisconsin is to continue, and that its sponsors consider it a success. It was inevitable that such a radical departure from educational orthodoxy should have given rise to persistent rumors of failure, dissension, and impending dissolution. Effective answer to these rumors is to be found in the university Bulletin for 1930-31. In this Bulletin President Glenn Frank sets forth succinctly and interestingly the aims of the college, its educational technique, and the apparent results so far—though he is careful to point out that since the college has been in operation only three years it is too early to draw any final conclusions. The samples given under the title of What Parents Say are especially significant and encouraging. More than one parent is of the opinion that his son, during his two years at the Experimental College, has learned to think. Two such opinions would justify the hopeful tone in which President Frank announces the program for the fourth year. There will be places for eighty-four freshmen this fall. Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn will, of course, continue as chairman.

NOT OFTEN DOES THE DEATH of a Congressman call forth such expressions of regret and sorrow both in Europe and the United States as has that of Representative Stephen G. Porter, of Pennsylvania. This was, of course, not because he was a veteran of ten consecutive terms in Congress, but because he had made himself an authority on foreign affairs and because he became, after the World War, the leading authority in official life on the illegal use of narcotics. Secretary Stimson has testified that as soon as Porter joined the House Committee on Foreign Affairs he qualified himself by studying more remote parts of the Far East and South America, with the result that he acquired "a rare understanding of our foreign problems" and was regularly consulted by every Secretary of State from 1911 on for his unbiased judgment—especially in Philippine and Chinese matters. But the work for which he deserves a monument was his magnificent leadership in the fight against opium. There he was not only an ardent and uncompromising fighter; he had completely mastered the subject and was equaled in fervor and knowledge by only one or two persons. To those Americans like Ellen La Motte who are waging this noble fight Mr. Porter's death must be a stunning blow. Dr. Harvey Wiley, who died full of years, had also deserved well of his country for his thirty years of warfare in behalf of pure foods in his position as Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture. It is impossible to overestimate what he did along these lines.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB

The Right to Revolution

WILL the right to revolt survive? The Declaration of Independence, as most Americans have forgotten, expressly declared that ". . . whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends [the right to life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and government by consent of the governed] it is the Right of the People to alter or abolish it, and to institute new Government . . ." All over the world the right to rebellion has been and is recognized by everybody save those actually in control of governments. It has been accepted as a matter of course and all successful revolutionists have been acclaimed as heroes and servants of humanity, whereas the unsuccessful have been consigned to the firing squad and contumely. But recent events have caused many to wonder whether the new technique of despots, and the increasingly centralized power of all governments, is not in a fair way to rob the people of their historic right to throw off any government which seems to them intolerable.

That modern inventions have played into the hands of governments nobody will deny. The growing destructiveness of these inventions in the field of warfare tends to strengthen those in power. The bombing ability of airplanes, the use of gas and of tanks augment tremendously the odds in favor of the in's and against the out's. Even more so do the modern press and the modern methods of communication—motor cars, telephone, radio, wireless. When all portions of a country can be explored either by reporters or the spies of authority flying from boundary to boundary in a few hours the possibility of concealing revolutionary preparations becomes slight indeed. The patriots at Concord and Lexington could not have hidden many supplies had British airplanes constantly watched them from overhead. When Washington started his march to Yorktown he crossed the Hudson at Dobbs Ferry, not twenty-five miles from British headquarters. Yet his troops were well through New Jersey before definite knowledge of this movement roused the British in New York City to action. Concealment of troop movements when war has begun can still be achieved, but our Southern and Western States, if they should decide to revolt against the Union, could not do in the way of preparation what the incipient Confederacy did so easily in 1860-61.

If we look abroad the point we are seeking to make becomes even plainer. No serious person believes, today, that there is any likelihood of organized revolt against Mussolini. Some day his whole regime may collapse in a violent convulsion akin to chaos, but the future surely holds in store no new Garibaldi to campaign with a thousand or a hundred thousand. In Russia, too, it appears as if the present dictators could be overthrown only by some great disaster or by complete economic collapse. Vast spaces there are enough in Russia; as far as distance and lack of communications are concerned it might be possible to stage an old-fashioned revolt; but there is surely no opportunity to acquire in advance all the food supplies and the military equipment necessary.

But what of India? That country is today the most interesting on the globe, for the reason that a very old yet new technique of revolution is now being used there which may prove that the Indians, at least, still possess that right of rebellion which our forefathers prized above all else. If non-resistance to physical acts on the part of the overlords, coupled with absolute disobedience, can break down a government that rules without the consent of the governed, the greatest lesson in its history will have been taught the world. Despots will certainly tremble everywhere if they find that airplanes, tear gas, police staves, rifles, and machine-guns are of no avail against a people which welcomes prison and courts death and suffering in preference to the continuance of a regime it detests. You cannot massacre a whole people; not even soldiers can continue for very long to shoot down unresisting men who bare their bosoms to the fatal lead. Certainly England today holds her Indian Empire by the most tenuous of strings; the only question is whether there is sufficient determination and solidarity to go on with the protests and the sacrifice.

Moreover, it is not only the active non-resistance of the Indians—to write an apparent contradiction—which counts. Little by little the English are being forced into an ignoble and an impossible situation. They are insisting upon holding a country which they won by a victory over a third nation; they know that the country is overwhelmingly against them; they are bewildered because the people they dominate refuse to take them at their valuation. They cannot understand that one little man whom they have placed behind bars exercises an authority far beyond their own and has achieved the love of millions they cannot win; they cannot understand why force no longer avails, or the wholesale arrests with which they have filled their jails. They have proscribed the National Congress as an illegal organization; some of their myrmidons have banned the Gandhi cap which even the children are wearing. Nothing avails. There is here a clash not only of civilizations, of national points of view, but of a greater philosophy with a lesser—that of Christ who refused to lift one finger to save himself; who put all his faith in the things of the spirit and the refusal to do evil that good might come therefrom.

Perhaps what is demanded here can only be achieved by a nation like that of the Indians with their mysticism, their spirituality, their faith, their peculiar beliefs, their history. Perhaps; but our faith in the eventual all-conquering nature of Gandhi's weapons is complete. How pitiful it is that Ramsay MacDonald and his Government cannot see it! How disturbing it must be to all members of the Labor Party who are at the same time followers of conscience and lovers of humanity when they read of the police beating unresisting persons until foreign correspondents can look on no longer; when they read that their agents are using all the weapons of imperialistic authority! What a pity they cannot recall what their great statesman Richard Cobden once said: "Can we play the game of fraud, violence, and injustice in Asia without finding our national conscience seared at home?"

Aliens and Citizenship

THE long-debated question of whether or not an alien applying for citizenship has the same rights as a natural-born citizen of the United States has been temporarily settled by the decisions rendered in the cases of Dr. Douglas Clyde Macintosh and Marie Averill Bland, applicants for citizenship, by Judge Manton of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. Judge Manton's decision reverses that of the lower courts, which denied naturalization in both cases on the ground that neither Dr. Macintosh nor Miss Bland would swear to bear arms in defense of their country in time of war. If this bald statement of the fact sounds preposterous in the case of a forty-seven-year-old nurse and a fifty-three-year-old professor of theology, let it be remembered that the same point of view has been upheld by no less a tribunal than the Supreme Court of the United States in denying citizenship to Rosika Schwimmer.

It was plain that Judge Manton and his associates, Judge Learned Hand and Judge Swan, were considerably hampered by this same decision of the Supreme Court, from which Justice Holmes dissented in such admirable language. It was not possible to tell the Supreme Court to its face that its decision was faulty. Yet Judge Manton's distinction between the Schwimmer case, in which citizenship was not granted, and the Macintosh and Bland cases, in which he permits it to be granted, is one of those labored differences for which the law is famous. Dr. Macintosh declared that he would not swear to support the United States in any war, but only in a war which he considered morally justifiable; Miss Bland declared that she would not bear arms in defense of her country, because her beliefs as a Christian forbade her to do so, but that she was willing to assist in any non-combative capacity during a war in which her new country should be engaged, just as she had served as a war nurse overseas in the World War. Judge Manton declared:

> It will, of course, be recognized as a duty of the citizen to bear arms in defense of his country, but there is also the well-recognized qualification that a person does not lack nationalism or affection for his government if, by reason of a conscientious religious scruple, he requests being excused from bearing arms. . . . Nor is there any fixed principle of the Constitution of this country requiring a citizen with conscientious religious scruples against bearing arms to nevertheless bear arms in time of war. . . . No more is demanded of an alien who becomes a citizen than of a natural-born citizen and when an alien becomes a citizen he is accorded all the rights and privileges afforded to a natural-born citizen except eligibility to the Presidency.

These sentiments are, of course, unexceptionable. The last sentence especially is a forthright and admirable reversal of the statement made by Judge Bondy of the lower court, when reminded that he was requiring more of an applicant for citizenship than is required of a natural-born citizen, that "the rights of those who are already citizens and the rights of those who apply for citizenship are entirely different." This is preposterous doctrine, and it is good to see a higher judge recognizing it as such.

It was in considering the precedent established in the case of Rosika Schwimmer that Judge Manton found himself on exceedingly delicate ground. His way of getting around the difficulty does not seem altogether successful. The decision declares:

> The question presented here differs from that presented in the case of Schwimmer vs. United States, supra. She stated she was an absolute atheist and said: "I am not willing to bear arms." . . . Mrs. Schwimmer said she was an uncompromising pacifist and was found to have no sense of nationalism but only a cosmic sense of belonging to the human family and opposed the use of military force as admitted by the Constitution and by the laws. She had "no nationalistic feelings."

This is putting the qualification for citizenship at least partly on religious grounds, although Madame Schwimmer's want of proper nationalistic feeling and her out-and-out pacifism are also mentioned. In so far as it sets up a religious qualification for citizenship we believe it to be directly contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. In so far as it sanctions the refusal of citizenship on the ground of pacifism—whether "uncompromising" or not—we believe it deprives this country of citizens of the highest potential usefulness. The necessities imposed by the existing decision of a higher court handicapped Judge Manton to a very great degree. The present decision, grateful as we must be for it, is not without its weaknesses. The fact is that the parallels between the cases of Madame Schwimmer and Doctor Macintosh and Miss Bland are uncomfortably close; and the latest decision may tend further to complicate rather than to clarify the issue. The final test will be when and if the present cases are appealed to the Supreme Court. The court will then have an opportunity of frankly reversing itself, as many times it has done. And one can only hope, in the interests of justice and common sense, that it will do so.

Wandering Students

THE wandering students are with us again. From all parts of the country, during the past week or two, they have been moving by thousands and tens of thousands upon the summer schools of the universities. Columbia University, it is reported, expects upwards of 14,000, and a dozen other universities will need four figures to record their enrolment. It is a very quiet and unostentatious migration. American students do not troop afoot along the highways as did the students of Europe in the Middle Ages, singing, arguing, carousing, plundering or begging as mood or circumstances dictated, and adding a colorful lawlessness to the towns in which they stopped. Civilization has changed all that. The summer-school wanderer pays his way and keeps the peace, and if the way is sometimes narrow and the peace a little dull, he knows that dormitory heads, boarding-house keepers, and restaurant proprietors, the managers of shows and purveyors of soft drinks are ready with a welcome and that presidents, deans, and professors will offer the glad hand. No one can say that summer-school students are not wanted; they are wanted very much, and the more there are this year the more, it is hoped, there may be next.

Most of the migrants are teachers in schools or colleges. With many of them the bread-and-butter motive, academically speaking, is paramount; they are working for degrees or for "credits" which professionally will be worth while. At least as many more, however, dispense with the credit motive and crowd classrooms and lecture halls because of someone whom they want to hear or something they want to know. A surprisingly large number do not attend the same school a second time; instead, they "sample round." This year, perhaps, it is Columbia or Chicago; last year it was Wisconsin or Harvard; the year before, Kansas, or Illinois, or Cornell. Some follow a favorite professor, for professors, like students, have taken to roving and seem to welcome a chance to turn up at a different place each year. Climate and geography play their part in determining the course of migration. The east winds of Cambridge are a standing invitation to wanderers from the South, while the schools at Berkeley and Palo Alto draw heavily from New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, and Nevada; Chicago is a Mecca to the pilgrim-minded of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, and the modern Babylon beckons gaily to everybody.

Culturally, this migration of students and teachers has a good deal of significance. It tends to overcome sectionalism and helps to break down prejudice. Six weeks spent in an unfamiliar place with a crowd of people drawn from everywhere is pretty certain to make a difference. One recalls the story of a Northern traveler who set out on a day's horseback ride in the Georgia mountains with a "cracker" for companion and guide. The two rode on for some time in silence, for Georgia crackers are not given to conversation. Suddenly the guide turned in his saddle and remarked: "I s'pose you-uns up there knows a heap o' things we-uns down here don't know." The traveler cautiously admitted that that might be so. A half-hour later and the guide turned again: "An' I s'pose we-uns down here knows a heap o' things you-uns up there don't know." The traveler agreed. Another half-hour and the native philosopher had thought it through: "Mixin' larns us." The summer school is a good deal like that; its members mix, and in mixing they learn.

It is not a onesided process, either, doing something for the visitors but leaving the university untouched. Every university in America, from the mammoths down, has about it a great deal that is provincial and manneristic. It prides itself on its ways of doing things or emphasizes some special attitude toward life. It has set up standards and habits and more or less openly appraises other standards and habits as inferior. Save, perhaps, for a few general principles, there are not two universities in the country that agree about the kind or quantity of knowledge which a student should have when he enters, or how he should be treated while there, or what he should be like when he leaves. Distinctive character the universities assuredly have, but it is a character curiously streaked with prejudices and aversions, exclusive loyalties, and myopic squints at a rather small world. For such self-consciousness and complacence the summer school is a healthy counter-irritant. The student gets some of his sharp corners worn down and discovers that parochial interests are not the whole story. The university, faced with a small army of men and women eager but unabashed, has to get out of a rut or risk the loss of prestige. The summer school, in short, does its bit for a cosmopolitan culture, and anything that can be done in that direction in America is so much to the good.

Coolidge Wisdom

CALVIN COOLIDGE'S first column, what with a copyright notation, an editorial note, a five-em dash, numerous paragraphs, and generous areas of white space, filled a box four inches wide and four and a quarter inches long on the first page of the Herald Tribune for July 1. It contained 198 words counting the date line and the signature. But what the Herald Tribune lacks in Coolidge copy it makes up in editorial excitement. On July 2 three half-columns on page 2 were filled with comment on the column culled from the leading newspapers of the country. Each item, as we remember, was longer than Mr. Coolidge's original message.

As for the message itself, it sounded from the first vaguely familiar. And when our eyes fell upon another contribution which is also to be found daily in the Herald Tribune, we realized why. This latter appears on the last instead of the first page of the first section and is entitled From the Founder's Writings. It is to be found, for that matter, in the upper left-hand corner of every advertisement syndicated by Wanamaker's department store.

It is evident at a glance that these two great minds run in the same channels. Says Founder Wanamaker on July 1: "For men to be gruff and offish with each other without reason is not only bad manners, but deprives them of helping each other to climb the high hills that often confront us." Says Profounder Coolidge on the same day, after a panegyric on the fundamental soundness of the country that must have warmed Herbert Hoover's heart: "My countrymen, it is time to stop criticizing and quarreling and begin sympathizing and helping!" And on July 2: "We should not faint at the first obstacle." (Cf. Wanamaker's "high hills.") There is not room for more quotation and we have probably exceeded already the one-half of one per cent allowed by the copyright. It is safe to say, however, that Coolidge wins on all three counts of homely wisdom, i.e., platitudes, healthy sentiment, and patriotism, though in fairness to Wanamaker it should be pointed out that this is due solely to the fact that the Coolidge Cogitations (for all his reputation for economy) are twice as long as the Wanamaker Wanderings. The only important difference is that the Herald Tribune pays Coolidge (thus vindicating his economics) and gets paid by Wanamaker's.

We hasten to assert that it is not our purpose to level the charge of plagiarism at any head. We wish merely to point out that Coolidge shares with Wanamaker, with Bok, and with Harold Bell Wright that talent for the mediocre and the obvious in thought and expression that will carry him to final triumph whether he seeks it in the columns of a newspaper or the corridors of the White House. And the Herald Tribune need have no doubt that the Coolidge column will pay its way. If Rudy Vallee is the soft heart of America, Coolidge is its hard head. He and his public understand each other, and his words will fall upon its ears with that same comforting familiarity that has enshrined Eddie Guest and Elbert Hubbard in the pansied wall-mottoes of a nation. Adding our voice to the chorus, we predict that Coolidge wisdom will prove only less popular than Coolidge prosperity.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

ONE important phase of the Russian experiment is seldom discussed by anybody and never by the Communists. Bolshevist commentators limit themselves to investigation and glorification of the economic aims of the Soviet Republic. It is, of course, a familiar Marxian theory that all history must be translated in terms of economics. Nevertheless, it seems to me unlikely that life in its entirety can be simplified into a mere matter of economic adjustments.

I have never been reconciled to the theory that there is such a thing as proletarian art and capitalistic art, as Upton Sinclair has suggested. Nor can I believe that love, religion, and recreation are capable of being interpreted wholly through a new conception of production and distribution. Much that is written about Russia is contradictory and it is unfair to comment dogmatically without striking some sort of balance between the various points of view of all observers. But there seems to be no conflict in the statement that the Soviet leaders are bending every effort to make all life within the borders of the nation serve a communal purpose. Private life is to be abolished as well as private property. The pleasure principle is rigorously frowned upon. To a good Communist cards, dancing, drink, and light love are just as reprehensible as they appeared in the eyes of the Puritans. Indeed, one may go even farther back and find a possible analogy in Sparta. As yet very little of Athens has crept into the Russian experiment.

It may be said, perhaps, that the Soviet state is still in the formative stage, and that certain rigorous aspects of self-discipline and coercive discipline from the state itself may be moderated once the structure has been solidified. Against this argument may be cited the certain fact that puritanism is not to be lightly assumed and then removed. People who adopt the puritan point of view for a purpose are not able to shed their philosophy even when their objects have been attained.

It may also be said that in some of its aspects the life prescribed for the faithful Communist is the direct antithesis of that lived by our New Englanders. For instance, at Russian bathing beaches wearers of suits are numbered among the bourgeoisie. No good Communist would dare to exhibit such false modesty. Granting, as I do, that this is a more healthy attitude and that in any case swimming without a suit is far more fun I must still deny that there is any essential difference in the point of view. It is merely a reversal. One sect is shocked by clothes and one by nudity, but in both cases there is a strict rule of conduct—a proper and an improper way of bathing. One can easily imagine wild Russians of the younger set sneaking off to some lonely pool to enjoy the unholy thrill of wearing bathing suits.

Ben James writes in the Herald Tribune:

> In a vaudeville performance at a Moscow amusement park I saw an eccentric dancer who interpreted his antics in terms of world movements. First he whirled for several minutes, gaining in speed and action until he slumped to the stage. He rose again and continued at a faster tempo until he once more fell exhausted. A third time he revived, and spun with greatest fury until he dropped and was carried from the stage. The performer explained his act as a dance of capitalism, which he pictured to the audience as in the last frenzied stage before its final downfall.

Such devices for beating the devil around the stump were not unknown to our old Puritans either. At a time when plays were forbidden by law in the New England States quite a little theatrical entertainment was bootlegged to the colonists. Shakespeare was freely performed, "Othello" being one of the favorites. But, of course, the producers did not call it a play. They set the tragedy forward as "an animated sermon illustrating the evil effects of jealousy." In both schools of thought—Russian and Puritan—there is an underlying spiritual kinship. The Puritan and the Bolshevist hold in common that man's first duty lies to something outside himself.

And there is a similarity in missionary spirit. The young Communist embarks upon a venture to enlighten the capitalistic world in much the same manner that Baptists go to China. There is the same impatience with the folkways of the benighted and an equal disposition to effect conversion even if the luckless unbeliever must be bashed over the head.

In fact, the theological form is strikingly of a piece. In both bolshevism and fundamental Christianity membership is by conversion and in each case the danger of backsliding is ever present. Heresy hunting is the favorite diversion of both camps and Lenin has been elevated to the status of a Messiah since grace proceeds only through a complete and literal acceptance of his doctrines. As among the theologians of the Puritan sects, vast and intricate debates occur as to the meaning of phrases and their application to the life of today. And to cap the climax the Soviet state seems to uphold the doctrine of predestination and foreordination in its attitude toward recruits who are white or red.

It has been observed in the matter of Russian motion pictures, Russian novels, and Russian plays that each creative artist is bound to the task of glorifying the state. Interest in productions such as "Romeo and Juliet" is discouraged because they draw the mind off the main track. Romantic love is a delusion, possibly an opiate fostered by the capitalists to enslave the masses. Such art as contributes nothing to the Five-Year Plan is outlawed as counter-revolutionary. Here again we see a situation not unlike that which existed in the great days of the church when painters were under the necessity of turning their efforts wholly to the glorification of saints and other holy figures. The only change is that now, instead of Madonnas, the artist must turn out his fair proportion of canvases showing the hands of Labor cleaving the earth above his head and emerging to down the capitalistic ogre.

To be sure, night clubs still exist in Moscow but they are run solely for the unregenerate. Here foreigners may come and others not belonging to the elect. Jazz is not for men and women intent upon the creation of a new Utopia. But there still remains the pertinent question: what is the Russian going to do with it when he gets it?

HEYWOOD BROUN

Our Super-Babbitt

A Recantation

By ROBERT HERRICK

A DOZEN years ago I contributed to the columns of The Nation a panegyric upon one Herbert Hoover, who then bulked large in the admiration and hope of the world. With an immense prestige gained by having successfully conducted the Belgian relief and skilfully imposed a self-denying ordinance upon the appetites of his countrymen, he had undertaken after the armistice the feeding of the starving vanquished peoples of Eastern Europe (not quite impartially, it is said!) and had returned to his native land, from which he had been absent during many busy years. He had emerged from the devastating war with an untarnished reputation won by prosecuting efficiently the aims of peace. For those who like myself were looking for some man, neither militarist nor politician, to lead this country out of the economic and spiritual chaos left by the greatest insanity in human history and the equally tragic betrayal at Versailles, this American engineer of Quaker ancestry who had so thoroughly demonstrated his quiet efficiency, this great humanitarian (as he was then thought to be), seemed an instrument of fate providentially fitted for mighty tasks. What other American, removed from partisan influences by the pattern of his life—and with such personal qualifications and rich experience—was as well equipped as Hoover to understand the infinite perplexities of the present, and not only to restore our own equilibrium, but to show us how to take nobly that larger part which destiny was inexorably thrusting upon us? We had had enough of eloquence, the proclaiming of great principles with feeble performance; we wanted someone who would know his way about in the new world, a doer not a talker.

In those early months of 1919 it looked as if one of the two dominant political parties might be forced to accept Hoover as its candidate for the Presidency for fear that the other party would run him if it didn't. In response to inquiry as to whether he was Democrat or Republican Hoover had given to the press shortly after his return to the United States a brief statement of things he believed ought to be done, with the implication that he would support the party that indorsed such a program. The Republican leaders in the Senate—the same gang that had knifed Wilson at Paris—had already selected their candidate, one of themselves, the most ignorant and pliant of the gang. But the public interest in Hoover gave them pause. This new man without party affiliations had a unique position of advantage; if he had been astute enough, or had had good counselors, or if simply he had been the sincere man we believed him to be, Hoover might have become President in 1920 without abating a jot of his prestige, without serving an eight years' apprenticeship in party politics under the tuition of Hughes, Mellon, and the Ohio gang. Instead, having an address to deliver before the Society of Engineers in New York he took the advice of friends and discovered overnight that he had always been a Republican, like most respectable Americans who own property. Thereafter, naturally, neither party had any immediate use for this great humanitarian—the Democrats because he called himself a Republican and the Republicans because of his own volition he had made himself harmless. The Hoover sentiment in the country faded away; the Senate gang proceeded with their plans and according to schedule put over Harding.

To those who read his address to the Society of Engineers (which was later elaborated into a book, the sole contribution he has made so far to statesmanship and philosophy) there was another deep disappointment. The message, the one supreme truth, that this man of such extraordinary experience brought to his countrymen from a close observation of Europe in the throes of self-destruction, after witnessing for five terrible years the bankruptcy of old systems of government, the agonies of peoples, the crumbling of civilization, was praise for "individual initiative" and denunciation of every kind of political or social change, all forms of which he loosely denominated "socialism." To one who read that Rotarian confession of faith, with its implications, any further enthusiasm for Hoover seemed impossible. The mind that could react along that single, well-worn groove to all the human phenomena it had been Hoover's privilege to witness was patently a narrow mind, without either imagination or insight or any large purpose. Hoover was merely another capable American business man with a knack for large affairs and a gift for publicity. One could have written him off as a dud then and there for any leadership in the new world. The American people, gorged with war profits and flushed with the consciousness of power, needed no incentive to individual initiative just then, least of all then, confronted as they were by grave problems involving their relationship with the rest of the world. The ideal of everybody for himself and the devil help the hindmost had worked well enough among pioneers exploiting a new land of unbounded riches; for a nation of one hundred and twenty millions of people, with billions owing to it by other peoples and more billions being added annually to the debt, such a policy was hardly a sure foundation for peace in a narrowing world.

After the election of Harding there followed, as everybody knows, eight of the least memorable, the most sordid years of our national history. Hoover was content to serve in the Cabinet that contained such specimens as Fall, Daugherty, et al. From them, and from Mellon and Hughes, he learned the game of party politics, the hard-boiled game. Opinions still differ as to how well he can play that game, whether he is still the blundering amateur or the skilled professional. The Parker and the Claudius Huston incidents would seem to indicate that for all his long apprenticeship under such a variety of able instructors he is not yet an adept. He became for two administrations the handy man, the intellectual front so to speak, very busy, very useful, while he developed his celebrated method of commission inquiries—a specious device for inaction, a convenient smoke screen. Those eight years, so momentous to the future of the world, meant here in the United States but one thing: prosperity and how to get it, how to keep it, how to increase it. With Coolidge and Mellon as leaders there was organized the famous prosperity chorus, which incited to frenzy the cupidity of Main Street until every elevator boy bought himself an "equity in the United States."

In the enormous task of the pacification of Europe, the liquidation of the errors of Versailles, what part did Hoover play? None, except to sit on the commission to settle the amounts, principal and interest, which our debtors must pay this country over three-quarters of a century. On the honor roll of those who labored in behalf of international understanding and peace there is the name of one German, one Frenchman, and one American—but not Hoover's.

Probably the stupidest and the wickedest aspect of our foreign policy since the war has been our official attitude toward Russia (that Russia which Wilson in one of his moments of divination predicted would become "the acid test" of American ideals!). The policy of non-intercourse first promulgated by the righteous Hughes has been rigidly adhered to since, and there is no sign that Hoover ever protested against this hypocritical silliness or has any intention of abandoning it. There is no evidence, either, that he has been superior to the sporadic crazes for witch-burning in connection with "reds" from which this country suffers periodically. I know of no utterance by Hoover against the sins of intolerance; I remember many insisting upon the materialistic basis of all human progress, where he and the great Communist seem to be in singular accord.

In due season, then, came Hoover's turn for promotion. Coolidge, with an uncanny animal instinct for stormy weather ahead, decided to retire into contemplation and journalism. His elevation had been the purest freak of chance; he seems never to have lost sense of this fact and did not presume upon fate. The handy man of the Administration was his natural successor, the Hoover myth having persisted to some degree and latterly been revived by the Commerce Secretary's competent handling of the Mississippi flood disaster. If Hoover could no longer unfurl the banner of the great humanitarian, he was still, in the minds of Main Street, the trained expert, the Great Engineer—and presumably by this time enough of a politician to know his way around Washington. If in 1919 one felt enthusiasm for the unknown Hoover, in 1927 one knew enough not to expect too much of the godson of Mellon, who had sat through the stench of the Harding years without any sign of nausea; who had accepted without protest the narrow Coolidge policies; who for eight years had run docilely in harness with the Republican gang. But at least the industrious Secretary of Commerce was a trained, competent executive, an "expert."

Alas, what a blow one year of Hoover efficiency has given to the ideal of training and education in the art of government! The preference of a democracy for the "plain" man to one who has received an education and has intellectual affiliations has been unfortunately encouraged. Events since November, 1927, are too recent, too poignant, to need much comment. It is pitiful, tragic, that a mature man of Hoover's full experience should have wanted anything as badly as he apparently wanted the Presidency and now wants another term. He wanted to be elected so badly that in a panic he promised everything before election: an extra session of Congress; a farm board with millions, billions if necessary, of public funds to hold the bucket for all agricultural surpluses (what had he learned as commission merchant for Belgium and Eastern Europe?); a new tariff to benefit the farmers without disturbing the manufacturers (and he was supposed to be an expert in economics if not in the political history of the United States!); and commissions galore.

We now know that his promises were not empty gestures. We wish they had been. For there is one worse habit than not doing the right thing—that is to persist self-righteously in doing the wrong thing. It is an interesting speculation which must be left to his intimates whether Hoover is as fundamentally ignorant as his actions and occasionally his words on economic matters would indicate, or is merely cynically sinning against his intelligence like any practical politician for the sake of that second term—the goal which has destroyed the integrity of many a chief executive. I prefer to believe that the President knows better—knows that prices of staple commodities cannot be maintained or boosted by the use of revolving funds, that no tariff can be devised to help the farmer without also seriously hurting him, that high tariffs do not in the long run make for prosperity at home or peace abroad. He might, at least, with his confirmed taste for expert opinion, have given some attention to the almost unanimous opinion of American economic experts on the inevitable results of the new tariff. Instead, without any "study" or consultation with experts, with a feeble effort to save face by the flexible provision, he hastened to sign this measure, which the "best minds" had been telling him for months would end for a long while our puffy prosperity and also, let us pray, the rule of the Republican Party.

The only one of the numerous commissions of eminent persons which Hoover has appointed that has produced any tangible results to date is the one on Haiti, and there the facts were already sufficiently known. What was wanting was the will to act upon them, which was accelerated less by the Forbes commission than by events precipitating some sort of decision. The commission method is a wise method, of course, the method of science, technology, big business. But anybody who has ever served upon a college faculty knows well enough that it is also the method of procrastination and evasion, a decorous manner of pigeonholing controversial subjects. In case of most governmental problems all necessary facts are well enough known or easily available; what is lacking is the will, the intention to find the right conclusion.

Thus far, Hoover has engineered two large publicity features—the good-will tour of South America preceding his inauguration and the Rapidan conversations with the English Premier, both of which were effectively advertised. To the hopes aroused by the first in all Latin America has come within one short year the disillusionment of the new tariff, in which their interests are more flagrantly ignored than ever before, especially those of our ward, Cuba. All our neighbors are now able to judge the value of Hoover's amiable words and gestures when translated into action.

The glow excited by the second, the hope of disarmament, has sunk into apathy over the petty accomplishment of the naval conference, which might have been predicted from the character of the American delegates selected by the President and the stubborn attitude these held in London throughout the conference. To arouse expectations among millions of men and women which are not met by performance, which possibly were never intended to be met, is dangerous politically. The memory of the public is short, but not short enough to acquit a Hoover.

It would be silly to attribute responsibility for all our ills to any President—or even to the Republican Party. Fumbling with farm relief, forcing a wretched tariff upon a world suffering already from too much tariff, and failure to accomplish any real disarmament do not altogether account for the present universal depression and uncertainty. Our vast Main Street is in the process of awakening from the prolonged dream encouraged by the last two administrations, and that is not pleasant. We must face the realities of overproduction and underconsumption, of a growing scarcity of gold, of a Europe still unappeased and ready to engage in reprisals, and of the potential rivalry of a different economic system developed in despised and hated Russia, whose gigantic effort the prosperity chorus may have too lightly derided. Individual initiative and natural resources alone may not be enough!

Hoover has not given the slightest evidence as President that he has either the understanding or the ability to cope with such a situation. The likelihood is that there will be the usual deadlock between an unpopular President and the Congress for the next two years, but the sooner we are rid of Hoover and his promises the better. When a French journalist said the other day that the American people must choose between a Babbitt and an Owen Young, he exactly appraised the values. But have they not already chosen in their hearts?

Sex Puritanism in Russia

By CHARMION VON WIEGAND

A YOUNG, strong, and enthusiastic Bolshevik, taking advantage of Russia's new freedom, acquired four sweethearts simultaneously—a number thoroughly legal under Mohammed's law and not prohibited under the new Soviet law. But the law is one thing and life is another. For a young man in any land it would be almost a whole-time job to make four girls happy. In Russia the difficulties are well-nigh insurmountable. Just to mention one small obstacle, there are no private motor cars in Russia. Imagine the energy required to call on four girls in four different sections of the city by means of the slow and overcrowded street cars. And in a country where even food and clothing are in the luxury class it is no small task to divide a party salary (not more than $110 a month) so that it will meet all the expenses of everyday existence and still provide enough for the expenses of courtship. In addition to these difficulties there was one vastly more important one. This young man was a member of the party and he held a responsible position. According to rule he was bound to work eight or ten hours a day at his job and give six hours to party work. It would have taken an Einstein to solve the higher mathematical problems of the division of his time and his purse. Is it any wonder then that he had to do without sleep to meet his heavy schedule, and that he became harassed, overstrained, and inefficient?

He soon did not want to answer the telephone or see the postman. Each week the difficulties piled up. Mila, who lived out of town, would write that she hadn't seen him for a whole week. He would be obliged to answer that he had to get out a report and could not come out that evening. He probably would not add that he also had promised to take Vera to the theater. But if the next evening was consumed in riding miles to placate Mila, then there were Masha and an important committee meeting to occupy him. And just that afternoon when he had gone home to prepare his speech for the coming congress, Natasha had dropped in and he could not hurt her feelings, after having broken the last engagement with her. Altogether the situation was getting intolerable.

The young man began to arrive at the office late. First it was only five minutes but it gradually became an hour or more. His work was careless and inaccurate. His comrades in the office raised their eyebrows, for he had always been a conscientious and faithful worker. Now, at a time when every nerve was being strained to put across the Five-Year Plan, when the comrades who had fought shoulder to shoulder in the Revolution were again sacrificing their health and shortening their lives in order to rear a modern Russia for the coming generation, here was their comrade arriving an hour late, falling asleep from fatigue at his desk, and neglecting to turn in his reports on time. In the eyes of the young man's friends these actions seemed nothing short of counter-revolution. The matter was reported to the party, which began to investigate in its most thorough manner. The culprit was finally called to account and I imagine that the ultimatum delivered ran something like this: We have nothing to do with your personal life and we are not interested in your private morals, but we beg to point out that your complex relationships with women take too much time and energy from your work. We have no suggestion to offer as regards a solution of your problem, but we wish to remind you that if you are again late at the office or your work lags behind, even by the smallest margin, we shall be glad to accept your resignation.

The end of the tale is extremely moral. The young man began at top speed to reform his life. He dismissed three of his sweethearts (it will be kind to draw a veil over the painful scenes that must have ensued) and he took the fourth to the registration bureau, where they were properly married. And when last heard of he was living a placid, monogamous, domestic existence, completely devoted to the party. I have told this story at some length because it epitomizes the new morality arising in Russia today.

During the years of actual revolutionary fighting Russia went through a period of experiments, including sexual excesses and overindulgence. Now that the Revolution has entered a new stage of development—a constructive and economic one—the Soviet pioneers seem to be headed toward a new kind of puritanism. Today Russia is a pioneer land and its morality and culture are almost completely dictated by economics and expediency. In this it stands much closer to the America of our forefathers than to present-day Europe.

The impressive thing about Russia is that the pioneer spirit should flare into life in a land that has already seen two cultures flourish and decay. That these old cultures could be so easily extinguished may be due to the fact that they did not spring from Russian soil and consequently never really entered into the blood of its people. Asiatic and medieval Russia still lives in the outlying districts and in the villages, and the religious controversy that reigned this year was nothing more than the death struggle of orthodox Holy Russia against the onslaught of modern collectivism. And European Russia still exists—that Russia which Peter the Great made and of which Leningrad is the visible symbol—and all those tattered traditions from Germany, France, and Italy that comprised the patchwork culture of the upper and middle classes. But amid all these foreign and conflicting elements there runs through the brains and hearts of men, like a current of electricity, the will to revolution, the will to build the future. And that will allows no trifling with its plans. Life is completely stripped of its ornaments. Only the essentials for satisfying the primary instincts of hunger, shelter, warmth, and sex desire exist, without as yet any definite social form to clothe them. And of these sex comes last, for enormous energy goes into providing food and clothes. A man or woman who is a good Communist cannot indulge in sexual excesses any more than in luxurious living.

Those sensation-loving Americans who go to Russia are usually disillusioned. They have read of the nationalization of women, the decay of legal marriage, the legalization of abortion, the ease of divorce, and they assume life is one long orgy. Instead they find a nation of workers laboring from seven to seventeen hours a day, emotionally and physically absorbed in the superhuman task of turning the world's greatest agrarian land into a modern industrial center. In this atmosphere it is not strange that love, luxury, leisure, and even art must take second place. It is only an effete Europe that has the leisure to cultivate social graces, manners, and the arts of courtship.

When the Revolution came the Russian people revolted against the old morality. In essence this was the challenge they flung to Europe: We will have no more of your bourgeois morals, manners, luxuries, or spiritual posturings. We think you have made one contribution to world betterment—science. We shall therefore take over your knowledge and use its inventions and technique to forge weapons against the old dominant classes and to build a huge industrial nation on a communistic basis.

It is the latter part of this program that has brought about the new puritanism. It is not based on Christian laws or the idea of sin in sexual matters. The Five-Year Plan has been more efficacious in restraining the Bolsheviks than have the Ten Commandments in restraining the Christians. The party does not believe in morality—our brand—and a Communist morality is yet to be developed. If his work is well done and the worker has earned his rest he may shape his life to suit himself—for the weeks of his annual vacation only!

Even among Communist Party members there are many divergences of opinion concerning personal conduct and they are still groping for a new code of morals applicable to the proletariat. Pilynak, one of the most successful of the new writers, has written a story called "The Law of the Wolf," which dramatically exposes the new double standard of the Communists. Two friends, who work sixteen hours a day "in the mills of Revolution" and whose cars stand ever waiting to take them to committee meetings, public gatherings, and party councils, go on their vacations together. They break loose from the tension of their work in those mills that never stop their grinding and leave Moscow.

In their car that runs along strange roads at night, silent and swift as a sleek greyhound, they go on the hunt—after animals in the dense forests, to shoot and to slay, and after women, too, strange women, lusty and without reserve, to satisfy the hunger for sex; and to slake their intolerable thirst they drink unlimited quantities of fiery vodka till they become mad and their blood runs wild in their veins. They return to the city refreshed, their blood made young again by lust and cruelty, and the next day their cars stand waiting to carry them to the mills of Revolution—that day and every day thereafter to their eternal work—until again they shall have earned the right to break the tension and revert to pleasure.

I myself observed the same thing in less vivid surroundings. To one Bolshevik, who one night had got suddenly drunk while on his vacation, I exclaimed: "How can you do it?" I knew him to be an idealist with an almost fanatical faith in the Revolution, and a most conscientious worker.

He answered: "I wouldn't dare in Moscow. I never touch it there. It would interfere with my work. But here, after four years without any rest, I can let go."

"How do you reconcile your conduct with your point of view?"

"I feel ashamed. I don't want to get drunk again."

But either because of his remorse or in spite of it, that very evening he was drunk and ribald as before.

And he was not alone in this. His companions, too, were heavy drinkers and could put any American under the table in short order. But no one thought of objecting, least of all the party, for it was vacation time.

The Russian puritanism is not artificially applied from the outside. It is a kind of integrity and control necessary to perform a difficult task. It is applied to all forms of conduct—not only to sex. The Bolsheviks encourage plainness in dress. Part of this is putting a good face on the fact that so few things can be had. But it also shows an attitude of mind. Some of this severe feeling has relaxed of late. A man may wear a collar and tie and not feel ashamed of it. But I have had Communists—men, too—say to me: "Those awful American clothes!" meaning mine. My frocks were simple but bright and the other girls wore clothes that looked like sacks tied in the middle. The girls seemed to like to feel the silk and gaze at the color but the men did not care to have attention attracted to me. I was too bourgeois for them.

There are Bolsheviks even today who consider washing a sign of bourgeois decadence. I once heard a remark,

"Imagine, he takes a bath every day," and it was said in a tone of disapproval at such extraordinary self-indulgence. Of course this was not because of any fear that cleanliness meant too much sensual pleasure and consideration for the body, as the early Christians feared, but because it involved, in Russia, a loss of time and of energy.

The party has gone so far as to frown on complicated domestic arrangements. Polygamy is prohibited. One is allowed to marry as many times as one wants, but some of the most daring, whose marriages and divorces have run into the teens, have been known to receive sound lectures from the presiding magistrate. And the punishment in Russia for anyone attempting to evade the responsibility of his or her parenthood is summary and severe. It is the accepted rule that severer punishment must be meted out to party members for deviation from its standards, as it is also notorious that Communist offenders receive longer sentences in court than non-Communists.

If I have summarized the new Communist morality as a puritanical faith, it has not been to disparage it but to explain its dynamic energy and force—its driving power. It is not possible to conquer continents, to convert whole countries, to lift millions of people out of an Asiatic sleep, without rules, without tremendous self-sacrifice and denial of personal pleasure. It is with this attitude that the Bolsheviks shape their morality.

Negro Barbers in the South

By VIRGINIUS DABNEY

THE Negroes of the South are in grave danger of being driven from one of the few remaining trades in which they are able to compete on anything like even terms with the whites. This is the trade of barbering. The organized white barbers of the country are gradually securing the adoption of bills in the various States setting up boards of barber examiners which pass on the qualifications of applicants and issue and revoke licenses. Already twenty-six commonwealths have passed such laws. Most of them are in the West, but the States of the East and South are slowly falling into line. Every State west of the Mississippi has adopted a barber bill of one sort or another with the exception of Wyoming, New Mexico, Arkansas, and Oklahoma, while east of the river Wisconsin, Illinois, Michigan, Louisiana, Tennessee, North Carolina, Maryland, Connecticut, and Rhode Island have done so. The movement spread to the South only two or three years ago. Sponsors of these laws have not had an easy time getting them through the Southern legislatures owing to the large Negro population and the widespread belief that barber bills below the Potomac are designed to eliminate Negroes from the trade. But four of the former Confederate States already have adopted such measures, and Florida failed to do so by a margin of one vote.

It is true that the organized white barbers and spokesmen for the American Federation of Labor, with which they are affiliated, are loud in their denials that these bills are drawn in such a way as ultimately to get rid of colored competition. The object of this legislation is, they say, "to protect the public." It is worth noting, however, that the Negro barbers in the Southern States are thoroughly convinced that the bills are designed to put them out of business, at least in so far as their white clientele is concerned, and they fear that foreign-born barbers will sooner or later want their colored trade as well. They also contend with emphasis that discrimination is being shown by examining boards against colored practitioners.

I am unable to confirm definitely the truth of this latter contention. The laws have been effective for only a short time in the South, and it is therefore difficult to obtain reliable data as to their effect on the Negroes. But I am in a position to present certain facts which throw considerable light on the question.

The Negro barbers of Virginia are heaving sighs of relief as a result of the recent defeat by the State senate of one of these barber bills. The measure was backed by the Virginia Federation of Labor, the four railway brotherhoods, and the National Women's Trade Union League, and was vigorously opposed by the Virginia Commission on Interracial Relations. Few bills before the Virginia Legislature at the session of 1930 created more widespread interest. When the committee hearing was held, the senate chamber was packed, with many standing. Already the press of the State had with virtual unanimity denounced the bill on the theory that it was designed to eliminate colored competition and to create a monopoly for the white members of the trade, with consequent skyrocketing of prices.

This was vigorously denied by the sponsors of the bill. They favored it only "as a health measure" and "in order to elevate the profession," they declared. Their sole object in working night and day to get this legislation through the assembly was "to protect the public." And why did the public need protection? Because Maryland, Tennessee, and North Carolina had already enacted similar legislation, with the result that hordes of diseased barbers, unable to pass the physical examinations required in those States and suffering from all manner of ailments from psittacosis to delirium tremens, were flocking into the Old Dominion and contaminating the populace.

Opponents of the measure pointed out, on the other hand, that Dr. Ennion G. Williams, Health Commissioner of Virginia and a man who enjoys a national reputation in his field, had said there was absolutely no need for the bill. They further declared that under its terms the proposed board of three white barbers could sooner or later eliminate all the colored barbers on one pretext or another, and they asserted that certain persons who advocated the bill had been heard to boast of the manner in which prices had been raised in States where such legislation had been enacted. A white barber who had been in the business for fifty-four years in one of Richmond's leading hotels appeared in opposition, and laughed at the claims that Virginia was being flooded with diseased barbers from neighboring commonwealths. He said he had recently advertised for two weeks for a man for his shop and had not secured a single reply. The closing speaker in opposition was Ben Taylor, a Negro barber, who delivered a tremendous oration in which he declared that his fellow hair-trimmers and razor-wielders would "whiten the mountains with their bones" and "dye old Virginia with their blood" rather than submit to be licensed by a State board of barber examiners.

After the hearing the bill was considered for several days by the committee and was substantially amended. Practically all its teeth were drawn. It was placed on the calendar, but was recommitted on the ground that it was satisfactory neither to its friends nor its enemies. However, the committee was unable or unwilling to suggest any further changes, and it was returned to the senate unaltered. Even in this emasculated condition it appealed to the white barbers. They were aware that if they could get some sort of board established it would be a comparatively easy matter to persuade the assembly to extend its powers in the future. For the same reason the colored barbers fought the plan.

At last the day arrived for the final vote. Each of the four patrons was asked whether he would make a fight for the bill on the floor, and each replied in the negative, saying that he had consented to be sponsor to the measure only because importuned to do so by the white barbers. On the other hand, Senator J. Belmont Woodson, of Nelson County, delivered a fierce assault upon it. The Senator, who is a practicing physician, characterized the argument that it was a health measure as "perfectly absurd" and "absolutely an insult to the intelligence of the Legislature of Virginia." He declared that if it was passed the Negroes would be frozen out and the tariff on hair cuts would go to "seventy-five cents or a dollar." He then asked: "Why should the barbers of Virginia all of a sudden become so much interested in the health of the people of the State? They wouldn't keep their shops in sanitary condition until Dr. Ennion G. Williams made them do it."

Nobody in the senate was sufficiently interested in the bill to answer Dr. Woodson. The four patrons sat silent under his verbal barrage. The vote was taken. Red and green lights flashed on the wall as the senators pressed buttons at their desks connecting with the new voting machine. White and colored barbers in the gallery craned their necks. The count was announced: ayes 16, noes 21. The bill was beaten. It will doubtless be revived in 1932. The white barbers got it through the senate in 1928 with the aid of Senator W. H. Jeffreys, Jr., only to see it beaten in the house by Delegate R. L. Jeffreys, his brother. Two years from now they will be back with another barber bill. What its provisions will be no one can say. Much will depend on what they think they can get. Last summer they announced that the bill to be introduced at the 1930 session would require all barbers to have at least an eighth-grade education, to pass a physical examination, to take a six months' course, and to complete an apprenticeship of eighteen months more, before they could be licensed. The requirements as to an eighth-grade education and a six months' course were subsequently abandoned. In addition, all towns and villages of less than 2,000 population were placed outside the purview of the bill on the theory, as its friends acknowledged, that otherwise it would never pass.

A prominent newspaperman who was present at a gathering of white barbers in Richmond last year, held for the purpose of discussing the measure, is authority for the statement that they freely admitted they desired its passage in order to "run the Negroes out of business" and raise the tariffs in their own shops. Noteworthy, too, is the fact that one of the patrons of the bill recently acknowledged to the present writer that under the terms which it contained when introduced the Negro barbers could be virtually eliminated "in ten or fifteen years."

An idea of the type of questions which examining boards ask of barbers who desire to be licensed is given by the Square Deal, an organ of the trade published at Des Moines, Iowa. In its February, 1930, number it prints a series of questions, of which it says:

> The series of State-board questions and answers published in the Square Deal last year proved such an outstanding hit that we are at it again—with better and harder questions. All the questions on this page are on the subject of human hair. Surely no subject is closer to the practice of barbering. Yet we venture to say that very few barbers could get a passing grade of 70 per cent on these questions . . .

Here are some of the questions: "How many hairs are there to the square inch on the average scalp?" "Where is the arrector pili muscle located and what is its function?" "How is a hair connected with the blood stream and nerve system?" "Describe the function and location of the sebaceous glands." "What is the scientific name for hair which shows a tendency to split?"

Aside from the asininity of requiring a hair-trimmer to be able to locate the arrector pili muscle and describe its functions, imagine the glorious opportunity which such questions afford a board of white barbers who wish to eliminate troublesome Negro competition! Is a certain Negro shop taking too much business from its white rivals? Then a question or two to the operator concerning sebaceous glands and the problem is quickly solved.

It should be stated in justice to the sponsors of barber bills that similar legislation is offered by other groups at almost every session of every State legislature in the Union. In Virginia, for example, the plumbers, the realtors, and the embalmers, to mention no others, have come forward with equally grandiose schemes setting up stiff requirements for would-be practitioners, with licensing boards and other abracadabra, all "solely for the protection of the public." There is reason to believe that Virginia is a typical State in this respect. In other parts of the Republic certain professions or trades also have been able to set up virtual monopolies against competition, and others are trying to follow suit. A bill making the Virginia Bar Association an agency of the State government was defeated at this year's session in the Old Dominion after members of the legal profession in the senate had attacked it violently on the theory that the lawyers who favored it were seeking to prevent many deserving persons from practicing in Virginia. Those who backed the bill said it was offered "solely for the protection of the public." Seven States already have passed legislation of this kind, and others unquestionably will take similar action. Thus, the barbers who ask enactment of barber bills are in the same category as the members of other trades and professions who desire legislation of a like nature. Whether the public is desirous of being "protected" by these altruistic barbers, realtors, and plumbers, these unselfish lawyers and embalmers, is another question.

The Power Trust Wins Again

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, July 5

DURING the last Presidential campaign there were a number of persons who believed the real issue to be whether the government would control the power trust, or vice versa. Subsequent events, including the devious maneuvers of Secretary Wilbur in relation to Boulder Dam, have tended to confirm that impression. However, the most important test has just been presented. The five men whom Herbert Hoover appoints to the new Federal Power Commission will be in a position to dispose of power sites representing the most valuable natural resource now remaining in the public's possession. They will determine the system of accounting to be employed in arriving at the valuations upon which future rates will be based. Eventually they will be authorized to regulate the rates on all electric current transmitted across State boundaries. Their decisions will be a vital factor in shaping the industrial development of the nation, and ultimately will exercise a profound influence upon the daily lives of the population. The importance of selecting the right sort of men for the job needs no emphasis. Therefore it is illuminating to note that, as his first and most important choice, Mr. Hoover has selected Major General Edgar Jadwin, retired Chief of Army Engineers, for the chairmanship of the commission. The General's record leaves no doubt about his attitude on the power question. As chairman of a board of experts assigned to study the Muscle Shoals problem four years ago, he approved the bid of the associated power companies for a lease of the property. He expressed grave doubts concerning the wisdom of building Boulder Dam. He opposed the creation of a national park at Great Falls, the most famous beauty spot near Washington, and submitted a minority report recommending that the site be turned over to private interests for power development. A subordinate officer, Major Harold C. Fiske, was found to have solicited funds from the Electric Bond and Share Company to complete a survey of the Cove Creek site, at a time when a subsidiary of that company was applying for a permit to develop the site. Subsequently Jadwin not only recommended granting the permit, but stated before the House Committee on Military Affairs that he saw nothing objectionable in Fiske's conduct, which prompted Chairman James to remark:

> I had intended to ask you to start court-martial proceedings or an investigation against Major Fiske; but I will have to broaden it, I believe, because from your attitude I do not believe you are a fit man to be Chief of Army Engineers.

Nevertheless, Mr. Hoover considers him a fit man to be chairman of the Federal Power Commission, and, according to reports, is accepting his advice in choosing the other four members!

* * * * *

IT was a noble victory when that joke body known as the House of Representatives sustained the President's veto of the veterans' pension bill. Although the House was originally and directly responsible for the worst features of the bill—and for many others which the Senate deleted before sending it to the President—the journalistic boy scouts at once filled the air with hosannas to the "statesmanlike qualities" of the House, and with hymns to the masterful leadership of Speaker Longworth. But now the "victory" has assumed a doubtful aspect. After a burlesque debate, limited to twenty minutes on each side, the "statesmanlike" body passed another bill embodying the same offensive principle of general pension legislation which Mr. Hoover so soundly denounced in the vetoed measure. It is true that the immediate cost of the second bill will be less than that of the first, but that is the chief difference between them. As passed by the Senate the rates are raised. Assuming that the President was interested in the soundness of the legislation rather than in the immediate cost, there remained the same excellent reasons for vetoing the second measure that existed for vetoing the first. The second pension bill was passed in the form described and Mr. Hoover's new-found courage did not extend to another veto.

* * * * *

ALTHOUGH the Senate shines in contrast with the House, it certainly did nothing to enhance its reputation when it curtailed the appropriation for the Wickersham commission and adopted a provision confining the commission's activity to an investigation of prohibition enforcement. The fact that on second thought it decided to grant the requested appropriation without strings is no extenuation. Granted that the Administration is using the commission as a device for dodging the issues raised by enforcement and that the commission itself has shown no great courage or intelligence in tackling that subject, therein lies the very reason for allowing it to continue its work in those other fields of inquiry where it has a real chance to accomplish something of value. Nothing that the commission might say or do will have much effect on prohibition enforcement; but its studies and recommendations may have a vast effect in modernizing our antiquated court procedure, police methods, and penal system. A distinguished staff of experts already has been recruited and much valuable information assembled. Royal commissions performed this task in Canada and Great Britain forty years ago, and the fact that it has been so long neglected in the United States is, of course, a national disgrace. That it happened to be a by-product in the case of the Wickersham commission was no reason for ending it. In this instance the by-product was the only useful product. Hoover's announced determination to obtain the necessary funds from private sources was creditable, but it would have resulted in trouble and confusion, and it never should have been necessary. If he and his trained fleas would desist from their senseless habit of constantly giving gratuitous offense to the Senate, such things would not occur.

* * * * *

IN the matter of prohibition enforcement the Administration every day manifests an increasing disposition to be more "conservative" in those centers of population where prohibition is unpopular. I predict that future efforts to "tighten up" enforcement will be confined to areas where enforcement is clearly wanted, and that inhabitants of such present oases as New York, Philadelphia, Detroit, Baltimore, and St. Louis need feel no alarm. (If I except Chicago it is because the bootleggers there seem bent on exterminating themselves.) In short, this Administration seems prepared to do furtively and hypocritically approximately what Governor Smith, in his campaign for the Presidency, proposed doing legally and openly. When one contemplates that fact, and contemplates also the fact that Mr. Hoover has virtually adopted his late opponent's proposal to place tariff revision in the hands of a tariff commission, one marvels that he refrained from voting for Governor Smith in 1928. His best ideas seem to have been borrowed from him.

* * * * *

SILENCE in recent weeks on the part of the Senate committee authorized to investigate charges of corruption in connection with post-office leases throughout the country should not be construed as an indication that the committee is idle, or that it has accomplished nothing. Under the direction of Senator Blaine and John Holland—that youthful veteran of the Teapot Dome and lobby investigations—a staff of accountants and investigators has accumulated and is sifting a mountain of information, out of which will presently come proofs of graft, favoritism, and corruption that ought to shock a public long hardened to "business administrations." It will be shown that gentlemen once high in the government accepted fat fees for securing leases from their former official associates; that millions of dollars were obtained from the public for bonds based on exorbitant rentals paid by the government rather than on the actual value of the properties, and that the government's name was widely used in selling these bonds. Moreover, unless I am mistaken, it will be found that substantial contributions were made to certain political campaign funds by persons obtaining such leases or desiring to obtain them. This pretty kettle of fish probably will be uncovered in September, when the committee, after digesting the documentary evidence, proceeds to conduct open hearings in various cities. What a delightful new term for patriots to contemplate—"the United States Post Office racket"!

Now Summer

By RUTH LANGLAND HOLBERG

Now summer brings again the days that sting,
Torrid days with cicadas insistently shrill;
The trees have leaves that glitter like grass and spill
Bright flecks of sun in the green shade-pool's dark ring
Where radiant flies dizzily skim and wing.
With high color the flower gardens fill,
Sounding like stone quarries with the busy drill
Of bees in the crimson bergamot hammering.
All else is listless, heavy, satiated;
Opening bland eyes, my languid kitten
Regards the bees where the stems and grass are plaited,
He tries to lift a clumsy furry mitten,
Lolls back too weak with sleep and heat—like me,
Sprawled in a hammock smothered in vacancy.

In the Driftway

WHEN the Drifter is very hot, as for a week in New York he has been, he thinks of penguins. These delightful birds, as his readers probably know, live in the coldest parts of the earth, where no vegetation and in some places no other animal life can live. It is a curious thing that under these very rigorous conditions, the penguin should resemble nothing so much as a well-fed bank president on his way to a meeting of his most important board of directors. The penguin is pompous and slow, he walks with dignity for he cannot fly, he has a white waistcoat and a gray cutaway, and his expression of solemnity is that of the bank president at his best. Apart from his looks, which are so charmingly self-important, the penguin's main characteristic seems to be insatiable curiosity.

* * * * *

THE Drifter does not mind confessing here and now that his information about penguins comes in the main from books—from one book, indeed, the admirable "Worst Journey in the World" of Apsley Cherry-Garrard. This account of the Scott expedition to the South Pole tells much about penguins. And aside from it, the Drifter has hardly a bowing acquaintance with the bird, although he is certain that the penguin, if pressed, could make a highly effective bow. One of Mr. Cherry-Garrard's best stories about the penguins is their method of testing dangerous waters. They are desirous of swimming about in the freezing waters of the southernmost seas for food; but in those same waters swims the sea leopard and when he swims about it is to look for penguins. The penguins line up on the edge of the ice with a great flutter and crowding. They peer down into the icy depths; they nudge each other. One can almost hear them say: "Why don't you just jump in and see if there are any sea leopards?" But whether they say it or not, they flutter still more, pushing each other toward the edge, and at last the weakest and most luckless of them plunges in with a pop. If he swims around safely, the others follow joyfully; if he is snatched up to make a leopard's breakfast they turn away in sorrow for their lost comrade and for their lost meal at the same time.

* * * * *

THE emperor penguin, who lives farthest south of all, has grown to the height of five feet and he has no time for much of the jollity of his smaller relatives. His business is to keep warm enough to live. In the Antarctic winter the temperature goes down to 70 or 80 below zero, and at this time the penguins have taken it into their heads to hatch their eggs. It seems an odd time for baby coddling, but they are passionately devoted to the occupation. The eggs they rest on their feet to keep them from freezing solid; if an unfortunate parent must at last desert his egg (the Drifter says "his" advisedly; the fathers are as ardently maternal, in that cold climate, as the mothers), a dozen eggless others are upon it, in a mad scramble for the privilege of warming it. The egg often gets broken in the melee, but the penguins do not seem to care. A child they must have. How penguins keep themselves warm nobody knows. This, with a temperature of 88 in the shade, is a comforting thought.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Scottish Subscriber Speaks

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: "As an English subscriber," writes E. Williamson in your issue of June 25, "I follow your comments on things British with added interest." As a Scottish subscriber, I do likewise. Unlike E. Williamson, however, I fail to see that your attitude on India shows that you do not appreciate "the realities of the situation." To my mind you get much nearer to these realities than does my countryman, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who has now got so far from reality that he talks of Great Britain's "having undertaken the care of peoples who could not take care of themselves." Much more realistic is Lord Rothermere, who bluntly declared in the London Daily Mail of June 3 that "the loss of India would mean immediate economic ruin to this country," and that "at least four shillings in the pound of the income of every man and woman in Great Britain is drawn, directly or indirectly, from our connections with India."

I submit that in these circumstances an intelligent American is much more likely than an intelligent Englishman to take an unprejudiced and objective view of "the realities of the situation."

John C. Mortimer

Black River Bridge, New Brunswick, June 24

Prodding Is Necessary

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Not to enjoy the vigorous prodding of The Nation is to acknowledge oneself illiberal or reactionary.

I confess to irritation at times because I think it goes too far; at others because it does not go far enough. I suppose every subscriber is just that way—and that makes you feel good. What if only 25 per cent (it is much more than that) of its attitudes are in the line of truth, right, or sanity? Don't we need just such an organ? Sure!

As a grandson of one of the early abolitionists in Beverly, Massachusetts, who was a lover and supporter of William Lloyd Garrison back in the 1830's when it took nerve, I recommend your unafraid spirit. Go to it!

Albany, N. Y., June 24 Wm. Chandler Smith

Books for Children

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A writer like Heywood Broun ought not to be challenged for his often facetiously uttered point of view, but at the risk of seeming pedantic and conservative I venture to disagree with the ideas he expresses in your issue of June 18 with regard to the type of literature fit for youngsters. He wonders why the comic strips are deplored by mothers and teachers.

He thinks Hans Christian Andersen's tale of the little match girl made his ninth Christmas holiday a solemn affair, to put it mildly. I think it was his misfortune to have been suffering from the measles at the time. And anyway, even if the story did sadden his holiday, I can see no harm in that. May it not have effectively made him realize that all is not well in this perfect world? Aside from the moral, however, I maintain that the tale is entertaining for children. I remember very well crying over the unfortunate fate of the poor little girl, but, then, I enjoyed the crying.

I remember very vividly how much I used to enjoy the fairy stories of the Grimm brothers. I used to devour them avidly, and when I got through with all there were, I went back to them again and again. I don't feel that the horrible ends that befall the wicked ones can have any sadistic effects on the young reader.

Brooklyn, June 25 Doris Fox Benardete

Rule by Force in Korea

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You have already learned, no doubt, that a few words of felicitation written by Mr. Villard, editor of The Nation, cost the life of a newspaper which has been regarded as the only light by not less than twenty million oppressed people.

Korea is inhabited by a people who enjoyed political independence and cultural leadership for about 4,000 years. It became a part of the Japanese Empire in 1910.

In the beginning of Japanese rule the natives were denied any means of expression at all, but after the nation-wide revolution of 1919 the conquerors conceded a little and allowed the publication of a few papers in the native language. And the Dong Ah Ilbo was the first of these. Now the whole plant has been forced into idleness just because Mr. Villard wrote something about the emancipation of Negroes.

These ten years have been stormy ones for the Dong Ah Ilbo. The paper was punished twice by the government, and the records show that one issue out of every four has been suppressed and confiscated. Both the president and the editor have served prison terms. But it is not the only sufferer. Out of the fifty-seven issues of a native monthly magazine forty-three have been suppressed and confiscated. The magazine was finally put to an end by the order of the Japanese government.

In Korea no one is allowed to speak in public unless he submits his speech to the local police and gets their approval beforehand. I have a brother, sixteen years old, a high-school pupil, who organized, together with a few friends of his, a kind of fraternity with the idea of having good times together, running a circulating library, and going camping from time to time. This was discovered by the local police during the recent student uprisings, and all the children were brought to the police station where they were beaten mercilessly. They have now been put on probation for three years by the court and the society has been disbanded.

Korean laborers work twelve hours seven days a week for a wage of fifty to seventy cents a day, and they are denied the right of collective bargaining. As for strikes, they are out of the question in a land where labor unions are not recognized by the law. Some workers who tried to form a labor union (mind you, it was not communistic) are behind the bars. Under the pretense of investigation political criminals are held in prison for two years without trial. The formation of a communist party is punishable by death.

In Korea a magazine must submit all manuscripts to the censors for approval. The words "independence" and "revolution" are forbidden to be published in any connection, so we use two circles and two triangles respectively to express the meaning.

Can anyone blame the Koreans if one day they become violent and use force to achieve their freedom?

Pyeng-Yang, Korea, April 20 J. C.

S. K. Ratcliffe Replies

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It would have surprised me greatly if my review of C. F. Andrews's book had failed to arouse some protests from your readers. The review was brief, and therefore, like nearly all of its kind, inadequate. Alice Stone Blackwell, however, calls it lopsided as well, and her use of that epithet, together with Grace Gilman's comment on India and non-violence, seems to make necessary a word of explanation and defense.

I would remind Miss Blackwell that I was reviewing a volume that presents Mahatma Gandhi's ideas. I was not criticizing a history or exposition of his political movement. Certain aspects of that movement have been very widely discussed in America; but the Mahatma's ethical beliefs and the extreme teaching that he has based upon them are very little known in the West. Mr. Andrews brings them out in all their rigor, and I called attention to this important fact. The significance and power of the Mahatma's personality and influence I have dwelt upon in scores of public addresses during the past few years. It is altogether fair that, when writing of a book that summarizes his ideas, a European reviewer should point out that the Gandhist creed, in the matter of sex and other fundamentals, is pure nihilism—that is, from any Western standpoint, sheer nonsense.

Miss Gilman says that my statement to the effect that India had rejected the Mahatma's central doctrine—non-violence—sounds ironical in view of the remarkable examples of Ahimsa recorded during the disturbances of May. I do not disagree with her. There can be no doubt that the Gandhist influence has held among the Swaraj volunteers in a noteworthy degree. But I was writing before Gandhi's arrest, and at a time when he himself was lamenting the meager response to his appeals. Moreover, Gandhi had not only joined the independence movement; he had allied himself with Jawaharlal Nehru, who makes no profession of non-violence; and before entering upon his march he had informed the Viceroy in the plainest terms that Young India was turning away from him and preparing for a campaign of violence.

Miss Blackwell says: "His great effort to achieve his country's freedom without bloodshed is worthy of the highest respect." It was. Many thousands of English men and women have felt it, and many of us have said so again and again by voice and pen. But the Mahatma declined the government's offer of a round-table conference, and for that fatal step we can find no justification. There is, and can be, only one alternative to violent conflict. That is conference. The refusal of conference means the choice of violence.

London, June 13 S. K. Ratcliffe

[Mr. Ratcliffe states that the burden of blame rests upon Gandhi for what Mr. Ratcliffe regards as his refusal to participate in a round-table conference. This is a matter of opinion and not of fact. Gandhi agreed to attend a conference that would include the framing of a constitution giving India the substance of independence, repeal of the salt tax, and amnesty to political prisoners. According to the only interview with Gandhi reported since his arrest, he is still ready to confer on these terms. To Mr. Ratcliffe these conditions appear unjustifiable. To another body of opinion, including The Nation, it is the government's refusal to accept Gandhi's conditions, in spite of repeated promises of self-government, which seems unjustifiable. Again, the refusal of conference does not necessarily mean the choice of violence. It may mean instead the choice of non-violence, which according to many reliable reports continues to prevail among the Swaraj volunteers in amazing degree.—Editor The Nation.]

BLACK MANHATTAN

by James Weldon Johnson

Famous Negro personalities, the Harlem of the past and of the present, the development of Negro music, art, and literature, all are in this panorama of Negro history in New York. Men like Frederick Douglass and Booker T. Washington share their fame with singers, dancers, jockeys, and pugilists. $2.50

THE LIFE AND MIND OF EMILY DICKINSON

by Genevieve Taggard

"Miss Taggard's critical biography accomplishes what is little less than a miracle of deliverance. Here for once Emily Dickinson has escaped her kin and met her kind. She has been patiently, understandingly, beautifully interpreted by a mind fitted to cope with her own."—Professor George F. Whicher in the N. Y. Herald Tribune $4.00

A ROUMANIAN DIARY

by Hans Carossa

This book of unusual literary excellence and imaginative power is a record of the mental and spiritual reactions of a poet, a mystic, and a highly sensitive man, faced by extreme hardship and suffering. $2.50

AT ALL BOOKSHOPS

730 5th Ave. · ALFRED A. KNOPF · New York City

Books

Cathemerinon

By DUDLEY FITTS

Sunrise; she woke me whispering, "It is day:
We must be early if we're to see
Our garden drenched in dew; and we must be Wholly in love, or it will burn away,
Leaving us hot and thirsty. You must say
Nothing: only hold my hand, and come with me;
We can dress after, when immediacy
Points from the sun and shames us to obey."

Noon; and her cry troubled me: "Will you turn Inwards only? Shall I have no part
In the formal drama of your heart?
If you are learned, must I also learn?
There was a time, not long, when the frail fern
Traced glory in your brain, until a dart
Hurled from the sun, and with a warning smart
Struck your consented mind coldly to burn."

Sunset; I heard her murmur, "It's too late.
It's finished, wide morning and bright dew.
It is too late to question now, or sue
For such another dawn. Or chance, or fate:
Here's terminus to our day; and you may wait
Forever, and never know the garden you
Have left so dead was ours still to renew Marvelously, and always, floreate."

I have sought her long since: it's cold
Under the stars, and lonelier than under Ground the frozen alleys of that garden.
I shall not find her, though the stripped stalks harden
Sheathed in dead dew, and January thunder
Drum far-off warning that a night is old.

An American Dynasty

The Adams Family. By James Truslow Adams. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

LAST winter, during the naval conference in London, certain of the American newspaper correspondents suddenly bethought them that one of the delegates of their country had never been heard from. All the other American delegates had talked copiously, and some of them had even talked sensibly, but this one had been silent. He was the Honorable Charles Francis Adams III, LL.B., lawyer, yachtsman, banker, railroad and public-utilities director, overseer and treasurer of Harvard, great-great-grandson of one President of the United States and great-great-great-grandson of another, and Secretary of the Navy in the Cabinet of Mr. Hoover.

Obviously, a man so eminent, both genetically and somatically, should have something apposite and valuable to say, so the press boys swarmed to his hotel and were presently in audience with him. Half an hour later they limped back to the adjacent public houses, amazed and baffled. For it turned out that what he had to say was precisely nothing. If he really knew any more about the inner workings of the conference than the marines who policed the corridors of the Carlton Hotel, then he managed to keep it to himself. And if he had any suggestions to offer about its conduct and aims, then there was no evidence of it in his sparse and halting words.

Thus the correspondents came home from London with an uneasy feeling that the celebrated Adams family, after five generations of high talent and achievement, had at last blown up, and this impression, I am informed, is now pretty general in Washington. Mr. James Truslow Adams, who belongs to a quite different tribe of Adamses, evades the question in his book, but presents a lot of evidence that points the same way. The plain fact is that the pearl and flower of all the Adamses was the original John, and that none of his heirs and assigns, not even his son John Quincy, has ever come within miles of him. They have been diligent and earnest men, and some of them have been men of considerable ability, but their weaknesses have always held them short of really first-rate work. What they have done has often attracted attention, both in the field of scholarship and in that of public service, but three times out of four it has attracted that attention not because it was extraordinary in itself, but because it was the work of Adamses.

Mr. Adams's study of them, as if borrowing something from their own futility, is a much feebler piece of writing than his well-known ventures into New England history. It has an air of improvisation: there is no sign of hard spade-work in it. Thus what he has to say of the dynasty differs but little from what anyone else would say—that its members, from first to last, have always taken life with deadly seriousness; that they have had a vast appetite for learning, some of it sound and some of it otherwise; that they have had the comfort of an unshakable self-righteousness; that they have commonly done well in a worldly sense; that they have always been more or less snobbish; and that every one of them has been a helpless victim to cacoethes scribendi. Perhaps the last of the line departs from the norm in all these ways. Certainly he has done no writing, and to date there is little evidence that he has ever done any thinking.

Mr. Adams says of Henry Adams's "Education" and "Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres" that they are "two of the most remarkable books in American literature." The adjective had better be taken in its strictest sense. Remarkable they certainly are, but that there is anything more in them than a somewhat drug-storish sentimentality I have often doubted. The first made a splash because it was recognized as a furious criticism of the whole American scheme of things, and anything of the sort, coming from an Adams, was important news, but its fury was not accompanied by anything properly describable as penetration, and today, reread, the book has an indubitably shallow and even sophomoric smack. It might have been written, given sufficient skill at English, by one of the new humanists.

"Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres" is quite as unsatisfactory. It is an evocation of the Middle Ages by a man who had but lately discovered them, and whose understanding of them remained defective to the end. Mr. Adams puts its thesis into a sentence: "All the steam in the world" could not have built Chartres cathedral. This banality makes one rejoice that Henry's later discovery of the South Seas, under the tutelage of John La Farge, did not result in another book. Of his "History of the United States from 1801 to 1817" a layman is not competent to speak; Mr. Adams says that it is "one of the great productions of American historical scholarship." It may be so, but I doubt that it is ever read today save by historians. Or that "Democracy" has any place in the permanent stock of American fiction.

There is no space to deal with Brooks Adams, a less famous but far more interesting fellow. His ventures into historical theorizing, it seems to me, are far shrewder than his brother's, and his "Emancipation of Massachusetts" is full of pungent and novel ideas. But perhaps the best Adams of that fourth generation was neither Henry nor Brooks but their brother, Charles Francis II. I commend his "Studies: Diplomatic and Military" to anyone who desires to savor the Adams talent at its best; and his judgment upon the American heroes of his time as a sample of the Adams pessimism at its wisest:

> I have known, and known tolerably well, a good many "successful" men—"big" financially—men famous during the last half-century; and a less interesting crowd I do not care to encounter. Not one that I have ever known would I ever care to meet again, either in this world or the next; nor is one of them associated in my mind with the idea of humor, thought, or refinement. A set of mere money-getters and traders, they were essentially unattractive and uninteresting.

Here is snobbery perhaps, but here is also sense. In this Charles Francis II there were plain traces of the Boylston blood which seems to have lifted the first John out of the original family wallow. He was a very clever fellow—but, like the rest since John I, he always fell a bit short. Charles Francis III falls short all the way, and so the family returns to the primordial protoplasm, following the Washingtons, Lincolns, and Roosevelts. The American air is not salubrious to dynasties.

H. L. Mencken

Men in Battle

Generals Die in Bed. By Charles Yale Harrison. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

Everyman at War. Sixty Personal Narratives of the War. Edited by C. B. Purdon. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

Her Privates We. By Private 19022. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Captured! By Ferdinand Huszti Horvath. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

SCENES of horror and destruction do not necessarily present war as an unattractive experience. Looking back over the present generation of war books, one finds that war has been unconsciously glorified. The personal record of any one man recreating a story of conflict against the social machinery of modern warfare is a melodramatic spectacle of extraordinary power. From a strictly personal point of view the experience of war is almost never without its elements of heroism, particularly if the individual happens to be an officer in absolute control over a large number of men. It is only when war is realized as a mass performance, sordid in its immediate objective and unintelligent in its waste of human life and effort, that the actual horror of war experience begins to take effect in no uncertain terms.

The value of Charles Yale Harrison's sketches of trench warfare lies in the fact that the author is convincingly anonymous. Beyond his gift for writing rapid-fire, hard-hitting prose, Mr. Harrison has the knack of submerging his personality in the lives of his fellow-privates serving as Canadian shock troops on the British front line. The men's real enemies were officers, rats, lice, and bad food. The business of serving as shock troops left them no time for detailed introspection. Those who were lucky received a "blighty" wound. The rest had to fight on somehow, attacking, retreating, deserting, clawing at extra portions of food at mess or an extra bottle of wine at the estaminet; the miracle was to stay alive. Mr. Harrison's story of the looting of Arras by the Canadian troops is a piece of superlative reporting. If after reading "Generals Die in Bed" you have any enthusiasm left for the glorious aspects of modern warfare, you have a strong and excessively non-realistic imagination.

It may be noted that of the sixty personal narratives of the World War contained in "Everyman at War" the most convincing accounts are written by privates and that they sustain the point of view projected by Mr. Harrison. The collection is admittedly an experiment in the use of social documentation, but it is neither extensive enough nor of sufficient unity of purpose to be of any permanent value.

In contrast to Mr. Harrison's vivid series of war sketches we have a full-bodied war novel in "Her Privates We," which has received an unusual measure of praise from popular reviewers in the English press. Arnold Bennett, evidently under pressure of great excitement, believes that this novel written by one of his Majesty's privates, regimental number 19022, "will be remembered when 'All Quiet on the Western Front' is forgotten."

Very likely "Her Privates We" has won legitimate popularity in England by representing a sublimation of the English public's reaction to the World War. The prevailing atmosphere throughout the novel is one of casual disillusionment and melancholy. The story is told with discreet honesty and dignity. The day-to-day monotony of trench warfare is faithfully suggested. Private Bourne, the protagonist, is obviously a product of the English public schools, a man of literary and cultural refinement. Uneasily you suspect that his attitude toward his fellow-privates is that of a weary, sadly amused member of a slumming party from Park Avenue on a visit to the Bowery. Bourne heroically carries his burden as a private, refusing to accept offers of a commission from his officers, with whom he is on the best of terms. At last he consents to a lance-corporalship (after all, he is a member of the ruling class) but is killed before he assumes command. For all its calm understatement of incident, the novel is the familiar overdramatization of the individual's reaction to war. Bourne dies in a pale haze of perverted glory.

"Captured!" the confessions of an Austrian lieutenant taken prisoner by the Russians, is a good old-fashioned example of Hearst Sunday feature-writing. Lieutenant Horvath does not allow a little thing like war to interfere with his ability to make love to the ladies. His affair with the wife of a Russian official is priceless. His generalities concerning the Revolution of 1917 are irresistibly comic and always inaccurate.

Horace Gregory

A Cultural Survey

The Great Revival, 1543-1687. (A History of Modern Culture. Volume I.) By Preserved Smith. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

PROFESSOR SMITH considers culture as synonymous with the intellectual life of man, and he has undertaken the elaborate work of which this is the first instalment because, while there have been histories of parts of the subject such as literature, science, or religion, there has been "hardly any history of that complex whole that includes knowledge, belief, morals, law, customs, opinions, religion, superstition, and art." He begins, accordingly, with a survey of the state and progress of astronomy, physics, mathematics, geography, biology, anatomy, and science generally in the century and a half with which he deals; follows this with a similar survey of the humanities as represented by philosophy, political theory, historiography, and Biblical and classical scholarship; goes on to education, religion, free thought, superstition, persecution, tolerance, and law as illustrations of "social control"; and concludes with a summary view of morals and manners, literature, and art. Save for a few references to colonial America, what is said applies only to Europe.

Not even a genius of the first water could possibly be an expert in all these fields, and the ablest attempt to sweep them all into a comprehensive view of intellectual history must lean heavily upon the findings of specialists. A good deal of what Professor Smith has to say, therefore, must be set down as compilation. It is intelligent and skilful compilation, however, and while Professor Smith's style is not enlivening, his pages are illumined by frequent well-turned phrases and clever observations which make the matter-of-fact narrative agreeable reading. On the whole, the book is to be adjudged a work of solid information and summary rather than one of notable insight or arresting interpretation.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Religion as a Literary Affair

Religion in Human Affairs. By Clifford Kirkpatrick. John Wiley and Sons. $4.50.

God. By J. Middleton Murry. Harper and Brothers. $3.

The Cradle of God. By Llewelyn Powys. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

Adventures in Religion. By Basil King. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

ANYONE desiring a religious literary digest should turn to Professor Kirkpatrick's book. It is an exceptionally judicious and competent compendium of current ideas about religion. Practically every theme and name which figures in recent literature on the subject is mentioned here and is succinctly assigned to its proper or improper place. The author is to be congratulated on his skill and candor in assorting systematically several hundreds of cards containing thousands of bits of information and constructing them into a clear, useful, and unconventional textbook. Unfortunately he was compelled to omit the first section as projected, a survey of three typical primitive religions, and unfortunately the editor did not take time to elide all the references to this eliminated section.

As it stands the book has two parts. The first is a critical résumé of anthropological theories of religion, culminating in what the author calls a "synthetic distinction" between religion and other culture patterns. The resultant conception of religion is compounded of several prominent theories and is formulated thus: religion is "a culture pattern with an emotion of reverence, a belief in mysterious powers, and noncoercive behavior bringing man into relation to these powers." Such a theory of religion, though more catholic in its sympathies than others, is still largely preoccupied with the psychological distinctions between emotion, belief, and behavior and with the anthropological distinctions between religion, magic, and animism. These distinctions are doubtless of practical value to the scientist and are indispensable to the reader in this field, but it would be refreshing and probably revealing to see a directly social approach to religion in terms of human affairs. Therefore the high hopes raised by the title and by the general aim of the book cause the reader to be annoyed by the long theoretical discussions, and when he finally reaches "human affairs" in Chapters VIII and IX he is dismayed by the cursory treatment which is meted out to what is presumably the main theme.

There is a second part of the book, devoted almost exclusively to a consideration of recent issues in American discussion of the Christian religion. In this the author has an opportunity to make a more detailed analysis of the human affairs at stake. But the reader is again disappointed, for the only human affairs which receive serious attention are science and technology. Of religion's role in the other human affairs listed in Chapters VIII and IX (social organization, morals, patriotism, and the fine arts) there is certainly much to be said at present and much that requires the kind of analysis which only a trained sociologist could make. Instead, we are treated once more to a competent review of the hackneyed theme of modern science and Christian mythology. The nearest approach to a critical study of other social phases of religion today is to be found in the chapter on Religious Disorganization, in which the author develops the thesis that, despite the theories and efforts directed toward unification, the general tendency in religion seems to be an increasing individualism and differentiation of cults. Two fundamental prejudices are conspicuous in Professor Kirkpatrick, prejudices which would be natural enough in a Protestant Christian but which are somewhat unseemly in a sociologist: one, that culturally "pure" religion is characterized by reverence; the other, that ritual is merely an "institutional adjunct" of religion. Certainly a disinterested study of primitive religion and of many of the most popular and vital aspects of all great religions would make such statements appear to be criticisms and not descriptions of the facts. Such statements are natural consequences of the common habit of explaining religion in terms of beliefs in "mysterious powers" instead of in terms of the human affairs which generate them. And such habits probably explain the subordination of both religion and human affairs to science and theology.

The love of J. Middleton Murry for Katherine Mansfield, the story of which forms the first and last chapters of Mr. Murry's book entitled "God," is a case in point, and I shall use it to illustrate the way in which religion grows out of at least one kind of human affairs. Mr. Murry and Miss Mansfield were romantically (that is, genuinely) in love; at least, he was. She was stricken with tuberculosis and in despair came under the spell of the Gurdjieff cult, whose inappropriate rites hastened her tragic death. These events completely crushed Mr. Murry. In moral and intellectual anguish he lost all sense of reality, his own reality included. Suddenly one evening as he sat desolate before his fireplace:

> A moment came [he tells us] when the darkness of that ocean changed to light, the cold to warmth; when it swept in one great wave over the shores and frontiers of myself, when it bathed me and I was renewed; when the room was filled with a presence, and I knew I was not alone—that I never could be alone any more, that the universe beyond held no menace, for I was part of it, that in some way for which I had sought in vain so many years, I belonged, and because I belonged I was no longer I, but something different, which could never be afraid in the old ways or cowardly with the old cowardice. . . . The "presence" of Katherine Mansfield was of the same order as the "presence" which filled the room and me. In so far as the "presence" was connected with her it had a moral quality, or a moral effect; I was immediately and deeply convinced that "all was well with her."

Whatever may be the delusion connected with this experience, and whatever its physiology, its consequences were too real to allow him to dismiss it as a mere illusion. It produced a process of "disintoxication" whereby he was not only "spiritually" and permanently reunited with the one he loved, but was reconciled to the universe; and this reconciliation, as it grew on his mind, was transformed into a general reconciliation between science and religion. It did not reconcile him to God; it taught him that he no longer needed God. For just as his bodily life was part of the living world, so his "soul" was an intrinsic event in the "metabiological organic unity of the world." He discovered that he, as well as every other "pure phenomenon," was incomprehensible; nevertheless he was a creative variation in the cultural organism.

Now, whether or not Mr. Murry is a "pure" phenomenon, he is certainly a religious one, and his religion is evidently the product of his need for Katherine Mansfield, not of his need for God. He is now quite willing to grant the Roman Catholic church a monopoly of God, at least of the Christian God; he makes no claim to have found God, and even upbraids Spinoza for having labeled his and Mr. Murry's discovery God. He does not worship the "metabiological organic whole" nor does he love it. He simply understands his relation to it and "accepts himself." "'God' and I, one might almost say, are a little tired of each other. It is time for us to part. This book is the story of the parting. It seems to me that we part on good terms, better, far better, than I should have ever imagined possible."

Since it has been my aim here to present Mr. Murry as a religious case history for Professor Kirkpatrick, I have emphasized the "spiritual autobiography" in his book. Of course it contains more—a whole mythology. He selects from among the romantic geniuses or "pure phenomena" three as illustrative of his theory: Jesus, Keats, and D. H. Lawrence—men who, though given to romantic illusions, are permanently significant as patterns of metabiological coherence. This is no place to argue with Mr. Murry, and a metaphysician cannot, of course, complain when he is plagued by a metabiologist. But I might merely confess that I can follow the argument, except for his talk about organic unity. There may be, for all I know, a general trend in evolution from "prebiological to biological to metabiological life" and, I might add, to super-metabiological life, but I see no evidence either in Mr. Murry, in his book, or in the emergent cosmos for a universal organic coherence, not even metabiological coherence. The intelligible problem is not: what is my significance for the universe? but what significance has the universe for me? I suspect that Mr. Murry himself is really more worried about his romantic newness than about his permanent significance. As he says, "The strain of being a new man in an old world is terrible.

Llewelyn Powys's "The Cradle of God" is apparently intended to be a Rabelaisian account of the Bible. Knowing little about Rabelais, I hesitate to criticize the book on this score. It is true, the characters stalk through its pages in a Gargantuan manner—from Abraham, with "vital loins, itching to beget thousands," to Saint Paul, whose boundless egoism developed the theory that Christ was in him and perverted "Christ's illumination" into the "flowing-away, world-undermining doctrine about the weak overcoming the strong, the foolish overcoming the clever, the things that are not overcoming those that are." God himself is introduced as "the God of jealousy, the jealous father of men . . . that strange, barbarous, adolescent absolute, so dependent upon the savor the generations gave him, so dependent on what the prophets said of him! Real and yet unreal! Creator and not created! Very God of very man!" Samuel is the "dour old man who never took an ox or an ass, and never uttered a civil word except in his prayers." Such characterizations may provoke a Rabelaisian grin, but are more apt to end in a Voltairean smile. When we come to the prophets, the later kings, the captivity, the restoration, the Maccabean revolt, and to Christ, we see what we suspected earlier, that Mr. Powys has been following the conventional history of the critics, filling in a little with Josephus and the Apochrypha. The prophets, with the exception of the obsessed Elijah persecuting the urbane Queen Jezebel, are portrayed along conventional Christian lines, leading up to the Messianic prophecy of Isaiah. The portrayal of Jesus, though perhaps not conventional, is an oversentimental tour de force. Most artificial of all is the representation of Jesus as the end-product and culmination of Jewish history, for in this Mr. Powys abandons all historical perspective, all critical insight, and blatantly exploits Christian prejudices. On the whole, the book is marred continually by excessive stylistic effort; the author is too evidently preoccupied with the art of writing to present his subject matter convincingly. But after this is said, it remains true that there are frequent bits of unusual insight and expressions of surpassing force or beauty. The majority of readers, however, will no doubt prefer to take both their Bible and their Rabelais straight.

"Adventures in Religion," by Basil King, is a diverting Victorian farce. It takes us back a generation or two into an old-fashioned family circle—the father reading the paper, the mother sewing; Ellie asks her mother, "What is a church?" and Bobby goes her one better by asking father, "What is religion?" Father lies awake pondering the question, plagues his office mates for an answer, and finally finds a satisfactory solution for Bobby in the dictionary. One question leads to another and each question requires a brief sermon in reply; each sermon requires a chapter, and at the end of each chapter the "dutiful" Bobby is delighted to know the answer and eagerly asks the next question. About two-thirds of the way through, mother gets interested in father's ideas too, and begins to ask questions similar to those of the children. It all ends as happily as possible for such a family, by the children being baptized, the poor relatives being subsidized, and the parents admitting that a church is an obligation. These are the dangers of answering childish questions, and these are the religious "adventures" of Basil King.

HERBERT W. SCHNEIDER

Women in Germany

Germany's Women Go Forward. By Hugh Wiley Puckett. Columbia University Press. $4.50.

FAR in the distance are the watchwords of the old German Empire—"Kinder, Küche, und Kirche." The position of women in Germany has radically changed during the past two decades. How much of this progress is due to the efforts of women themselves is a moot question. Mr. Hugh Puckett has presented a most interesting survey of the woman's movement in Germany against a shifting background of political and economic events. His thesis is that there are three phases in the history of the woman's movement—in Germany as in other modern countries. The first was the phase of the man-made criterion, when the ideal woman approximated what man conceived her to be. This was the period of Frauendienst, the age of chivalry, as well as the age of the accepted inferiority of women. The second phase was dominated by the conception that women had a personality apart from the masculine idealization. In this phase women sought to emulate men, to secure their so-called "rights," and to approximate their vices. The third phase is the one in which women have rediscovered their individuality: "Instead of claiming that they can do anything that men can do, they are willing to divide the field of culture with men, admitting men's superiority in certain lines and claiming their own in others."

German literature of the early half of the eighteenth century is full of the philosophical discussions concerning women to be found in English literature of a century or so before. There was the author who with typical German Gründlichkeit wrote five volumes on an "Attempt to Characterize the Feminine Sex." This was concluded by a prayer from the author to "deliver him from learned women; they expect men to please them instead of themselves trying to please." And yet according to the writings of Tacitus, and even the old German legends, the women of the early German tribes were the equals of men and frequently their superiors. The decay of medieval society and the advent of the Reformation caused a shifting in the values placed upon the sex. Women were put into the chimney corner; they became the butt of masculine jests.

The eighteenth century found many individual women struggling for education, for the right of self-expression in art, poetry, and literature. The French Revolution too had its liberalizing effect in Germany. New ideas and expressions were bandied around in the salons of Rachel Varnhagen, Henriette Herz, and Dorothea Mendelssohn. It was not until the nineteenth century, however, with the greater industrialization of Germany, that organizations were created for the purpose of securing more rights and privileges for women. These organizations represented primarily the bourgeois women. The workingwomen found no champions until late in the nineteenth century, when the Socialist Party, with such leaders as August Bebel, attempted to formulate a program for working-class women.

Women's entrance into politics came through the recent war. Several million women then found themselves in the economic trenches—and for the first time the old-line political parties took cognizance of them. Since the war German women, like those of practically every other country, have forged ahead in the fields of education, literature, and the arts, and have grasped new privileges in their legal, social, and economic relations. Whether they have attained the third phase in their development the author does not state.

THERESA WOLFSON

Father and Son

John Sebastian Bach. By Charles Sanford Terry. Oxford University Press. $7.50.
John Christian Bach. By Charles Sanford Terry. Oxford University Press. $8.50.

ONE might be tempted to question the necessity for a new biography of John Sebastian Bach when we already have the voluminous and comprehensive studies, weighty with scholarship, by Sweitzer and Spitta. True, Mr. Terry is deservedly considered the greatest contemporary authority on Bach—but what new things can be said at this late date which have not already been said more convincingly and more thoroughly? Nor does a careful reading of the book answer the question. The work, it is true, is solidly compact, full of informative material; but Mr. Terry has added nothing to what we already know. Its greatest use, I am afraid, will be only to those who have not the courage, the patience, or the time to struggle through Spitta and Sweitzer.

Mr. Terry's biography of John Christian Bach is another story. This is not only the first biography in English of Sebastian's youngest, and greatest, son, but it is also the most painstaking work on the subject which we have today. The reticence on the part of biographers toward devoting their research to John Christian has puzzled musicians for a long time. His was a personality far more picturesque than that of his father: he walked arm in arm with Frederick the Great; he occupied the post at the English court left vacant by the death of Handel; he held little Wolfgang Mozart upon his knee and prophesied a great future for him; he was in the milieu of musical activity for more than fifty years. But John Christian was something infinitely more than a noteworthy musical figure. He was also a pioneer in his art, whose influence is inestimable. He stood at the parting of the ways. Behind him were Handel and the great Sebastian Bach, his father; ahead of him were Haydn and Mozart. John Christian Bach is the link that binds the chain. He gave a dignity and significance to orchestral music which was then unheard-of; his Sinfonias afforded models for Haydn and Mozart; his solo works gave a greater plasticity to the clavichord. Finally, John Christian was the composer of many works, fresh, original, and vital. If he had not the profundity or grandeur of his great father, he had, at least, something almost as precious—a fragile touch, a delicacy, an infallible artistry. No wonder young Mozart worshiped John Christian! "On the platform of his generation," Mr. Terry writes, "Bach [John Christian] owes his honorable position not to the inheritance of a great name, but to his own eclectic genius and indomitable industry."

The work fills a sad gap and fills it completely. Mr. Terry deserves the gratitude of the entire music world.

DAVID EWEN

One Kind of Patriotism

George Harvey: A Passionate Patriot. By Willis Fletcher Johnson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

GEORGE HARVEY would be pleased if he could know that after a lifetime of controversy his biography is also controversial; and he would be more than pleased if he knew that there are some excellent examples of scurrility in the book. Harvey throve on just such stuff. It would be impossible in limited space to point out all the dubious statements that are here attributed to Harvey or those that Mr. Johnson makes in his own right. According to Mr. Johnson, for example, Harvey told the Democratic bosses at Baltimore in 1912, including the late Roger Sullivan of Illinois, that if they voted for Wilson they need expect nothing in return. Mr. Johnson either does not know or does not care to point out that Wilson made an effort to reward Sullivan, who did vote for him, when Sullivan ran for the Senate. Wilson wrote a letter indorsing Sullivan but by a series of accidents the letter was not made public.

The story is told in Tumulty's "Woodrow Wilson," where the letter is reproduced. Bryan opposed Sullivan's candidacy to pay off the grudge he had entertained against Sullivan since 1906. Sullivan was defeated.

Elsewhere Mr. Johnson writes that Bryan forced himself on the Democratic Party in 1908. This is hardly true; Bryan sentiment that year was overwhelming. Again, Mr. Johnson would have it that Harvey implanted the idea of the League of Nations in Wilson's mind, and that Wilson got the California vote in 1916 by "an extraordinary manipulation." He quotes Harvey as saying, honestly enough apparently, that Harding received the nomination in 1920 "because there was nothing against him, and because the delegates wanted to go home," but he then lays himself out to show how Harvey believed Harding to be a great President, a man of power and vision. He quotes a memorandum which Harvey made of a conversation with Coolidge immediately after the latter had assumed the Presidency, in which Coolidge is made to appear shockingly close to ignorant of every problem before him; and he then glorifies Coolidge. Fall and Denby, we are told, resigned under "unpleasant circumstances." The Boston police strike was "part of a practical conspiracy for a general strike of the police of the nation." Mr. Johnson paraphrases an article of Harvey's showing that in the election of 1924 there was a "practical conspiracy of some Democrats and the followers of the Radical candidate, La Follette, to throw the election into the House." The number of "practical conspiracies" that Harvey frustrated is simply amazing.

These things may seem trivial enough in themselves, but they indicate the tone of the book. Taking him all in all, Harvey, even under Mr. Johnson's eulogistic handling, appears to have been little more than an intriguing politician of the backstairs variety with a genius for controversial journalism. I have a suspicion that he would have been happiest in the days before the Civil War when personal journalism flourished. He could then have broken heads right and left, and he would have done it with immense gusto.

By far the most interesting part of the book is that which deals with Harvey's relations with Wilson. As Mr. Johnson tells it, Harvey made Wilson Governor of New Jersey and had an appreciable part in securing his nomination for the Presidency. He adduces evidence to show that Harvey was not fooled into believing that Wilson was a conservative. That was Wilson's conception of himself and he made every effort to underline the idea. His subsequent liberalism was less essentially a part of his mentality than his conservatism. The conflict with the New Jersey bosses is also made understandable, as is also Wilson's acceptance of their aid to win the governorship. With regard to the Manhattan Club episode, where Wilson abruptly told Harvey that his support was embarrassing, Mr. Johnson shows that Henry Watterson was much more bent upon making trouble about the affair than was Harvey himself, and demonstrates from documents that Wilson apologized to Harvey and attempted once more to enlist his support.

One or two interesting points about Bryan are also brought out. The most important is that Bryan deliberately inserted the word "ultimately" in his famous Madison Square Garden speech, in 1906, dealing with government ownership of railways ("I have already reached the conclusion that railways . . . must ultimately become public property"); he did not seize upon it later to justify his repudiation of the doctrine as a campaign issue in 1908, and although his retreat was undignified and disastrous it was not unforeseen on his part. Altogether Mr. Johnson has written a valuable and interesting, if unreliable, book which no one interested in the intimate history of America in the last thirty years can afford to overlook.

C. Hartley Grattan

Books in Brief

Laments for the Living. By Dorothy Parker. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Dorothy Parker has become, of course, an institution. Her jests and witticisms start traveling as soon as they are uttered—sometimes even before. Her verses are read and quoted everywhere. And her recent series of merciless and brilliant reviews in the New Yorker were the talk of the town. The present volume of short stories, ironic character sketches, tragic or satiric monologues and dialogues is her first work of fiction. All of the pieces have appeared before in various magazines, where they were at once devoured by Parker enthusiasts and retold to their friends and families. And all are in her well-known vein whether the intent be humor or tragedy, constituting with the rest of her works a biting, satiric, and witty philosophy of despair. But the stories are too few and too slight to be seriously considered as more than a beginning which looks interesting.

Lope de Vega. By Angel Flores. Brentano's. $3.50

Mr. Flores's biography of the gallant literary figure whom Cervantes called "the monster of nature" presents another spry recruit to the ranks of romanticized lives, and even the most carping critic must admit that it is an interesting and informative portrait. Lope de Vega—soldier, poet, playwright, friar, convict, duelist, and lover extraordinary—was the Casanova of his age. The same mingling of craft, vanity, and lust dominated the Spaniard as the Italian. Both coveted fame and immortality; neither is read today.

Painted against the picturesque scenes of the turbulent reign of Philip II, the Inquisition, and the naval disaster of the Spanish Armada, the colorful life of de Vega is given skilful and fluent interpretation. "Lope de Vega" reveals a sycophant and opportunist merging inseparably with a deadly satirist; a masterful lover, a gay romanticist, and deep beneath, a man who always found "plenty of time to write and dream." Indeed, the astounding total of Lope de Vega's writings, some 2,200 plays plus numerous eclogues, romances, and sonnets, remains today his chief and perhaps only bid for contemporary recognition. It is significant that whereas practically nothing of de Vega's is read nowadays, his contemporary and rival whom he continuously belittled, Miguel de Cervantes, is celebrated far beyond the borders of his native Spain.

A Bravery of Earth. By Richard Eberhart. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.

Richard Eberhart, a young American in Cambridge, has made a very serious attempt in his long poem "A Bravery of Earth" to trace the development of man's awareness to various types of experience—sensual, mental, and spiritual—and to describe man's final assimilation of all these into an impersonal and objective attitude toward life. That the poem is rather immature, overpretentious, and dull does not blind the reader to the fact that the young poet may some day write much better. He has leaped beyond himself here and he has been

It is not too late to include Russia in your trip abroad this Summer

SPECIAL late summer parties now being organized to visit the Soviet Union . . . Theatres, opera, schools, and institutions will be opening and the tourist rush over. Also a student tour at reduced rates.

SAILINGS: July 17th and 30th; August 14th and 21st

Parties may be joined abroad

Facilities for individuals

20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK

THE OPEN ROAD

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □

THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS
The NEW GARRICK GAIETIES
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

"LYSISTRATA"
"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockridge, The Sun.
FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre W. of B'way, Eves. 8:30 Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:30

"MIGHTIEST WAR DRAMA EVER SEEN"
—N. Y. American.
"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"
A Universal Picture presented by Carl Laemmle
Directed by Lewis Milestone
"A notable achievement, sincere, earnest, vivid and graphic. Better than anything so far done."—Mordaunt Hall, N. Y. Times.
"Enormously compelling talking motion picture. As a show something to get definitely excited about! A very fine motion picture."—Howard Barnes, Herald Tribune.
CENTRAL THEATRE, B'dway and 47th Street Twice Daily: 2:45—8:45. 3 times Sat. & Sun., 2:45—5:45—8:45

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street
Cooled by Refrigeration
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

American Premiere—Week of Sat., July 12
PAMIR
Russian-German Expedition Film Record of climb to Mt. Lenin (Highest Peak in U. S. S. R.)
8th STREET PLAYHOUSE
FILM GUILD CINEMA
52 W. 8th Street—Spr. 5095
Director: Joseph R. Fliesler

55TH STREET PLAYHOUSE
Just East of Seventh Avenue—Continuous 1:30-midnight.
Circle 0129. Popular prices.
THE JAPANESE FILM TRIUMPH:
"SLUMS OF TOKYO"
A dramatic story of YOSHIVARA far too much influenced by the Wordsworthian necessity of writing a major opus stating a philosophy. Once he cuts loose from all this his other qualities may stand him in good stead, for he has already at his command an adequate technique and an explored and partially defined point of view.

Those passages in which he allows himself to speak personally are his best. He is probably not aware that he is imitating, but he seems, at one and the same time, a would-be scientifically minded person and a student immersed in nineteenth-century poetry. After he has passed through this apprenticeship we shall expect from him another, different, and probably more interesting volume of verse, without this curious mixture of unassimilated modern scientific thought and romantic enthusiasm.

Pelle the Conqueror. By Martin Andersen Nexö. Peter Smith. $3.50.

The reissuance of "Pelle the Conqueror" in a single well-bound volume is a valuable contribution to the library of proletarian fiction. Published originally in four volumes, this Marxian tetralogy of man's inspiring struggle against the numbing forces of modern industrialism has achieved a merited success. Translations have appeared in many languages and the work has gained an appreciative audience here and in Europe. Although handicapped by a patently socialistic theme, the book evades the pitfall of monotony which awaits most treatise fiction. The sociological element is used chiefly as an illuminating background against which the persevering figure of Pelle, who symbolizes the working classes, is revealed in definite and unsentimental lines.

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

Plays to See

‡Fifty Million Frenchmen—Lyric—W. 42 St.
‡Flying High—Apollo—W. 42 St.
†Lost Sheep—Selwyn—42 St., W. of B'way.
†Lysistrata—44 St.—44 St., W. of B'way.
†Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45 St.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47 St., W. of B"way.
*The Last Mile—Sam H. Harris—42 St., W. of B'way.
‡The New Garrick Gaieties—Guild—52 St., W. of B'way.

Films

All Quiet on the Western Front—Central—47 St. and B"way.
He Knew Women, Saturday, July 12 to Tuesday, July 15; Lummox, Wednesday, July 16 to Friday, July 18—The Plaza—58 St., E. of Madison Ave.
Journey's End—Gaiety—46 St. and B'way.
Pamir, Beginning Saturday, July 12—Eighth St. Playhouse—52 W. Eighth St.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
Slums of Tokyo—55 St. Playhouse—E. of Seventh Ave.
So This Is London, Saturday, July 12 to Tuesday, July 15; The Big Pond, Wednesday, July 16 to Friday, July 18—Little Carnegie—57 St., E. of Seventh Ave.
The Big House—Astor—B'way and 45 St.
The Trespasser and Devil's Holiday, Sunday, July 3 to 15; Puttin' on the Ritz, Wednesday, July 16 to Saturday, July 19—Fifth Ave. Playhouse—66 Fifth Ave.

Concerts

Goldman Band Concerts, Monday, July 14, Central Park, French; Tuesday, July 15, N. Y. U., Beethoven; Wednesday, July 16, Central Park, Italian; Thursday, July 17, N. Y. U., Victor Herbert, Friday, July 18, Central Park, Beethoven; Saturday, July 19, N. Y. U., Symphonic; Sunday, July 20, Central Park. Concerts begin at 8.45 p. m.
Philharmonic Symphony Concerts, Lewisohn Stadium. Every evening at 8.30 p. m. Program subject to change.

*Drama. †Comedy. ‡Musical.

Ferment in the Arabic World

By FELIX VALYI

I

THE Arab-Jewish difficulties in Palestine brought out again the sentiment of hostility toward Islam as a menace to the West which has dominated the Occidental mind for centuries. In spite of all the changes which have affected human thought since the Middle Ages, in spite of the modern doctrine of universal tolerance in religious matters, none of the nations by which Islam is confronted in her effort to survive have really changed their mind toward her. Under the name of "civilization" the spirit of the Crusades remained a continuous reality in the dealings of European Powers with Islam. The unrest caused by the latest events in Palestine among the Mohammedans of the world is due to their feeling that the Arabs as a nation have been refused that "equality of treatment" which the whole East claims as the basic principle of peace.

In her periods of conquest and glory Islam herself did not grant "equality of treatment" to non-Moslem peoples, though under the more enlightened Mohammedan rulers of past centuries the religious minorities—far from suffering persecution—were admitted to the highest positions. To quote only one example, in Mohammedan Spain, at the court of Andalusia, Christians and Jews cooperated with Mohammedan scholars to create one of the most brilliant cultures of all times. Recent discoveries of a Catholic priest in Madrid have demonstrated in the most fascinating way how the Mohammedan literature of thirteenth-century Andalusia inspired the "Divine Comedy," the greatest poem of Christianity.

But the interdependence of all cultures known in history is a very recent discovery of scholars who have no influence on political emotions. From the psychological point of view European consciousness regards Islam as a source of danger to civilization, a popular opinion which gave to the Arab uprisings a more than local significance. It is this state of hostility between two different worlds which makes partisanship in such conflicts the first thing to avoid.

Is the ferment in the soul of Islam really such a danger to "civilization," or is it rather a sign of fundamental change which ultimately may bring the whole Mohammedan world to a better understanding of modern life? To answer such a question, we should not forget that Islam is just beginning to recover from a long period of decay brought about by centuries of bigotry and intellectual stagnation. Orthodox Mohammedanism may have such temporary triumphs as the reaction in Afghanistan, but it cannot reverse the historical and psychological process which forces the Moslem nations to reconsider the fundamentals of life.

The downfall of the Ottoman empire has been a deathblow to orthodox Islam from which she will never recover entirely. As long as the Califate existed, orthodox Islam found support in the consciousness that there was still upon the earth a world factor under the acknowledged leadership of a spiritual and temporal ruler commanding the faithful of Europe and Asia. The self-respect of the old generation among the Moslems depended on that feeling. It inspired their fidelity to stereotyped traditions. Now, with their political center hopelessly destroyed, they have become like sheep without a shepherd, scattered in spiritual anarchy among the strong peoples of the earth.

For five centuries Constantinople was the assembling place for Moslem pilgrims west of the Ural Mountains. It could never be replaced by any new center farther south among the Arabs. Religious distintegration appears as a natural consequence caused by the destruction of the Califate. It is a strange revenge of destiny to see the Turk, whom Europe has for so many centuries held to be the symbolic figure of Islam, destroying the theocratic idea in the Mohammedan world. Strong though Ibn Saud, the King of the Hejaz and Sultan of the Nejd, may be in his own realm, he will be powerless to influence the general flow of Mohammedan thought outside the Arabian desert. Henceforth the unity of Islam does not depend on political power, but on some kind of spiritual consensus which cannot be obtained without a thoroughgoing reform of Mohammedan institutions. It is not the loss of territorial sovereignty or the loss of population which has caused the decay of Islam; it is primarily the influence of Western ideas and aims of life which creates the new situation. The loss of moral and spiritual force made it impossible for orthodox Islam to support the burden of a world empire in the face of Western civilization. So far as the lessons of history avail, the defeat of orthodox Islam during the last three centuries was inevitable.

One of the intellectual leaders of modern Islam, the late Syed Ameer Ali, Mohammedan legal expert of the British Privy Council, explained in his famous book, "The Spirit of Islam," how the orthodox clergy among the Mohammedans destroyed the school of free thought which existed until the eighth century of the Hegira, our fourteenth century, which saw the beginnings of scientific thought in the West. The formidable struggle between the ideas of free criticism and the principle of unchanging authority which convulsed the Mohammedan world from the tenth to the fourteenth century ended in the triumph of rigid ecclesiastical dogmatism, in spite of the powerful appeal which eminent thinkers of Islam made to the progressive forces inherent in the cultural life of the community. The rationalistic school of the so-called Mu'Tazilites demanded a new interpretation of the fundamental concepts of Islam, laying down as a principle the individual responsibility of man and his capacity for judging between good and evil and for allowing himself to be guided in the right road by God through an act of free moral choice.

After a desperate struggle of four centuries, Mohammedan rationalism ended in complete defeat. The spiritual development of Islam was thus paralyzed by the fanaticism of the orthodox mind. A formalistic scholasticism took possession of Mohammedan teaching from the fourteenth century onwards, that is to say from the very moment when, in Europe, scholasticism was in its death agonies and modern science was taking its first steps in the West. The authority of factitious ecclesiastic traditions weighed down the Mohammedan world; as in medieval Europe the cause of freedom of thought succumbed before the ecclesiastical principle. Centuries of intellectual sterility followed upon the result of this conflict and prevented the Mohammedan world from adapting itself to new conditions of life.

II

The old slogans of holy wars and pan-Islamism are dying away under the influence of Western ideas. The reactionary school of Mohammedan thought cannot prevail in face of the political, intellectual, and economic changes brought about by the impelling power of Western science. The example of Turkey was the greatest impulse which the Mohammedan world has received since Mohammed's time. Those who believe that Islam will be destroyed by the new mentality invoke Lord Cromer's opinion that Islam cannot be reformed without ceasing to be. No system of religious and social thought can survive the changes of life if its leaders refuse to reconsider its relationship to the needs of the living generation. The reinterpretation of its essentials and its adaptation to the spirit of the new times can still save the permanent human values which inspired the finest minds among the Mohammedans.

The clash of ideas in the present generation is precisely the one great hope of Mohammedan reform. In the face of her muftis and sheiks Turkey has replaced the old Islamic law by a Western code, and has set up a new educational system on progressive lines. In Egypt the storm created by the publication of Dr. Taha Hussein's book on pre-Islamic poetry in 1926 has shown how much the Mohammedan youth of Egypt stand for free criticism. Dr. Taha Hussein was professor of Arabic at the Egyptian University of Cairo. By his critical method of dealing with his subject, by his conclusions contrary to orthodox views about the sanctity of every word in the Koran, he provoked the Ulemas of Al Azhar, the center of old-fashioned ecclesiasticism. His book tried to demonstrate a new thesis about the origins of Arabic poetry, showing that a few of its greatest masterpieces have nothing to do with Mohammed and had been interpolated in later times; they are of pre-Islamic origin, though they form part of the Koran. All copies of Dr. Taha's book were bought up and destroyed and the matter was brought before the Egyptian Parliament. The orthodox leaders demanded the immediate dismissal of the author from the university and insisted on proceedings against him in the religious courts. The resolution had to be withdrawn and the orthodox agitation fell flat in face of the action of the liberal students.

The cleavage between the old reactionary forces and the new movements of liberal thought is apparent in the whole Mohammedan world today. In every Mohammedan country there is a struggle for free discussion, for modern education, for a new interpretation of Koranic traditions, and for social reform. The temporary triumph of the reaction in Afghanistan, due to psychological mistakes of the ex-king, cannot alter the general situation.

The longing of the Arabic world for national unity shows once more that in the Mohammedan mind, as in the mind of Western peoples, nationality is now put above religion. A hundred Arabic newspapers and magazines in Egypt, and about sixty-five in Syria and Palestine, are emphasizing the national point of view. Heresy hunting has little chance to win their support.

Even among the sheiks of Al Azhar the spirit of re interpretation makes headway. Sheik Abdel Razek's recent book on "Islam and the Principles of Government" propounded the theory that the Moslem code is intended solely as a guide to personal conduct, and not for purposes of the state. He goes so far as to deny the fundamental significance of the Califate in Islamic thought, and thinks it did more harm than good. Moreover, when Sheik Abdel Razek was tried by the Supreme Council of Al Azhar for heresy, he had to be acquitted and the Arabic press hailed him as a champion of free thought.

In fact, all the open or secret attempts to restore the Califate in one of the Arabic-speaking countries have failed. The Mohammedan Congress of Cairo for the restoration of the Califate was a lamentable failure. The Mecca Congress, organized under the auspices of Ibn Saud, had more to do with the practical problems of Mohammedan policy, without settling anything. The Moslems of India under the leadership of the late Hakim Adjmal Khan and Dr. Ansari, one of the most enlightened Mohammedans, thoroughly westernized, refused to take a partisan point of view. During their tour of the Mohammedan East in 1925 these leaders insisted on the necessity of studying carefully the problem before making any decision. Attempts to make over the Califate into a corporate body of Mohammedan intellectual leaders on democratic lines, for the purpose of religious and social reform, did not materialize because of the lack of agreement on essential principles.

III

The common agreement of the Mohammedan world cannot be obtained to any of the suggestions hitherto proposed. And without such a consensus if it remains unwritten nothing can be done to restore the unity of Islam. Meanwhile Soviet Russia handles her own Mohammedan problem on the Black Sea and in Central Asia in the usual revolutionary way. If the Bolshevik methods prevail for the next twenty years, Islam will be destroyed on the confines of Russia. France and England restrict themselves to watching the Mohammedan movements without interfering officially with religious affairs. But the missionary efforts continue in North Africa and in India, with a new approach and more psychological knowledge of the Mohammedan mind, though without much hope of success.

The theocratic idea of a Mohammedan empire on the old orthodox line has definitely disappeared from the mind of responsible people among the educated classes. National consciousness has become the important factor in all vital decisions. During the revolution in Egypt in 1920 under Zaglul's leadership the nationalists used a flag on which the Cross and Crescent both appeared in order to demonstrate that their movement had nothing to do with pan-Islamism. Mohammedans addressed meetings in Christian churches, and Christians (Copts) spoke in mosques.

The Arabic movement for unity outside Egypt is tending in the same direction. The Arabic struggle is a struggle for and not against westernization. It wants to imitate the example of the West. More and more, religion is regarded as a matter for the individual conscience, and not a subject for compulsory state legislation. King Feisal himself, in spite of his old-fashioned personal education, is thoroughly in favor of complete westernization of his Iraqian kingdom. Bedouins now learn in night schools to read and write. Before returning to Bagdad from the Congress of Versailles, which created the kingdom of Iraq, Feisal paid his respect to the Pope in Rome, offering his services to reconcile the Christians and Moslems of the Near East. Reza Shah in Persia is after much the same kind of thing as Feisal.

The whole fabric of Islam is affected by the new ideas. At first sight it seems solely a cheap imitation of our Western superficialities. And to some extent this is so. But those who observed the wonderful work of the educational institutions founded by American philanthropists in the Near East, such as the American University of Beirut, know that under the influence of the ideas of 1776 the Mohammedan peoples are awakening to a new consciousness toward the world.

Is it the end of Islam? I do not believe so. Islam survived fourteen centuries of historical storms as an emotional attitude toward life. The break-up of orthodox Mohammedanism simply means that Islam will slowly rediscover her own finer traditions. The dogmatic concepts of later Islam can be discarded without harm. If the East wants to be freed from Western economic exploitation, it has to learn the Western ways of organizing life. If Mohammedans want to live their own lives unfettered by Western control, they must accept Western science as the basic condition of self-government. The secularization of Islam is the first step. But universalism as a spiritual factor which inspired the best minds in Islam will always remain an essential condition of any lasting reform. In the Moslem world neither birth nor color has prevented men from reaching the highest positions. If educated Islam maintains that spirit and extends it to the non-Moslem world, the Near Eastern problem will find its natural solution in the copartnership of East and West for their common good.

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT HERRICK is the author of "The Common Lot," "Together," and other novels.

CHARMION VON WIEGAND recently spent four months in Russia.

VIRGINIUS DABNEY is on the staff of the Richmond Times-Dispatch.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

DUDLEY FITTS is a contributor to Hound and Horn, the Criterion, and other periodicals.

H. L. MENCKEN has recently published "Treatise on the Gods."

HORACE GREGORY will publish this fall "Chelsea Rooming House," a book of verse.

HERBERT W. SCHNEIDER is professor of religion at Columbia University.

THERESA WOLFSON is in the department of economics at Hunter College.

DAVID EWEN is a contributor to the New Freeman and other periodicals.

FELIX VÁLYI is a close student of Arabic affairs.

EDUCATIONAL

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN
Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 13th year.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN
GERMAN. Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th year. Also neglected English education.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
[redacted] Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

EXHIBITION SERVICE

BOOK AND ART SHOPS, Art League and Club Officers, send now for details of Exhibition Service, etchings, prints and paintings of The Brown County Artists Colony. THE ARTISTS' SHOP, Nashville, Indiana.

SHOPPERS' CORNER

25 TO 50% saving on Standard Advertised Merchandise, such as electrical appliances, radios, fountain pens, portable phonographs, furniture, silverware, watches, stoves, radiators. Write for catalogs, or call John 1427. SERVWELL SYSTEM, INC., 55 Maiden Lane, New York City

APARTMENTS TO SHARE

WOMAN (professional) with daughter 5, desirous of sharing her apartment, household expenses, cooperative basis, preferably mother and healthy child 5-6. Near Hunter College Model School. References exchanged. Box 2484, % The Nation.

SPLENDID, large, well-furnished front room. Separate entrance. Private family. Share part of lovely duplex apartment, if desired. Excellent location near Drive. $30-$40. 614 W. 148th St. Edgecombe 7819, preferably mornings.

FOR RENT

HOUSES—BUNGALOWS

OLD New England Home (furnished) on West Road in Dorset, Vermont. 10 airy large rooms, 2 baths, electricity. One mile to Field and Golf Club. Beautiful location. Reasonable rent. Inquire M. F. Gilbert, West Road, Dorset, Vermont.

POSITIONS WANTED

PART-TIME secretarial stenographic work wanted: extensive experience with prominent writers. Manuscripts prepared for publication. German translations. RIVerside 8966 or Box 2466, % The Nation.

WILL some philanthropic attorney offer a living wage to a young hopeful who wishes to continue his clerkship? Interested in well fed present, and glorious future. Box 2482, % The Nation.

LIBRARIAN desires to communicate with party able to offer permanent connection in similar or other interesting field. Well recommended. Location secondary. Box 2483, % The Nation.

YOUNG man, 24, married, (1928) honors graduate of prominent liberal arts college, since graduating a newspaper advertising solicitor and copy writer, desires more interesting employment. Excellent references. Box 2485, % The Nation.

HELP WANTED

EDITORIAL secretary-stenographer. Requirements: expert knowledge of English, general writing ability, experienced in related office work. State training, experience, salary. Box 2486, % The Nation.

"The finest study of life under the Soviets that has yet been published."—
New York World

SOVIET RUSSIA:

A Living Record and A History

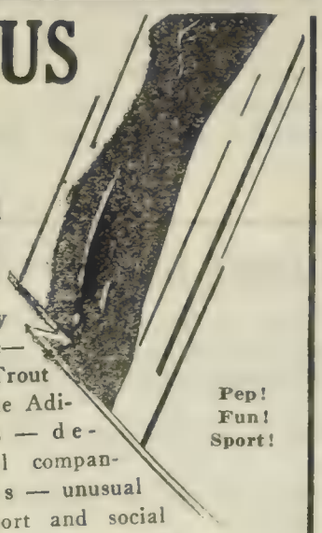
By WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

Correspondent in Russia for the Christian Science Monitor

"An intelligent, balanced understanding of what is going on, supported by the historical background of the Revolution and the Communist movement. One of the best reference books on the achievements of the Soviets."—Oswald Garrison Villard in The Nation.

FOURTH LARGE PRINTING:

An Atlantic Book
With 16 illustrations
$5.00 at all Booksellers



LITTLE, BROWN & CO.
Publishers, Boston

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

SUMMER SUMMER

SCOPUS

The Vacation Playland

Away from city dirt and noise—at beautiful Trout Lake in the Adirondacks — delightful companions — unusual sport and social facilities — return to the city refreshed, invigorated —ready to tackle the job right!

Pep! Fun! Sport!

Swim! Row! Play!

SCOPUS

An Adult Camp of Distinction

IN THE ADIRONDACKS

P. O. LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

City Address
11 WEST 42nd STREET
Longacre 0105

FOR YOUR SUMMER VACATION

IN THE CONNECTICUT HILLS

Complete rest and rebuilding, in delightful country. Invigorating outdoor life. Saddle horses. Swimming. Ideal for week-ends. Only 1½ hours from New York.

TOPSTONE FARM

Write: R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn.
Telephone: Ridgefield 648

RIVERSIDE INN, Derby Conn.
on Housatonic River, swimming, bathing, boating. Modern improvements, tennis. Vegetarians accommodated. Rates [illegible] per week. Also furnished bungalows.
Tel. Derby 231-2. P. O. Seymour, Conn.

HIKING TOURS

DYRUS and Edith Cook are now conducting hiking tours over the old trails of the Catskill Mountains. Five-day trips. Two-donkey pack-train. All camping equipment provided. If your vacation period coincides with our yet unfilled dates we can make you reduced rates. Box 353, Woodstock, N. Y.

CHILDREN—SUMMER

FREE SEASHORE SUMMER for 10 year old. Will give best care and free summer on South Shore, Long Island, to healthy, intelligent little girl, 9 to 10 years, as friend to child same age. References exchanged. If interested please call Schuyler 0825.

COUNTRY home and private schooling for one or two children from three to eight years. Excellent care, modern, liberal, creative environment. Interview, references. Dorothy Coursen and Dorothy Wilson, Woodstock, N. Y.

BAILIN'S MAPLEDALE HOTEL

"The Hotel with the Camp Spirit"

Roscoe (Sullivan Co.,) N. Y. Tel. Roscoe 3Y2

For the Modern and Moody

Conveniences ▪ ▪ River ▪ ▪ Sports ▪ ▪
Casino ▪ Recreation ▪ Social Activities ▪
Supreme Jewish Cuisine

City address: 570 7th Av., Suite 1002, N. Y.

Phones: Pennsylvania 1777 L. B. Bailin
Coney Island 1750 Eva Bailin

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

WARRENSBURG, N. Y.
A Camp for Adults in the Adirondacks
Most modern facilities for comfort and sports including golf
Booklet on request
City phone Lex. 8879

SONAQUA CLUB
Lake Mohegan, N. Y.
The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only 45 miles from New York.
Sports
Tennis, Boating
Swimming, Dancing
For reservations call Peekskill 1276

Camp Bethlehem
formerly Bethlehem Country Club
Bethlehem, Conn.
An ideal Vacation Camp for discriminating adults. In the Litchfield Hills
Private Lake, land and water sports, dancing
Rates: July, $25—Aug., $27.50
Descriptive Booklet Upon Request
Phone: Woodbury 48, Ring 2

ROCKY DALE LODGE

An Adult Camp in the Hills—Sellersville, Pa.
2½ hours from N. Y.—1 hour from Phila.
Outdoor activities—NO GREENS FEES.
Rates July and August $37.50.
Write for Booklet.
Executive Directors
WM. J. HELFGOTT WM. D. TENDLER
Social Director: "MORRY" GOLDBERG

Camp Sports - Hotel Comforts

Boating, Bathing, Fishing, Dancing, Entertainment galore. Tennis, Riding, Golf; large social and physical staff.

KENMORE
on the Beautiful Lake
N. WHITE LAKE, N. Y.
Phone: White Lake 114
Write for Booklet "N"

CAMP HASWELL For Adults

The Lakeside Playground of New York
Rensselaerville, N. Y. 24 miles from Albany
Private Lake ¾ mile long with white sand beach. Tennis. Saddle horses.
Rates: $25.00 weekly—$5.00 per day.
For Reservations—EDWARD APSTEIN,
51 Chambers St., N. Y. C. Worth 7054

GERMANY

"ROMA"—Beautiful modern rooms, every comfort, excellent cuisine. Select neighborhood, convenient to subway and bus. American, European plan. English spoken. Moderate rates. Write for reservations now. Viktoria-Luise Platz 1. Berlin W.

INDIAN HEAD

an ideal camp for adults

Echo Lake, Warrensburg, N. Y.

Dancing
Swimming
Fishing
Rowing
Canoeing

Tennis
Golf
Baseball
Basket ball
Horseback riding

All social and sport activities.

Only five miles from Lake George.

Rate: $32.50 per week.

Write or phone for illustrated booklet.

N. Y. Office:
370 E. 149th St. Phone Mott Haven 4703

Brushy Mountain Lodge

East Stroudsburg, Pa.
Telephone
Stroudsburg 61-R-4

Excellent accommodations and a delightful location in the heart of the Pocono Mountains make the Lodge ▪ desirable vacation retreat for those who like a combination of camp and hotel life and ▪ "homey" atmosphere. Swimming, tennis and all camp activities. Dietary laws observed.

Write for Booklet

HAMBURGER'S EVERGREEN (Health) FARM
Tel. Farmingdale 40 F 31—
[illegible] Asbury Park, Farmingdale, N. J.
VEGETARIAN HOUSE
A farm resort in ▪ delightful rural setting. 1¼ hr. from New York. Plenty of ground to play about, sun baths, showers, bathing, games and sport. Natural delicious health foods. Write or telephone for information.

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 122-F-3

Most beautiful estate, surrounded by brooks, lakes, woods and flowers. Absolutely private; Boating, Fishing, Tennis and other sports on premises. Golf and Saddle horses nearby. Limited accommodations, select following. Excellent Jewish Cuisine.

1½ hours on Erie ($2.60 round trip) or Route 17

CAMP TOPSTONE—For Adults

A Jewish Camp with ▪ fine American spirit

All land and water sports, with free instruction. Splendid social activities. Excellent strictly Kosher meals.

Write for illustrated booklet
SHAPIRO BROS. Branchville, Conn.

LATERN HILL LODGE
OLD MYSTIC, CONN.

Country place with forest, lake and stream. Near ocean. Bathing, boating, fishing, tennis. Booklet. Mrs. Aileen Gray.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 23, 1930 No. 3394

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 81
EDITORIALS:
The Farm Board Folly 84
Treaty and Peace Lovers 85
Black and Gold Stars 85
Conan Doyle 86
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 87
NEWSPAPER CRIMINALS IN CHICAGO. By A Veteran Journalist 88
WHAT I BELIEVE. By J. B. S. Haldane 90
"MINE OWN WITH USURY." THE INVESTMENT TRUST. By J. G. Curtis 93
THE HAGUE CODIFICATION CONFERENCE. By Edwin M. Borchard 94
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 96
CORRESPONDENCE 96
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Dark of the Brain. By Norman MacLeod 99
A Posse After the Humanists. By Mark Van Doren 99
George Eliot Reconsidered. By John Macy 100
The Poetry of a Novelist. By Eda Lou Walton 100
The Turkish Debt. By Jane Perry Clark 101
A Race as Protagonist. By Fred T. Marsh 101
Beyond the War Books. By Alter Brody 102
The Primitive "Imagination." By Melville J. Herskovits 102
Books in Brief 103
Films: Enter Japan. By Alexander Bakshy 104
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 105
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Nansen the Norwegian 106

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor

Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER

Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Literary Editor
HENRY HAZLITT

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

AS WE GO TO PRESS, the prospects are for an early ratification of the naval treaty as a result of a compromise on the Norris reservation on secret agreements. This is again a victory for the President. In marked contrast to his refusal to direct or to lead Congress during all those weary months of the tariff legislation, he now seems willing to move without fear of being charged with interfering with the legislative branch. In arriving at this agreement he was surely considerably helped by the State Department's publication in parallel columns of astoundingly similar utterances by the British opponents of the treaty and by the American. Senator Hale's declaration on July 1 that "the British by the terms of this treaty have us hamstrung and hogtied" is matched by Winston Churchill's "I am astonished that any Admiralty Board of naval officers could have been found to accept responsibility for such a hamstringing stipulation." The declaration of the minority report of Senators Johnson, Moses, and Robinson that "the treaty does not give us parity with Great Britain in naval vessels" is offset by Mr. Churchill's "under superficial and paper appearance of parity this treaty embodies a solemn acceptance by the British Empire of a permanent secondary position in sea power." Similar parallels from the die-hards in Japan could also have been cited. As it is, these ought to suffice to make sane men everywhere realize the utter nonsense talked by the admirals and big-navy statesmen wherever these pestilent breeds flourish.

THE CASE OF CLAUDIUS H. HUSTON has ceased to be remarkable and has become scandalous. Ever since the Caraway committee, early last March, let daylight in upon Mr. Huston's activities as a lobbyist in connection with Muscle Shoals, Republicans in Congress who would like to see the affairs of their party decently managed have moved heaven and earth to get Mr. Huston to resign the chairmanship of the Republican National Committee. On June 26 it was reported that Mr. Hoover would shortly insist upon Huston's retirement, but Mr. Huston declared that he had no intention of giving up his job, and forthwith issued calls for committee meetings on July 7 to discuss the Senatorial and Congressional campaigns. The meetings were postponed, but on July 7 Mr. Huston saw Mr. Hoover, and it was announced that Mr. Hoover would not press the matter and that Mr. Huston would stay. On July 9, when the postponed meetings were held, twenty Senators, it was said, were ready with a point-blank demand that Huston quit, but when the smoke screen lifted the Honorable Claudius still held the fort. What the country would like to know is why Mr. Huston holds on and why Mr. Hoover is supporting him. Is it possible that the power trust, with which Huston had acceptable and useful political connections, is the obstacle to be got around, and that if Huston were fired some ugly facts about campaign contributions might turn up? Meanwhile Mr. Huston declares his intention of staying till September.

MILITARY UNDERSTANDINGS with Germany, unofficially suggested by Italy and France as helps in case those two countries should go to war, is the startling report that comes from Berlin. Italy, it is said, would like to have Germany agree to remain neutral in a war between Italy and France, and France would appreciate the privilege of passing its troops through Germany in order to connect with its ally Jugoslavia. What the war is to be about has not been stated, and Paris, of course, has denied that the reports have any foundation. There seems to be no doubt that France has lately been strengthening its forces on the Italian border, and that a number of nearby Italian communities have shown alarm at the prospect of hostilities. Financially, if not otherwise, Italy is so ill-prepared for war that any talk of war with anybody seems absurd, yet it is exactly such vulgar saber-rattling speeches as Mussolini has recently indulged in that stir up the war spirit and make even the wildest action possible. France, too, has steadily done its bit by enlarging its air force, constructing elaborate fortifications all along its northeastern frontier, and negotiating offensive and defensive alliances with Czecho-Slovakia, Rumania, and Jugoslavia. It is the more gratifying, therefore, to read that both Italy and France have suspended all naval building until fall in order to see if a definite agreement as to their relative naval strengths cannot be reached.

THE VICEROY'S SPEECH before the Indian Legislative Assembly has added very little to the prospect of early peace in India. To be sure, he said that the coming Round Table Conference would not be bound by the Simon recommendations and that dominion status was the final goal in India. Both had been said before. The remainder of his speech was largely given over to denunciation of the Nationalists. In the unconscious tones of an overlord whose subjects have offended him he attacked the civil-disobedience campaign and put upon the Nationalists the "original blame." He praised the police and gave fresh weight to rumors that have for the most part been shown to be false by saying: "Several—I mean police—have been brutally murdered." Meanwhile Gandhi's paper Young India has been suppressed; and the official inquiry into the disorders at Peshawar, where, from every Indian account so far received, the police fired upon defenseless and non-resisting volunteers, has completely exonerated all British officers and troops. As for the Simon report, all parties in England seem to consider it the basis for discussion at the Round Table Conference in spite of the Viceroy's speech. In India several liberals in the assembly, as a result of the speech, have asked that the civil-disobedience campaign be terminated so that the Round Table Conference may include all Indian opinion. But almost every important leader of the strongest force in India, the Nationalist movement, is in jail. To expect the Labor Government to release them in order that their voices may be heard in London is to look for courage where there has been so far only querulousness and confusion.

ANOTHER NARROW ESCAPE from defeat, this time thanks to Liberal support, has saved the MacDonald Government and prolonged its life a little longer, but at the cost of leaving the party situation in England more confused than it was before. Neither the Liberals nor the rank and file of the Conservatives are anxious to turn Mr. MacDonald out, but the mischievous leadership of Lloyd George precipitated an attack on the budget bill which failed only because a handful of Liberals, voting with the Government, gave the Government a majority of three. Some fifty young Conservatives, eager, apparently, to unseat Labor on any pretext, distinguished themselves by hiding in a nearby club until the division was called and then rushing in to record their votes in the hope that the Government might be caught unprepared. The incident apparently ends such working agreement as there may have been between Lloyd George and Mr. MacDonald, but dissatisfaction with Liberal leadership, which appears to have been freely expressed, does not necessarily insure continued Liberal support for the Labor program. Such support as there is will be jeopardized if Labor shows any marked inclination toward empire free trade. Mr. MacDonald declared in a recent speech that "the tariff is not the way to salvation," but he also gave a vague assurance that the forthcoming Imperial Conference would do all it could to "come to an economic arrangement with the dominions that will benefit the working classes of this country." Is Mr. MacDonald hedging?

ELIHU ROOT has decided to back up the Civic Federation in its demand for a special federal police to combat the red menace, and the secretary of the federation is certain that the results of the hearings of the Fish committee will undoubtedly so arouse "the American people out of their false sense of security that they will demand the sorely needed remedial legislation," which seems to mean the creation of another force of government secret police and spies. This only goes to prove that the great age which Mr. Root has attained does not bring wisdom, neither does it enable men to read the plainest teachings of history. All the secret police forces in the world will not prevent the communizing of the United States if that can be proved to be the best means of life and livelihood for the great masses of the people, nor can they prevent the dissemination of Communist doctrine in the United States. The only way to prove the superiority of American institutions is to make them work honestly, cleanly, fairly to all Americans. Then they will be safe from Moscow and Rome, too. We repeat for the hundredth time that the men to be feared in America are not the handful of reds but the big-business exploiters of the United States, many of whom have found no more brilliant counsel in the conduct of their affairs than the same Elihu Root, who now forgets that every one of the great nations which collapsed in revolution was previously safeguarded by thousands of secret police, Chekas, lettres de cachet, spies, stool pigeons, and all the rest. We wonder, by the way, if he is pleased to be joined by the Pope in fears for the bolshevizing of America.

A BOOST IN FREIGHT RATES in what is known as official-classification territory, meaning thereby territory east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio, together with an increase in rates in Western trunk-line territory, is the contribution of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the business revival which the Administration insists has already begun. As the net operating income of Class I railroads fell off nearly $150,000,000 during the first five months of the present year in comparison with the same period in 1929, the gift will of course be welcomed by the roads even though it does not become effective until November 1. What the railroads will gain, however, must come from the tills of the shippers who pay the charges. The commission estimates that the new rates will add some $12,000,000 to the annual income of the Western roads, while unofficial estimates put the increased earnings of the Eastern lines as high as $40,000,000. Something like $52,000,000, accordingly, or upwards of 5 per cent on a billion dollars' worth of business, is the load which the shippers of the country are expected to carry. We daresay the railroads need all the revenue they are likely to get, but the only thing that will prevent the new order from robbing Peter to pay Paul is a substantial increase in the volume of goods hauled.

FIFTY-SEVEN WAGE CUTS in June as against fifty increases is the rather depressing report of the Labor Bureau, Inc., of this city. Organized labor, apparently, was not hit, all of the cuts affecting non-union workers who lacked the protection of wage contracts. Union labor also benefited by wage increases, thirty-nine of the increases going to trade-union members and only eleven to unorganized workers. On the other hand, while 72 per cent of the workers (the figures are for manufacturing industries) were affected by decreases averaging 10 per cent, the 5 per cent average increases applied to only 17 per cent of the employees in the establishments concerned. The industrial situation in May showed little change except in a downward direction, for which, of course, seasonal conditions were in part responsible. The bureau takes issue sharply with the unemployment estimates put out by the Department of Commerce. The department estimate, based on reports from six States, put the number of unemployed in the country at 2 per cent of the population. The bureau points out that reports obtained by census enumerators are unreliable, that the department's method of "sampling" the States excludes the most important industrial centers, and that non-industrial States "have an undue weight in the tabulation in relation to industrial States." Assuming that only about 40 per cent of the population is to be regarded as employable, the figure of 2 per cent becomes 5 per cent for potential workers.

TOM MOONEY has been refused a pardon by Governor Young of California. The refusal came a day or so after the denial by the State Supreme Court of Billings's application for pardon and the denial by the State Advisory Pardon Board of a pardon to Mooney. The Governor had previously announced that he would be guided by the action on the Billings application and by the Pardon Board's decision on Mooney, so that his refusal cannot have surprised anyone. It has taken him nearly the whole length of his term in office so far to "study" the Mooney case. Time after time he has put off his decision in order to study some more. This in itself was discouraging enough. Those numerous persons, in California and elsewhere, who believe the two men innocent can only take up the fight where it was laid down, can only press for new evidence, can only make fresh appeals and try to turn public opinion in favor of the two men. John McDonald, an important witness for the prosecution who later repudiated his testimony, has been found in Baltimore. He will be returned to California in order to testify before a grand jury. Governor Young held out the possibility of obtaining McDonald's recantation as the one hope for the condemned men. As for Mooney and Billings, one is almost ashamed to wish them more patience, more fortitude; they have already displayed so much of both. But it is not Governor Young who has disappointed them this time but the people of California, who have not, so far, demanded that the Governor free them. The California Court of Appeals has just upheld the conviction of Yetta Stromberg, sentenced to from one to ten years for displaying a red flag at a children's camp. This, we fear, is the temper of the whole State just now.

DR. VLADIMIR MATCHEK, leader of the Croat Peasants' Party, has been acquitted at Belgrade on charges of high treason. The trial, which lasted two months, was described at some length in our issue of June 18. Of the twenty-three Croatians tried with Dr. Matchek, nine were acquitted with him; the other fourteen were convicted of terrorist activities and sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from several months to fifteen years' hard labor. The reliability of the testimony leading to conviction was seriously impaired during the trial by charges of perjury and torture, especially by the evidence of a prison doctor who testified that the feet of one of the prisoners were covered with blood from being beaten and that he was in a state of physical and nervous collapse. The evidence against Dr. Matchek, it will be remembered, was drawn almost entirely from "confessions" made by his fellow-prisoners. All but one of these repudiated their confessions before the trial began. Dr. Matchek owes his acquittal to the fact that the one prisoner who stuck to his confession beyond the beginning of the trial finally withdrew his evidence, also. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the Croatians are out for home rule and that the more reckless among them will not hesitate to resort to terrorist activities. The political character of the trial is indicated by the news that several of the acquitted men were rearrested for singing Croatian songs, expressly prohibited by police orders, at a banquet celebrating the verdicts of acquittal.

ON TOP OF THE NEWS that Great Britain has closed twenty-one important prisons for lack of criminals since the end of the World War, and is about to close Pentonville, for generations one of the most famous London jails, comes the news that in 1929 there were only ten cases of murder recorded in London as against an annual average of twenty-two, and one of these ten was committed in 1928 although only discovered in 1929. To compare this with the daily average of a murder or more a day in Chicago and almost as great a showing in New York is humiliating indeed. When one thinks, too, that the New York police, which Grover Whalen so proudly described as the finest in the world, usually fail to find about ninety murderers a year it is amazing to read the apology of Lord Byng, head of the London police, because out of the ten cases his men failed to capture two murderers, and two who were tried were acquitted. Besides the 10 murders there were 37 manslaughter cases in London; in New York for the same period there were 357 murder and manslaughter cases. Commissioner Whalen also reported 25,709 felonies, against which Lord Byng testifies to 17,664 indictable offenses in London.

"VANITIES," the latest production of Earl Carroll in New York City, has brought up in clear-cut form the whole question of censorship. It is the unanimous opinion of dramatic critics that the "Vanities" was and is a dirty show. So far the only dissenting voice has been Mr. Carroll's, who insists that it is not dirt but art, with which we must disagree. Yet we believe that the action of the New York police in hauling some of Mr. Carroll's young ladies into court and insisting that parts of the revue be changed will uplift the stage but little and will hardly alter the vulgarity and bad taste of Mr. Carroll's performance. The police themselves are not to blame; under the existing obscenity laws they were called upon to act and they had a clear case. There are in Mr. Carroll's audience many middle-aged men and women. Why should anyone attempt to censor the morals of the middle-aged? Certainly it should not be the function of the police. Although this play is different from a genuine work of art in that it is merely the exploitation of the female form to coin dollars for the producers, we are still unchanged in our objection to all forms of censorship, believing that the evils of censorship are far worse in the long run than the harm that can be done even by an Earl Carroll.

The Farm Board Folly

IT looks as if Mr. Coolidge had set out to prepare the country for a collapse of the federal farm-relief enterprise. In his 200-word epistle general in the New York Herald Tribune of July 9, after coldly suggesting that it might be well to "defer judgment" until we know what the Farm Board has done and why, he adds that "there is one possibility that may turn out to be all important. If at the very outset of its career the action of the Farm Board demonstrates to the country that even the United States Treasury cannot maintain a fixed price for farm produce, while the lesson may be expensive it will be worth all it costs. We shall learn through experience that that kind of farm relief will not work."

Mr. Coolidge was only repeating in discouraging form the substance of the crushing indictment which he framed in his veto of the McNary-Haugen bill on May 23, 1928. "Prejudicial to public policy and to agriculture," "a formidable array of perils," "a fantastic promise of unworkable governmental price regulation," "cruelly deceptive," and "futile sophistries" were some of the caustic phrases with which he damned that notorious measure. To be sure, the bill did not directly mention price-fixing, but Mr. Coolidge declared that there could be no doubt of the purpose of the bill "to impose upon the farmer and upon the consumers of farm produce a regime of futile, delusive experiments with price-fixing" with all their attendant evils. "No farmer," he continued, "will be safe in directing his planting upon his individual judgment, for should the result be a stimulation of an increased yield, the board will be likely to withdraw the support which encouraged the surplus, and allow the prices to collapse under the weight of that artificially created excess."

It is true that the McNary-Haugen bill contained the odious debenture provision, and the dangerous possibilities involved in that feature may have intensified Mr. Coolidge's opposition. In the bill which Mr. Hoover signed on June 15, 1929, the debenture scheme did not appear, but the other essential features of the plan were retained and a revolving fund of $500,000,000, of which $250,000,000 has been made available, was provided for the experiments which Mr. Coolidge had unsparingly condemned.

The experiment is a sorry-looking affair now. Through a subsidiary organization known as the Stabilization Corporation the Farm Board holds at present upwards of 60,000,000 bushels of wheat bought at prices averaging from $1.12 to $1.15 a bushel, and worth at this writing about 90 cents, and several cents less than that on various recent dates. The government loss on the operation is estimated at between $10,000,000 and $20,000,000. Another organization, the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, financed by the board, expects to handle some 300,000,000 bushels of wheat this year. Another stabilization corporation, formed to take over the losses incurred by the board on loans to cooperative associations of cotton-growers, holds about 1,250,000 bales of cotton at a present estimated loss of about $13,000,000. Meantime cotton has declined to about thirteen cents a pound, and a further decline of two or three cents is predicted because of a steadily diminishing demand for American cotton abroad.

In other words, in the face of a superabundant world production of both wheat and cotton and a foreign demand for American cotton which has been falling off ominously for years, the board is holding over the market, and proposes to hold indefinitely, 60,000,000 bushels of last year's wheat plus whatever amount the Farmers' National Grain Corporation may undertake to carry from this year's crop, and 1,250,000 bales of cotton. Sales from the old crop are to be made good by purchases of the new. No great wisdom is required to perceive the effect which these surpluses will have on the market. Any upward movement of prices will be checked by the existence of huge surplus stocks overhanging the market, ready to be sold whenever the board thinks the price is favorable, and sold then, almost certainly, at a loss.

No wonder that the board, administering the wildest scheme that Congress ever devised, finds itself in a dilemma. It has spent all or most of the money that Congress provided, and it can pay out no more until Congress, next winter, comes to its aid. The farmer, consequently, must prepare to do his own financing through the banks, and the banks, with one eye on the surplus stocks and the other on tobogganing prices, can hardly with safety advance enough to cover the bare cost of production. If the board had more money to spend it would be hard put to it to find storage, for elevators and warehouses are crammed and space is at a premium. Yet Senator Capper of Kansas, who owns a whole string of farm papers and regards himself as a farmers' spokesman, comes out with a demand that the board buy another hundred million bushels because "the wheat price situation has approached a crisis and it must be met."

Under these circumstances it seems a bit futile to expect that the Secretary of Agriculture and the chairman of the Farm Board will get very far in their campaign to convert the wheat farmers to reducing their acreage. Mr. Legge may have been indiscreet, as he certainly was indelicate, in likening the Kansas farmers the other day to the big hog that always lies down in the trough, but if the Kansas farmer is to go on raising as much wheat as he can and letting somebody else practice reduction, we shall continue to have a surplus as long as the government promises to hold the bag. Moreover, the government itself is in the worst possible position for pleading with the farmers, for the whole theory of the idiotic plan of farm relief is that the government, by buying and holding any surplus, will thereby steady the market and so, indirectly, regulate prices.

Let no one, whether he lives in a farming district or in an industrial center, make any mistake about the outlook. The farm-relief program spells calamity. It means stagnation for agriculture, huge financial loss to the government, and continued depression in every industry whose products the farmer would ordinarily buy, in addition to jeopardizing the existence of a multitude of legitimate middlemen. Mr. Coolidge is kind enough to say that the experience "will be worth all it costs." There is no doubt that it will be expensive.

Treaty and Peace Lovers

THE letter from Roger Baldwin, which we print in our correspondence columns this week, makes a definite challenge to peace-lovers and moves us to restate our own position on the pending naval limitation treaty. Mr. Baldwin cannot understand why uncompromising devotees of peace do not come out against the treaty, disregarding the fact that they will then find themselves allied with jingo Senators and admirals. He also asks whether this treaty fight will not reveal "the bankruptcy of the middle-class liberals, of the radical pacifists." We hardly think so, but needless to say we respect highly the position of those who see eye to eye with Mr. Baldwin. Our readers have been too often made aware of our willingness to take the uncompromising, idealistic position at any cost, as in the matter of India, for example, to make it necessary for us to assure them that fear of standing with the belligerent admirals and Senators had nothing to do with our stand.

Our position has been this: We have held that the London conference was a miserable failure; that if it should result in our building up to parity, or increasing our navy in any degree, we should consider it a disaster; it would make the word limitation a ghastly joke. We have seen from the time the treaty was written only one possible worth-while outcome of it, and that is the end of all talk of naval rivalry between the United States and Great Britain; precisely as the Washington conference, which seemed to so many liberals nothing but a deception and a snare, put a definite end to the talk of war between Japan and the United States, stopped the admirals from asserting that we were in grave danger in the Pacific, and led our sensational Sunday editors to drop their portrayal of the coming Japanese-American hostilities from the list of their available scare stories. If the ratification of the treaty with Great Britain has a similar effect in stopping the mouths of our war inciters, in and out of uniform, we are for it.

That does not mean that we shall agree for one moment to building up our fleet to parity with Great Britain. We have already stated in clearest terms that this does not need to happen and we have urged (in The Nation for April 30) all our readers to do their utmost to prevent the voting of a single additional ship. One of the greatest fights ever waged will be on in Congress after the ratification between those who are opposed to further warships and those super-patriots and manufacturers of ships and guns who will at once be in the breach demanding that we build up to parity. There should be no quarter in this struggle. But we would remind Mr. Baldwin that this fight will be quite as inevitable if the treaty is defeated as if it is ratified. With an intellectual density and moral obtuseness we ourselves cannot remotely fathom, Mr. Hoover has joined his immediate predecessor in declaring that if there is no limitation then there will be a race in armaments between this country and Great Britain. Why there should be this finality of decision we cannot understand. Mr. Hoover and his delegates to London have constantly talked about what the American people want, and how large a navy they will demand in this or that contingency. They have no right to assert that they know. The American people have never been asked to express their views about this whole navy business. No referendum has ever been taken; the politicians and armament-makers have seen to that and will fight to the death any proposal to make legal such a popular vote. We deny the inevitability of any such armament race, but if the treaty is defeated the issue will be joined, the race will be on.

We and those who feel as we do have no zeal whatever for the treaty; we are almost entirely indifferent. We shall be but little more interested if it is defeated than if it is ratified. It is the struggle which is bound to follow after the vote upon it which we wish to stress. We can only say in behalf of the treaty that fighters for peace will be in a little bit better position if it is approved than if it is defeated. We cannot rise to heights of indignation against it. If we could the caliber of the Senators, with one or two exceptions, who are opposing the ratification would fire us to the boiling-point. Our natural inclination is to take after them, whatever they espouse, as a pack of hounds takes up the trail of the fox. The more they talk the greater the discredit they will cast upon this whole naval business. It is really incredible that men like Mr. Stimson and some of his associates should dare to pretend that this treaty bears in the slightest degree any mark of genuine constructive statesmanship. We notice with interest that Dwight Morrow has never opened his lips about it since he returned from London, not even during his recent Senatorial campaign in New Jersey.

Black and Gold Stars

THERE is no record, so far as we know, that any officer in the late war refused a Negro soldier the inestimable privilege of dying for his country because of his color. "No, Mr. Johnson, you will not go over the top today; today is the day for the Randolphs of Virginia to make the supreme sacrifice." If remarks such as these were ever uttered while the United States fought the Germans, we do not recall having seen them in print. But our government has not learned that such scenes did not actually take place. And as a result, when we get around to sending off to France the mothers and widows of men who were killed in the war, in order that they may visit the graves of their dead soldiers, we make the incredibly stupid and ungracious gesture of drawing attention to the Negro women, putting them in a group by themselves, providing for them a different sort of accommodation in hotels and on shipboard. Their black sons died as white men die. The mothers are not to visit the graves as do white mothers.

The War Department, of course, is full of explanations for the segregation of Negro mothers and for their lodging at different hotels and their passage on different steamships from those provided for white women. Secretary of War Hurley says: "After thorough study the conclusion was reached that the formation of white and colored groups of mothers and widows would best assure the contentment and comfort of the pilgrims themselves." However, as he explained at length: "All groups will receive like accommodations at hotels and on steamships, and the representatives of the War Department will at all times be as solicitous of the welfare of Negro mothers and widows as they will be of white ones." Fifty-five Negro women have canceled their reservations so far on the ground that they were not given like accommodations, either at hotels or on shipboard. A letter voicing the protest of the Negro women has been sent to President Hoover. The letter should have provided interesting reading for the Chief Executive, but his reply was a brief acknowledgment of the letter and a statement that it had been referred to the War Department. The letter said in part:

> As a Gold Star mother who happens to be colored, I wish to protest against the gratuitous insult in the attitude of the War Department of the United States in segregating colored Gold Star mothers who are entitled to go to France to visit the graves where our loved ones are buried. When the call to arms came . . . in 1917 mothers, sisters, and wives, regardless of race, color, or creed, were asked to give their loved ones. . . . This call we answered freely and willingly. . . . Ten years after the armistice . . . we who gave, and who are colored, are insulted by the implication that we are not fit persons to travel with other bereaved ones. Instead of making up parties of Gold Star mothers on the basis of geographical location, we are set aside in a separate group, jim-crowed, segregated, and insulted.

The Negro women, therefore, are not so much concerned with Mr. Hurley's offer of "like accommodations" as they are with the simple and undeniable fact that they have been segregated. And surely there was no time in the history of our country when segregation was less necessary and more cruel. If there were a few white women from any section of the country who were so delicately constituted that they could not endure to travel on the same ship with a black woman whose son or husband was killed in France, the War Department might with good grace have received cancellations of their passages. But we believe that such cancellations would have been few and far between. We believe that American white women are less prejudiced than the War Department itself. We believe that Negro women in a group would have been as welcome as Italian women or Jewish women or Polish women, for whom it was not thought necessary to provide separate accommodations. The government must learn that the Negroes are no longer property to be shunted around back alleys and smuggled in at side doors. They are American citizens with a vote. There are laws to insure to them their rights as such. And it is altogether unlikely, if the Government of the United States had declared its intention of securing hotel rooms or steamship cabins for Negro women, that any hotel or steamship line would have refused the request, Mr. Hurley to the contrary notwithstanding.

But in the last analysis it is segregation that the Negroes object to first and most bitterly. And it is in segregation that the War Department made its worst and most unfortunate blunder. It is hinted by the Administration that the protests were cooked up by a group of Negro agitators. It is good to note, therefore, that so far from this being the case, the first protests were made by white persons, and that, according to Walter White of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, not a ghost of an attempt was made to make one Negro woman cancel her passage. If governments will not learn, citizens will.

Conan Doyle

WE shall dispense with the "Sir Arthur." That came long after Sherlock Holmes had been created, and only because—it is believed—Dr. Doyle had whitewashed the Boer War in a book which was translated into twelve languages. The King of England does not ordinarily bestow knighthood on mere story-tellers, so doubtless in this case he had his own special reasons of weight and state. But in this very case the honorific is so meaningless that we who love good stories shall take our revenge on the King and cease—now that the magician is dead—to recognize the "Sir."

We shall dispense also with the author of medieval fiction and of books about wars. We are tempted to dispense at the same time with the old man who went in for spiritualism and displayed photographs of ectoplasm. But we had better keep him around. For as the late William Bolitho of the New York World has pointed out, there is probably some connection between the maker of Sherlock Holmes and the believer in voices from "the other side"—of what, it seems, he never said, but it does not matter.

William Bolitho had the advantage of being able to see an exhibition of drawings by Charles Doyle, the immortal's father; and he had the perspicacity to recognize that the subjects of these drawings—fairies and goblins chiefly—bore some relation to the subjects treated later on by the son, not only in the spiritualistic writings but in the detective tales themselves. "For Sherlock Holmes himself was a fairy," claimed Mr. Bolitho. "Apply the test—was he not altogether good, yet impossible to imagine in love?" Without becoming quite so personal as that, we can agree that the world represented by Holmes was—and is, for it cannot grow old—delightful as only unreal worlds can be delightful.

What could be more unreal and fascinating than a world at the center of which a man sits, smoking tobacco, while he waits for things to happen which invariably shall be wonderful or terrible? That was the privilege of Sherlock Holmes. England was a little stage set with wires along which messages reached him, and him alone, telling him of —well, the strange disappearance of a baronet in Devon, or the still stranger appearance of a Hindu in the shrubbery at Dingley-come-Dampford, Hustlebury, Hants. The great achievement of Conan Doyle was not the invention of the detective apparatus whereby Mr. Holmes solved his mysteries; it was the invention of the mysteries. They are what we still hunt for through the collected works, now that so many other men have tried to write the same kind of story and have somehow failed. Sooner or later we go back to Sherlock Holmes; and then, surely, it is not the solutions that captivate us. It is the situations—and the picture of this imperturbable man among them, waiting there in Baker Street till the web twitches and a morsel of human wonder comes along for his devouring. That Conan Doyle thought he was doing the same thing later on when he groped for messages from the other side, and that he was pathetic in thinking so, does not remove the suspicion that it was the same thing after all. He simply had grown old and had lost his grip on the particular unreality which he had once found a great public to share with him.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

IF the younger generation is in almost every respect an improvement over the generations which have gone before (and surely nobody will deny this contention) there must be a reason. Some have pointed out that children of today are less harassed by parental discipline and that Sunday school attendance has fallen off considerably. And yet I think we must look to other sources for the increase in courage and gallantry of spirit among the boys and girls of our own day. I am inclined to give the credit to the newspaper comic strips.

The hard-boiled little ones who are to carry on the torch have been educated for the most part upon the adventures of characters surprisingly sturdy. The comic strip, to be sure, is not a new invention, but syndication has grown prodigiously within the past ten years and now no child even in a distant hamlet is likely to be deprived of an opportunity to follow the fate of Mutt and Jeff and many others. The comic pictures of my own childhood were a thin stream. Neither in volume nor in violence was there anything approaching the flood tide of our day. It is my recollection that I came into contact with the emancipated characters of the newspaper strips only on Sundays. The daily press in those benighted days was devoted to recording fires, floods, wars, and political addresses. Room had not yet been made for features solely aesthetic in their content. The daily strip was still a dream and for six days in every week I lived, like my fellows, on no more satisfying ration than moral precepts. These inculcated for the most part a sense of fear, and there were ever so many things in the world at the thought of which any child had a right to tremble.

New York was moderately well settled by the time that I got born. We had a City Hall, a mayor and chief of police, and also street lamps. And yet I can remember an early fear of wild animals. There was a vacant lot on a Broadway corner now occupied by one of the largest of metropolitan apartment houses. I would never have been surprised to see avenging she-bears pop out from its brambles and rank weeds. And it would have been horrifying although not altogether startling to meet a lion on any landing of the stairs at home in corners where the gaslight functioned feebly.

The yearly trip to the circus had in it, as far as I was concerned, elements of martyrdom. I never liked to run the gantlet down the long line of elephants. Uncles and aunts supposed that I enjoyed the business of making timid proffer to the beasts of peanuts which I would rather have consumed myself with safety and satisfaction. Well did I know the fate of such youths as palmed off tobacco plugs and other indigestibles upon these fierce animals. And though I played no tricks at all how was I to know that some sensitive member of the herd might not happen on a nut a little off the normal and hold me responsible? If there was any sense of justice among the elephants they could have no reason to complain of me, but I was not convinced of their good-will or fairness. And small solace did I get because some aunt whispered: "Jumbo won't hurt you. Jumbo loves you."

If it so happens that he did his affection was by no means reciprocated. And if he held a grudge I had little faith that Aunt Ella would actually be efficient in averting sledge-hammer blows of that great trunk. In all my daily life it seemed that beasts were abundant, sinister, and savage. Almost every day I saw lions and tigers in Central Park and to my eyes the bars seemed flimsy. The average citizen upon going to Lloyd's could probably get huge odds against the possibility of his being eaten by a lion. And very few inhabitants of Manhattan are trampled to death by elephants in any given year. But how could I know that? The beasts were everywhere and they were strong and I was small and brittle. Policemen were also common and carried clubs.

The indestructibility of human fiber was a concept which I never achieved. I have not caught it yet. If I had only grown up receiving the comforting intimations of the comic strips I might not have led a frightened childhood nor left at last my adolescence in exchange for timorous manhood. Now, when it is much too late, I am privileged almost any day to see a dozen bricks bounce off the head of Mutt and even more frequently fall on his comrade Jeff. The victim cries out "Pow!" and also "Ouch!" There is an indication that at the moment of impact he sees stars. But in any case the injury is wholly superficial. No serious damage is done even when the missiles are dropped by Jeff from a great height upon the head of his friend. I've seen Mutt live through a Zeppelin bombardment and suffer nothing more than minor abrasions and acute annoyance.

When next we see Mutt in that same strip he has launched an airplane and is in close pursuit of his tormentor. With leer and pitchfork he stabs holes into the gas bag which supports the luckless Jeff. "Nix, Mutt! Nix, Mutt!" cries out poor Jeff. Down drops the balloon and down goes Jeff. To destruction? Don't be silly.

As for the Captain and the Kids, I've known that estimable mariner to fight with octopi and gorillas and escape with nothing more serious than a torn collar and fierce rage against his offspring who put him into the predicament. I've seen him bound hand and foot and tossed into shark-infested waters by his antic children. Crocodiles have been introduced into his bed at night and cannibals aroused against him through misconceptions fostered by Hans and Fritz. Their sense of humor has led them at times to fire the ship and again to blow it up with dynamite. But nobody is ever hurt. At least not vitally.

I would not commend the comic strip as an agency for inculcating good manners. It seems to me that the frolicsome children of these pictures sometimes go too far in their search for good clean fun. But they do set up in the impressionable a fine and simple faith in the toughness of the human carcass and the imperviousness of the human spirit. I was taught in school that there is no such word as fail, but my faith in this fact was never lively, even though I copied the maxim many times. Much more hearty would have been my belief if only I could have lived for a few passionate moments each day with the heroes of the comic page and learned to be a lot more like them.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Newspaper Criminals in Chicago

By A VETERAN JOURNALIST

Chicago, July 14

THE editor of The Nation has asked me to write on the recent startling charges, preferred by newspapermen themselves, of criminal racketeering on the part of Chicago reporters, editors, and other press men. He wanted, he said, the full and absolute truth.

The full and absolute truth, alas, may never be known. A grand jury is sitting and inquiring into the murder of "Jake" Lingle, the reporter for the Chicago Tribune, and into the causes and motives of that typical crime. The police department is supposed to be carrying on a rigorous investigation on its own account, as is the State's attorney's office. A mysterious committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce with its own detectives, presumably loyal and competent, is at work on the same sensational case. In due time we may expect reports, presentments, indictments, perhaps even murder trials. But it does not follow by any means that the truth will be ascertained and disclosed regarding the crime situation in Chicago, so far as crime is organized and is a direct or indirect outcome of official corruption and venality, police negligence and blindness, police alliances with gangland. Still less does it follow that the whole truth about newspaper racketeers and copartners of professional gangsters will be revealed to what I must admit is a rather cynical, skeptical, and apathetic public.

There is little, if any, confidence in the police, and hardly any in the State's attorney's office. The Chicago newspaper publishers did jointly pledge themselves to the community to wage a relentless campaign against crime, rotten politics, and police corruption, but that was before it was established that Lingle had been assassinated not because he was a conscientious reporter faithful to his charge and ready to take risks in combating crime and criminal vice, but because he was a crook, a blackmailer, a peddler of illicit favors, and a close friend of high and low police officers not all of whom were or are above suspicion.

Today there is no love or good-will among the newspaper proprietors and editors. Some complain of broken faith and others of unfair and gratuitous efforts to besmirch the whole journalistic profession in Chicago in order to divert attention from one sore and damned spot—the city room of the Tribune. Cooperation is the last thing now to be hoped for from the five or six newspapers of Chicago. They are engaged in recrimination and the bandying of charges of insincerity, evasion, and suppression of ugly facts. If they continue in this sordid game they will disgust the public and lead it to cry, "A plague o' both your houses."

Meantime, what are the facts as contradistinguished from mud-slinging, rumor, and conjecture? I do not believe that any considerable number of reporters or other press men in Chicago are guilty of criminal racketeering. Lingle was an exception to the rule. There are perhaps a few other such scandalous exceptions. But the probability is that the great majority of those newspapermen whose work has necessitated contact with criminals, vice lords, grafting politicians, and blackmailing policemen have remained upright and clean. Mistakes of policy and tactics may have been made by some of them. It is admitted that some have sought to use low-lived and disreputable men—stool pigeons, parasites, half-reformed crooks, and the like, and of course the chances are that these unscrupulous men have used the reporters instead and given them misleading information, faked news, and downright misinformation. Nor would these underworld characters hesitate to pose as trusted agents of the press, to threaten exposure of their friends or foes in the pages of this or that newspaper, or to demand regular and fat tribute for silence.

It seems to me foolish and dangerous for honest newspapers to seek material in the lowest and meanest circles of the underworld. If a paper can afford to hire good detectives and embark upon a "piperization" of its local police or of any other group of public servants suspected of corruption, well and good. Valuable service might thus be rendered to a community vainly wrestling with the allied forces of evil and darkness. But this is a different thing from trying to get truth and fact out of professional stool pigeons, who are notoriously mendacious and purchasable.

Let us now glance at the insinuations and vague charges that have been leveled at the Chicago press since the Lingle murder. The indictment that has attracted the most attention is that of Harry T. Brundidge, reporter for the St. Louis, Missouri, Star, who was sent to Chicago to investigate the crime situation and tell the truth about it. Mr. Brundidge made the following statements:

That a certain reporter is known as the unofficial mayor of Chicago, as Lingle was known to many as the unofficial chief of police.

That another reporter collects five cents a bag for every sack of cement sold in Chicago, and that other reporters are connected with a street-paving racket.

That a certain reporter controls the bond-signing racket, and another has made a fortune by tipping off, from police stations, accidents to ambulance-chasing shysters.

That a certain reporter boasted of having cleaned up $200 a week at the county building by forcing grafters to share their booty with him.

That a certain reporter was a guest of Al Capone in Florida and at Havana, dined and wined at the expense of that vice lord, and used an alias while claiming to be a dealer in real estate.

That a certain newspaper executive told Mr. Brundidge that there was no sense in newspapermen living like tramps when "the filthy lucre is being passed out like rain checks at the ball park."

That a certain editor maintains an office in the Loop separate from that which he has at his newspaper, and that the transactions carried on in the mysterious office won't bear the light of day.

Well, these are rather serious statements. Mr. Brundidge offered to go before a Cook County grand jury and give the names, dates, places, and other piquant details to which he merely alluded in his dispatches. Was his offer promptly and heartily accepted? Not exactly. The State's attorney, former Judge Swanson, insisted that Brundidge submit himself to some sort of preliminary examination, or cross-examination, by an assistant prosecutor. Otherwise, he said, he would not call Brundidge as a witness. The latter, or rather his boss, the managing editor of the St. Louis Star, took the position that this preliminary examination was unnecessary, questionable as to motive, and an unfair reflection upon the veracity and integrity of Brundidge. According to latest reports, the grand jury has decided to call Mr. Brundidge to testify.

To an impartial bystander neither the State's attorney nor the St. Louis Star emerges from the bizarre controversy with flying colors. Was Brundidge afraid of the third degree in State's Attorney Swanson's office? He had no reason to apprehend the application to himself of that gentle art of extorting confessions or changing testimony to suit the examiners. The Chicago police uses the third degree early and often, but the State's attorney's assistants are more law-abiding and more amenable to decent opinion. Mr. Brundidge and his boss have strained at trivialities instead of proffering prompt and unconditional cooperation to the Chicago authorities.

But why, it may be asked, the demand that the St. Louis reporter go through the ordeal of a preliminary examination at the prosecutor's office? Because, say those who profess to know, the State's attorney has no desire to play into the hands of sensation-mongers, and is inclined to believe that Brundidge knows little of real value, and that he is being exploited by the Chicago Tribune, which has shown some avidity in republishing his dispatches and lending them an unmerited importance. It is said, further, that were Brundidge permitted to testify at length and at will before the grand jury his statements would straightway find their way into the pages of the Tribune, in violation of the rules of law and orderly justice, and help that newspaper to darken counsel and discredit its competitors. Meanwhile, in an interview published in the St. Louis Star, Colonel R. R. McCormick of the Tribune was quoted as follows:

> I shall personally request the grand jury to make a thorough investigation of all facts and rumors having to do with alliances between newspapermen and the underworld.
>
> There is no need of beating about the bush. If the newspapers in Chicago are to continue to occupy the foremost place in the life of this country, we must clean house. The Tribune has nothing to conceal, it is bigger than any or all of its personnel, and I will not only discharge but prosecute any man on our pay roll who has used his employment dishonestly.

Regarding the slain reporter Colonel McCormick said:

> His life and death are only an incident. I might, according to the facts so far developed, figure out a long and tortuous course to prove why Lingle was an honest man. I know he was not honest, so why should I?

Whatever may be the result of the grand jury hearings, it is certain that politically and administratively conditions in Chicago are rotten to the core. The official organ of the police force says in its current issue that at least 20 per cent of the men on the force are corrupt and ought to be in the penitentiary. This estimate is very conservative. Only a few years ago a commissioner of police said publicly that in his opinion 50 per cent of the force were corrupt. The gangs carry hundreds of police officers on their pay rolls. Occasionally a book of tell-tale addresses—addresses of patrons, of kept and bribed officers—is found on the body of a dead gangster or in a raid. The little incriminating black book is at once destroyed by the police. The breweries and speakeasies, the sumptuous gambling establishments, the shady hotels, to say nothing of the thousands of cheap and filthy dens, severally pay for protection. They pay in more ways than one. They send checks to party bosses, to political machines, to influential candidates. They have friends in the highest official circles. They are not without pull on the bench. In these circumstances it is no holiday task for any grand jury and group of prosecutors to follow up clews mercilessly and successfully. Many people will refuse to testify. Some will perjure themselves. Racketeers will enter passionate denials of guilt, and adequate proof against them will demand more time, energy, skill, and devotion to the truth than we can reasonably hope for in these troubled times.

I have said that the Chicago public is quite apathetic despite the reign of lawless gangs and their great, far-reaching political power. This apathy is understandable. For years every local governing body has been justly accused of waste, theft, and every kind of rascality. There have been indictments, trials, and exposures. Few of the rascals have been punished, and the prosecution of the crooked officials has been dilatory, languid, ineffective, and glaringly insincere. When every local government is believed to be a nest of cynical spoils, if not a den of plunderers and blackmailers, when criminal and civil proceedings against faithless officials are permitted to lag and die of inanition and neglect, if not of sabotage, the average citizen is prepared to believe that the poison has spread to and profoundly corrupted even the organs of public opinion. The public is ready to believe that scores of newspapermen have yielded to the temptations thrust under their noses and increased their small incomes by forcing the division with them of the blackmail levied upon various trades and occupations. The newspaper passion for scoops, for fresh sensations, for exciting news has led to practices which lend color, superficially, to the wholesale charges of reportorial and editorial racketeering.

The situation calls for a vigorous and unsparing house-cleaning, for an inquiry under the guidance of an independent, courageous, and resourceful special prosecutor. It is a question whether the politicians would favor or tolerate such an inquiry. It is a question whether all the local newspapers really want it. Some do, undoubtedly, and some probably do not. The situation calls also for an intelligent and candid inquiry into the causes of the prevalent and triumphant corruption. Cant and humbug must be eschewed, and the facts faced and set forth. Is the Chicago press ready to embark upon such a delicate and difficult enterprise? I doubt it.

Mr. Villard's ninth article on The Press Today, which was announced for this issue, will appear instead in The Nation for July 30.—Editor The Nation.

What I Believe

By J. B. S. HALDANE

I AM a representative of the generation whose finest members died in the great war. As a child I was not brought up in the tenets of any religion, but in a household where science and philosophy took the place of faith. As a boy I had very free access to contemporary thought, so that I do not today find Einstein unintelligible or Freud shocking. As a youth I fought through the war, and learned to appreciate sides of human character with which the ordinary intellectual is not brought into contact. As a man I am a biologist, and see the world from an angle which gives me an unaccustomed perspective, but not, I think, a wholly misleading one.

In describing in so little space the world as I see it I cannot avoid being dogmatic. I do not doubt that some of the statements which I am going to make are false. A survey of the beliefs which intelligent men in the past have held as certainties makes that sufficiently clear. One cannot order one's life without a set of beliefs of some kind. But the intellectually honest man must recognize the utterly provisional nature of his beliefs. So when I make an apparently definite statement I must ask you to put before it some such words as "It seems to me very probable that." I will now try to state my point of view.

Man lives in two worlds—the visible world which changes with time and an invisible world whose constituents do not change. But both worlds can only be described as they appear to us, that is, from a human and imperfect standpoint. Among the components of the invisible world are the realities corresponding to mathematical statements like $16 + 9 = 25$. This is a statement of fact as real as the Albert Memorial, which any sane person must recognize when it is pointed out to him. But unlike the Albert Memorial it was a reality 10,000 years ago and will be 10,000 years hence. There are also invisible realities corresponding to scientific laws, and I think also to our general notions of what is beautiful and good. These latter realities are harder to apprehend because we approach them through a mist of emotion.

We know very little about what may be called the geography of the invisible world. The religions, if I may continue the metaphor, have covered the vacant spaces of its map with imaginary monsters; the philosophies have ruled them with equally imaginary parallels of latitude. But both have affirmed, in opposition to the so-called practical man, that the meaning of the visible world is to be found in the invisible. That has been the secret of their success. They have failed when they tried either to describe the details of the visible world or to dictate the details of conduct in it. The churches are half empty today because their creeds are full of obsolete science, and their ethical codes are suited for a social organization far simpler than that of today. But they still command the support of some intelligent people because, amid a world of transitory interests, they support in some measure the claims of the ideal. I am not a member of any religious body because I find those claims supported elsewhere. If I thought that the aims of science and art were merely material I should belong to some church. But I believe that the scientist is trying to express absolute truth and the artist absolute beauty, so that I find in them, and in an attempt to lead a good life, all the religion that I need.

I have not very much use for people who are not in touch with the invisible world. At best they are good animals, and too often not even that. The men and women who have done best both for themselves and for their fellows are those who have brought these worlds into relation. We can hear music by radio today because James Clark Maxwell fifty-six years ago embodied an extremely important set of properties of electro-magnetic waves in a set of equations. Those equations represent an eternal truth—something in the invisible world. Their discovery rendered wireless communication possible. If you do not make any contact with this timeless world (in other words, have no inner life) you have at best a very precarious hold on happiness. Given that contact, you enjoy a very considerable security from the results of misfortune in the visible world, and a complete immunity from boredom.

One does not come naturally to the realization of eternal truths and values. One is brought there by education in the widest sense. It is one of my principal functions to teach certain scientific truths to students at Cambridge University. Many of them are both able and eager to learn. But others are neither the one nor the other. Under our present economic system they are enabled to come to Cambridge because their parents are wealthy. By so doing they keep out others who are better qualified intellectually to learn, and more willing to do so. As a teacher I cannot support a social system which is responsible for this injustice. We have got rid of physical starvation. We still have intellectual, aesthetic, and spiritual starvation, which to my mind are greater evils than any mere economic inequality. Until our educational system is so altered as to give a fair deal to every boy and girl who desires a first-rate education and is capable of benefiting by it, my political views are likely to remain, as they are now, on the left.

There is a worse evil than intellectual starvation, and that is the deliberate suppression of free thought and free speech. I rejoice to live in a country where this evil, though it exists, is less serious than in most other countries. But I believe that even in England freedom of publication is unduly restricted in the names of decency and morality. There is much more liberty in this respect across the Channel, and no one who has worked beside the French in peace and fought beside them in war can accuse them of degeneracy. So many new ideas are at first strange and horrible, though ultimately valuable, that a very heavy responsibility rests upon those who would prevent their dissemination.

I now turn from the world of ideas to the visible world. I am a biologist, that is to say, I study the nature of living creatures, and I naturally look at things from a biological point of view. I feel at home in the world because I know that the other animals, and the plants, too, are my blood relations. Even the inert matter has mostly been alive in the past. When I look at a limestone mountain I realize that, forbidding as it appears, it was made by countless billions of my microscopic fellow-creatures. What is more surprising, I think that I can even have some very dim inkling of what it feels like to be limestone. We know material objects in general from the outside. We know our own bodies from the inside. Just as everyone knows what it feels like to be hot, so I know from my own personal experience what it feels like to consist of an abnormally large or small amount of calcium carbonate, of which the limestone mountain is built. In this concrete and detailed way I feel my relationship to the world around me.

As a biologist I am interested in my body. Most people are only interested in anything below their skins when they are ill. I like to study the performance of mine as my friends do that of their motor cycles or receiving sets. It amuses me to know what my heart does when I run upstairs, or how quickly my fingernails grow. To a biologist even a toothache can be interesting. Naturally I regard health as extremely important, far more so than wealth, and I shall regard my life as well spent if I can do a little by research and education to make my fellow-creatures healthier. There is still an immense amount to be learned about health, but if what is at present known to a few were part of the general knowledge the average expectation of life could probably be increased by about ten years. Two difficulties lie in the way—ignorance and the dissemination of falsehoods. To take a simple example of the latter. Enormous sums are spent in advertising medicines and "health foods" which are generally useless and often dangerous. A widely advertised vitamin preparation contains, besides vitamins, a substance definitely poisonous to children. Under the law of the land I might have to pay thousands of pounds in damages if I mentioned the preparation in question, even if my statement were true. On the other hand I am at liberty to say publicly that diphtheria antitoxin is useless, which is a plain lie.

Now for an example of the prevailing ignorance. When a father advises his son on a choice of occupation he is generally guided mainly by economic, and partly by ethical, considerations. He wants his son to avoid bad wages and bad company. He does not think about bad health, though he may be impressed by the risk of violent death. Yet the health of different occupations differs to an extraordinary extent, and the average man knows very little about the risks of even his own job, let alone his neighbor's. Otherwise no sane man would take up such an occupation as that of metal grinder or barman, with a mortality double that of the average man, when he might become a carpenter or a railwayman, and thus enjoy an expectation of life above the average. Our rulers are equally ignorant of these matters. Protective duties and subsidies are granted quite impartially to healthy occupations like agriculture, and unhealthy such as the cutlery trade. When this is opposed it is opposed on economic grounds and never because, by encouraging an unhealthy trade, you are condemning some of your fellow-countrymen to death. All parties agree in putting economic considerations before biological; wealth before health. I could give you plenty more examples of this ignorance if space permitted.

Even a healthy man or woman is incomplete. For a large number of men the main interest in life, the main object of their desires, the main source of their satisfaction, is woman. For me the fascination of woman is only second to that of science. In most cases man's interest in woman culminates in marriage. Provided it does not then cease the marriage is generally a success. Successful marriage requires a certain effort by both husband and wife. But speaking as a happily married man, I can assure you that no other effort is so amply rewarded. Marriage has a biological basis and would be far more often a success if its biology were generally understood and the knowledge acted on. But you can only study the physiology of marriage against a background of general human physiology. If you do so the facts fit into their proper places. If not you get a distorted and unhealthy view of them.

The psychological, even the intellectual, benefits of marriage seem to me to be enormous. If a man has lived for some years in the closest intimacy with a woman he learns to look at life from her point of view as well as his own. A man who cannot do this is like a man blind in one eye. He does not appreciate the solidity and depth of the world before him. The ideas I am now putting forward are largely my wife's, or at any rate family ideas, rather than my own private productions. The unmarried woman is perhaps even worse off than the unmarried man; and few women seem to me to be psychologically complete till they have become mothers. During the Middle Ages Europe was far too much influenced by celibate men. Today much too big a part in public life is played by the celibate woman and too little by mothers. I find few ideas more genuinely disgusting than that of many education authorities that a woman ceases to be suitable as a teacher when she becomes a mother. Because I have so high an opinion of marriage at its best, I think that it should be possible to terminate it if it fails for any of a number of reasons, instead of, as now, for one only. This is called undermining the sanctity of marriage.

Marriage generally brings children. Everyone will agree that it would be an evil if the birth-rate of this country were halved, in which case the population would rapidly fall, or doubled, in which case it would increase too quickly. But they will disagree whether too many or too few children are born at present. I do not know myself, though I am clear that too many children are born in the slums, too few in the well-to-do suburbs. But we shall not arrive at a sensible solution of the population problem till we realize that it is a question of numbers, like the design of a motor car or the feeding of a nation, and cannot be settled by an appeal to abstract principles alone.

Our present educational system is unjust to children because the majority of them do not get a fair chance, and practically none are taught the truths of science from a human point of view. Science teaching should begin, not with a mythical body in rest or uniform motion, but with the human body. Mine did so begin when I was three years old.

Between different men and women there are immense differences which no amount of education can overcome. I do not believe that any training could have made Ramsay MacDonald into Jack Hobbs, or vice versa. The ideal society would enable every man and woman to make the best of their inborn possibilities. Hence it must have two characteristics: first, liberty, which would allow people to develop along their individual lines and not attempt to force all into one mold, however admirable; second, equality of opportunity, which would mean that, as far as is humanly possible, every man and woman would be able to obtain the position in society for which they were best suited by nature. The waste of human beings under our present system is a far worse evil than any merely economic waste. I believe in democracy because equality of opportunity is impossible where inherited rank or wealth is important, but for no other reason. I do not know what would be the ideal form of government in a community where that equality had been achieved. Democracy appeals to me, not as an end in itself, but as the most hopeful route to a classless society. In a classless society eugenic measures could be enforced by the state with little injustice. Today this would not be possible. We do not know in most cases how far social failure and success are due to heredity and how far to environment. And environment seems to be as yet the easier of the two to improve.

I am a citizen of the British Empire, which includes the great Dominions. My highbrow friends complain that the Dominions have produced little great art or literature. I answer that at least they have done something unique. Before the war the average expectation of life of a baby born in New Zealand was sixty years, in Australia fifty-seven years, in Denmark, the next healthiest country, fifty-six years. England also ran. Since then other countries have caught up to a large extent, but New Zealand and Australia still seem to be leading. I am proud to belong to a Commonwealth which has won the first and second places in the great race against death.

I am also a European, and proud of it. Europe is sick today, but it is at least making some attempt to cure that sickness by a federal union of its states. And it still leads the world in science, literature, art, and music. In methods of production the United States are ahead of us, and many Europeans think that we should copy them. When my wife and I were in Moscow last year we saw only two propaganda films. One was against alcohol, the other showed the manufacture of Ford cars. I take a different view for the following reason. Since 1921 the death-rate of Americans at every age from thirty upwards has been increasing steadily. In England this is of course not so. Whether as the result of hustle, prohibition, or the spread of medical cults which reject the results of science, America is at present heading for death, and not life. Europe has much to learn from America, a little even from Asia, but I do not think that we should imitate either of these continents.

Moreover, I am British, and, what is more remarkable, though of Scottish origin I believe in England. At the present moment our country counts for less in international politics than during the last century. Nevertheless some of our ideas and practices are at present conquering the world. In Moscow, which has rejected the great British invention of parliament, there was a word which I constantly noticed on posters. It was not "soviet," or "red," or "revolution," but when speaking, "football," rather oddly spelled "phutbol." The same is happening all over the world. Spanish bullfighters are becoming center forwards. German students are taking to football instead of slashing one another's faces. And with British sport goes the ethical code called sportsmanship, which future historians may perhaps consider as a British invention as important as parliaments and railways. I hope to see British sport conquer most of the world. But I am no narrow patriot and would welcome a French invasion of the British kitchen.

England is only likely to regain her former preeminence if we can be ten years ahead of the rest of the world in industry, as we were a century ago. We should of course reorganize our industries, but other countries have already done so. We shall not regain our place by doing so. We have no great undeveloped mineral resources. But we have undeveloped human resources, especially among the children of the skilled-artisan class. Our best hope for the future lies in giving these children a chance to become Watts and Stephensons.

Finally I am a human being, a citizen of the world, which applied science is daily unifying. My own profession of scientific research knows no frontiers and no color bars. Japanese, Indians, and Chinese, as well as Europeans and Americans, are, or have been, among my colleagues. I am naturally in favor of any measures tending to unify humanity and prevent war. But my views as to the best methods of achieving these aims are not informed by sufficient knowledge to be worth stating.

I am glad that I live today and not at any time in the past. In the 4,000 years before about 1800 A.D. civilization had spread over a gradually widening area, but its quality had not greatly improved. A century ago in England children were hanged for theft, and the men of the ruling class habitually drank themselves under the table. Neither of these evils existed in Ur of the Chaldees 4,000 years earlier. In the last century we have doubled our average expectation of life, quadrupled our average real wage, and vastly improved our education and morals. This has been made possible, in the main, by the application of science. Today the whole form of civilization is changing. We are trying unheard-of experiments. The great experiment of socialism is being tried in Russia and will doubtless be tried elsewhere. We meet with huge and unexpected accidents like the great war. We shall go on having such accidents so long as our rulers are not merely ignorant of science, but think on prescientific lines. (You will remember how the Kaiser talked of the war in terms of "shining armor," and Mr. Asquith of "unsheathed swords.") We have got to learn to think scientifically, not only about inanimate things, but about ourselves and one another. It is possible to do so. A single mind can acquire a fair knowledge of the whole field of science, and find plenty of time to spare for ordinary human affairs. Not many people take the trouble to do so. But without a knowledge of science one cannot understand current events. That is why modern literature and art are mostly so unreal.

We live in a dangerous age, but an extraordinarily interesting one. History is being made on a vaster scale than ever before. For humanity as a whole I am hopeful. For England I am only moderately hopeful, though I believe that if we are willing to adapt ourselves to new conditions of life we may yet be as great a nation as ever. But even if I am killed in the destruction of London during the next war or the British revolution, I hope that I shall find time to think as I die, "I am glad that I lived when and where I did. It was a good show."

"Mine Own with Usury"

The Investment Trust

By J. G. CURTIS

TO get an idea of what an investment trust really is one might begin with a story in the Gospel according to St. Matthew about a man who wanted some of his money looked after while he was away on a trip. He wisely spread his riches, placing this money in three separate trusts. In two of these it was doubled; in one he gained nothing at all. He was viciously angry about the third one. "Thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not," he exclaimed to his trustee, "and gather where I have not strawed. Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury."

It is a distinguishing characteristic of our culture that the servants or trustees with whom we place our money are almost invariably corporations. Most commonly they are banks, which are the simplest form of investment trust although they are not conventionally thought of as such. The bank depositor's money goes indistinguishably with other depositors' money into common funds which are invested in loans, mortgages, and securities; and from the income on those diversified investments the depositor is paid his usury, which in these un-Biblical days is about 4 per cent. Either because he is timid or because he doesn't know any better, he leaves his money there and satisfies himself with his low return. Assuming that he is timid or doesn't know any better or both, this is an extremely wise thing for him to do.

Whatever the bankers can make on his money over and above the 4 per cent they pay him he lets them keep without question. But after a while his timidity is outgrown and his knowledge is increased by stories he hears of the money other people are making on securities. He decides to try something of the sort himself. Statistics indicate that he probably will buy some shares of stock without being adequately advised or informed as to their real value and the conditions likely to influence their price; and by this technically lamb-like act he will make of himself food for bears, who in the neighborhood of stock exchanges are unhesitatingly carnivorous.

But whether or not the small investor is so unfortunate as to find his stock has gone down in price when for one reason or another he has to sell it, he will have heard that there are people who know all about stocks and are excessively clever traders, and that these clever people will accept his money, make it part of a large fund, and operate that fund so profitably that even the increase on his small share will make him rich. Because he is perfectly sure that somebody must know more about General Motors, National Biscuit, American Cyanamid, or Sears Roebuck than he does, he gives his money to one of these groups of clever people and receives therefor a certificate for an appropriate number of shares in the fund. This fund is sometimes called irreverently a "blind pool"; reverently it is called an investment trust; more accurately it is called a trading company. Two hundred years ago people invested in "a scheme, the purpose of which is to be announced later," and have been called ridiculous ever since in histories of speculation. Today their descendants constantly do the same thing without exciting any risibility whatever.

The clever people who manage this fund in which our investor has put his money make a small charge for their services, which is in effect deducted before his profits are paid him. He has thus exactly reversed the conditions under which he kept his money in the bank: then he accepted a small agreed return, 4 per cent, and let the bankers keep all they could make above that; now it is the investment managers who accept the small per cent and it is he who keeps everything else. His advantage under the latter scheme is obvious, but what about the clever people who have made his advantage possible? Are they impelled by sheer nobility, or have they too some advantage of a recondite sort? In the first place, they have the advantage of not being responsible if their cleverness fails them and there is a loss instead of a gain. What is far more important, they have the control of funds with which they can buy and sell their own securities in a perfectly legal and highly profitable way. Most of them, that is, are persons already in the business of "manufacturing" securities. They are what are called "banking houses," and their function is largely to furnish long-term financing to industry. In other words, if the Bering Sea Power Company or the Little America Whaleries, Inc., wants more capital the banking house will arrange to sell the necessary stock; and because the knack of inducing people to buy stock under competitive conditions is both necessary and rare, the successful banking houses are able to charge large fees and make prodigious profits. It is a matter of frequent occurrence, however, that some of the stock issues for which they are sponsor are not successful, and they are forced to hold the stock themselves or buy some of it back, in order to protect their reputation as vendors of good securities. In addition to this, they are constantly trading in existing issues of stock, just as any speculator might do except that they have exceptional advantages of shrewdness and information. They can therefore very conveniently utilize a large fund of other peoples' money, especially when it is costing them nothing. And meanwhile the other people are happy in the thought that they are sharing in the profits of the great financiers. Some persons are as naive as that.

Of course there are plenty of men and women who are justified in speculating in this type of investment trust as much as in anything else. The trouble is that numerically most of the people who are speculating shouldn't be doing it at all, even under the delusion that they are battening off the generosity of the insiders. They should be going to the investment trusts that are dissociated from the promotion of securities and that select their securities for bona fide investment. There are several such—the only difficulty is that the person who is ignorant in such matters does not know whom to believe. For the purest type of investment trust service, however, one should choose concerns that have as much interest in grinding their customer's ax as in grinding their own, and that do not fail to maintain a just diversification.

From the foregoing it is apparent what diverse things may be called "investment trusts," depending upon what the managers of the trust are allowed to do with the money intrusted to them. There are some holding companies, such as the Transamerica Corporation, which are sometimes called investment trusts, though their primary function is to own and operate subsidiaries. With equal license almost any organization might be called an investment trust, from the Travelers Insurance Company, which is a large owner of diversified securities, to the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, which controls the associated Bell telephone companies, and the Western Electric Company. It may even be said that the stock of such organizations represents a better diversification of assets than do the shares of some properly so-called investment trusts, which in spite of what they are called do not put investment before speculation; even though they nominally employ their funds in the purchase of diversified securities they are by no means devised primarily in the investor's interest. They are devised in the interest of those who manage them, and they are engines of speculation, not of investment.

The claim made by all of them is that they spread the risk for the investor by backing his investment with many securities instead of a few, and that they give him the benefit of a skilful professional management. It is a good claim, and if the investor could be confident that it was justified he would be fortunate, for it is true that diversification of investment is invaluable and it is true that professionals are better at investment than amateurs are. But after all who is interested in mere investment? Who is satisfied with 4 per cent, or 10, or 100? What intelligent person in an acquisitive society is content with less than his own with usury? As a matter of fact, a few appear to be, but so few that they create no conspicuous demand for investment experts. The demand is for speculative experts who can double our money. And these experts find that the apparatus of the investment trust, admirable for the investment needs of the great mass of small investors, is just as admirable for speculative purposes, and has the enchantment of novelty for the person with a few dollars who wants to double them.

The trouble is that finding the best investment trust or the best investment is like trying to select the best doctor plus trying to select the best basket of strawberries from the grocer's display. Ignorance and avarice unite to the confusion of judgment. It is possible that as we get somewhere nearer an equality of wealth the material needs of life may be more temperately satisfied and the procedure of investment may become as readily mastered as the manipulation of an automobile or a radio. But since we are still far short of that time, the person who quite reasonably thinks he would like to have more than 4 per cent on his savings—or even than 4¾ per cent, which one bank pays—will continue to look for an investment trust. But he should not feel satisfied when he finds something which calls itself that. Before he puts his money in the capable hands of the manager he should ask: "Have you any stuff of your own that you are going to put this money of mine into?"

Nine times out of ten the investment-trust manager will smile frankly and say yes. And nine times out of ten the modest investor will give him his money anyway.

The Hague Codification Conference

By EDWIN M. BORCHARD

THE first Conference for the Codification of International Law called by the League of Nations to codify the subjects of nationality, territorial waters, and responsibility of states for injuries to aliens adjourned at The Hague on April 12 after a four weeks' session. After five years of preparatory work, with voluminous documentation, by committees of experts of the League in cooperation with the governments represented, these three subjects were selected as presumably ripe for codification. Some forty-seven states were represented at The Hague, including members and non-members of the League. The delegates and technical advisers were divided into three groups or commissions, one dealing with each of the three subjects.

Notwithstanding four weeks of almost daily conference, the results achieved were very slim. On the subject of nationality the goal of the conference was to eliminate, so far as possible, cases of dual nationality and statelessness (no nationality) arising out of the many conflicts of internal law on nationality. A narrow convention was agreed upon, which the United States alone voted against, together with three protocols and eight recommendations. On the subjects of territorial waters and the responsibility of states the differences proved so great that no convention was voted, the conference contenting itself merely with reports indicating inability to agree.

In the field of nationality each state has its own laws, resulting, of course, in innumerable cases of dual nationality and statelessness. The reduction of these conflicts can come only through international agreement. The majority of the states at The Hague agreed to a few rules. Of these the following are of general interest: diplomatic protection by one state against the other state of a person having two nationalities was prohibited; easier methods were agreed upon for renouncing that one of two nationalities with which a dual national is least closely connected; expatriation permits, if required by a country, shall be given effect in other countries—a provision which was mainly responsible for the negative vote of the United States; women marrying aliens shall not lose their nationality unless they acquire their husbands' nationality; moreover, in order for a wife to lose her nationality during marriage by a change in her husband's nationality, her consent shall be required—a concession from traditional Continental rules. Several provisions were adopted concerning the nationality of children, including illegitimate children, foundlings, adopted children, and children of ambassadors and consuls.

Three separate protocols were adopted. One of these, providing that a dual national who habitually resides in one of his countries shall be exempt from military obligations in the other, would, if ratified, be of great importance to the United States. The program of the National Woman's Party—that nationality laws shall make no distinction in the matter of sex—was rejected, although one of the recommendations of the conference commends this question to the study of the governments. But the conference adhered to tradition and upheld the alleged unity of the family by agreeing that the woman, on marriage, takes the nationality of her husband if by his law she acquires it. This is less than the Cable Act grants, and it may have influenced the United States not to sign. How much of the convention and protocols will be ratified is problematical. Nations do not change their laws too readily and the Woman's Party has declared war upon the convention.

In the fields of territorial waters and responsibility of states the situation was very different. A long development of international practice and decisions of many arbitral tribunals had established certain rules of international law on these subjects which it was proposed now to codify in legislative form. The futility of the effort soon became apparent, for a considerable number of the states desired to modify international law—in other words, disagreed with the majority as to the governing rules of law. For example, twelve states advanced the proposition that the three-mile limit of marginal seas was not fixed under international law, and that the proper zone should be deemed a belt of four, six, or twelve miles. The countries differed further on the question of a contiguous zone of water in which certain supplementary jurisdiction might be exercised for the protection of the territorial state. Several of the great Powers refused to concede either the legal existence or the propriety of such a contiguous zone, arguing that the line of division between territorial sea and contiguous zone would soon vanish and the territorial sea be insidiously extended. They professed willingness, however, to conclude special treaties—for instance, treaties with the United States dealing with the smuggling of liquor—as circumstances might require.

On the question of responsibility of states the eight Latin American countries which were represented, together with some nine additional states, declined to admit that a state could be internationally responsible for unauthorized acts of officials which violated international law; they declined to admit state responsibility for damages arising from failure to punish a person who assaults an alien; they declined to admit that they were liable for lack of due diligence in protecting an alien against injury to any greater extent that in protecting their own nationals. While there is much to say for these views, a different attitude toward this question has developed in international law. Thus there arose at the conference a conflict between those who sought to sustain fairly well-supported views of international law and those who dissented from those rules and sought to write their dissent into new legislation.

It is not surprising, therefore, that on territorial waters and responsibility of states no agreement was reached. The record of the conference, indeed, throws doubt on the feasibility of codification even in those branches of law which have attained a certain maturity. Codification is difficult enough when there is scientific difference of opinion as to what the law is. In this case there was a political attempt to break down well-established or generally recognized rules by professing that they were not rules, that particular states had not recognized them, or that they were too harsh in their restrictions on certain states. Some opinion in fact developed at the conference to the effect that the opposition of a considerable number of states to rules which arbitral decisions and the majority of states have supported has possibly weakened the generally accepted rules by throwing doubt upon their validity. Thus, a conference called for the purpose of restatement and clarification of international law seems to have constituted for some states an opportunity to weaken, modify, or dissent from existing international law.

In any event, it is possible that the views expressed in such an international forum will affect the future development of international law, possibly to its detriment. The outcome of the conference on the three subjects considered justifies the view expressed by numerous students that codification on subjects developed by case law presents insuperable difficulties, and that the open expression of differences is worse for international relations than their tacit suppression—another illustration that it is best to let sleeping dogs lie. Indeed, perhaps any attempt to codify such subjects is unwise. Strange as it may seem, the greatest amount of agreement was reached on the subject least controlled by international law, namely, nationality, in which internal legislation has almost a free hand. On the other two subjects, generally considered to be regulated by seasoned international law, fundamental disagreement arose as to what are the rules of international law.

The subjects that seem most susceptible of codification are those dealing with new matter, such as air law, radio, and submarines; matter so old and settled that it has lost political significance, such as slavery, piracy, consuls, and diplomatic officers; or matter mainly of administrative interest, such as rules of navigation and the procedure for submitting agreed disputes to arbitration. Topics exciting political susceptibilities are difficult to negotiate. Unusual as it may appear, rules governing war and neutrality have been more readily codified than most others, partly because they have so often and so widely been called into application; and the wonder is, not that such rules have on occasion been violated, but that they have been so generally observed. Disagreement as to rule or interpretation still exists on numerous topics, as, for instance, on the transfer of flag, and no definite rule exists on many essential topics, such as the nature of articles deemed contraband.

Whether international relations have been improved by the conference is doubtful. It has, however, served a useful purpose in disclosing the limitations of codification and in substituting practical evidence for hypotheses, suppositions, and inferences. It is perhaps a little early to suggest all the lessons to be derived from the conference, but it is possible that codification will arouse less ill-considered enthusiasm in the future than it has in the past.

In the Driftway

THIS is the season, next to Christmas, most favored for family reunions. In wooded groves from Maine to the Middle West to California the clans are gathering. It is many years since the Drifter acted, all at the same time, the roles of first, second, and third cousin, of uncle, nephew, and grandson, but he is sure that the family reunion, though perhaps scarcer than it was, has not changed its character. Children are chucked under unwilling chins and told that they "favor" their Aunt Martha. The younger generation is bored and a little scornful of it all and a little ashamed of some of the people who have turned out to be relatives, but they, too, will come willingly in time. A husky farmer, coming upon a dignified city cousin whom he has not seen for twenty-five years, shakes her strenuously by the hand and says, in the words of a reunionist the Drifter once overheard, "My, Jane, how you have broke!" Meanwhile, as each load of relatives arrives, the long tables under the trees are stacked higher and higher with fried chicken, angel-food cake, mustard pickles, jellies and jams and apple pies—all home-made from recipes that will provide comparative conversation during the long afternoon for those middle-aged matrons who are the backbone of any family reunion.

* * * * *

AS one goes west, the family, like the population, diminishes in numbers until in the farther regions of the Rockies, what with the great distances and the migratory instinct of the human young, it would be hard to muster a scant half-hundred people who are related to one another. The last reunion the Drifter attended took place west of the Rockies, and though he always thinks of it as a family reunion it was technically not a family gathering at all. It was a reunion, in a little Western town, of the first settlers of the surrounding country. But ties as strong as blood and stronger united its participants. A twig of sagebrush worn in the coat lapel or pinned to a silk dress was the badge of honor that day, and none but a bona fide first settler was allowed to wear it. The youngest of these was more than sixty, the oldest was near eighty. To all of them life on a frontier had been a familiar reality. All of them had known what it was to be afraid of wild Indians; most of them had felt the stubborn resistance of sagebrush roots to a grubbing hoe; in isolated cow towns, as boys and girls, they had danced many a night out together. That day they danced together again, Virginia reels and quadrilles on the campus of a State college their hard-earned money had helped to establish.

* * * * *

BUT to return to the family reunion. Already the Drifter hears the scratching of pens bent on convincing him that the family, and therefore the family reunion, does not and cannot exist in modern America. The Drifter admits that the family as a social institution is in an advanced stage of disintegration. And that is just as well. But the reality behind the institution persists. As a precious human relationship, stripped of the weight of authority and tradition that has formalized and deadened it, the family will persist, the Drifter suspects, as long as parents have children and children have children of their own.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Defeat the London Treaty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have recently sat in on discussions in several committees of radical pacifist organizations considering the London naval treaty. I am amazed at the moral and intellectual confusion it has created. Disinclination to oppose a treaty which lays the legal basis for a billion-dollar naval increase is obviously due to fear of being lined up with the admirals and the Navy League.

Here we have the spectacle of left-wing pacifists openly or tacitly supporting a treaty which will certainly be used to urge and justify unparalleled additions to a navy already greater than is needed for any defensive war, the only war pacifists contemplate under the Kellogg pact. Worse, we find them supporting, or not opposing, a treaty which does not even in principle limit naval armaments; the escape clause, the "escalator," tends to that. The best they can say for the treaty is that it stops naval competition between the three greatest naval Powers, provided some other Power does not start them all off again.

Is history to record that because the admirals howl against any limitation whatever to their mad plans, no peace organization dare raise its voice against the treaty and for real limitation? Will history record that all American pacifist organizations were so barren of fighting idealism and so politically naive that they took the morally defenseless position of supporting the treaty only to oppose thereafter the very naval increases the treaty permits? The admirals will lick them. The navy will be increased. Parity with Britain will be a tempting invitation to a war for which the economic base is already well laid.

Is thus to be revealed the bankruptcy of the middle-class liberals, of the radical pacifists? Are there none among them uncompromising enough, irreconcilable enough, to demand for their own moral salvation, if not for practical results, the defeat of the treaty, and ceaselessly to insist on a new international agreement for immediate and progressive disarmament?

Boston, July 1 ROGER BALDWIN

Investigate the Republicans

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We conservatives of the Middle West are watching with interest the Congressional investigation of the activities of the "reds" in America. We are not in sympathy with the Communist attitude of sticking up their heads to have them walloped by Republican police clubs. We think rather they should wait until they can apply the club to the other fellow's head. We are not concerned much over the attempt of the Communists to get control of our affairs. Their control could not possibly be worse than the rule of the Republican Party.

The present aggregation of treasury-looters and crooked politicians hold the world record for downright depravity in public office. They have stolen and squandered billions of the people's money, traded the oil reserves of the nation for a suitcase full of greenbacks and taken the interest money for their own use, sold post offices, corrupted the electorate, and are annually collecting billions of dollars in graft in the form of taxes and appropriating it to their own use and that of their friends and relatives.

Why investigate the reds? It is the Republicans that should be investigated.

Springfield, Ill., July 7 DUNCAN MCDONALD

Santo Domingo's Anniversary

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Owing to the celebration of the sixth anniversary of the restoration of our national government, we entreat you to accept our homage and thanks for the noble aid you have given the Dominican people and government.

Santo Domingo, July 13 Estrella Urena, President

The Lingle Case and the Press

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The treatment of the Lingle murder in Chicago by the local and national press brings out more strongly than ever the need for an honestly fearless and genuinely independent daily newspaper in the United States.

As soon as the story of the reporter's death went out over the press service wires, paper after paper went into hysterics over a supposed martyr to civic reform. Even the Literary Digest wallowed in a wave of hypocritical indignation. Meanwhile, Chicagoans drink Capone beer and rich business men continue to buy case goods, in the face of a plea by the local chamber of commerce that citizens deprive gangsters of their income by boycotting their products.

Paul Blanshard, in his Nation article Who Killed Jake Lingle? has cut through all the fake sob-stuff of the local moral pillars and has given an honest and accurate analysis of the whole affair. He has spoken for the majority of Chicagoans—something no local paper has done so far.

Most of the pleas made for a liberal daily in the United States have been based upon the argument for greater liberty and honesty in presenting labor and other controversial and unpopular viewpoints. The Lingle murder case, an ordinary news story, shows how hopelessly single-track is the mind of the press of this country.

Chicago, June 30 Chicagoan

That Colombian Election

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Colombia has just been through a tempestuous election period, and like our correspondent Mr. Sanín Cano, in your issue of July 9, I am surprised at The Nation's failure to comment upon it.

I am just back from a four months' trip through that country, and I had occasion to see the clerical influence at work. Colombia is the most priest-ridden nation in the world; in spite of the intense poverty of its people, costly cathedrals are being built and ambassadors as well as large contributions are being sent to the Vatican. Colombia gained its independence from Spain to become a colony of the Pope!

It was during the last campaign for the presidency that the influence of Rome could be seen at its worst. Telegraph companies had to hire special help to handle the daily messages to and from the Pope. Until now, the Archbishop's candidate has always been elected. A few days before the last election the Archbishop posted all over the country manifestos exhorting the people to refrain from voting the liberal ticket and threatening them with excommunication, or its equivalent, if they did so. I brought with me (and they are at your disposal) hundreds of newspaper clippings showing the great part the church takes in politics. Some of them are so shameless that they would make even the most ardent American Catholic blush! Nevertheless, Olaya Herrera, the liberal candidate, won, after forty-five years of clerical rule. He won because the people were tired of being fed on hokum, were tired of starvation in a rich and fertile land, and welcomed any change.

Olaya Herrera is the man who can best pull Colombia out of its present chaos, but no matter how good his intentions are, his liberalism must perforce be tempered; he has to contend with masses brought up in the crudest and most primitive form of Christianity, and it takes more than one presidential term to eradicate fanaticism and ignorance. However, the working classes are gradually awaking and we may still see the day when state and church will be separated. Not until then can we hope for any real progress in Colombia.

Brooklyn, July 8 J. M. E.

Another English Subscriber

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As another English subscriber I beg to differ with E. Williamson's criticism of The Nation for its attitude on Indian and Egyptian affairs. The Nation might be wrong in detail occasionally—to be entirely correct all the time does not lie within the scope of human possibility—but its report on British affairs in the East I find to be generally precise in principle. I am not going to permit my status as an Englishman to blind me to the injustices and maladministration which have been inflicted on the Indian masses since the British East India Company obtained almost absolute authority in that benighted country. The British have no right to be "endeavoring to lead the Sudanese to self-government." The Sudanese already possessed self-government when my (and E. Williamson's) progenitors were disputing the very same question with Caesar's Roman legions nearly two thousand years ago. The Philippines are having the same controversy with the United States government also. E. Williamson might like to camouflage British abuses in India beneath hairsplitting arguments. We are more concerned with principles.

I am concerned with logic and the principles which have their foundation on common justice and the right to live. I repudiate and deny the right of any foreign government to dictate to India, just in the same way that I repudiate and deny the right of the Indians or any foreign Power to govern my native Manchester.

New York, July 7 H. Spencer, Jr.

Communists and Deportation

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Ever since Judge Thacher's decision releasing the alien Voich, the press has generally suggested that this opinion established "that mere membership in the Communist Party does not make an alien deportable." This probably explains why the annual report of the American Civil Liberties Union fell into error on this point.

As the attorney for Voich I feel called upon to correct this error, both in the interest of presenting the law correctly and of making Judge Thacher's position clear. Judge Thacher held that there was no evidence in the record that Voich was a member of the Communist Party. He did say, however: "The relator consorted with radical agitators, and no doubt sympathized with their views; but this is not enough to warrant his deportation, unless prejudice is to take the place of proof."

New York, June 9 Carol Weiss King

NO ONE MUST KNOW

A single phrase found in a year-old love letter to her son told her the truth. Now she must hide her secret deep within herself, suffer . . . and tell no one... that the letter was from a man. Rupert Hughes calls this strangely beautiful study of a mother's mind "a masterpiece of art and a work of profound and noble mercy toward all people, the peculiar as well as the normal." $2.50

REVELATION

By ANDRÉ BIRABEAU Translated by Una, Lady Troubridge

THE VIKING PRESS : : 18 East 48th Street, New York

SOVIET RUSSIA

An extraordinary combination of low price and tour value for Students. $280 complete. The itinerary is fascinating.

Aug. 16 S.S. Statendam or
Aug. 27 S.S. Berengaria.

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

175 Fifth Avenue, New York. Algonquin 6656

NOW IT CAN BE MAILED

"The Sex Side of Life—An Explanation for Young People"

By MARY WARE DENNETT

is at last free from all legal interference

Order from the author, 81 Singer St., Astoria, L. I., New York.
3 copies for $1.00, single copies, $.35.

Employers:—

For intelligent employees advertise in The Nation. You reach fewer readers than through a large newspaper, but those you reach are worth while. And your advertisement in The Nation is READ.
Rates, minimum half inch (30 words) $3.08. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Send advertising, with remittance, to

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, N. Y. Phone FITzroy 9074

One Farmer Approves

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: While the tariff bill is unsatisfactory to the Northwest it is nevertheless better than no bill at all. No farmer buys in an equal amount to what he sells. On an average his tax and interest bills absorb a large part of his revenues. These will be very little affected by an increase in industrial rates. The average farmer may buy only two sets of machinery during his lifetime but may raise thirty crops.

Erskine, Minn., June 16 Carl Berg, Farmer

"Journey's End"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Some time ago you raised the question whether West Point cadets realized the full meaning of "Journey's End," whether they did not "think . . . how sweet it is to die thus strongly and bravely."

May I suggest that the crux of the matter, so far as the coming generation of young men of every race is concerned, is that they should have their eyes opened to the ghastly deeds they must commit if involved in warfare, not only against their fellow-men, but indirectly (and perhaps directly by bombing from the air) against the women and children whom the warrior is supposed to protect? No one would ever desire that young men should fear to be killed or injured in a great cause, but we may surely hope that the day is not far off when they will fear to kill and maim, and consequently do their utmost to help the world-wide movement for permanent peace.

Victoria, Australia, June 22 J. B. Howie

For Nation Readers in Colorado

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It has occurred to me that it would undoubtedly be decidedly worth while for those of us in Denver and the Rocky Mountain region who are Nation readers to get in touch with one another, though it may not be possible to organize a Nation club and have meetings. In this health-seekers' Mecca some of us are home-bound. Nevertheless, to discuss even by mail the issues and causes in which The Nation is interested would, I think, seem desirable and worth while to an appreciable number.

I am willing to act as clearing-house if anyone is interested in such a project. My address is Route 3, Box 929, Edgewater, Colorado.

Edgewater, Colo., June 23 Elsa L. Widmayer

A Request for Conversations

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am preparing a critical study and anthology of real conversations, both historical and contemporary. I wonder whether any of your readers may be able to refer me to especially brilliant, amusing, or otherwise readable conversations which have been recorded and are now available in published form. Any such references may be sent to me at the School of Journalism, Columbia University.

New York, July 1 Walter B. Pitkin

Books and Films

Dark of the Brain

By NORMAN MACLEOD

An incipient brown the taste of earth strangles my need for water and the turquoise of the hard fast earth enunciates a requiem for stars in a pale black glow that knows too much the color of my brain on colder nights than hands have ever felt on any body.
The color of the blackness of the mind with eyes nor hands affording sure access to any human intercourse through these cold years is like a wound unbleeding and uncared, stabbing the prickly tentacles of mind.

A Posse After the Humanists

The Critique of Humanism. A Symposium. Edited by C. Hartley Grattan. Brewer and Warren. $3.50.

MR. GRATTAN'S title must be taken with at least a teacupful of salt. He has not edited the critique, or even a critique, of this formless thing which so suddenly has found a name. Rather he has sent out a hurry call for men to help him hunt two intellectual culprits down, and a dozen have come running, armed with as many different weapons, to make it a good bloody night. They have answered from all quarters; some of them are short men, some of them are tall; some are trained fighters and some are not; but each of them has arrived with eagerness in his face, and each of them has achieved a certain measure of destruction—though not a few of the blows have been glancing blows.

If the reader, then, expects nothing at all in the way of concerted criticism, if he is blithely willing to hear one more series of notes added to the confused music which humanism has been making in its small portion of the world, he may proceed with pleasure through Mr. Grattan's book. There is some excellent writing in it; there is some good fun; there is now and then a rousing argument; and there is a greater display of learning than he might have looked for from the young men whom the humanists, academic or otherwise, have certainly urged him to despise. I read on with an almost constant relish, thinking that if nothing very much was being established against Mr. Babbitt and Mr. More, at any rate a good deal of intellectual exercise was being taken by the literary critics. That in itself is not a bad thing to have happening in a time when American criticism suffers so much from a failure, or a refusal, to examine assumptions. General ideas have been lacking from our literary talk, or at any rate they have not been stated; I suppose they have always been there. It is interesting to have them stated, and to the extent that that is so we have the humanists to thank for precipitating a war of words. Not, of course, that this will determine what kind of fiction we shall have in the coming decade, or what kind of poetry. Those departments of literature have a beautiful way of taking care of themselves. So has criticism, which I see as a quite separate department. We see it here, taking care of itself.

I said that this posse after the humanists came armed with divers weapons. The weapons fall, nevertheless, into three recognizable types. The first type, with harrow teeth, is employed by Burton Rascoe and Edmund Wilson, neither one of whom takes the fracas as anything but an excuse to ride recklessly over his victims, scratching and hacking as he goes. Mr. Rascoe, in a very gay piece called Pupils of Polonius, pours more effective ridicule on Mr. Babbitt and Mr. More—on their prejudices, their styles, and occasionally their ideas—than I remember to have seen poured on any living author or pair of authors. When I say "effective" I do not mean that Mr. Babbitt and Mr. More are demolished; so far as I can see they remain untouched. I mean simply that I was made to laugh, which is the purpose of ridicule. And I am not sure but that that is the best technique in literary argument, as it is obviously an excellent way of dealing with the present issue. Mr. Wilson's Notes on Babbitt and More—four scholia on passages picked out of their essays in the humanist symposium of a few months back—did not make me laugh. They were not intended to. But I got a great deal of smiling satisfaction out of the scorn and skill with which Mr. Wilson pounced upon the passages. Details, merely; yet if one can enter these breaches so easily, what depths and vacancies may not be found within? Mr. Wilson does not bother to go in. It is enough for him, who shows by the way that he knows modern literature with a thoroughness to which Mr. Babbitt and Mr. More make only a moral pretense, to show also that they are not infallible on their chosen ground—the ancient and the "sound."

The rest of the contributors are entirely serious, though they are serious in two different ways. The way of Hartley Grattan, Malcolm Cowley, Henry Hazlitt, and Lewis Mumford is the less effective because it does not take account of the fact that there is no use—neither is it fair—talking to Mr. Babbitt and Mr. More about the very aspect of the modern world which they have chosen to ignore, and by ignoring condemn. These four writers have done highly competent jobs, but they hardly needed to be done. Is it conceivable that their opponents will be impressed by Mr. Grattan's quotations from John Dewey, or by Mr. Cowley's reminder that this is an industrial civilization, or by Mr. Hazlitt's canvass of Bertrand Russell and A. I. Richards for new "individual and social values," or by Mr. Mumford's proposal of an alternative program which "recognizes the organic nature of human life"? The humanists, remember, separate man and nature, and have a right to do so. Why bombard them then with gospels contrived by contemporary thinkers in an attempt—vain, the answer cometh—to reconcile nature and man? It is like quoting scripture to the devil—or shall we say performing the black mass in the hope of saving an angel's soul.

The more effective way is that of Allen Tate and Bernard Bandler II, who address themselves directly to Mr. More, and examine him, not exhort him. Mr. Tate particularly scores a palpable hit—the only one, I think, in the volume—when he reduces Mr. More's "religion," which Mr. More had presented as a discipline, to something altogether personal with Mr. More—an indulgence, really, rather than a discipline. Mr. Tate is all the more convincing because he himself agrees with Mr. More that a discipline is desirable; so he is all the more plausible when he insists that the sage of Shelburne has merely added another personal faith to the excessive number of such that we already have, to our confusion and decay. Each one of them may have been necessary to the owner, and in Mr. More's case I think we have one which we can admire as a spectacle. But none of them can be used by other men—can be, that is, a religion at all. If Mr. Tate is right the whole structure of humanism comes tumbling down at once. And incidentally we have there an explanation of the feebleness of Mr. More's followers. His religion could nourish him; it cannot nourish them. That being the case we shall have no humanist movement.

MARK VAN DOREN

George Eliot Reconsidered

George Eliot. By J. Lewis May. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

THE authentic biography of George Eliot is the "Life" by her second husband, J. W. Cross, based, under her guidance, on her journals and letters. The still standard work by a professional critic is that by Leslie Stephen in English Men of Letters. There are no new facts for Mr. May or anybody else to discover, for George Eliot's life is as open, simple, lacking in mystery as that of any person in the whole Dictionary of National Biography; in what is known of her there is nothing which calls for a novel subtle interpretation. All that another critical biographer can do is give his views of her work, celebrate the woman and the writer in the light of his personal enthusiasms, place his own emphasis on quite undisputed facts. This Mr. May has done in a pleasant, sincere book. He would have done better if he were not inclined to learnedly irrelevant references and allusions, with bits of French and Latin. This manner has fortunately gone out of fashion, and it is a kind of literary pomposity which was one of George Eliot's faults, as Mr. May notes several times—and then commits it in his own way.

Two things Mr. May makes more prominent than Stephen had made them, though Stephen's competent understanding had seen them clearly enough. One is the immense importance of George Henry Lewes in helping the gods to make George Eliot a novelist. The other is the dependence, to the point of identity, of all that is best in her work upon her girlhood experience and her inmost, uneducated natural self.

Lewes is Mr. May's hero, as indeed he was George Eliot's hero. It is she who tells the story of her debt to him, and her gratitude is detailed, repeated, fervent. Perhaps the ardor of her avowal was increased by the fact that their relations were illegal and she was placed in a somewhat defiant attitude. But the irregularity of their union no longer disturbs us. Literature applauds the union for itself and admires this devoted, vivacious, versatile, alertly critical man who turned a highly intellectual spinster, with discursive purposeless interests, into the full true course of her genius and fulfilled her womanhood. Without Lewes there might have been a talented Mary Ann Evans, recorded in handbooks of literary history; there would have been no George Eliot.

The George Eliot we care for is a passionate woman who did look in her heart and write and who wrote best when she did not look too long into the higher regions of her intellect. She is Maggie Tulliver with the pen of an artist. This assimilation of the creator's character to the created character means much more in the case of George Eliot than the commonplace misstatement that every novel is more or less autobiographical. The material, the scenes and persons, of "Adam Bede" are as faithfully drawn from her experience as those of "The Mill on the Floss." Mrs. Poyser is no more alien to the nature of George Eliot than is Maggie (or for that matter than Diana or Clara Middleton is to George Meredith). But the girl Maggie, hot, wilful, affectionate, capable of doing unaccountable things, is the heart of her author. The death of Maggie strikes you with double pain because you have witnessed the death of a splendid young girl and also because you wonder what her development would have been. To make a reader's imagination run beyond the last page into a forever unwritable sequel is creation of the highest order. To understand George Eliot we begin not with the mature philosophic woman who made Maggie but with Maggie herself.

George Eliot became an eminent person with an intellectual halo, perhaps the most prominent Englishwoman except Victoria; only a few men equaled her in distinction. Mr. May thinks that if we are to see her face, the intellectual halo should be removed; that her admirers have dehumanized her. I doubt if he is right in saying that "she figures in the popular imagination as a highly respectable and prodigiously learned person, one whose respectability derived tremendous emphasis from the deliberate and august solemnity with which she invested her solitary and public defiance of it." Probably she figures, if she figures at all in whatever the popular imagination may be, as the author of some great novels, read or unread. Certainly Leslie Stephen makes her human and warm and attractive. But he seems to say too emphatically that she, alone of English novelists, "came to fiction from philosophy." Rather she came to fiction from life and from herself, and only wandered in philosophy awhile before she somewhat tardily found herself, or until Lewes (a philosopher!) found her. If biographers have been inclined to portray her in cap and gown, Mr. May has done good service in taking them off and showing her in whatever kind of ordinary clothes Victorian women wore. The value of her lies under the garments, in all parts of her, not solely in the head.

JOHN MACY

The Poetry of a Novelist

The Winter Alone. By Evelyn Scott. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.

THIS book of poetry is difficult to criticize, for the reader is almost constantly of two opinions. "The Winter Alone" is the poetry of a novelist, one of the best of American novelists. There is no poverty of subject matter: the book is filled with individualistic observations upon life, with startling characters given in a sentence, with intricate emotional situations, with vivid backgrounds. The poet's outlook is at one and the same time mystic and intellectual. And yet, although the intention of many of the poems is lyric, there is a kind of looseness in rhythm and diffuseness in imagery which gives the reader the impression that many of these poems are notes for longer poems rather than the fused immediate statements of lyrics. And the lyric intention is only now and then focused clearly enough to arouse the called-for emotion on the part of the reader. In these verses there is the same subtlety and richness of imagination that makes Evelyn Scott a poet in her prose, for certainly much of her novel "The Wave" is highly poetic. Here is the same capacity for suffering, the same penetrative mind, and the same amazing gift for visualizing and using language. Here also is perhaps a little too much of human observation and not quite enough immediacy of emotional statement—the trick again of a novelist superseding the art of the poet. Mrs. Scott is too much inclined to walk into her scene and comment. She closes the poem on Creatures in General with:

> Oh God, would God I were a Presbyterian,
> And could feel these creatures
> Less real than I!

and the finer poem on the Eagle with:

> What is the crowd to him?
> A despised reason for the calm and mighty flight
> Above those lost and dwindling tents of snow.

These lines with their fine rhythm—and here the rhythm is identical with the emotion—lose just a bit through the author's rhetorical question. It need not have been asked. The feeling of aloofness and grandeur could have been given directly.

Mrs. Scott has so much more to say than have most of our numerous poets, is so much more acutely sensitive to life, that we should not, perhaps, ask anything finer of her than that which she offers. And yet, the lack is there, a lack which some of the poems do not have—that of a convincing rhythm and a lightning-like fusion of several images into one consummate emotion.

But to quibble no more, "The Winter Alone" is a book of deeply and sincerely felt experiences. It exhibits no mere fluency of words, no mere playing with facile technique; the poems are of the stuff of life understood and the product of a mystic search never quieted.

EDA LOU WALTON

The Turkish Debt

European Financial Control in the Ottoman Empire. By Donald C. Blaisdell. Columbia University Press. $3.

THE allurement of fiction is often to be found in tales of imperialistic ventures, but the authors, like writers of fiction, are prone to follow fancy rather than fact. Dr. Blaisdell has shown that scientific accuracy may be combined with the interest of a novel. He has presented a technical thesis so vividly that despite its prosaic title it can be of interest to the layman; on the other hand, he has written so clearly and dispassionately in the prejudice-filled field of international debts that, as Professor Edward Mead Earle says in his foreword, his book should attract the attention of all students of international relations whether or not they have heretofore concerned themselves with Turkish affairs.

Dr. Blaisdell tells the complicated story simply, beginning with the days when Turkey, like many another "backward" and unstable country, offered a chance to financiers and speculators to lend money for the easy realization of speedy profits and an opportunity to small investors to obtain high interest rates. By the fourth quarter of the nineteenth century the Ottoman government had piled up a foreign debt of two hundred million pounds sterling. Realizing the well-nigh impossible situation into which it had fallen, it defaulted on the charges. The opportunity arose for European financial interests to penetrate to the very heart of the Ottoman Empire, and the chance was not lost. In 1881 the Turkish government concluded an agreement with the representatives of its foreign and domestic creditors for the resumption of payments on Ottoman bonds—a unique agreement standing midway between private and official financial control, and with no treaty or diplomatic basis. The Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt was created by it, with an executive council representing European and Ottoman security-holders.

The ability and efficiency of the council and its non-political activity are stressed by Dr. Blaisdell, who sees the salutary effect which it exerted on Turkish finances and yet realizes the germs of imperialism which the organization contained. Those germs came suspiciously near maturity when the council began to lend the weight of its influence to the advancement of the many European schemes for railway development of which Turkey was so notoriously full; and even more when it took the banking interests, especially those of the Imperial Ottoman Bank and the Deutsche Bank, to its heart. Thus the importance of the council in the financial scheme of the empire was constantly becoming greater. The climax was reached in 1907 when the council was given the semi-official duty of collecting, as agent of the Euopean Powers, the 3 per cent customs surtax which resulted from the convention imposed by Europe on a discomfited Turkey. The cat was out of the bag, for it could no longer be denied that the council was acting as an agent of the Powers. Small wonder that the rising spirit of Turkish nationalism should begin to feel suspicious of even so profitable an organization as the Debt Administration, or that after the turbulent war years the Nationalists who came into power should be opposed to restoring to the administration the privileges and power it had had before the war.

Turkish interest will no longer be subordinated to that of Europe in regard to finance, for the entrance into force of the draft contract of 1928, concluded after more than two years' negotiation, will show that Turkey is to be mistress in her own financial house. By the contract, the Turkish Republic has agreed to pay 67 per cent of the annuity of the pre-war debt; the council has been transferred to Paris, and its death knell has sounded.

Whether or not one agrees with Dr. Blaisdell's interpretation of the imperialistic development of the council, one cannot fail to agree with the fairness of his presentation of the picture; and one must perforce agree with his psychological understanding when he remarks that "so irrational are human beings that touched pride often demands that the body politic be divested even of an agency conferring certain material benefits."

JANE PERRY CLARK

A Race as Protagonist

Sweet Man. By Gilmore Millen. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THUS far novels about the Negro have been novels of problem or of background. Race is always the protagonist, except in studies where a landscape with figures forms the subject. And this has been true whether the author was white or black. No single character towers above his race and his condition, becomes a man, first, in whom the forces and urges of his people are fused by the white heat of creation, illuminating merely incidentally the social and philosophical problems of his race. The Negro needs his Dostoevski; he has had his secondary Zolas. American writers, in order to satisfy the American demand for vicarious physical experience, are going in heavily for stories of tramps, poor Negroes, savages, under-dogs, historical eccentrics, rogues, and clowns; stories that emerge crisply from those efficient writers' schools—the newspaper and the advertising agency; stories that are the result of an extraordinary amount of detailed knowledge gleaned either from actual experience or extended research, as the case may be. These may be excellent journalism done in fiction form, with the right amount of sob stuff, sex stuff, and high drama to carry along the good straight reporting, but as novels they are not of the first order.

"Sweet Man" is a good book, at times poignant, often exciting, for the most part artistically truthful, but viewed coolly and from a distance, it remains unimportant. It is without power. It is actually superficial. And the reason is to be found in the principal character, John Henry. Whether on the cotton plantation of his youth, in the army, as a sweet man on Beale Street, or as wandering laborer, gambler, lover, he remains of no consequence either as a representative figure for his people or as an individual. It is the things he does, the adventures he has that are interesting. We have the feeling that we are not being shown how John Henry does these things, but how a Negro like John Henry would do them. In that difference lies the difference between the creation of a man and the recording in story form of a good journalist's observations and experience.

FRED T. MARSH

Beyond the War Books

The Whistlers' Room. By Paul Alverdes. Covici-Friede. $1.50.

TO speak of this novelette as a war book and assign it a higher or lower rank in the established hierarchy of war novels is to miss completely the nature of its significance. This lies primarily in the fact that it is the first novel dealing with any phase of the war that is not a war novel. One can no more call it a product of the war than one can call "The Red Badge of Courage" a product of the Civil War. It is symptomatic that German literature is beginning to overcome the trauma of the war and is able to use war experiences aesthetically instead of reacting to them journalistically.

The war, here, is merely a means of damming up the lives of four men in a hospital room—four crippled soldiers isolated by the peculiar nature of their disability in a world of which to all intents and purposes they are the only inhabitants. They had been shot through the throat, and in the process of healing the surrounding tissue had closed up their windpipes so that they were only kept alive by silver tubes inserted into new channels opening under their chins. "When they breathed a soft piping note like the squeaking of mice came from the silver mouth . . . hence they were called the whistlers." Left mute by their wounds they developed a language of their own consisting of "a wordless, clucking speech that, in default of a stream of air to make words with, they formed by means of their lips and tongues and teeth." Three of them are Germans. The fourth is an English prisoner who joins the "club" later on. There is a feeble pretense of hostility to the Englishman, but the overpowering constriction of their common world soon obliterates distinctions belonging to a realm as removed from them as another planet.

For all its artistry and power one closes "The Whistlers' Room" with a vague discontent. In part it is due to the puncturing of the isolated intensity of the whistlers' world by the successful operations which restore them to normality, a happy ending no doubt, but one that makes the compressed atmosphere of the book deflate like a ruptured balloon. Throughout the novel the feeling grows on one that Alverdes has not sufficiently exploited his power over us. From the outset we are translated into a world intensified by contraction to a point where the most ordinary gesture is fraught with terrific significance. But the author has remained content with ordinary gestures. We are put under general anaesthesia and are ready for a major operation and when we awake we are somewhat disappointed to find that we are still intact.

ALTER BRODY

The Primitive "Imagination"

Lobagola, an African Savage's Own Story. By Bata Kindai Amgoza Ibn Lobagola. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

ONE wonders why this book was ever published. Indeed, were it not for the fantastic character of its fabrications, I should hesitate to take the space of The Nation and the time of its readers to discuss such a performance. Yet there are certain questions which arise in the consideration of this book—questions which pertain particularly to the obligation the sponsors of a book have toward the reading public. The story was printed, before it appeared in book form, in a prominent magazine. Its publication brought a flood of protesting letters, which pointed out many of the gross errors of fact and drew attention to some of the internal evidence that the tale is woven out of whole cloth.

There is no objection to anyone spinning a yarn, and if a yarn be offered as such it makes enjoyable reading. "Trader Horn" is fantastic, but it is presented for what it may be worth, as the rambling tale of an old "'busher" recounting and embellishing his adventures. But the book under consideration is presented as autobiography, as fact. That its dubious character was realized is disclosed by the attempt to forestall criticism found in the introduction. Unfortunately, this is unsigned; one would like to know the authority who quotes Fishberg's quotation from Bastian to prove that "black Jews" live on the Loango coast, when more recent and complete works on that region make no mention of them, and who points to circumcision, a widespread African custom, to prove that Lobagola's people are Jews.

The internal evidence indicates that this self-termed "savage" not only did not lead the early life he says he did, but that he never went very far into the interior of West Africa, and could have visited the coastal region only casually. Thus, there is a three-hundred-and-fifty-mile discrepancy between the two places at which he says his home was situated. A "day's walk," according to computations based on his statements, is about sixteen miles. On page 1 he states, "I was born . . . six hundred miles north of Abomey Calavi . . . about forty-five days' walk north of the Gulf of Guinea, and three days' walk south of the native city of Timbuktu." On page 250 we learn that "my guides' intentions were to go . . . as far as Kano and then turn due west, which would bring me within two days' journey of my own village." If anyone will turn to an atlas the difference in location will be at once apparent. Indeed, if we consider the second statement, a journey of 330 miles west of Kano does not take the traveler out of Nigerian territory, in which, according to the 1921 census, no people like those described by this writer are to be found.

Other internal evidence for the falsity of the African setting of this so-called "autobiography" is to be had. The first two or three chapters are as excellent nature faking as I have ever read. The setting is the "Ondo bush," which, incidentally, is in southern Nigeria. It is described as a dense jungle inhabited by lions, elephants, leopards, boa constrictors (!), and other supposed denizens of the tropical forest. Yet, curiously enough, there is no tropical forest within many hundreds of miles of either of the two regions in which the narrator places his home. Far from being jungle, the region of which Lobagola writes is an intermediate prairie land, more desert this far north than anything else. Elephants rarely get into the region of Timbuktu, although lions appear occasionally. Some bits, considered as folk-lore, are not bad, as when we are told that if in getting away from a lion,

> ". . . you should climb a tree the lion can easily get help from the elephant, because the elephant and the lion are friendly. They may fight now and then, but they are really the closest of friends; so you would not be safe up a tree. When the elephant comes to the aid of a lion, the lion tells the elephant that it wants you down from the tree, and the elephant shakes the tree or pulls it up by the roots, and down you come."

The ethnological misstatements in the book are so numerous that only a few of the most glaring errors can be mentioned. Is it not curious that the kings of Gezo and Glelele, who are said to have instituted the battalion of "amazons" which, if real, must be unique in West Africa, should have had the same names as Dahomean kings? Does Lobagola not know that one of the strongest elements in West African religion is the fertility cult, so that a pregnant woman, far from being universally taboo, is the object of great care, and is assisted by other women when in labor? Why is a spear called by the South African term "assagai"? Why does the role of the ancestral spirit, so strong in all West Africa, not appear at all in his account? Does the writer not know that for Africans to do as the Negroes among whom his people are supposed to live are said to do with the bodies of the dead—to throw them into the bush and burn them—is contrary to all known West African practice except in the case of proved sorcerers? Does he not know that this is the worst punishment that can be inflicted on any human, something that dooms his spirit to be an outcast for eternity? One might go on and on with one's questions, until one came to the inevitable query as to Lobagola's Jewish people, who centuries ago wandered the "untracked wastes" of the Sahara—the Sahara where since before the time of Herodotus there have been well-traveled camel routes from north to south and east to west! This migration and these people, I am tempted to conclude, belong in the same category as the non-existent bush where the non-existent animals roam and where the Negro inhabitants have non-existent customs.

One wonders just who Lobagola may be. From his photograph I might venture the guess that he is a North African, perhaps even a North African Jew in whose ancestry there is some Negroid mixture. That he has lived in Europe and America I do not doubt, and the photographed documents prove that he has fought in the British army. The whole thing must have started when, being exhibited in Philadelphia as an "untamed African savage" from Dahomey, anthropologists questioned him about his supposedly native customs, until they found him so ill-informed that he could not be utilized. That he has become a convert to various religions, that he has written this tale out of his imagined picturing of what the interior of West Africa might be like, are not to be held against him. As he tells us, he was out for the main chance, and no one conversant with the situation of any colored non-European among us can blame him.

I return again to the question which is more grave, however, to that of the publisher's obligation. One can understand how this apparently persuasive Africanoid took in the kindly people who helped him; one can even understand how his glibness made his story sound plausible to the editors of the magazine that published it. But in the face of the denunciations which even the first instalments of the published account brought forth, one wonders how the publisher rationalized whatever convictions he may have as to his obligation to the readers of his books, and brought himself to stand sponsor for a volume of tall tales such as this. Is it perhaps not time that reputable publishing houses assumed some responsibility for the validity of the subject matter in the books they put forth? And in the case of accounts of strange people is it not time that they realized that the bloodthirsty savage so often portrayed is usually the figment of an imagination stimulated by visions of an inflated pocket-book? MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Books in Brief

The Constitution of the United States. A Brief and General Commentary. By William Bennett Munro. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

Professor Munro takes the various provisions of the Constitution one by one, in the order in which they stand in the document, and comments briefly upon their origin, meaning, and implication. The book is designed for those who wish to acquire a general familiarity with the Constitution without going into the intricacies of constitutional law and political theory. References to judicial decisions, historical digressions, bibliographies, and other material usually found in treatises on the Constitution are, accordingly, omitted. The book should prove useful to persons whose political education, as far as constitutional matters are concerned, has been neglected and to those who, with no technical or special purpose in mind, approach the subject for the first time.

The Return of the Hero. By Darrell Figgis. Charles Boni. $.50.

This unusual little volume is a splendid choice for the first of the Boni paper books to be placed on general sale at fifty cents. Originally put forth by Figgis in Dublin in 1923 under the pseudonym of Michael Ireland, it is a modernization of the medieval "The Colloquy of Oisin and St. Patrick," of which there are several versions extant. But aside from its historical and philological interest, the story is a delightful creation in itself. Oisin, son of Finn, father of Oscar, chieftain of the Fiana of old Ireland, by a mischance finds himself returned to Ireland after two hundred years in the fairy land of Tir-na-nog. He is received by St. Patrick, who tries to convert him to the new faith, Christianity, while Oisin extols the ancient pagan delights, virtues, and heroism. The greater part of the book is taken up with the long discussions between St. Patrick and his bishops on the one hand and Oisin on the other, discussions in which the old hero more than holds his own. The flashes of keen insight and the bits of humor, philosophy, and description are what give the book its special value and charm.

The History of Iberian Civilization. By J. P. Oliveira Martins. Translated from the Portuguese by Aubrey F. G. Bell. Preface by S. de Madariaga. Oxford University Press. $5.

Both the translator and the distinguished scholar who writes the preface agree that Senhor Martins is far from the scientific historian that he believes himself to be. Nevertheless, he writes so well and with such fertility of ideas that his book, with all its exaggerations, is one of the most interesting historical productions of this century. Racially Senhor Martins connects the Iberians with the Berbers of Africa; he gives both peoples a heroic personality. The brilliant course of conquest and empire of Spain and Portugal in the sixteenth century is explained as the explosive expansion of a race capable of heroism; the decadence is explained as the exhaustion of the race, spent by its titanic effort. The simpler explanations at hand of economic and social processes are either ignored or argued away, and even the expulsion of the Moors and the Jews is seen as an act of heroic self-sacrifice.

North of Suez. By William McFee. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

William McFee's new book is reminiscent of a very fine novel—his own "Command." Lieutenant Rumford, thoroughly English girl of his own class, attractive, domineering, and Transport Officer at Port Said in war time. His wife, an English girl of his own class, attractive, domineering, and frigid, is there with him. Rumford remains honest and efficient though surrounded by corruption, charlatanry, and stupidity; and he keeps morally sound while other officers are slipping by the wayside through liquor, hasheesh, or women. Naturally he is disliked. Then, gradually, hardly realizing how it comes about, he finds himself involved in a mesh of intrigue, a tangle of conflicting suspicions and interests. At the same time he is being swept off his feet in a passionate affair with the seductive, intoxicating Grecian beauty, Mme Calisthenes. The conflict, of course, is in Rumford's own soul, in his inability to find new standards to take the place of the old ones he has thrown over, in his effort to adjust his mind to meet the larger sense of life which Anastasia Calisthenes and his new experiences have given him. The tragedy has not the splendid inevitability that made "Command" a fine book. The solution, like the usual happy ending, is a mere dodging of the problem. It is not quite fair. But the pages of the novel are illumined by those flashes of insight into the minds and hearts of inarticulate men for which McFee, after Conrad, is so notable.

The Life of Solomon. By Edmond Fleg. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

There is very little to be said in praise of Fleg's "Life of Solomon" that has not already been said in connection with his "Life of Moses." Again his poetic imagination has taken an accretion of legendary material and attempted to integrate it psychologically in the development of a personality. In this case, however, Fleg has not worked with exclusively Hebraic fable. He has, as he says, aimed to create a "Hebraic Faust," but as one can see from the preponderance of thaumaturgical as opposed to miraculous elements in the representation, his Solomon is as much Magian as Hebraic, and the fusion is never quite complete. The fact, too, that the historical probabilities about Solomon are so much more certain than in the case of Moses tends to disturb the imaginative reception of the legendary story. Somehow we remember that Solomon stands for the million-fold magnification of a petty Oriental despot. Hence we tend to take the story too much as an allegory, and to become more interested in the myth-forming process than the myth. In any event, it is certain that Fleg is rendering a tremendous service to Western readers as the Bulfinch of rabbinical fable in making accessible to them in beautiful form a mythology no less rich than the Greeks', whose very existence in most cases must have remained unknown to them.

Christine, and Other Stories. By Julian Green. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

In this collection the author again shows his unquestioned familiarity with Hawthorne and Poe; he again demonstrates with well-caught echoes of his former works that he is completely at ease in the half-world of dreams and phobias. All of the four stories in the volume are psychopathic studies. And they are somehow unsatisfactory. The eerie prose and the continued playing on the same note of the weird and uncanny begin to take on the appearance of the ordinary. Unlike Coleridge, Mr. Green merely makes the supernatural supernatural. He becomes so embroiled in the tortured intricacies of his characters that the reader finds himself sympathizing with him rather than with his creations. The result is a sort of spiritual whirlpool, an eddy of tormented thoughts whose force and direction are both centripetal. Mr. Green's stories are unsatisfactory because they arrive nowhere. Nor is this a matter of plot or detail; it is rather a confusion that exists in the mind of the author himself, a confusion that creeps into the words and actions of his characters.

Blue Forest. By Viola C. White. Four Seas Company. $1.50.

"Blue Forest" is the third book of poetry by Miss White. Her first volume, "Horizons," was published in the Yale Series of Younger Poets. In this last book her technique has come up to the demands of her vision. She has the most curious combination of a naive mysticism and an adult observation of life, and it is this combination that makes her verse unique. Her effects are so simple, her art so quiet, that the worth of her verse emerges only with rereading. Gradually, as in the reading and rereading of Blake's "Songs of Innocence," the significance of a simple description or a direct statement clarifies and widens. Her images are drawn from an animistic feeling for nature; her vision is directed toward no certain idea of Deity, but toward a loveliness which does away with marked epochs of time. She never strains for an effect or attempts forms she is not at ease in. Most of the poems in "Blue Forest" are lyrics; there is one longer and very fine poem addressed to Edgar Allan Poe. Her poems remind one of a vine grown up around a tree, tendriled, small-leafed, yet somehow as certain as the very tree trunk itself.

Films

Enter Japan

WE hear very little about Japanese films. Many hundreds are said to be produced annually in Japan but so far New York has seen only two, "A Daughter of Two Fathers," shown last summer, and "Slums of Tokio" ("Yoshivara"), the current picture at the Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse. It is difficult to say on such slender evidence how far one may regard these two pictures as representative of Japanese film work. One may only note that they are distinctly different from the typical American and European films. The quality that sets them apart is mainly their peculiar earnestness. No sophistication of any kind is visible in them. Traditional moral values are never questioned. The struggle with the adversities of life is couched in terms of extreme simplicity; the point of view has the naivete characteristic of primitive communities. To the Western mind this makes the same sort of appeal that the natural simplicity of children does. It is refreshing in its ingenuousness.

But it also has its weak points. Having outgrown the patriarchal stage of family life we find it difficult to be moved by the spectacle of paternal love rising in triumph over all obstacles, or to be thrilled by the self-sacrificing loyalty of a sister to her erring brother. There is a sentimental attitude here that cannot but seem forced to our Western eyes. This largely accounts for the failure of the two pictures mentioned to be fully convincing. One feels this particularly about "Slums of Tokio," which expounds the sister-brother theme, although here the failure is partly attributable to a "theatrical" treatment of the material which was less evident in "A Daughter of Two Fathers." The latter clearly belonged to the naturalistic school of cinematography and shared consequently all the limitations of that school. By contrast, "Slums of Tokio" exhibits a cinematic technique of considerable imaginative power; but it has the serious defect of echoing the conventions of the Japanese theater. The principal character in this film, Rikiya, whose infatuation with a geisha results in his losing his sight at the hands of a rival, is impersonated by an actor whose make-up and play of facial expression are clearly reminiscent of the conventions of the national stage. Much as we may admire masks on the stage, where the entire setting is wholly conventional, on the screen, amidst the surroundings of natural life, the barest suggestion of such artifice strikes a harshly discordant note. Moreover, the high emotional tension apparent behind the emphasized movements and facial expressions of this actor suggests a deaf-mute struggling to break into speech, an effect that makes one feel as if this silent picture were incomplete without spoken dialogue. The cumulative effect is that the picture, though produced with evident care and photographic skill, and though abounding in extremely interesting glimpses of Japanese life, rather drags in telling its story and hangs fire in its most dramatic moments.

A short travel picture of Japan shown on the same program deserves mention for its beautiful photography and its daring, if not quite successful, attempt to use the "split screen" in a news-reel subject. With a little more coordination in the movements within the three separate sections of the "frame," and a more clearly marked division between the sections, this might have been a very significant achievement in cinematic technique.

"Juno and the Paycock" (Cameo) in its talkie version is not to be compared with the stage original, lacking as it does the latter's warmth and tense atmosphere. It also suffers from the acting of Mr. Chapman in the part of the Paycock, in which he wears his airs with too obvious an effort.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Contributors to This Issue

J. B. S. HALDANE is a distinguished English scientist and philosopher.

J. G. CURTIS is the pseudonym of a careful student of present-day financial and industrial developments.

EDWIN M. BORCHARD is professor of international law at Yale University.

NORMAN MACLEOD, editor of the Morada, is now living in New Mexico.

MARK VAN DOREN is editor of "An Autobiography of America."

JOHN MACY has recently published a book entitled "About Women."

JANE PERRY CLARK is a member of the department of government at Barnard College.

ALTER BRODY is the author of "Lamentations," a book of plays.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is in the department of anthropology at Northwestern University.

PHILIP NOEL BAKER is professor of international relations at the University of London.

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

‡Flying High—Apollo—W. 42 St.
†Lost Sheep—Selwyn—42 St., W. of B'way.
†Lysistrata—44 St.—44 St., W. of B'way.
†Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45 St.
•The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47 St., W. of B'way.
•The Last Mile—Sam H. Harris—42 St., W. of B'way.
‡The New Garrick Gaieties—Guild—52 St., W. of B'way.

FILMS

All Quiet on the Western Front—Central—47 St. and B'way.
Hold Everything, Saturday, July 19 to Tuesday July 22; True to the Navy, Wednesday, July 23, to Friday, July 25—The Plaza—58 St., E. of Madison Ave.
Journey's End—Gaiety—46 St. and B'way.
Mysteries of Nature, Friday, July 18th—Eighth St. Playhouse—52 W. Eighth St.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
The Big House—Astor—B'way and 45 St.
This Mad World, Saturday, July 19 to Tuesday, July 22; The Ship From Shanghai, Wednesday, July 23 to Friday, July 25—Little Carnegie—57 St., E. of Seventh Ave.
Wiegenlied, Beginning Friday, July 18—55 St. Playhouse—E. of Seventh Ave.

CONCERTS

Goldman Band Concerts, Monday, July 21, Central Park, Symphonic; Tuesday, July 22, N. Y. U.; Wednesday, July 23, Central Park, German; Thursday, July 24, N. Y. U. Peruvian; Friday, July 25, Central Park, Verdi; Saturday, July 26, N. Y. U., Popular; Sunday, July 27, Central Park. Concerts begin at 8.45 p.m.

Philharmonic Symphony Concerts, Lewisohn Stadium. Every evening at 8.30. In case of rain, the Choral Symphony concert on Wednesday, July 23 will be postponed to the following day and an orchestral program substituted.

•Drama. †Comedy. ‡Musical.

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □

THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS
The NEW GARRICK GAIETIES
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

"LYSISTRATA"
"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockridge, The Sun.
FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre W. of B'way, Eves. 8:30 Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:30

"MIGHTIEST WAR DRAMA EVER SEEN"
—N. Y. American.
"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"
A Universal Picture presented by Carl Laemmle
Directed by Lewis Milestone
"A notable achievement, sincere, earnest, vivid and graphic. Better than anything so far done."—Mordaunt Hall, N. Y. Times.
"Enormously compelling talking motion picture. As a show something to get definitely excited about! A very fine motion picture."—Howard Barnes, Herald Tribune.
CENTRAL THEATRE, B'dway and 47th Street Twice Daily: 2:45—8:45. 3 times Sat. & Sun., 2:45—5:45—8:45

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street — Cooled by Refrigeration — ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT — Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

STARTS FRIDAY, JULY 18
MYSTERIES OF NATURE
UFA'S LATEST SCIENTIFIC FILM
Vastly entertaining and tremendously informative
8th Street PLAYHOUSE
FILM GUILD CINEMA
52 W. 8th St.—SPR 5095
DIR. JOS. R. FLIESLER

Summer Homes—Summer Resorts on pages 107, 108 and iii

Nansen the Norwegian

THE death of Fridtjof Nansen on May 13 removed from the contemporary scene one of the world's great men. The remarkable tribute to his personality and his work which we reprint below was written for the Nation and Athenaeum, London weekly, by Philip Noel Baker.

How often in the last weeks has Nansen been called a citizen of the world? How often have we said that he was the greatest of Europeans? And indeed his fame was not merely widespread, it was universal. His deeds had stirred the hearts and quickened the imagination of so many nations that they had become a part of the common heritage of mankind. So much so that we had half forgotten that Nansen was Norwegian . . .

Yet that, in reality, was the most important thing about him. The key to his simple yet mystical personality and to his position both at home and in the world lay in his passionate pride in Norway, and in Norway's affectionate and devoted pride in him. No one could meet Nansen in Geneva or elsewhere without discovering his anxiety to be back in Norway, his happiness in the forests and mountains and rivers of his native country, his belief in the value of Norwegian culture, his faith in the sterling qualities of the Norwegian people. No one could go to Norway without discovering that to Norwegians Nansen was one of the heroes of their race.

What was the secret of this mutual feeling? It lay in the common genius of Nansen and of the people from whom he sprang. There was nothing in Nansen to hamper the action of this common genius. He was not one of those "great" men whose greatness diminishes as you come nearer to it. Just the reverse. He was one of those rare beings whose stature seems to grow with closer knowledge. He was greatest to those who knew him best. Thus there was nothing in Nansen to check the devotion which a small nation could feel for a leader who lived his daily life within it. And there was everything in Nansen to call forth that devotion.

Norwegians are proud of their lovely country, of the wild primitive life which their forests and mountains still afford. They are proud of the physical prowess of their men, of their skill in national sports, in shooting, fishing, skating, skiing. They are proud of their sailors—no country sends so high a proportion of its men to sea as Norway. They are proud of their explorers, who from the days of the Vikings onwards have faced the perils of a peculiarly merciless unknown; and the nearness of Norway to the Arctic circle, with the mysterious fascination of its winter darkness and the dream-like beauty of its "white" summer nights, gives them an intimate conviction that by divine right the kingdom of the frozen North is theirs. They are proud of their national contribution to the science and knowledge of mankind. They are proud of their national contribution to art and letters, and are rightly conscious of the intensely national character of that contribution. They are proud of their democratic state—of their freedom, so hardly won and so nobly used, of their upright and efficient administration, of the simplicity of their public life. . . .

What did Fridtjof Nansen mean to such a people? He was the living embodiment of all the virtues and qualities they most admire. In the primitive life of wilder Norway, Nansen, even among his fellow-countrymen, was supreme. He was a master-craftsman of the woods and mountains; a superb horseman; a splendid shot, with an unrivaled knowledge of Norwegian ways of hunting; a fisherman of surpassing skill and cunning. As an athlete, Norway perhaps has never seen his equal. He won the national distance skating championship of his country when he was less than seventeen. A year later he broke the world's speed skating record for the mile. A year later he gave up skating and took seriously to skiing, and at his first attempt won the great national cross-country contest, victory in which marks a Norwegian as the leading athlete of the year. Twelve times he won that contest—and, indeed, was never beaten, for after twelve victories he retired.

Nansen was a sailor; not such a sailor as other yachtsmen are, but a sailor in the true tradition of the early Vikings. There are stories of Nansen battling in his yacht through stormy seas to Spitzbergen, alone with his daughter for days and nights amid the wild winds and waters of the Northern sea.

Nansen was an explorer, and, indeed, the greatest of explorers, not only among Norwegians, but, as I was told by one of the most eminent of Continental geographers, among all the explorers of the modern world. Have we forgotten—Norway at least has not—how at the age of twenty-eight Nansen, with every authority against him, having been refused a subsidy from the government for his expenses, planned and carried through the first crossing of the grim, mountainous ice field of central Greenland? All the other experts said that his scheme was madness. . . . They said it again later when he planned to freeze the Fram into the polar ice field and to drift her across the Arctic region back to the open sea. These experts would have been right with any ordinary man. But they were wrong with Nansen. For Nansen not only had the scientific knowledge and the imagination to conceive new and correct explanations of geographical facts; he had faith and patience and craftsmanship and courage such as no other man has had. He had faith which launched him on these great adventures with the absolute certainty that he must go through on the course he had projected or perish in the attempt. He had craftsmanship of the very highest order. It was said of him that he never won even the smallest victory by chance. . . . He designed and made the drawings for the Fram; he chose the wood and supervised the actual construction of every plank and beam—and the Fram triumphantly resisted pressures in the ice floes which his critics had predicted would grind her into dust. He had courage of a kind that most men never guess at. The smaller the party, the less the risk—that was his motto on his expeditions; and in faith therein he left the Fram on foot with one companion to seek to find the Pole. How many of us would gladly face for one single day and night the terrors of an empty desert of ice and snow, with only one companion, surrounded at every hour by every kind of danger, cut off by vast and often impassable distances from every link with civilized mankind? Nansen faced such terrors for fourteen months; he and Johansen were in almost daily peril of their lives; time and again only Nansen's quickness and endurance saved them from the assaults of bears or walruses or icebergs. . . . The word adventure takes on an ampler meaning when one remembers the epic tale of "Farthest North," and Nansen lives today among explorers as the giant of them all.

Nansen was a scholar, with an unusually wide range of scientific knowledge. He began as a zoologist, dipped into other branches, studied meteorology and the physical configuration of the globe, and specialized at length on oceanography.

Nansen, in a modest way, was an artist. His drawings—portraits of men and women and polar bears and dogs and walruses, sketches of scenes in the Arctic regions or of holidays on skis or in the mountains—have more than talent. He was, in no modest way, a man of letters. His works of science, of adventure, of sporting stories, even of history—the history of the Viking explorers of long ago—are known wherever men read printed books. He wrote not only admirable Norwegian, but an easy and moving English prose that few even of our own great writers can excel.

Lastly, Nansen was a patriot and the first statesman of his native land. His first active intervention in political questions was when he worked for the consummation of Norwegian freedom by the separation from Sweden in 1905. His articles and manifestos influenced profoundly the trend of both Norwegian and Swedish thought, and helped to bring about a separation by peaceful means. People still talk in Norway of the great speech Nansen made to a vast concourse of fifty thousand people in the streets of Oslo on May 17 (Norway's Constitution Day) a quarter of a century ago. And when he had helped the Prime Minister, Christian Michelsen, to end the Swedish Union, Nansen came to London to act as Minister for two years, to insure the stability of the new Norwegian kingdom by gaining the friendship and the confidence of the most powerful government in the world. In 1908, without a sigh, and by his own request, he left the diplomatic service and returned home to serve his university instead. Ten years later, at the crisis of the war, he went on a new and greater mission to the United States, and after long negotiation made for Norway a "food and shipping arrangement" that was the envy of all the other neutral Powers. It was not surprising, therefore, that in 1920 Nansen was asked to act as first Delegate for Norway to the League of Nations; and at ten assemblies, even when his own prime minister was with him, Nansen remained first delegate to the end. Never once in all his life had he held political office of any kind; in 1926, at a serious crisis, he was asked to head a national government but gladly refused as soon as another solution of the crisis could be found; yet both to politicians and to the public Nansen stood above and behind all governments. As a shrewd Norwegian told me, all Norway felt the safer because they knew that if disaster happened Nansen would be there.

With all this genius, with all this wisdom, with all this personal authority and power, Nansen remained the simplest of living men. He loved beauty, he loved youth, he loved animals, he loved the country, he loved pleasure, he loved his work; he hated social duties and pretensions, he hated the waste and futility of social functions, he hated snobbery, he hated pomp and parade of every kind. Lord Curzon said of him in 1923 that he was the only living man to whom the doors of every Chancery in Europe were flung wide open; and true it is that he—a simple citizen of a tiny kingdom—was perhaps the only man alive who could venture to say whatever he thought right to any prince, prime minister, or president in the world. Yet differences of class or rank meant nothing to his mind. His king and his gardener were equally his friends.

There lies the secret of his power in Norway. They loved him not so much for his deeds as for himself. How in a nation of two millions could it be otherwise? In so small a national community the outer trappings of a public figure do not count. Norwegians loved him because he was their ideal in every quality they value and admire. They loved him because among all their legendary heroes, he was the greatest Norseman of them all. They loved him because he was a passionate nationalist, who had made his people great among the other nations of the world. But most of all they loved him, as his friends in every country loved him, because he was himself.

EDUCATIONAL

PLAYWRITING AT N.U.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

Classes in playwriting, playshop production for promising mss., walking rehearsals, etc. Competitive scholarships available. For catalog write:
THE DEAN, School of Speech and Theatre Arts, Evanston, Illinois.

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN

Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 13th year.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN

GERMAN. Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th year. Also neglected English education.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

Psychoanalysis and Psychology

PRIVATE lessons and evening courses conducted by trained Swiss Psychologist, Ph.D. Reading and discussion of important scientific works in English, French, German. Introductory and advanced classes. Call 9-11 A.M. Cathedral 9544, Apt. 6; Dr. Moser.

POSITIONS WANTED

LIBRARIAN desires to communicate with party able to offer permanent connection in similar or other interesting field. Well recommended. Location secondary. Box 2483, % The Nation.

STENOGRAPHER, high school graduate, a year's experience, is urgently in need of work. Box 2489, % The Nation.

YOUNG man, LL.B. good student, excellent references, desires position as clerk with a law firm. No experience. Box 2490, % The Nation.

FOR RENT

HOUSES—BUNGALOWS

OLD New England Home (furnished) on West Road in Dorset, Vermont. 10 airy large rooms, 2 baths, electricity. One mile to Field and Golf Club. Beautiful location. Reasonable rent. Inquire M. F. Gilbert, West Road, Dorset, Vermont.

UNFURNISHED APARTMENT

TWO ROOMS, kitchen, tiled bath, fireplace, high ceilings, parquet floors. Private house. Convenient location. Gramercy section. Reasonable rent. 219 East 19th St.

HOMES TO SHARE

MOTHER of son, 14, desires share lovely home on equal terms with intelligent, genial mother with son same age. Both must possess better qualities essentially necessary for a good home. References exchanged on personal interview. Box 2488, % The Nation.

WANTED: Beginning October, one or two co-tenants for accessible attractive Astoria apartment. Three large bedrooms, sitting-room, sunparlor, etc. Three exposures. Low rental. Immediate arrangements desired. Box 2491, % The Nation.

FARMS FOR SALE

SEVERAL FARMS, good size, stone houses and barns. Hill country, on Delaware, 75 miles from New York, 40 miles from Philadelphia. Low prices. ($3,000 to $6,000). Address John Coffey, Erwinna, Pa.

SHOPPERS' CORNER

30% during July and August only, on Eastman Cameras, Kodaks, Films, and Supplies. As usual our discounts of 25 to 50% on other standard advertised merchandise still holds good. Write us or call John 1427 for prices. SERVWELL SYSTEM INC., 35 Maiden Lane, N. Y. C.

SUMMER

THE CRYSTAL VILLA
WOODCLIFF LAKE, N. J.

A rare combination of Country Pleasures with City Comforts. All modern improvements. Beautiful surroundings. Altitude 864. Free of Mosquitoes. Excellent Meals. Delightful Bathing and Fishing. 23 Miles from New York City. Very Easy Commutation. Write for Booklet. Telephone Park Ridge 404.

BLUE HILLS LODGE on Maple Lake
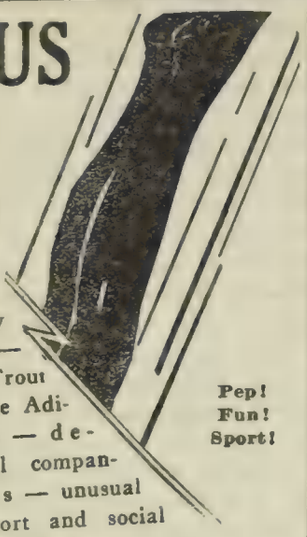
Livingston Manor, New York

A homey place on 150 beautiful acres—all improvements; pure, wholesome food . . . athletic director . . . swimming, rowing, fishing . . . dancing to fine orchestra . . . experienced social staff . . . surprising rate of $22 per week . . . no extras. Write for further details.

QUIET, charming vacation place for limited number of grown-ups with artistic and literary interests. Modest rates. Ask for circular.
CAMP ARTEMIS
Brewster, N. Y.

CAMP FOR ADULTS—A new addition to an outstanding girls' camp—all water and field sports, excellent food, unusual scenery. Introductory rates—$25 per week. Write Camp Como, Lake Como, Pa., or phone Lake Como 163.



Summer advertising continued on following pages

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

SUMMER SUMMER

SCOPUS

The Vacation Playland

Away from city dirt and noise—at beautiful Trout Lake in the Adirondacks — delightful companions — unusual sport and social facilities — return to the city refreshed, invigorated —ready to tackle the job right!

Pep! Fun! Sport!

Swim! Row! Play!

SCOPUS

An Adult Camp of Distinction

IN THE ADIRONDACKS

P. O. LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

City Address
11 WEST 42nd STREET
Longacre 0105

Spend Your Vacation on the shores of the Queen of Mountain Lakes

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women

ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

Superb location at "America's first summer resort." All the most desirable camp features. The Wunnishaunta Booklet, sent free, includes pictures of camp activities, auto routes, train and airplane information.

MRS. SADIE BRICKMAN, Hostess

WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

MILFORD

KENT, Connecticut

'The Camp for YOUth!'

JUST BRING A BUNDLE OF SPIRIT!

A beautiful summering place for intelligent young folks and folks who stay young; informal, athletic, carefree; sheltered tent accommodations and log cabins; excellent meals.

"Mickey" Michaels is especially desirous of greeting Nation readers.

Rates Moderate.

Camp 'phone Kent 1-8

In New York : 1440 Broadway
PENnsylvania 7842

HIDDEN IN THE CONNECTICUT HILLS

Swimming · Boating · Horseback · Tennis · Handball · Basketball

165 Acres of Rustic Beauty
Delicious food from our own farm
RATES FOR JULY $25
RATES FOR AUGUST $28
Reservations limited to 65
Bungalows for two, three or more.
Write or Phone Direct
UNCAS LODGE, Uncasville, Conn.
Norwich 1858, Ring 5

FOR YOUR SUMMER VACATION

IN THE CONNECTICUT HILLS

Complete rest and rebuilding, in delightful country. Invigorating outdoor life. Saddle horses. Swimming. Ideal for week-ends. Only 1½ hours from New York.

TOPSTONE FARM

Write: R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn.
Telephone: Ridgefield 648

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

WARRENSBURG, N. Y.

A Camp for Adults in the Adirondacks

Most modern facilities for comfort and sports including golf

Booklet on request

City phone Lex. 8879

ROCKY DALE LODGE

An Adult Camp in the Hills—Sellersville, Pa.
2½ hours from N. Y.—1 hour from Phila.
Outdoor activities—NO GREENS FEES
Rates July and August $37.50

Write for Booklet

Executive Directors
WM. J. HELEGOTT WM. D. TENDLER
Social Director: "MORRY" GOLDBERG

CAMP BETHLEHEM

Bethlehem, Conn.
Tel. 48—Ring 2, Woodbury, Conn.
Simple Camp Life in the Litchfield Hills
ADULT CAMP FAMILIES ACCOMMODATED
Sports: Boating, Bathing, Tennis, Handball and Dancing
Rates: July $25 August $27.50
Fare, Round Trip by Bus $5.00

Camp Sports - Hotel Comforts

Boating, Bathing, Fishing, Dancing, Entertainment galore. Tennis, Riding, Golf; large social and physical staff.

KENMORE

on the Beautiful Lake
N. WHITE LAKE, N. Y
Phone: White Lake 114

Write for Booklet "N"

HAMBURGER'S EVERGREEN (Health) FARM

Tel. Farmingdale 40 F 31—
near Asbury Park, Farmingdale, N. J.

VEGETARIAN HOUSE

A farm resort in a delightful rural setting 1¼ hr. from New York. Plenty of ground to play about, sun baths, showers, bathing, [illegible] and sport. Natural delicious health foods. Write or telephone for information.

THE SEA GULL

Something different for your holidays or vacation at this Russian-American Inn facing the ocean. All outdoor sports; cuisine for the epicurean, also the seeker of simple health diet; beautiful rooms.

1300 Ocean Ave. Phone Belmar 217
Belmar, N. J. N. Y. Phone Spring 5291

SONAQUA CLUB

Lake Mohegan, N. Y.

The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only 45 miles from New York.

Sports
Tennis, Boating
Swimming, Dancing

For reservations call Peekskill 1276

SEA GATE RENDEZ-VOUS

Where food is the best

A vacation is a necessity; a change of surroundings greatly beneficial; wholesome food an elixir. You will enjoy all this at the Sea Gate Rendez-vous, where food is the best, where comfort, coziness and simplicity, aided by the sea air, and the health-giving rays of the sun, combine to restore poise, harmony and well being to the vacationist.

Arrangements by week, day, or as long as your vacation lasts. Write 3913 Laurel Ave., Sea Gate, N. Y. Harbor, or Telephone Mayflower 8655.

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 122-F-3

Most beautiful estate, surrounded by brooks, lakes, woods and flowers. Absolutely private; Boating, Fishing, Tennis and other sports on premises. Golf and Saddle horses nearby. Limited accommodations, select following. Excellent Jewish Cuisine.

1½ hours on Erie ($2.60 round trip) or Route 17

CAMP TOPSTONE—For Adults

A Jewish Camp with a fine American spirit

All land and water sports, with free instruction. Splendid social activities. Excellent strictly Kosher meals.

Write for illustrated booklet

SHAPIRO BROS. Branchville, Conn.

THE LESTER HOUSE

ROSCOE, NEW YORK

Magnificent surroundings: good food.
Rates: $25.00 per week.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 30, 1930 No. 3395

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS..... 109
EDITORIALS:
Europe Meets Briand Halfway..... 112
Labor Turns the Tables..... 113
Professors and Propaganda..... 114
Realities in India..... 114
The Greatest Novels..... 115
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN..... 116
WHAT NEXT IN PALESTINE? By Victor S. Yarros..... 117
HUSTON STAYS ON. By Paul Y. Anderson..... 119
THE PRESS TODAY: IX. THE OPPORTUNITY IN THE SMALL CITY. By Oswald Garrison Villard..... 120
PAPA DROISSART. By A. G. Barnett..... 123
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter..... 125
CORRESPONDENCE:
What's Wrong with the World?..... 126
Other Correspondence..... 127
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE..... 127
BOOKS:
Spring Plowing. By Hal Saunders White..... 128
A Brutalized India. By William MacDonald..... 128
Tranquil Journeys. By Isidor Schneider..... 129
This Side the Land of Promise. By Arthur Warner..... 129
Beyond Death. By Eda Lou Walton..... 130
The Making of History. By Salvador de Madariaga..... 130
Books in Brief..... 132
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Women Mill Slaves in Japan..... 134

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

AIDED NOT A LITTLE by a temperature of 107 in the shade, the naval treaty was finally ratified on July 21 by the overwhelming vote of 58 to 9 with only one reservation, that offered by Senator Norris, assuming that there are no "secret understandings" on the part of the Executive. Fortunately the resolution of Walsh of Massachusetts that the navy be built up to the full British strength by December 31, 1935, was defeated by 54 to 11—a most hopeful augury of future success in holding off any building up to parity. The faithful nine who voted against the pact were such great intellectual lights as Bingham, Hale, Oddie, Moses, Pine, Johnson, and Robinson of Indiana, Republicans, and McKellar and Walsh of Massachusetts, Democrats. Johnson, whose mock heroics led him to announce his readiness to "die for his cause—the United States of America" and to declare that "it was a great British victory" went down to defeat the champion of American liberty and independence to the end. As for the treaty, it at least establishes the precedent that three leading naval nations got togther and agreed to the limitation of all classes of ships, and it will, we hope, put an end to twisting of the British lion's tail and assertions that a war with Great Britain is inevitable. As a piece of statesmanship it remains a sad miscarriage. Whatever good may come of it, it will always be a monument to the inability of the men in charge of five great governments to carry out the wishes of their peoples that the navies of the earth be not only limited but radically reduced. Least of all does it reflect credit upon President Hoover and the British Prime Minister, who together raised such high hopes on the Rapidan last year.

THE STABILIZATION FOOLISHNESS seems on the point of being relegated to the limbo of other crank devices for insuring prosperity by government aid. The Federal Farm Board, it is reported, will not buy any more wheat this year, and very likely will go out of the grain-buying business altogether. The $75,000,000 worth of wheat that it has on hand it will continue to hold in hope of being able to get out even on the transaction—that is, until the price of wheat goes up from 90 cents or less to around $1.20, which is about what the board paid on the average for its accumulation. Thus is dissipated the fantastic dream of the farmer politicians who saw the federal Treasury bolstering agriculture. Mr. Legge and Secretary Hyde will now devote themselves to inducing the wheat-growers to cut down their acreage, with a reduction of the annual yield from about 800,000,000 bushels to 600,000,000 as the ultimate goal. Senator Capper, of course, is vastly chagrined, and insists, quite rightly, that a cut in acreage will not help the present situation. As far as we can see, the present situation is beyond remedy save as time and the slow working of supply and demand may be expected to resolve it. The belated action of the Farm Board removes a most dangerous irritant, and to that extent is to be commended, but the sixty-odd million bushels of wheat which the board holds will long be a menace to prices.

WE RECORD WITH REGRET the appointment of Nicholas Roosevelt as Vice-Governor of the Philippines. He represents the school of thought which is opposed to our living up to our promise to bestow independence upon the Filipinos, and on hearing the news of Mr. Roosevelt's appointment the Philippine Senate at once adopted unanimously a resolution protesting against the nomination and citing chapter and verse from his book, "The Philippines: A Treasure and a Problem," to prove that he is highly prejudiced against Filipinos and Orientals generally. We do not wonder at the vote. Mr. Roosevelt's book was reviewed in The Nation April 6, 1927. We quote from the review:

> Mr. Roosevelt states that "no American ever better understood the difficult task of dealing with a sensitive alien race" than Leonard Wood; that "the idea of fair play is as alien to the Filipino as to all other Orientals"; that "the Oriental's idea of government is one in which the dominating group exercises power ruthlessly"; that therefore we should behave like Oriental rulers and keep the Philippines, partly because "we have a responsibility toward the hundreds of thousands of Christian converts made in China by American missionaries."

Poor Herbert Hoover! Of course he had never heard of, much less read, Mr. Roosevelt's book. But even he will, we hope, not insist on forcing on the Filipinos an official who has been guilty of the above.

CONSTITUTIONAL DICTATORSHIP in Germany has been foreshadowed ever since the middle of June, when Professor Paul Moldenhauer resigned as Finance Minister after his proposals for reforming the finances and balancing the budget were overwhelmingly rejected by a hostile Reichstag. Dr. Hermann Dietrich, who succeeded Moldenhauer, has had equally bad luck in trying to persuade the Reichstag to accept the needed economies and additional taxes. The dissolution of the Reichstag on July 18 was decreed by President von Hindenburg under the authority of Article 48 of the Constitution, which provides for a temporary suspension of certain articles "in the event that public security and order . . . should be considerably disturbed or endangered." There is some question whether Article 48 was intended to cover such a case as the present one, but the bickering and pettifogging Reichstag is out, Chancellor Bruening will put the financial program into effect, and there will be a new election by the middle of September. Count Westarp, one of the stormy petrels of German politics, is reported as already scheming to form a new party, and it is quite possible that the election will result in important changes in party representation. Whatever the party outcome, the government program will have to be accepted or a deficit of some $115,000,000 for this year and half that sum for the next will remain to plague the Treasury. It is no credit to German democracy that a dictatorship has had to be resorted to in order to bring the country to its senses.

PROGRESS BY RIOT seems to be the Egyptian conception of how best to solve a constitutional problem. Ever since the resignation of the Nahas Pasha Cabinet, on June 17, Egypt has been distracted by a violent party struggle involving King Fuad and, indirectly, the relations between Egypt and Great Britain. The immediate occasion of the resignation was the refusal of King Fuad to sanction certain measures, strongly supported by the Wafdist, or Nationalist, Party, intended to insure the maintenance of constitutional government and, in particular, to prevent the suspension of Parliament. Nahas Pasha's successor, Ismail Sidky Pasha, obtained from the King on June 22 a decree adjourning Parliament for one month. The riots at Alexandria on July 15 were the violent fruit of the agitation of the Wafdists against what they regard as a denial of constitutional rights, but the fact that the Wafdists are also in control of the legislature gives the outbreak a clear partisan slant. The statement of Prime Minister MacDonald in the House of Commons on July 16, while it announced the intention of the British government "to adhere to its attitude of neutrality and non-intervention in what appeared to it to be a purely internal issue," gave notice that the Egyptian government would be held responsible for the protection of foreign lives and property. The prompt dispatch of two British battleships to Alexandria enforced the warning.

A TEMPEST IN A TEAPOT, with the possibility of something a bit more serious later, seems to be a proper characterization of the events which have been convulsing Malta and have led the MacDonald Government to take the extraordinary step of suspending the Maltese constitution and postponing the election that was due. The trouble goes back to the early part of last year, when the Maltese ministry intervened to prevent the recall from the island, at the direction of the Vatican, of a Franciscan priest on the ground that the priest was a British subject and hence could not be removed by ecclesiastical authority. A violent controversy between church and state, industriously fanned, it would seem, by high church dignitaries in the island and effectively aided by the indiscretions of Lord Strickland, the Prime Minister, has gone on more or less actively since. Beyond saying that there appears to have been fault in plenty on both sides, the merits of a controversy in which charges and counter-charges of plot, intrigue, political agitation, secular invasion of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and the like have been liberally exchanged are still obscure. Lord Strickland's hurried visit to London does not appear to have aided a settlement, and the loss of constitutional privileges seems to have been accepted by church officials as a better alternative than the withdrawal of their charges.

ON NOVEMBER 1, 1929, a group of American Communists organized a bimonthly paper called the Revolutionary Age. Postmaster John J. Kiely of New York has refused second-class mailing privileges to this paper on the ground that the first six issues were held by the Solicitor of the Post Office Department to be unmailable. Benjamin Gitlow, president of the Revolutionary Age Association, has begun suit in United States District Court to enjoin Postmaster Kiely from excluding from the mails the issue of July 16, and the complaint has been filed by Arthur Garfield Hays, of the American Civil Liberties Union, who is Gitlow's attorney. Meanwhile, in England, the Labor Government has struck its first blow against the London Daily Worker, official organ of the Communist Third Internationale, by sending to jail three men connected with the enterprise on a charge of contempt of court, and fining another more than $1,000. And just to keep the pot boiling in America, the Fish Committee, spending $25,000 in an investigation of red activities as ridiculous as it is dangerous, has now gone into the wilderness to stalk the young Communists in camp, where Charles G. Wood, of the United States Department of Labor, has hinted at terrible goings on: children who sing the Internationale, salute the red flag, and even (let us whisper it lest Grover Whalen hear us) say at table, "God damn it, pass the bread."

THE LAST WORD against giving hitch-hikers a lift has now been said. One Harry Gold, driving in his car in the vicinity of New Brunswick, New Jersey, was asked for a ride by one Max Schwartz, private in the United States Army. Mr. Gold invited Private Schwartz to get in and ride a while; Private Schwartz said he was temporarily out of funds; Mr. Gold obliged him with a small loan. Certain conversation ensued. Private Schwartz then left the car, got the ear of a State trooper to whom he denounced Mr. Gold as a red communist anarchist who was desirous of overthrowing the United States government by force and violence and interfering with enlistment in the army, and the State trooper pursued Mr. Gold and arrested him. Freely admitting himself a Communist, he was kept in jail for five days, charged with the crime of anarchy. On July 17 he was unconditionally released with a handsome apology by Federal Judge William N. Runyon. Judge Runyon said in his opinion:

> I want to say to you very frankly that, as I regard that which happened, you did two kind acts; you gave a man a lift who wanted it . . . and you gave him a little money because he wanted it. That may be communism, but if it is I think it is a very admirable brand of communism, to share your own belongings with somebody else. I can only say, sir, that I hope you can look with kindness upon government in general. . . . I don't take it that this government is designed to throttle a man's ideas, to close his mouth; I believe that free speech is just as much today an incident and a principle of this government as it ever was. . . . The exchange of your ideas, the announcement of your ideas in the course of conversation, it would seem to me are a part of your rights. . . .

These words must have been very welcome to the ears of Mr. Gold, as they are welcome to ours. For the over-industrious Private Schwartz there is little to be said. One hopes that he will not ask for a hitch very soon again. He ought to keep out of the company of dangerous persons; he ought certainly not to be obliged to take their money or ride on the public highway in their nasty anarchist automobiles.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT'S championship of unemployment insurance before the National Conference of Governors at Salt Lake City emphasizes the timeliness of the campaign launched by the Conference for Progressive Labor Action for this form of out-of-work relief. A committee of liberal economists, actuarial experts, and publicists is now at work on a model unemployment-insurance bill, which the C. P. L. A. plans to have introduced in the various State legislatures. When the model bill is completed, the effort of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action will be to interest other labor and social organizations in the measure, with the thought that they will take the leadership in sponsoring this form of social insurance in their various States. Encouraging progress is already reported, although the campaign is hardly more than a month old. A number of labor organizations, notably the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, have recorded themselves as in favor of unemployment insurance. The Ohio Consumers League and other allied groups have created a committee to study the best method of unemployment insurance in that State. A special organization to campaign for the idea has been formed in the State of Michigan. The demand for unemployment insurance was bound to follow the growing agitation for old-age pensions. It will be strengthened by the period of depression in which the country now finds itself.

WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation? Eugene G. Grace, the present incumbent, has just testified in a legal proceeding that he received in 1929 only the pitiful sum of $1,623,753 as a bonus in recognition of his services. This represented 3.319 per cent of the net profits of the company after deducting fixed charges, less an amount equal to the annual preferred dividend, but before depreciation. Really, we wonder how any such concern can hope to secure and hold the services of worth-while men if it puts their compensation on such a niggardly basis. Mr. Grace testified that when earnings were low he had to put up with a bonus of one-half of one per cent. So this ill-treated man has been able to put into his bank account since 1925 only about $8,000,000 in addition to his salary. His salary? Yes, we forgot to mention that his regular salary is $12,000 a year. Obviously this is not a salary but an after-dinner tip. We feel certain that now these sad facts are out the stockholders of Bethlehem Steel will rise up as one man and demand that the emolument of their presiding genius be increased to at least 6 per cent per annum. The head of the greatest ironworks in Russia gets $112.50 a month plus an official residence of three rooms. What other contrast could show as clearly how superior we are to the Bolsheviks?

A GREAT POLITICAL BATTLE is on in Wisconsin, where Philip La Follette is definitely in the field for the governorship. A dynasty is at stake. The La Follette machine has its back to the wall and so has brought out its biggest trump. If Governor Kohler is reelected the La Follette faction will have received almost a mortal blow. The Governor has, moreover, been helped and his opponents hurt by his unsuccessful prosecution for alleged violations of the corrupt-practices act during the campaign leading to his election. That was a bold stroke, but boldness counts in such a matter only if the stroke is successful. Now Mr. La Follette, who has charm, character, and unquestioned ability, must convince the voters, many of whom think well of the present Governor, that he is sincere, and that he has a sufficiently differentiated program to call for his preferment. Philip La Follette belongs in public life like his brother and his father, and Wisconsin needs an aggressive, modern leadership. The State is very heavily taxed; it is suffering a good deal from the present depression both in industry and agriculture. These evils cannot be cured by the program and the philosophy of the elder La Follette. It remains to be seen just how far the son is abreast of the times.

LEOPOLD AUER, like all great teachers, had a great personality. As such he gave to his pupils far more than a technical violin training and a most understanding appreciation of the musical art. It was sometimes suggested that the brilliance and the success of the long roll of virtuosos who called him master was due in large part to his ability to pick the most promising of the dozens of aspirants who knocked at his door. This is as may be, but we believe that Mischa Elman, Efrem Zimbalist, Jascha Heifetz, Toscha Seidel, Cecilia Hanson, Miron Poliakine, and Max Rosen, to mention the most outstanding of his pupils, would be the first to attribute their success to what they are on record as calling his genius. That was manifest not only in his teaching; he was besides one of the outstanding soloists of his day, showing in all his work the effects of the five years of teaching he had received at the hands of the severely classical Joseph Joachim. Besides being a notable violinist and unsurpassed teacher of the violin, Auer was an artist to whom every field of musical activity was as an open book. Everywhere he touched it his taste was as fine as his violin style was highly polished. His death at eighty-five leaves no one exactly to take his place. But genius still finds its way and it will do so even without the master-touch of Auer.

Europe Meets Briand Halfway

THE unfavorable reply of the MacDonald Government to the Briand proposal that the European nations come together to discuss the formation of the United States of Europe is the one really discouraging note among the twenty replies thus far received from the twenty-six nations involved. Every one of them has dissented at one or more points, some of them radically, like Italy in the matter of the Briand proposal to put security to the forefront, while Germany and Hungary are clear that no new organization should be built upon the existing wrongs of the Versailles treaty. But they have all agreed to meet and to talk things over, most of them stressing the necessity of doing nothing to injure in any way the League of Nations. We confess to genuine disappointment that the British Labor Government should not have cordially promised to meet with the others to explore the whole proposal and to see what if anything can be accomplished to aid Europe toward a tariff and economic union and perhaps, in the years to come, to a political organization which will still further insure peace in the world.

True, the British answer does not wholly close the door. It does not say that the British nation will not be represented at the conference and it does agree that there should be an "association of economic and political authorities"—whatever that may mean. For the rest it answers M. Briand categorically and always in favor of the League of Nations. It points out that some of the committees of the League are working on the very issues that Briand raises, indeed "on virtually the whole of the program of practical action which the [Briand] memorandum puts forward . . ." and it, therefore, fears that a new organization would create confusion "and perhaps also rivalry." It also worries lest the new organization create intercontinental rivalries. The issue is thus squarely raised as to whether everything should be left to the League with its large non-Continental membership—represented on its committees—or whether Europe should try to organize for itself. We hope to see the Briand proposals plumbed to their uttermost depths. So far from being discouraged by the often sweeping and radical disagreements and reservations in the replies, we are hopeful that they mean a readiness to talk frankly and directly about the issues involved. The all-important point for us is that the nations are going to meet and that they are putting their cards on the table in advance. Being accustomed to accept gratefully half- or quarter-loaves in international affairs we shall rejoice in whatever emerges which may prove to be a milestone toward that tariff union which Europe so sorely needs.

On the point of the League of Nations the German reply is especially admirable: "The German Government agrees to the proposition that the League of Nations must not suffer. No form of European isolation should be introduced which might lead to other groupings in the League of Nations." It also adds that no solution of Europe's difficulties should "be directed against any other state or country"—a generous and friendly gesture in the direction of the United States, the more noteworthy because of the deliberately hostile blow just struck at Europe by our new tariff. Altogether the German reply is as temperate and as reasonable as could possibly be expected. How refreshing it is to hear from Berlin that "military points of view must not be placed in the foreground of the discussion of economic problems"! Courageous, too, in view of the persistent French insistence that security comes first, to have Berlin reply that independent of political considerations there are economic fields to be explored and utilized in the interest of general European advancement and that "closer cooperation in this field should not be made dependent upon closer security. On the contrary, just this economic understanding will materially increase the consciousness of solidarity and thereby the feeling of security." The Germans are, moreover, as emphatic as Italy for including Russia and Turkey in the conference from the outset.

This is the part of wisdom, and we note with similar satisfaction the German belief that a study of European economic troubles should begin with agriculture and should seek means of enlarging agricultural areas and "facilitating the exchange of goods between the leading agricultural and industrial districts of Europe." That is the direction in which this great human experiment should first head. Nothing could help the complete recovery of Europe so much as the breaking down of tariff barriers. The bankers of Europe have been on record for three years to this effect, and to their manifesto was also signed the name of J. P. Morgan, as well as those of other leading American financiers. More than that, there is the historical precedent of the tariff union of Germany, in effect long before the proclamation of the German Empire at Versailles in 1871, which led to this political union of all Germany under a kaiser and to her great economic rise. Free trade relations between the states of the proposed new federation of Europe will do more to bring about security than anything else, and out of security and free exchange will naturally develop such political relationships as may seem wise as the years pass. In such a union lies the best promise of a normal, natural evolution.

We have already referred to the admirable Italian answer, so wise and humane in its insistence upon that disarmament to which the Allies are sacredly pledged by the Treaty of Versailles. Remarkable also is the unanimity of belief that there should be complete equality between all nations, large and small, in the new organization. It is idle, of course, to believe that the millennium for Europe is at hand. It is not possible for those who have started this movement to foretell just where it will lead any more than it was possible for the founders of the League of Nations to specify what the evolution of that body was going to be. Besides political and economic difficulties there are linguistic and cultural barriers to be overcome. There are many who think that a new federation would constitute a challenge to Geneva. These are all points to be faced in due course, but if nothing else comes out of it all than a new reason for European consultation and cooperation and planning for disarmament, that alone will have justified M. Briand and will give to his name an enduring place in history.

Labor Turns the Tables

RARELY, if ever, has a Supreme Court decision received a more enthusiastic welcome from trade unionists than the recent decision in the case of New Orleans Railway Company v. Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, decided May 26, 1930. Here in an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Hughes labor has scored what appears to be a victory of great importance.

Congress provided in the Watson-Parker Act of 1926 that railroad managers shall treat with employees' representatives selected by the workers. The Texas and Pacific road ignored this provision in 1927, when the organized clerks sought to increase their wages. In direct contravention to subdivision 3 of Section 2 of this statute the company proceeded to form a company union. Pressure was brought to bear on members of the brotherhood to induce and coerce them to withdraw from their own organization and make the company union their sole representative in all dealings with the road. The effect, of course, was to deprive the employees of the protection of their own organization—their chief dependence for fair wages and proper working conditions. In opposition to the company union, the brotherhood proceeded in a somewhat novel and unusual manner. Not the strike, boycott, or picketing was a part of its program. Relying upon the provision of the Watson-Parker Act, the brotherhood appealed to Federal District Judge J. C. Hutcheson, Jr., for an injunction against the road and certain of its officers restraining them from interfering with the clerks' labor organization and from displacing the clerks' union as representative of the employees. A temporary order was granted, which was later made permanent. Railroad officials, so it appears, paid little or no attention to the court's order, whereupon counsel for the brotherhood went into court with some one hundred counts alleging violation of the restraining order. The case went to trial and certain railroad officials were found guilty of contempt. The railroad appealed, with the result that the judgment of the District Court was affirmed. Thereupon the company secured a writ of certiorari and carried the case to the Supreme Court of the United States. Here a unanimous bench, speaking through Chief Justice Hughes, denied all the contentions of the petitioners in an opinion that will take high rank in the annals of the court.

The first and most important point which the opinion establishes is that Section 2 of the Railway Labor Act of 1926 confers a substantive right and not merely, as counsel for the petitioners argued, an abstract right. It was because of an appreciation of the infirmity of the existing legislation, the court pointed out, that Congress was prompted to pass the act of 1926. Under its provisions legal duties were imposed and Congress intended, moreover, to make these duties enforceable.

One could scarcely desire a more outspoken approval of the right of collective bargaining than the following, quoted from the decision:

> The legality of collective action on the part of employees in order to safeguard their proper interests is not to be disputed. It has long been recognized that employees are entitled to organize for the purpose of securing the redress of grievances and to promote agreement with employers relating to rates of pay and conditions of work. Congress was not required to ignore this right of employees (to be represented by persons of their own choosing) but could safeguard it and seek to make their appropriate collective action an instrument of peace rather than strife. Such collective action would be a mockery if representation were made futile by interference with freedom of choice. Thus the prohibition by Congress of interference of representatives for the purpose of negotiation and conference between employers and employees, instead of being an invasion of the constitutional right of either, was based on the recognition of the rights of both.

A final and perhaps the most significant ruling of the court was that the obligation of a railroad not to interfere with the freedom of employees to organize could not only be enforced in the federal courts, but it was enforceable by the extraordinary process of the injunction. Counsel for the petitioners argued that the Federal Court was without jurisdiction because property or a property right, as required by Section 20 of the Clayton Act, was wanting in this dispute. Chief Justice Hughes, however, doubted whether Section 20 could be regarded as limiting the authority of the court to restrain violation of an explicit provision of an act of Congress. But even conceding that it was necessary to show a property interest, the interest was easily forthcoming. The Chief Justice maintained that "there was such an interest with respect to the selection of representatives to confer with the employer in relation to contracts of service."

Although this case involved a dispute in interstate commerce the control of which was authorized by an act of Congress, the implications that flow from this opinion are far-reaching. Since the right to work, the right to bargain collectively, and the right of the union to choose its own representatives are all property rights, such rights when invaded are entitled to equitable relief. Since a company union, moreover, under the influence of the employer, prevents workers from faring as well financially as they would fare when represented by their own organization, such an organization denies workers their proper enjoyment of a property right. Would not this argument lead one to conclude that a labor union might secure an injunction against the continuance of a company union without legislative sanction such as was afforded in the Railway Clerks' case?

It is hardly necessary to say that the interpretation which the court placed on the phrase "liberty of contract" in earlier cases has long since been belied by economic and social facts. Chief Justice Hughes has now reached almost the conclusion formulated by Mr. Justice Holmes—that the union alone furnishes that "equality of position between the parties in which liberty of contract begins."

The case is significant for another reason: it demonstrates for the first time in a case before the Supreme Court the effectiveness with which the injunction can be employed in behalf of employees. It is evidently a means by which unions can fight employers with their own kind of fire.

Professors and Propaganda

HAVING wrestled for years, not very successfully, with the question of academic freedom, the American Association of University Professors has recently turned its attention to the ethical issue involved in the acceptance by professors of payments from public-utility companies in return for articles, addresses, investigations, or other services presumably of benefit to the companies. Included in the inquiry is the ethics of the acceptance by a university of funds ostensibly intended to finance the study of subjects directly related to the business interests of the donors. The immediate occasion of the inquiry was the evidence, some of it appearing to reflect rather seriously upon the integrity of the American professoriate, brought out in hearings before the Federal Trade Commission in its investigation of public-utility corporations.

The report of the association's committee, prepared by the chairman, Professor E. R. L. Seligman of Columbia University, is a broad but inconclusive survey of the various aspects of the situation. The inconclusiveness of the report is due in part to the fact that the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission has not been completed and the public-utility corporations have not yet presented to the commission their side of the case. Until the evidence was all in, accordingly, the committee did not feel at liberty to interrogate the particular professors whose relations with the companies have been called in question. The subject itself is difficult, however, quite aside from the particular incidents involved.

The main question, of course, is whether a university professor, whatever his rank (the report notes that most of those whose names have been mentioned are instructors), may properly have anything to do with propaganda in a field in which his professional and professorial interests are concerned. Propaganda, as the report points out, may be either good or bad. If the merits of a worthy cause—the advantages of organized as against unorganized labor, for example, or the unwisdom of war, or the social dangers of unrestricted traffic in drugs—may not be brought to public notice by organized effort in its behalf, the good causes are few that will be able to make much headway. The trouble comes when propaganda is a tissue of misrepresentation or lies, as was much of the Allied propaganda during the World War, or a deliberate attempt to fasten upon the public an undertaking or a policy which in fact means the exploitation of the public for private profit.

The position of the professor who happens to be a chemist, or a physicist, or an engineer, or an economist offers special dangers and difficulties. Most professors in scientific fields, if their standing is high, are eagerly sought by industrial or business concerns as technical experts or advisers, and many of them are drawn permanently into the business or industrial field to the detriment of university teaching and research. It is not well that university professors should lose touch with practicality, or that business should be deprived of the aid of scholarship merely because a university has appropriated the scholar. Professor Seligman's report does not find that any professor who was mixed up with the public-utilities propaganda changed his opinions or espoused any cause because of the money that was paid to him. The difficulty comes in convincing the public that he remained quite honest while taking money for what he said, wrote, or did.

About all that the committee is able to recommend is that the professor should let his students and the public know where he stands. If he believes in the private ownership and operation of public utilities and is being paid for supporting that view, he had better warn his students that his opinions on the subject may have been influenced by his business connection. Perhaps this is as far as an ethical pronouncement can go until the facts of the situation are more fully known, but it must be apparent to everybody that even with the utmost frankness and most limpid honesty on the part of a professor, his classroom may still be a place in which views of public policy widely regarded as inimical to public welfare are regularly taught. The most dangerous defenders of error are frequently those who are sincere.

Realities in India

THE Simon Commission has made its report, and the Viceroy has told the Indian Legislative Assembly that that report is in form only a set of recommendations and that anybody may propose other plans. But the Viceroy omitted to point out the underlying psychological reality, namely, that the Simon report, by its manner of presentation and its completeness, has the field entirely in Great Britain, and press comments there make it clear that all parties are ready to accept the report scheme with but minor variations. It is clear moreover that the Indian groups outside the Gandhi-Congress camp cannot compose their differences sufficiently to put forward any clear-cut, comprehensive, workable proposals. If Indians come to the conference they will present only factional and incomplete proposals, and the British can easily play on their mutual suspicions and jealousies so as to prevent the formation of a solid Indian front at the conference. That means that the Simon Commission's scheme in substance is what the British expect to put into effect.

Furthermore, the Viceroy, by stating that the government intends to fight the civil-disobedience movement "with all our strength," makes it clear that there will be no representatives of the Congress at the proposed Round Table Conference. The Viceroy and the government apparently hope that this party will surrender before October. If it does not, the Round Table Conference, if it is held, will be on the Indian side only a group of catspaws and beggars. Suppose that the Simon proposals, with minor changes, are adopted by Parliament. The Simon scheme is built on the assumption that a sufficient number of powerful Indian groups will cooperate in making it work. But it is clear that the present movement has stirred Indian nationalism to depths hitherto untouched. If Indian opposition in the past ten years has made the present scheme of government difficult to work, it will be tenfold more difficult from now on. If the Gandhi-Congress party continues with its present tactics after the Simon plan becomes law, the Viceroy and provincial governors will be forced to use the "overriding powers" provided in the Simon scheme, and the government will become completely autocratic and repressive.

Several Indian liberals and moderates have apparently been satisfied by the Viceroy's speech and are now ready to go to a round-table conference. But as they and their friends digest the situation more fully, it seems likely that they may realize not only their own weak position but that the only way to gather strength is by joining Gandhi. As the struggle proceeds, more and more Indians and more and more outsiders seem likely to realize:

1. That the Gandhi-Congress party excels all other Indian groups in initiative, courage, energy, enthusiasm, greatness of purpose, strategy, determination, method, and effective numbers. The fact that the Viceroy deemed it necessary to say in his speech that the government will fight this party "with all our strength" is a tribute to its power.

2. That a fully crystallized scheme of future government need not be formulated by the Congress party at present. Whatever comes must be an organic growth from the circumstances at the time of actual achievement of freedom. It cannot be manufactured in advance. Even though it was not adopted, the Nehru plan was sufficiently good to prove that there is the ability to draft a feasible plan.

3. That if the Gandhi-Congress party achieves success, it will do so only by having welded together a substantial part of all the groups which previously have quarreled among themselves, and hence, at the end of the struggle with Britain, the few remaining party disputes will be easily manageable.

4. That if the Gandhi-Congress party wins, its prestige in India will be so great that it can handle quite easily what little remaining Indian opposition there may be.

5. That organized, mass, non-violent resistance is a method of solving human conflicts which requires very great self-control, cooperation, discipline, and determination. These are not the qualities of disorder and what is known as anarchy. Therefore the substitution of non-violence, courage, and kindness in place of violence and fear as the ultimate basis of the state need have no terrors for timid souls.

6. That under British or any other outside government the communal quarrels will continue, whereas under the proposals and methods of the Gandhi-Congress party substantial unity and working harmony can be attained. The Congress has promised that no scheme of government will be put into effect by it which does not in advance satisfy all Indian communities.

7. That the Simon proposals, even if put into formal effect, are unworkable in the face of a fully aroused, energetic, well-organized, disillusioned, and determined national party such as the one which now exists.

8. That even if Mahatma Gandhi were to die, there are now so many Indians who understand his method and have practiced and become disciplined in it, and the desire for political independence is so widely and deeply felt by all groups in India—even in such an event Great Britain would inevitably lose political control over India.

The months between now and October will test the determination and power of the civil resisters and the effectiveness of their weapon. These months will also indicate how adaptable is the British ruling class.

The Greatest Novels

PROFESSOR LAMONT'S list of the "sixty great novels of all time" is as nearly impeccable as such a list can be. If it omits "Robinson Crusoe" and "Tristram Shandy" it includes "Jennie Gerhardt" and "Of Human Bondage." If one might have spared "The Forsyte Saga" and "Barren Ground" in favor of "Emma" and "The Idiot," if personal preference would have included "All Quiet on the Western Front" instead of "The Case of Sergeant Grischa," these corrections are purely arbitrary and show that such a list can never be final or please everybody. But all the great names are here: there is the omnipresent "Tom Jones," heading the list chronologically, and one suspects meritoriously also. There are the Russians—"War and Peace," the immortal Anna, the Karamazovs; there is the White Whale; there are Hester Prynne and Becky Sharpe and Emma Bovary and Tess, and Huck Finn and Swann and Henry Esmond, and the irresistible Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. A very motley, very gallant company. If they are all in paradise together, as one hopes they may be, paradise must be a splendid place—more splendid, more dashing, more full of pity and terror than the creators of these characters themselves would make if they lived all together behind the pearly gates of heaven.

For it is a strange commentary on the relative realities of fact and fiction that in most cases these brain-children are more alive to us now than ever were their creators. We know more and care more about Tom Jones than we know or care about Mr. Justice Fielding; we follow Hester and Dimmesdale and Chillingworth into realms of the heart which the reticent Hawthorne kept closed to us. Dreiser is a man who issues pronunciamientos on the Communist Party; but Jennie Gerhardt is the woman next door, a poor, suffering, loving, inadequate, aspiring human creature. There should probably be a law that every great novelist be compelled as his best and greatest work to write a full and perfectly truthful autobiography, everything that he has ever thought, felt, said, and done. Then we should have a list of novels that would be memorable indeed. Instead, every novelist, whether great or small, puts some of himself and his own experience into each of his books. Something that he has heard goes into the mouth of this character; something that he has done appears in the actions of that one. The whole can never be assembled because nobody but the author can disentangle himself from the rest, and he prefers not to do it. He is willing to tell secrets about his characters; he prefers in most cases to keep his own secret life inviolate.

But all such captious criticism aside, Professor Lamont's list, if it were read carefully by every young man and woman before attaining the age of twenty-five, would constitute a liberal course in the art of living. Here are men and women facing very human problems, solving them and not solving them, making something or nothing of their lives, breaking or being broken by the forces that are mustered against those who live in this world. Here are love and death, joy and pain, truth and fraud and paganism and piety. Here, in short, is life. Not complete, any more than this list of sixty books is complete. But interesting. That is the final answer to those who criticize the making of such a list.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

IT has always puzzled me that people should complain about heat waves. I like them. Much has been written in prose and song of the glories of the open road. The open pore remains to be celebrated. I have no lyric gift, so all that I can say is that man is generally at his best when in a melting mood. The hot and bothered are, on the whole, a more cheerful lot than the numb and nasty. With all due deference to the Scandinavian, it is the cold which brings out man's baser nature. Little of any moment ever takes place before a blazing log fire or around the oil stove. These are spots where reactionaries hold forth in praise of ancient grudges. Inspiration and idealism depend upon the possession of a brow both warm and moist.

Even the humidity provokes me into thoughts of higher and better things. Most of my mysticism is associated with days and nights called stifling. For when one tosses then he thinks, and there is nothing like sultriness to get a man steamed up about the cosmos. At the end of any day of record-breaking temperature I am somewhat less in bulk than I was before. A part of me has gone back into its basic elements. Some of the outer layers are already in the hands of the button-molder. And yet, though surfaces which once could thrill and suffer are departed, I am essentially the same person. I am still here.

And if this process of diminution could be continued until any one of us was dissipated out of corporeality would he at that moment surrender all personal identity? If you or I can lightly drop 5 pounds and still be Jack or Jill as usual why not 175 or even 240? At what point is one to draw the line with some grave shake of the head and say, "The poor fellow is no more"?

Few of the health hints which I have observed take any account of the necessity of high thinking during torrid weather. There is nothing so potent to chill warm blood as speculation. It will be found, I believe, that all those who were overcome offered nothing to the scorching rays but a hospitable vacuum. Even the sun itself is not capable of tagging a brain which stands poised upon its toes. One should always present to the fierce bright beams a moving target.

In any bulletin of how to live though very nearly stifled there should be the injunction not to read the list of victims in the daily papers nor even the standing headline "'Hot Wave Deals Death." The difference between an eighty-six and a ninety-three is insignificant upon the thermometer no matter how vital it may be upon the golf course. And after the mercury passes one hundred there is no possible point in ascertaining its precise course. Beyond the century mark anything is terrible and so what is the use of bothering as to the exact tabulation. We should be calm and pay no attention to the sun's persuasive press agents. Again and again I have spent delightful days with no thought of suffocating until I picked up the evening paper to read to the length of two columns that I had been "Baked in Deadly Furnace."

To be sure, there are a few simple rules which everybody ought to observe. Naturally no one should get up until after noon. Or go to bed until fanned by the cool breezes which generally rise along about the hour of 4 a. m. Obviously we should all absent ourselves from business places, subways, and main thoroughfares in tropic weather. Few are ever prostrated while sitting comfortably at home in a cool tub reading a good detective story.

Our boasted American efficiency is largely bosh. Many peoples live and breathe and prosper in climates far more punishing than our own. But they organize their lives upon the fact of high temperature. Although summer heat is no novelty in the United States we Americans act as if the thing were wholly unexpected. We do not even dress with any regard for summer conditions. People close to the equator never regard themselves sorely put upon by high temperatures. They accept the circumstance that the sun can be unfriendly in periods of frenzy and adjust their daily routine accordingly. When the sun is at torrid height they remain indoors and nap, all unconscious of the glaring punishment.

The European and the South American are far more efficient than the average American. The foreigner goes to his office only when there is work to be done. With us it is a rite, like attending church on Sunday. Hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers rush downtown on days when they know that nobody is going to turn a hand. They seem to feel that they must report just the same and be at post if only to preserve the franchise. The American business man who idles about his house upon a mean and stuffy day when there is nothing whatsoever to do at the office is called a loafer and a parasite. But if he goes to his office and remains there some portion of the day to twiddle the time away before a barren desk, that person straightway becomes a shining member of the army which has made American industry all-conquering.

But what is the use of working when there's no work to be done? If all the idle executives in New York could be laid end to end they would stretch from Wall Street to the cool coast of Maine, where they could have much more fun.

Physicians who fashion hot-weather hints are almost unanimous in gravely advising that alcohol should be dispensed with absolutely. I wonder whether every one of them would or could actually resist the minted fragrance of something cool and tinkling in a tall glass. To avoid any semblance of a prohibition argument during the present temperatures—it is such activities that bring on prostration—I will admit that alcohol on summer days is frowned upon by doctors and lawmakers alike.

Having granted this, I will point out that men in hot climates have almost invariably turned to the friendly stimulation of Scotch. The white man's burden could never have been carried to the far quarters of the globe without recourse to fizzes and highballs. Undoubtedly all this is bad for the liver. But it is good for the disposition. And on such a day as this I'd give my liver as gladly as Prometheus for just a touch of something icy, spiked, and gurgling.

HEYWOOD BROUN

What Next in Palestine?

By VICTOR S. YARROS

IT is difficult, if not impossible, for an impartial observer in America or Europe to reach firm conclusions regarding the calamitous Arab-Jewish conflict still raging in Palestine. The report of the Shaw commission in Great Britain put the immediate blame for the outbreaks upon the Arabs but absolved the Arab leaders as a body of deliberate incitement. It met the charge that the Palestine government was weak by pointing to "the difficulties inherent in the mandate." It cited as the underlying cause of the outbreaks the fear on the part of the Arabs that wholesale Jewish immigration and land purchase might create a situation in which the Arabs would be landless paupers under Jewish political domination. On the other hand, it is rumored that the report of the Mandates Commission, which has not yet been published, lays the burden of responsibility upon the British, and that it particularly blames the British for failing to assure adequate means of maintaining order.

But a recent visit to Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa, and other Palestinian communities and settlements, old and new, has given the writer of these lines some insight into a grave and tragic situation that he would like to share with other friends of justice and liberalism. Almost every person in Palestine has his own positive opinion concerning the burning question—What next? Such opinions fall naturally into three distinct categories: the violent and hate-ridden, the moderate, and the gloomy and pessimistic.

There are intelligent, vigorous Jews in Palestine who hold the British administration responsible for the riots of last August, for the present feeling of insecurity, and for the bitter Arab opposition to the policy of the Balfour Declaration—as generally interpreted. There are Jews in business and in the professions who say that Britain has been weak, vacillating, tricky, and stupid in her administration of Palestine under the mandate of the League of Nations, and that if she surrendered the mandate, retired from Palestine, and transferred power to a native agency, none of the predicted disorders would come to pass.

On the other hand, there are Jews in the settlements that have known danger and fear who say that Great Britain will be needed in Palestine during the next five or six decades, that the Jews would be massacred by the Arabs if British bayonets and police clubs did not overawe and subdue the bitter and embattled elements of the Arab population, and that all talk about autonomy and national self-government is doctrinaire and premature.

Between these extremes stands Dr. J. L. Magnes, the scholarly, high-minded, gentle chancellor of the Hebrew University at Jerusalem. His views and recommendations, as outlined in candid conversations as well as in a brochure written and recently published by him entirely on his own responsibility, seem to me sane, reasonable, and eminently practical. He seems to have few followers, it is true, outside the university faculty and student body. He is loved and admired as a man and an educator, but he is called an idealist and a visionary. It is asserted by many that he is far too generous in his estimate of Arab character and Arab temperament, and that he credits the Arabs with fine qualities which they do not possess. This too hopeful estimate, it is said, renders his program utopian; but if there is any alternative program of merit or promise, I was unable to discover it in Palestine.

Dr. Magnes believes the situation demands a candid reinterpretation of the Balfour Declaration. Whether or not that ambiguous declaration has been misconstrued, and if so, by whom, is not a question of moment at this critical juncture. The important thing, in Dr. Magnes's judgment, is to remove misunderstanding and sources of angry contention by saying plainly what the declaration really means. What does it mean—or, rather, what can it mean?

There are about 650,000 Arabs and Christians in Palestine. In establishing a national home for the Jewish people in Palestine the Balfour Declaration stipulated that nothing should be done to prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities. Certain Arab leaders contend that the objective of a Jewish national homeland is per se incompatible with the rights and aspirations of their people. Some Christians take the same position. But is there in fact no room for a large Jewish population in Palestine? This, manifestly, is a crucial question. Were the answer negative, Zionism would be an impossibility. But the answer, say the Jews, is affirmative, according to scientific inquiries conducted under independent auspices, including the British administration. Palestine, politically limited as it is, could accommodate between 3,000,000 and 3,500,000 people, agriculture remaining its principal industry. The present population is only about 900,000; hence it follows that there is room in Palestine for considerably over 2,000,000 immigrants. These immigrants will not come from Arabia and they will not be Mohammedans. They will come mainly from Europe and America, and they will be of the Jewish race.

Should they be permitted to come? If not, why not? By what right, by what principle of justice or equity, can they be excluded? A sovereign Arab state, the present mood being what it is, would undoubtedly take steps to suspend or limit with extreme rigor further Jewish immigration; but ten or twenty years hence even an Arab state might recognize the enormous economic and cultural benefits inherent in Jewish immigration, if wisely controlled and accompanied by adequate capital and modern technical equipment. However, there is no possibility of a sovereign Arab state in Palestine in the near future. A Palestinian state, if and when created, will be a binational state under the protection and control of Great Britain or the League of Nations.

This, Dr. Magnes holds, is what a proper reinterpretation of the Balfour Declaration would signify and announce to the world. There is no likelihood of an Arab state or of a Jewish state. The goal to strive for is a state based on and dedicated to the principle of equal rights, mutual tolerance, justice, and good-will. In other words, Palestine will be at once a Jewish, a Christian, and an Arab homeland.

But in the meantime how can peace and cooperation be restored? Clearly, force and the threat of force will not do that. Dr. Magnes's ideas and practical suggestion in this connection are exceedingly interesting and thought-provoking. Here is their essence: Let Great Britain, after consultation with racial and national leaders, establish a legislative assembly in Palestine. Let the regime be genuinely democratic. The assembly may be unicameral or bicameral—that is a detail not now pressing. Let the people of Palestine govern themselves through their representatives, and let all domestic questions be settled after discussion and investigation, as in other republican and democratic commonwealths.

But three fundamental questions must be "reserved" by Great Britain, the mandatory and umpire, or taken out of the purview and jurisdiction of the Palestine legislature or the local electorate. These three questions are immigration, settlement on the land, and freedom to restore Hebrew culture and develop Hebrew genius. If the Arab majority will accept these restrictions—and there is no reason why it should not, once prejudice and suspicion are thrust aside—the spirit and substance of the Balfour Declaration, as of Zionism, will have been preserved and made secure, in Dr. Magnes's opinion. Those who are not prepared to indorse this program might well ponder and answer these remarks:

> If I could know that in the course of a long period a Jewish community of one million souls, one-third of the potential population, was possible in Palestine, I should be well content. Let the colonizers and the students of vital statistics tell us how long a period it will take for Arabs to become 2,000,000 and for Jews to become 1,000,000. Surely, much longer than a full generation. Why not, therefore, let us try to work out a program for a generation, and let the succeeding generation take care of its own problems?

Will the program of Dr. Magnes as a whole appeal to the Arabs? That will depend largely on the way in which the settlement of hundreds of thousands of additional Jewish immigrants is conceived and carried out. Land must be purchased, of course, and fair prices must be paid, but the agricultural and social conditions existing in Palestine are peculiar, and certain mistakes must be avoided in dealing with Arab proprietors. The fellaheen must not be dispossessed. If the rich absentee landowners continue to sell land to the Jews, despite the present theoretical boycott of such "traitors" by the intense nationalists, care must be taken effectively to safeguard the meager claims of the Arab laborers. In no circumstances must these be allowed to suffer. Moreover, it is better to reclaim land now worthless than to purchase land already under cultivation; for reclamation offers the Arab the most striking object-lesson in the benefits of Jewish immigration, and it makes directly for prosperity—at least under normal conditions when there is effective demand at fair prices for Palestinian products.

With immigration and settlement on the land assured to the Jews, the Arabs would place no obstacle in the way of the promotion of Hebrew culture and the gradual revival of the Hebrew language. Intellectual and spiritual competition is tonic and wholesome. In the Jewish public schools, in the Hebrew University, through the libraries and clubs, in the modest homes of idealistic colonists, Hebrew is beginning to permeate life and to influence thought and sentiment. The intelligent Arabs see nothing alarming in these developments. Some of them, indeed, have cooperated heartily with the Hebrew University and its faculty. They have donated books and valuable manuscripts to the library. They have welcomed the interesting and scholarly project of a concordance of Arab poetry. Arabs are consulting the material for the concordance already available in the library.

After all, as has been pointed out, Palestine cannot mean as much to the Arab as to the Zionist Jew. The Arab has Syria, Iraq, the Nejd, the Hejaz. The Zionist has nothing save Palestine. If he can convert it into a creative source, a constant inspiration, a center of spiritual activity, Asia will be the richer for it and the more significant to the world of today. Palestine to the Zionists is still an experiment. As I have intimated, there are disheartened Jews in that country who frankly anticipate the failure of the experiment. They do not trust British statesmen and politicians. They are not sure that the 160,000 Jews already in Palestine will receive adequate protection. They think that the British administration in Palestine is anti-Semitic, and they assert that the Arabs are convinced of that fact and are led by it to adopt an attitude of bitter hostility toward Zionism. But to an impartial observer the failure of the experiment does not seem either inevitable or even probable.

A firm but just position on the part of the British administration, an educational campaign in the press, open and sincere disclaimers of any design to expropriate or dispossess the Arab peasant, strictly and scientifically controlled Jewish immigration, the continued introduction of modern machinery, tools, and methods by the Jewish colonists, the extension of all medical and hygienic services to the Arabs, the improvement of living standards and the upward trend in wages—these things cannot fail in time to undermine and dispel groundless Arab prejudices and fear and to effect a rapprochement between the races now poisoned by mutual antipathy. After all, the Arabs and Jews have lived together in amity for many centuries. There is no reason in the nature of things why the same amicable relations should not continue in spite of the Balfour Declaration. The danger lies in fanaticism, in impossible demands from either side, in the deliberate and systematic sowing of the seeds of envy, jealousy, malice, and antipathy by the irreconcilables.

One thing is clear—no nation and no government can "give" Palestine to the Jews. That land is not on the auction block. Those who are there cannot be overridden and defied, and whatever is done in the future in line with the Balfour Declaration will ultimately have to be done with the real consent of the majority. To conclude with another quotation from Dr. Magnes's pamphlet:

> The Jew may have to be prepared to face for a further period the hostility of a section of Arabs and of English and others. Provided our own attitude is just and fair we should face that opposition and not abandon the struggle. Our goal must be to have our enterprise rest upon the conviction of all concerned that it is right and just.
>
> Palestine is holy to the Jew in that his attitude toward this land is necessarily different from his attitude toward any other land. He may have to live in other lands upon the support of bayonets, but that may well be something which he, as a Jew, cannot help. But when he goes voluntarily as a Jew to repeople his own Jewish homeland, it is by an act of will, of faith, of free choice, and he should not either will or believe in or want a Jewish home that can be maintained in the long run only against the violent opposition of the Arab and Moslem peoples.

Huston Stays On

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, July 21

"CLAUDIUS has a lot to learn about stud poker, but he knows where the body is buried all right." So runs the generally accepted explanation hereabouts of the Administration's ignominious failure to remove Old Man of the Sea Huston from the neck of the Republican National Committee. Day after day the word went out from the White House that Claudius would soon be only a painful memory. Brave Will Wood, chairman of the House campaign committee, announced that "every Republican member of the House wants him out." Treasurer Nutt thundered, and Jimmie Burke whispered, and such redoubtable party characters as Maurice Maschke of Ohio and Matt Chilton of Kentucky closed in for the killing. When the doors opened and the smoke lifted there sat good old Claudius, his thin lips parted in a half-smile, his skin like parchment, and his starched collar immaculate, in the midst of a circle of dripping brows and limp linen suits, and he was still National Chairman. The most that can be had in the way of explanation is that he "knows where the body is buried." As to what body it is and who buried it there is some difference of opinion, but most of the guesses are immediately concerned with the methods employed to arouse religious prejudice against Al Smith in the last Presidential campaign and the sources from which those efforts were financed. Because of Huston's established success in obtaining lobby contributions from power companies seeking possession of Muscle Shoals, there is a natural tendency to wonder whether he obtained political contributions from similar sources. To hold on as he has under all the pressure to which he has been subjected, he must have valuable knowledge of some kind. Few competent observers believe that it relates to stud poker or the stock market.

* * * * *

NOT all is moonlight and roses for the power trust. That devoted friend of the Electric Bond and Share, Lieutenant General Edgar Jadwin, chosen by his brother engineer in the White House to head the new Federal Power Commission, has suddenly become the recipient of a "private offer" so attractive that he feels compelled to decline the proffered chairmanship. In view of the celebrated efficiency of the Presidential secretariat, containing, as it does, one former detective, one former reporter, and one former Congressman, it is a little surprising that the General's name was announced before it was definitely ascertained that he would accept. Can it be possible that he did accept and then changed his mind? It is possible. It is even possible that he was induced to change it after that thoroughly hard-boiled customer, Senator Couzens, to whom his name had been submitted in advance, served notice that in view of Jadwin's power record, and in view of somebody's failure to mention the same when consulting Couzens on the subject, he would oppose his confirmation by the Senate. Poor Herbert! This job of finding men for the Power Commission whose records are definite enough to satisfy the power magnates and yet so obscure that Senators and newspaper reporters cannot discover them is not an easy one. If extremity comes and he decides to name a set of commissioners whose records are definitely favorable to the public, he might look at the record of the Massachusetts Commission.

* * * * *

RIGHT now, however, the problem which is most disquieting to the Great Sufferer in the White House is concerned with the condition of the wheat market and the Farm Board's efforts to alleviate it. Rather, to be more exact, it is concerned with the potential political consequences arising from that condition and those efforts. A bumper crop, the lowest price in sixteen years, and the Farm Board holding, at a cost of $1,000,000 a month, 60,000,000 bushels of last year's crop, none of which it can sell without further breaking an already broken market! This is the harvest of the Hoover farm act, handed to the House, passed by it without the changing of a comma, and forced through a rebellious Senate which wanted the debenture plan. But the White House correspondents no longer are treated to any mention of "the Administration's program," or "the President's Farm Board." Now it is impressed on them that the farm act was the work of Congress, and that the board is "simply carying out the policies laid down by Congress." In other words, the original savior of agriculture and author of the Administration's farm-relief policies washes his hands of the program which he devised and of the board which he appointed. Well, what did you expect?

* * * * *

THE best-laid plans of mice and men often fail in politics as elsewhere. But there was an uncomfortable period of a few days when it seemed that success might attend the miserable political trick through which certain rodents in Nebraska sought to deprive this nation of its most devoted public servant. If Senator George W. Norris had been compelled to run for reelection as an independent candidate he might still have won, but only after a terrific battle against heavy odds. The risk, happily averted through the prompt action of the Nebraska Supreme Court, was created when an obscure grocery clerk named George W. Norris was mysteriously inspired at the last minute to file against him for the Republican nomination, and when Secretary of State Frank Marsh, a political enemy of Senator Norris, ruled, contrary to the opinion of the Attorney General of the State, that Grocer Norris's papers were received in proper order and that the law prohibits any designation on the ballot that would enable the voters to know which Norris they were voting for. That malice could be carried to such grotesque lengths seems almost incredible, for under the Secretary of State's ruling the election officials charged with the duty of counting the votes would not know which candidate to credit them to. And if they were so counted that one Norris received a clear majority of the votes, no living soul would know which Norris had won! Of course, what would have happened is that the vote intended for Senator Norris would have been divided between the two names, thus enabling his real opponent to win. His real opponent is W. B. Stebbins, the State Treasurer. I have heard no intimation that Stebbins is suspected of complicity. Apparently he was a mere incident in what was obviously an attempt to get Senator Norris out of the Senate at any cost. * * * * *

THE history of Grocer Norris and the circumstances under which he became a candidate are sufficient to dispel any thought that he might have aspired to the Senate. Thirty-two years old, he arrived in the town of Broken Bow about a year ago and became manager of a chain grocery store. To the community at large his presence remained virtually unknown. He joined the local post of the American Legion but took little part in its activities. With one exception he did not participate in public affairs. The exception, in view of recent events, may be significant. It concerned a campaign conducted by the local power company for a renewal of its franchise. In that campaign, which was unsuccessful, Grocer Norris exerted the whole of his modest influence in behalf of the power company. Such was his political background. July 3 was the final date fixed by law on which candidates could file for the Republican primary. On July 1 Grocer Norris quit his job. On July 2 he gave to a friend in the post office a stamped envelope containing his filing papers and the required fee of $50, with instructions not to mail it until the last train had departed. That night he disappeared with his wife and two children, and thus far all efforts to locate him have failed. Facts that might throw light on the matter are meager. An attorney for the Nebraska Power Company visited Broken Bow a few days earlier. Grocer Norris's wife is reported to have told acquaintances that the family was going on a three years' vacation. In the legal proceedings arising from his candidacy the absent candidate has been represented by distinguished counsel.

The Press Today

IX. The Opportunity in the Small City*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE Canton, Ohio, Daily News is no more. On July 3 James M. Cox, former Governor of Ohio, and owner of the Daily News, announced that its career of ninety-seven years had come to an end, that its real estate, plant, and other assets had been sold to the Canton Repository, which is owned by the Brush-Moore syndicate. "Canton," Mr. Cox announced, "is not big enough to support two modernly conducted newspaper plants . . . there is not a sufficient net return on the capital invested nor the labor and management involved." So another historic daily passes, and inexorable economic forces which are steadily decreasing the number of dailies in the United States have scored another success.

There are, however, other reasons why the announcement of the demise of this daily will be read with deep regret. The Canton News was the paper whose editor, Don R. Mellett, was assassinated on July 15, 1926, by, or by order of, the corrupt public officials whose misconduct he had exposed and denounced. For his murder the chief of police was convicted, only, I believe, to have the sentence subsequently set aside. After his death the Pulitzer prize was awarded to the Canton News for its gallantry and courage in attacking the alliance of officialdom with vice and crime.

This excellent fight with its tragic ending was widely heralded by journalists throughout the country as proof that the entire profession had not yet succumbed to the capitalistic influences which are so profoundly changing it day by day—and the contention was just. It was the kind of fight newspapers ought to be making; it was in accord with the best of the old traditions; it showed that dailies can still exert a profound influence in their communities if their editors are willing to make every sacrifice and are free to state the truth as they see it. Yet the Canton News is done to death just four years after the murder of Don Mellett, not by its enemies, not by the organized power of political corruption, but by its owner himself, as he frankly says, because of the "tendency toward large operating entities, a tendency obviously promoted if not rendered necessary by economic trends." What the gang could not accomplish, the drift toward combinations has achieved. Many active journalists may yet live to see only one morning and one evening newspaper, or just one daily, in all but the largest of our cities.

Melancholy as the fate of the Canton News is, it does not negative my long-held belief that the best opportunities for the rising journalist today, especially for him whose blood is infected with the virus of the reformer, lie in the small towns and cities. Dozens of aspirants come to me each year, as to every other metropolitan journalist, for aid in getting on a New York City daily. Mostly they are novices; but often they are men who have had provincial experience, who have for years dreamed of a job in New York, and are worthy craftsmen. It is hard to make them understand that the offices of the remaining New York dailies are flooded with applicants; that with the disappearance of the great editors one must be a columnist, or a feature writer, or a sports editor to make a quick reputation, and even these opportunities are extraordinarily limited; that the chance of running or controlling a big city daily is now practically nil unless there is inherited opportunity or very great wealth. So I, for one, urge the applicant to settle in the large towns that are becoming cities, in the many cities that have achieved or are achieving their first 100,000 of population. There one can still be a personal and editorial force; there one can still know the leaders of the entire community and be known by them and can profoundly influence the development of things, provided, of course, there happen to be liberal owners, or owners of sufficiently broad gauge to give their editors a free hand.

* This is the ninth of a series of articles on The Press Today. The tenth, on the German press, will appear in our issue of August 20.—EDITOR THE NATION.

That there still are such owners appears from a letter from W. T. Anderson, owner of the Macon, Georgia, News and Telegraph. It bears the date of June 10 last, which was just after Mr. Anderson had purchased the News. It is addressed to Ben B. Johnston:

> You are hereby appointed managing editor of the Macon Evening News, effective from this date. Your duties will consist of seeing to it that the News is made the best afternoon newspaper it is possible to make it, exigencies considered. You will be expected to write the editorials according to your own views and reactions to public questions. We must bear in mind that there is a substantial element in Macon that have opinions that differ from those of the Telegraph, and while I don't want to suggest what argument you shall offer or side you shall espouse, leaving that to your intelligence and your conscience, I shall have no criticism of or quarrel with you if at any time you are found opposing the views of the Telegraph.

He added among other good things: "I hope you agree with my idea that publishing a newspaper is a trusteeship and will treat it as such." I cannot see how these instructions from an owner to an editor could be improved upon.

As for instances of the service a free paper can render in a small city or town, there are any number of them. There was the case of the Indianapolis Times, a Scripps-Howard daily, which under the editorship of Boyd Gurley saw its circulation decrease by 25,000 overnight because it dared to join Thomas H. Adams, then editor of the Vincennes Courier, in declaring that the State of Indiana, from the governorship down, should not be run by crooks and grafters. Together these men made a glorious fight. Such as these, and Don Mellett, do not build up Saturday Evening Posts nor Philadelphia Inquirers nor Chicago Tribunes. They do not line their pockets with millions with which to endow a college here, a music school there, or an unnecessary school of journalism elsewhere. But they win, these small-town crusaders, the enduring satisfactions of life, beside which material success is as nothing. Theirs is the true glory of journalism.

Nor does this apply only to the crusading spirits that I have cited. There is William Allen White. What need to point out the service he has rendered to his small town and his big State? He is a national asset, if the country has one. Because he stayed in Emporia and refused to accept any of the many high-salaried positions in New York which have been offered to him, he has become the most outstanding figure in journalism west of the Mississippi River. He alone would demonstrate my case. But there are many others, though less conspicuous. I need hardly state again, as I have so often, my admiration for the splendid group of Southern editors who are fighting the battle for justice and fair play and progress in the South. There could be no better examples than are to be found there of the patriotic service a small-town editor can render. It will be a sorry day indeed for the whole country when the same economic forces which are making over and decreasing the Northern press begin to affect the Southern section. But even in passing one should recall the years of admirable journalism of the Gonzales brothers who made the Columbia, South Carolina, State an ornament of the profession. W. E. Gonzales is still carrying on the tradition. In other sections, too, there are brave men who stand out. The late Warren Worth Bailey of the Johnstown, Pennsylvania, Democrat for years carried on the work of steadily enlightening his community upon economic and political issues, and the paper continues in the family's hands. Mr. Bailey would have been absolutely at a loss in a large city; as it was, he was held in honor at home and even represented in Congress for too brief a period the hidebound Republican district in which he labored, although he was a Democrat, a tariff reformer, and a single-taxer. Then there is a man in Akron, Ohio, who has also been in Congress, C. L. Knight, owner of the Beacon Journal with a circulation of 57,581. A bit erratic he seems, but what does that matter? The point is that he is free to say what he thinks, that he is outspoken and fearless, and that he is molding public opinion in a small city which under his leadership and that of others is rapidly growing into a large one.

In many States there are outstanding newspapers like the Springfield, Massachusetts, Republican, the Des Moines Tribune-Register, the Newark Evening News, to cite only three, which merit universal commendation for their day-by-day scrutiny of courthouses, city halls, and legislatures. Their steady searchlights of publicity stop much corruption and disorder at the source. When I contemplate such as these I must admit a considerable measure of truth in a criticism of this series of articles which a small-city editor sends me:

> New York papers attract the greatest attention from critics like yourself. I suppose that is logical and inevitable. Yet the real leadership is in the so-called country newspapers—those in the provinces. They are really more necessary to the public than those in the metropolis and they do more real ground-work. I believe that the kind of newspaper that I work for, which handles foreign stuff, has a fairly good Washington service, and lives up to the responsibility and drudgery of giving vigilant publicity to the things in town, city, and State which promote honest government, is the most worth-while and effective daily we have.

Undoubtedly there are virility and devotion to the public welfare in such dailies as these. Yet I often wish that they could have still greater passion for our civil liberties and the old-fashioned American ideals and could be freer still from local business influences. I wish that the Newark News, for example, would blaze with indignation and make a major crusade against the denial of free speech in its city by its lawless police and their refusal to grant to unpopular minorities the legitimate exercise of their constitutional rights. Too often newspapers of this type represent the old kind of watch-dog activity which is not always suited to our newest problems, which too often lacks a liberal point of view and an understanding of what is facing the American people. It generally fails to ally with that day-by-day scrutiny of our public officials a clear-cut, fearless, aggressive leadership and a knowledge of what it is all about in this modern world of ours. It is surely obvious that there has been a dreadful lot of corruption and crookedness in all our cities despite the vigilance and the searchlights of which my editor friend writes me. Obviously, if there had been more of the Mellett crusading spirit State and local governments everywhere would be a good deal better. It is precisely this fact that renders the opportunity so tempting for liberals who seek to make their influence felt through journalism.

The clearest illustration of just what I have in mind is afforded by the Portland, Maine, Evening News, to which the Pulitzer prize committee gave honorable mention this last spring for its admirable fight to prevent the export of power from that State. The Evening News was founded late in 1927 by a small group of citizens, not men of great wealth, but persons actuated by the desire to break the press monopoly in Portland of the Guy P. Gannett newspapers and to have an independent and liberal daily. They have meticulously held to this program. They have left the editor wholly free to run the paper as his conscience dictates, and they have even allowed him to advocate policies with which they disagreed. They have seen their policy bear fruit in the steady rise of the circulation from nothing to 10,869 by September 30, 1928, to 18,179 in March, 1930. Their paper is selling over 21,000 copies in July, 1930, or within 3,000 of its long-established evening competitor, the Portland Express. This is a very considerable achievement indeed; it has naturally not been brought to pass without financial sacrifice. Yet it seems as if financial success could not be long delayed; month by month the paper gains in circulation and advertising. In less than three years it has firmly established itself in a community which is anything but receptive to what is new.

For this the credit belongs in large measure to Dr. Ernest Gruening, the editor, formerly managing editor of the Boston Traveller, the New York Tribune, and The Nation. Dr. Gruening saw the opportunity and yielded his natural inclination to continue in the field of authorship and in metropolitan life to the chance to drive an entering wedge into a situation in which the press and big business have gone hand in hand in dominating the State. Mr. Gannett, who now owns one morning and one evening newspaper and the Sunday paper in Portland, besides the Waterville Sentinel and the Augusta Kennebec Journal, has not only been closely allied with the great power and banking interests of the State, but has actually spoken in his newspapers as if they were the direct representatives of Samuel Insull. More than that, having been for years national committeeman, as his wife is now national Republican committeewoman, he represents the liaison between the press, business, and politics. The monopoly which his newspapers achieved, especially in Portland, led to serious bias in their handling of news, to tendentious political reporting, and to suppression and distortion—in all of which respects, by the way, his newspapers have improved since the advent of the Evening News into the Portland field, undoubtedly because the News has had courage at times to expose their mishandling of news. Thus all the three Gannett newspapers carefully suppressed the news that certain Continental Oil Company bonds had been traced to the Republican National Committee, a most important and sensational event in the oil scandal. It was a first-page story in the New York Times, Herald Tribune, the Philadelphia Inquirer, and other papers. Not one line of this appeared in the Portland Press Herald or Express. Even last year news of a series of deaths of workers on the Bingham dam, the great hydroelectric development on the Kennebec River, was suppressed by the Gannett newspapers.

But the achievement for which the Pulitzer committee commended the News, although it felt that it could not award it the prize, was the rousing of the State to voting down on September 9, 1929, by a majority of 8,000 votes, a referendum which would have permitted the regular export out of Maine of hydroelectric power. The Gannett press fought hard for the referendum, which would have wiped the Fernald law of 1909 preventing such export off the statute books, although it had previously taken the opposite position—the editor of the Press Herald had himself for years been an outspoken defender of this law. With Mr. Gannett stood Mr. Walter Wyman, Insull's right-hand man in Maine, president of the Cumberland County Light and Power Company and the Central Maine Power Company. The Gannett press received a lion's share of the power companies' advertising in connection with the campaign and the job-printing office of Mr. Gannett's Kennebec Journal printed hundreds of thousands of pamphlets and posters which were sent all over the State; indeed, in the last days of the campaign thousands of free copies of the Gannett papers were distributed by the companies. It seemed utterly ridiculous for a new daily in Portland to attempt to combat the solid industrial and financial alignment in the State which favored the referendum. Alone among the newspapers of the State the Evening News fought the export proposal, and for two and one-half years has carried on its campaign of education as to the power issue in State and nation. It was David and Goliath over again, and David won to the astonishment of all who followed the fight.

This was the more remarkable because many of the forces of big business have been arrayed against the News since its appearance. It has been boycotted by most of the department stores and by the largest banking interests in Maine—those dominated, by the way, by the all-powerful Messrs. Wyman and Gannett. It has faced opposition enough to daunt most men and to discourage the backers who have given a free hand to its courageous editor. But the News goes steadily on. It intrenches itself upon principles rather than advocacy of men. It has fought a glorious fight against the dreadful intolerance, bigotry, and standpattism which have made Maine politics a mess of all but hopeless stupidity and gravely checked the social and moral development of the State. It has sounded a new note in Maine on questions involving international relations and civil liberties.

What has been done in Maine in this thrilling fight can be done elsewhere; what Dr. Gruening by his ability and courage has achieved in stirring the whole political life of Maine should and can be done in many another State. Here lies, I repeat, the great opportunity in the immediate future for men who yearn to strike hard blows at the domination of our national life by those big-business interests whose servants most of the politicians are. As our economic system weakens more and more under the unnatural burdens placed upon it, the opportunities for this kind of journalism will in my judgment rapidly increase. And not only in the cities. As I write there comes to me the following note:

> You wouldn't have any use for an exchange for a country weekly, the C———, would you? I can say that if I manage to survive—I am just beginning—the C——— will have an interesting tale to relate of the transformation of this community into one whose banking and business in general will be done cooperatively. That is why I bought the paper—namely, to use it in effecting such a transformation. I'll either win or go under.

It is another sign of the times. There are plenty of others. Let those who need take notice.

Papa Droissart

By A. G. BARNETT

FOR two years I superintended mining works in Surinam, Dutch Guiana, with headquarters at Moengo Hill on the Cottica River. This is a region always infested with escaped convicts from the adjoining French penal colony. My friend Droissart was one of these. The gaunt refugees would float to Moengo camp on makeshift rafts or come staggering over trails cut through the jungle by our geologists. From this constant flow of human refuse we salvaged the strongest, prodding the unfit away—to die elsewhere. All were in the same boat. World-outlaws, they could never return to France or legally enter any other country. Those who found precarious respite at the mine might endure hard labor and the malignant climate for five or six years; those who gallantly set out for distant goals must always move on and on toward nowhere.

Edmond Droissart was one of a philosophic few who elected to remain permanently at Moengo and make the best of it. There was something uncannily compelling in the man, which I hope to be able to bring out in relating what I know about him. He was a little, almost burnt-out cinder of humanity. Seventy-five years of buffetings had reduced him to a rickety skeleton, with a parched and wrinkled hide, a few gray hairs, and two sparkling eyes. His mind was clear and quick as summer lightning.

The morning of his arrival he lay wide awake on the verandah of the superintendent's house. He was worn out, sopping wet, and shivering with fever. Four similar derelicts slept noisily beside him. Rain, roaring like a cataract, flailed the surrounding jungle. The five newcomers had reached Moengo during the night.

Henry, the nervous cook-boy, was the first to see them.

"Eh-ek! eh-ek! eh-ek!" he screamed; "Who you? Who you?"

"Fear not, lil black jumping-jack," soothed the old man. "W'en your master 'as 'ad breakfas' per'aps 'e will speak wit' us."

Strong backs were needed just then to throw up a dyke, and when the doctor had pronounced the four younger Frenchmen physically fit to push spades, they were signed on as workmen. But Droissart proved to be full of undesirable germs and was too weak for the regular labor gangs.

"No, old man, nothing doing," the superintendent told him. "I reckon you gotta push on down-river."

"I spik English pretty goot," the Frenchman countered; "an' I mek all kin' of t'ings you want. You want chair, I mek it; you want sofa, I mek you goot one; you want picture of dis camp, I paint him; you want sculpture of yourself, dat too I mek. Ev-re-t'ing I mek. I surprise you. Mais oui, mes camarades will gif me food."

The very next morning Droissart hobbled over to see the superintendent with a bundle wrapped in old newspapers.

"For you," he announced. "One lil gif'."

The superintendent shook out two hunting horns beautifully decorated with carved wild beasts, huntsmen, and dogs. The old rip had chipped away all night long.

"Well I'll be doggoned!" exclaimed the superintendent. "You make these? Honest? Now whadda you know about that?" He blew a long blast.

"Great day! That sure would bring all the coon dogs in four counties a-running, if we were up in ol' No'th Ca'lina. B'lieve I need a sofy, come to think about it. Sit down; I'll show you how I want it fixed. Oh, Henre-e-e-e! Go fetch a week's rations for Papa Droissart."

The old eyes snapped as Droissart took up his basket of rations and turned to go.

"I surprise all right, eh?" he exulted.

In a short time the sofa was produced. The full length of it was caned with strips of finely split "bush rope." The woodwork was painted pea green. There was a comfortable roll to the head part.

"How'd you get those legs curved like that?"

"Oh, I mek me one lil fine saw for do dat."

"What did you make it out of?"

"Oh, I fin' me one hoop from ol' barrel, an' cut out thin piece, an' file lil teeth in 'im. Not cut too good, dough. Mos' one night I work on jus' dem leg."

"Don't you ever sleep?"

"Sometime, yes, I sleep. Forty wink. Mos' time jus' smoke two, t'ree cigarette an' res' lil while. Dat jus' so goot like sleep w'en ol' brain go roun', roun', roun', t'ink, t'ink, t'ink, t'ink, all time, anyhow."

"Well, that's a nifty sofy, all right," said the superintendent. "And now I'm going to give you a steady job. You gotta keep the grounds cleaned up, see? Everything always neat. And keep that blue barrel up on those posts full of water. That's my shower bath, see?"

Immediately the landscape began to improve. Droissart carted away the loose stones and roots and laid out pathways and planted beds of roses. He constructed rustic seats around tree trunks, and built a thatched pergola where visitors could sit in the shade and watch the mining operations. Boulevard des Alliés, he named a trellised lane he laid out between the bachelors' bunkhouse and the office. And the shower reservoir was unfailingly filled to overflowing twice a day. He made a little tin windmill and painted it red. Barand helped him plant a sixty-foot pole with the windmill atop it.

"What's that for?" inquired the superintendent.

"Oh, jus' for fun," the old man replied. "Ah . . . dat lil play mash-ine will buz-z-z-z more longer dan dis ol' mash-ine you call Papa Droissart."

Often we would see him standing motionless, staring up at the little red buzzer as it spun and twisted. Simple-minded Henry reported that Papa lay in the pergola all one Sunday morning praying to the windmill.

The superintendent got into the habit of stopping to talk:

"They tell me you were a kid officer along with Joffre back in 1870; that so?"

"Dey talk too much, no? But yes, dat is true."

"Who's goin' to win this war?"

"France. The Allies."

"Yeah? But say, who's goin' to keep the Kaiser from marching right on, now, to Paris?"

"Ha! Papa Joffre."

"How'd they come to send you to Cayenne?"

"Oh . . . wickedness."

"Eh? How's that?"

"Wickedness: wine, women, lying, cheating, always meking trouble. I t'ink I love wickedness.

"Ever read Hugo, Victor Hugo?"

"Mon Dieu, oui; I 'ave read ev-re-t'ing. Too many book 'ave I read."

"That sofa you made me is sure tiptop. Best I ever napped on. How'd you come to think of making a scroll saw out of a barrel hoop?"

"Oh, if I need somet'ing always I mek it. Ha! Firs' time I go to Senegal dose native dey will not trade me boat to go 'way. Dey no want blanket, shirt, boot. Dey say money—not'ing else. So I re-main two, t'ree day in dat nigger town; pick up all de ol' tin can; melt out de solder; an' mek me plenty nice money for buy one fine boat. Oh, I am one ver' bad ol' man. Là, là, là, là!"

When word came that the United States had got into the World War the déportés at Moengo took the day off. There were sixty of them; and they drank wine and sang songs and paraded, and ultimately took to chasing the black Dutchmen from end to end of the camp clearing because these unenlightened fellows persisted in remaining neutral. At this celebration Droissart became appropriately intoxicated. He leaned against his windmill pole and saluted.

"France 'ave cas' me out," he declaimed. "Today I cas' out France. Today I tek my stan' un'er de Stars an' Stripe. Vive l'Amérique! Vive le Président Weelson! Vive Tetty Rose-felt! . . . Voilà. I am one American!"

Soon after this demonstration the old man began to slip. For longer and more frequent periods he would sit idle in the shade of the pergola, resting. And one morning, after rising early and preparing coffee for his mates, he flopped back into his hammock; and there he stayed. We packed him off to our infirmary, but he sneaked out and returned to his corner of the loggia.

"Dat 'ospital is like prison. Too many year 'ave I spen' in prison. I stay 'ere, eh? My fr'en will 'elp me."

But finally we carried him out and shipped him off to the Catholic hospital in Paramaribo. There the sisters worked over him for a month or so. The whole camp was anxious about his condition.

"Miste' Sup'tendent Ah only inte'cede to make inquiry how is po' Papa Drawsa't?" inquired a corpulent black washerwoman.

"Oh, he's comin' along fine, I hear."

"That is good news, sir. Papa is a noble ol' gentleman. Three nights togethe', sir, he set up with my younges' whilst she was drawin' her firs' teeth; an' not a drop o' sleep he took, sir. Ah thank the Heavenly Fathe', sir."

"Ach yess, how goes it yet wit' Boppa?" inquired Nelius, the Dutch timber clerk.

Even the naked bush Negroes dropped in to talk about the gentle old man.

About the end of June he came back to Moengo, looking fine—for him. He had taken thymol for his hookworms and quinine prophylactic treatment for his fever bugs. He was in fettle all that day, greeting his friends and joking and visiting. "Tomorrow I go to work!"

"Looky here, Papa; see what's goin' to be your next job?" called the superintendent. "See that new shack yonder alongside the dynamite house? Well, that's your private office. You're powder boss, see? You gotta keep track of the amount of powder in stock, and 'tend to issuing it to the foremen. That bench there is where you can work at your other trades when you're not dishin' out dynamite. You got a tight roof there, le' me tell you, and a plank floor. And, looky here: I want about twenty pairs of those little dice, and a set of snippy French shoes carved out of pink bauxite, and a lot of those fancy round dinguses, souvenirs, y'know. Governor of the colony says he's comin' to visit us before long. Ought to have a paintin' of the camp made for him. You got paints? No more workin' in the hot sun for you, eh?"

But Papa did not show up at the new shack the next day. He was sick, in his hammock. The second morning the superintendent came to see about him; he was sicker.

"Hey, powder boss, what's eatin' you today?"

The Frenchman slowly raised up on his elbow. All his newly acquired energy had melted away. He was only an old, old man, facing in a foreign land the bitter last hours of a life that had somehow gone awry.

"Ah, my fr'en', I t'ink it is too late for powder boss. I t'ink it is too late for—ev-re-t'ing—you sen' me to Paramaribo, like gentleman—in bes' 'ospital—you gif me dat—office—w'ere I can mek my lil t'ings—powder boss—too—!"

Slowly the tousled head sank down into the blue French army blankets. A bony knee pushed out through grimy hammock mesh. Stifled sobs came.

"God—has punish me—too—much—!"

And then, surprisingly, he raised up again, voice steady. "W'at-I-tell-you-'bout-dat-lil-win'mill, eh?"

He was dying on the night before le quatorze Juillet. He sent Mila to bring the superintendent.

"One time I tell you one damn big lie—I say I cas' out France—Dat is not—true—Foreffer—I am Fr-r-rench!"

Then, after a longer pause, he raised up a gray finger and began: "Allons, enfants de la—"

His comrades took up the song. Forty outcast Frenchmen thundered the words of the Marseillaise.

And while they were singing, Papa Droissart died.

The men dressed him in his white town clothes. Among his things they found, wrapped in tissue and silk, a signed photograph of a great Frenchman: "To my dear friend Droissart—Zola." Someone slipped it into the breast pocket of his jacket.

The Chinese carpenter knocked together a little coffin of cedar boards. Valette, a cabinet-maker, provided a tall mahogany cross. The German tinsmith cut out a wreath of zinc immortelles and painted the metal leaves green, with a red zinc rose at the top. The burial took place at noon. A man with the face of a devil, who nevertheless had once been a priest, led the funeral procession. At the grave a yellow woman who was reputed to be not better than she should be sang two hymns in Dutch, weeping as she sang. The outcast priest recited a service for the dead and pitched the first shovelful of jungle mold down on the coffin. The superintendent next threw on a few clods and passed the shovel to a geologist. But the fat washerwoman came elbow-ing her way to the edge of the grave, her eyes streaming:

"Stan' one side, please, sir, stan' one side. Le' me take nex' turn. Too long ma wash been waitin' already."

On our way back, just as we were nearing the main office building, the little red windmill leaped from its pole and fell crumpled at our feet. Nothing about it had worn out; nothing had broken. It had just quit.

A Negro foreman trembled and went ashy black. Barand crossed himself and picked up the windmill. He took it reverently to the graveyard corral.

And there rests Papa Droissart, an unlettered cross at his head with a rusting zinc wreath encircling it; and at the foot of the cross is the little tin windmill, still red in spots.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has just put through a trying half-hour composing a bread-and-butter letter, or, as he prefers to call it, a "Collins" (in honor of that worthy gentleman whose letters so delighted the immortal Mr. Bennet). The Drifter deplores the custom of sitting down, immediately one has left a friendly roof, and committing to paper a series of polite nothings.

* * * * *

LET no one accuse the Drifter of ingratitude in these remarks. It is not that he never wishes to thank his host or hostess for kindness done and pleasure given. It is simply that he sometimes feels a longing to do just that very thing, but he knows that whatever he can say will sound like no more than what each and every child is taught to write after the dullest of visits. The Drifter knows whereof he speaks, for he has spent rather more time on visits already, he thinks, than most people spend in a lifetime. Somehow, with the best will in the world, he has never qualified as a host. His hearth is too evanescent. The visits, of course, have varied enormously in kind and quality. The letters have been almost exactly alike, save for an occasional desperate cadenza. And now he has just been faced with the problem of a particularly happy visit, for which he really is grateful. He has done his best, but the host in question, on receiving his sincere letter, will never dream but that his guest has simply "done his duty."

* * * * *

ONE possibility encourages the Drifter. Might not the telegraph companies be induced to take on the business of bread-and-butter letters? The letters could be listed by number, and could be carefully drawn up in advance to suit the circumstances: urban or rural; sea or mountains; large house-party or small, intimate week-end. Then, when some special occasion gladdens the Drifter's days, he could sit down and write, from his heart, to a host who would receive his letter as such. It was only the other day that the Drifter heard of a small friend of his who went to visit a cousin. "Did you have a good time?" his mother asked him when he came home. "Well, I would have had except that I kept wondering what I'd say afterwards when I wrote." "That's easy, then. Just say you enjoyed yourself." "But I didn't."

THE DRIFTER

NO ONE MUST KNOW

A single phrase found in a year-old love letter to her son told her the truth. Now she must hide her secret deep within herself, suffer . . . and tell no one . . . that the letter was from a man. Rupert Hughes calls this strangely beautiful study of a mother's mind "a masterpiece of art and a work of profound and noble mercy toward all people, the peculiar as well as the normal." $2.50

REVELATION

By ANDRÉ BIRABEAU Translated by Una, Lady Troubridge

THE VIKING PRESS : : 18 East 48th Street, New York

SOVIET RUSSIA

An extraordinary combination of low price and tour value for Students. $280 complete. The itinerary is fascinating.

Aug. 16 S.S. Statendam or
Aug. 27 S.S. Berengaria.

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.
175 Fifth Avenue, New York. Algonquin 6656

Visit Soviet Russia

SPECIAL late party forming. . . . The tourist rush will be over and theatres, opera, schools and institutions opening. Party may be joined abroad.

SAILING: August 14th, 1930—S.S. EUROPA

Facilities for individuals

20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK

THE OPEN ROAD

What's Wrong with the World?

Letters from Nation Readers

A Few Exceptions

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Few, I think, could have read with more interest than I Mr. Villard's What's Wrong with the World? For twenty years I was a member of the World's editorial organization, and its day managing editor for six and one-half years of the period Mr. Villard had particularly under examination. With less hesitancy, then, than I might feel in discussing a situation with which I was not so intimately acquainted I make the following suggestions:

Mr. Villard, in saying that "the loss of prestige and of news value [by the World] came largely after the death of Frank I. Cobb in 1923 and during the managing editorship of Herbert Bayard Swope," attributes to Mr. Cobb a part in the news organization of the World that he never had and an interest in news, as such, that he never felt. His great gifts and his great services in his profession had to do with the discussion and not at all with the gathering or presentation of news. He just wasn't interested subjectively in news, as we had repeated, despairing reason to know.

Mr. Villard has quite as faulty a conception of Mr. Swope's services as of Mr. Cobb's. It is perfectly true that Mr. Swope did not do all his work in the office, but no one can know better than I how constantly he did work. As for "entangling alliances," three instances come back to me of intimate friendships that ended, and were never renewed, because his professional obligation transcended the personal. As for "hostile cliques within the office," it must be that I am a poorer reporter than I rate myself, for in thirty years of newspaper work I never knew an office where politics played so insignificant a part.

But there is really no reason why I should submit my own opinion. During the Swope regime, and more than a year after Mr. Cobb died, the World reached the peak of its circulation, with a daily average of more than 400,000, greater by 100,000 than that of its nearest standard-size competitor. Twice during the Swope regime the Columbia University Gold Medal for Public Service in Journalism was awarded the World. Twice during the Swope regime the World was cited formally by Mr. Villard and The Nation.

On December 15, 1924, a year after Mr. Cobb died, Mr. Villard called the World "the bravest, most outspoken, most liberal New York daily, and the most thoroughly devoted to democratic and American ideals."

On January 3, 1927, three years after Mr. Cobb died, The Nation's Honor Roll listed "the editors of the New York World for the crusading devotion to liberal ideals which makes of their daily the finest public servant in the urban press of the North."

Which is the balanced judgment?

New York, July 2 William Preston Beazell

[Mr. Villard did not forget the World's excellent record nor the number of times it has been cited for its admirable service. It was because of that record that he wrote as he did in alarm lest the World be lost to liberalism.—Editor The Nation.]

An Ex-Employee Agrees

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have just read Mr. Villard's article on the World, and as an ex-employee I want to express agreement with his analysis. I admire very much Walter Lippmann's great abilities, but it seems to me that Lippmann should never have succeeded Cobb. The change was too utterly abrupt, not so much in policy, perhaps, as in tone and in style. It seems to me that in recent years I frequently detect touches of "writing down" to the reader, a fatal fault in editorial matter; at the same time the World indulges too much in irony which appeals primarily to the limited "F. P. A." audience.

There have been grave faults in the news policy. I think the old "before-the-war" World policy of always having a few striking handmade stories in the ice-box for release when other news grew slack was the ideal policy for the World.

I am glad that in your article you evidently wrote more in sorrow than in anger. I can say truthfully that in all my years in the dome I never encountered the slightest suggestion of anything approaching "influence" as applied to the staff. I have nothing but the highest respect for the World tradition.

It reassures me to find that a student of the press should arrive at conclusions so nearly identical with mine, which I feared might have been influenced by prejudice or preconception.

New York, July 9 Ex-Employee

Still the Brightest in New York

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: This from a former World man, in appreciation of your analysis of the present state of that newspaper and, in fact, of all your recent articles on the press. I thought your diagnosis of the languishing of the World and the causes of it quite fair and accurate.

It has seemed to me that for obvious causes, some of which you mentioned, the World no longer fits into the journalistic scheme of things, either metropolitan or national. It is neither liberal fowl, conservative, stand-pat fish, nor good, popular red herring. It lacks orientation and direction. It hasn't marched with the times while retaining its traditional independence and authority of touch, as it most likely would have done had Joseph Pulitzer lived and retained his vigor, or had he left a successor of his caliber.

Then, too, coupled with its pristine sensationalism—later considerably modified—the popularity of the World lay largely among the discontented and the under-dogs, folks who earned their bread by the sweat of their brow. This appeal has lost force in the past decade, owing to prosperity and consequent indifference to the political and social ills against which the old World thundered and crusaded.

Weak or misfit executives also have contributed to the degenerative process. It doesn't follow through any more. It starts something with a hurrah and then loses interest. Growing deficits and loss of circulation, with no adequate remedies forthcoming or being applied, have also bred a spirit of timidity and irresolution in the organization. I was amused—and measurably saddened—not long ago while talking with one of the editorial executives. I congratulated him upon the paper's attitude on Mexican affairs. With a pained expression he dug into his desk and produced a sheaf of not more than ten or a dozen complaints from American Catholics, protesting against the World's friendly editorial policy toward the Mexican government. "It's costing us circulation," he groaned.

But aside from all this, one would say that probably the root of the cancer lies in the fact that, setting aside a few non-news special features, it really isn't much of a *news*paper any more. Clients get more for their money in the other papers, or they think they do. If Joseph Pulitzer, Jr., could remake it, with the assistance of a competent news and editorial staff, he probably in time could put it back where it belongs, unless the patient is too far gone. I'm afraid, though, that the World has had its day, and that it is now too late to do much with it.

In their woodenness, conservatism, and lack of soul, the bulk of all our newspapers today are, I suppose, merely a natural consequence of the highly mechanized and material age in which we are living. Most of them are box-office propositions, pure and simple; they have to be, production costs and overhead being what they are.

But with all of the palpable evidences of marasmus which the patient presents, I do think that, so far as its news columns go, the World is the best and most brightly written paper in New York.

Mexico City, July 1 ROBERT H. MURRAY

Correct Diagnosis

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read with great interest the article on the World in The Nation of June 24, and believe you diagnosed the case correctly. The Pulitzer paper here, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, has lost its editorial initiative, and only holds up to its old standards in two particulars—the excellence of its Washington staff and in printing "all the news." It is under a terrific strain to contribute to the losses of the morning World and maintain itself here.

St. Louis, June 30 J. L. H.

Other Correspondence

Police Control in India

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Discussing the changes recommended by the Simon Commission, Mr. Richard B. Gregg in his very excellent article in your issue of July 9 states, as some others have done, that the police department would become a provincial function and might thus be placed in the hands of an Indian minister. If true, that change alone would grant half of the "substance of independence" Gandhi demands. But it is not so. The police will be, as is at present the case, an exclusively British function.

In Part IX, Article 329, the commissioners recommend that the "security services" (civil service and police) should > continue to be recruited upon an All-India basis by the Secretary of State, who should have power . . . to require provincial governments to employ these services in such numbers and in such appointments as he thinks necessary (my italics).

New York, July 11 T. H. K. REZMIE

The Russian Bare

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of July 16 Heywood Broun, writing presumably to prove his frequently made point that the joke is on the Communists, says:

> At Russian bathing beaches wearers of suits are numbered among the bourgeoisie. No good Communist would dare exhibit such false modesty.

Unfortunately, I am not familiar with Russian bathing beaches under the Communist regime, but in the dear old Czarist days bathing suits were not used by anybody at either popular or smart resorts. When I frequented the gorgeous beach at Baku there were no Bolshevists there, but neither were there any bathing suits. Once they were all set for going in the water, it was impossible to distinguish between a Georgian princess and the cloakroom girl at the Mephisto. But maybe Mr. Broun has an easy way of telling a naked Communist from a naked bourgeois.

New York, July 11 SHEILA HIBBEN

Letters of D. H. Lawrence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I shall be most grateful if you will give publicity to this request, addressed to all those who may have any letters from the late D. H. Lawrence in their possession. The administrators of Mr. Lawrence's estate have asked me to collect his letters, and arrangements have been made for having them copied and filed. May I therefore ask all those of Lawrence's correspondents to whom I have not already written personally to send their letters to Mrs. Hilton, 44 Mecklenburg Square, London, W.C. 1. The originals will be copied and returned as soon as possible. If it should be decided to publish any of the letters (the copyright in which vests exclusively in the estate), correspondents will be informed which of their letters or parts of letters have been selected.

London, July 1 ALDOUS HUXLEY

Contributors to This Issue

VICTOR S. YARROS is on the staff of the Chicago Daily News.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

A. G. BARNETT is a writer of fiction and travel stories.

HAL SAUNDERS WHITE is in the English department at New York University.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a regular contributor of political and historical reviews to The Nation.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

ARTHUR WARNER, associate editor of The Nation, has for many years been a close observer of events in New Zealand.

SALVADOR DE MADARIAGA, King Alfonso XIII Professor of Spanish Studies at Oxford University, was for five years director of the Disarmament Section of the League of Nations.

Books

Spring Plowing

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

With the bent iron for plow we have reborrowed time,
Unshrouded virgins and retaken God.
Slowly the rain that filtered the torn hair
And bore her body's whiteness under Gives up from odorous chambers her sweet breath,
And the mild east has bloomed in infant thunder:
There is no death.
Body of God lies sunning by the river.
Waken to light, O stone and tree and weed!
Hand of the plowman feels the furrows quiver;
Time's breached—the dead arise to sow the seed.

A Brutalized India

Must England Lose India? The Nemesis of Empire. By Lieutenant Colonel Arthur Osburn, D.S.O. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THIS is a terrible book—terrible in its description of conditions in India, more terrible still in its indictment of England. Writing, it would seem, in hot haste under the urge of righteous wrath, with little attention to style, not much to order, and with a good deal of repetition, Colonel Osburn literally flays alive the typical Englishman who represents British rule in India, and tears in shreds most of the alleged benefits which that rule has conferred. The onslaught is the more effective because Colonel Osburn, who has himself served in India as a medical officer, does not wish to see India independent; on the contrary, his one purpose, he assures us, is "to delay or prevent the demand in India for independence or home rule from becoming irresistible" by exposing the causes of the present discontent and suggesting remedies for existing evils. How, after the merciless and damning evisceration which he has made, he can look forward "to a time when the United States of India will dwell contented within the orbit of the British Commonwealth" is difficult to explain save on the assumption that the author has a faith in the ability of the English to change and the willingness of the Indians to forget that may fairly be regarded as sublime.

The English civil or military official in India, as Colonel Osburn pictures him, is a brute. He is a pronounced Negrophobe, despises all classes of Indians as inferiors, and treats them indiscriminately worse than he would a cur. He bullies, beats, flogs, and mutilates them, curses them on the roads, berates them obscenely in shops or public places, flouts their customs, outrages their religious feelings and observances, and makes India, for the Indians, a hell on earth. At the garrison club he drinks heavily, gambles, dances, makes love to officers' wives, and boasts of the outrageous abuses which he has visited upon merchants, farmers, workers, or priests. For any Englishman to take an Indian's part or even extend to him ordinary courtesy is to risk suspicion, social ostracism, or official rebuke.

The terrorism of officialdom is supplemented by the terrorism of the native police. Colonel Osburn, who fills his pages with specific incidents, is scathing in his denunciation of a system which places natives of one province in police control of another. The police beat, torture, steal, and rape, all with the knowledge and tacit consent of their English masters. To get on the books of the police is to incur the presumption of guilt on all future occasions, and in addition to be persecuted, hounded, abused, and robbed.

The explanation of this extraordinary attitude of the English in India is found by Colonel Osburn in the "colossal conceit" of the upper-middle-class Englishman "that he is a divinely appointed governor in perpetuity of about half the earth—if not the remainder—when he has had time to take it," and in the fact that most of the Englishmen who go to India are products of Eton, Harrow, or other so-called public schools. The arraignment of life at these schools which Colonel Osburn offers exceeds in terribleness anything of the kind that I know of in English literature. Nurseries of snobbery, brutality, viciousness, and laziness, the merest mockery of education as a veneer for their rottenness, teachers steeped in violence toward their pupils, and "authority" magnified at the expense of reason and social decency—such is the picture. No greater service could be done to the English upper middle class, Colonel Osburn declares, "and indirectly to the Empire and the world at large, than to close down these tradition-ridden haunts of corruption and to compel all England's children to attend England's national schools."

Colonel Osburn devotes a good deal of space to sexual matters, and passes severe strictures on Miss Mayo's "Mother India" as hopelessly one-sided and mischievous. His training and experience as a physician lead him to find in the climatic and social conditions of India an explanation of much that passes for immorality, and he rejects altogether the charge of degeneracy due to sexual excess. Indirectly, at least, he seems to defend regulated prostitution and child marriage as inescapable under the circumstances. For the English provincialism and snobbishness which judges all sex relations by its own prudish standards he has, naturally, only unrestrained scorn.

The remedies which the book suggests appear curiously inadequate to the situation which it describes. Colonel Osburn would like to have India and other dependent parts of the Empire governed only with the consent of the governed. To that end, he would require every Englishman who serves in India to know something about the country before he goes and learn more while he is there; he would forbid and punish offensive language and abusive conduct toward Indians, put a stop to missionary talk about the "depravity" of Hindus, extend habeas corpus to the country, prohibit the exportation of food until a falling price invited waste, reduce taxation, spend more of the revenue on health and education, and cut down the preposterous sums now paid for the army, the secret service, official salaries, and extravagant building schemes. The money lender should "have his wings severely clipped," the police force should be demilitarized, and the problem of a spawning population met by official recognition and encouragement of birth control.

Whether or not India should be independent is, of course, a matter of opinion. Not only does Colonel Osburn, as has been said, think that it should not if by any possibility it can be induced to remain in the Empire, but he goes so far as to deprecate attempts to establish social equality between Indians and English. The average Indian, he insists, is unclean, he has an offensive body odor, and his table manners are bad. It is quite obvious that at this point, as at a number of others, Colonel Osburn is still an Englishman, and even his rough handling of Kipling has not freed him wholly from the Kipling taint. His revolt against English rule in India, however, is so outstanding and his condemnation of the system and of those who administer it so severe as to make his book a challenge that will have to be met. If the British Labor Government can let this book go unanswered, then surely have the statesmen of Labor hardened their hearts, closed their eyes, and stopped their ears.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Tranquil Journeys

The Gentleman in the Parlour. By W. Somerset Maugham. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.
Hot Countries. By Alec Waugh. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.50.
The Last Paradise. By Hickman Powell. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $4.

IF one is to judge by the tone of at least the first two of these books, the great liners and railroads that make travel easy and the imperialism that secures the life and property of their passengers have also made a little too easy and too safe the writing of travel books. Mr. Maugham and Mr. Waugh traveled so comfortably that they had the leisure and the energy to compose their books during the few months of their journeys. And both have written with their minds on the comfort of their readers, who will ride smoothly, even luxuriously, through their pages. They do not intend to treat the reader strenuously like Doughty or Lawrence, Mungo Park or Cunninghame Graham.

Of the three books Mr. Waugh's manages, almost through sheer nonchalance, to be the most interesting. It is by no means as exciting as its title, but its author keeps up a flow of small talk of the sort that would single him out as an interesting companion in the salon of any ocean liner. It is not talk that remains for any length of time in the mind, but it does not irritate with any pretensions.

Mr. Maugham's book is depressing. It is languid and tepid. It attempts to entertain and employs in the effort the genial essay, the anecdote, and two fanciful fairy tales that serve no other purpose than to prove, to Mr. Maugham, how clever he is. The book is made up of digressions, but unfortunately the digressions suggest not an active and inquisitive mind adventuring outside the bounds it has set itself, but a tired mind unwilling to stick to its labors and allowing itself holidays of triviality. Mr. Maugham attempts some excuse for himself when he says: "I am writing it for my own diversion and I hope that it will divert also such as care to spend a few hours in reading it. I am a professional writer and hope to get from it a certain amount of money and perhaps a little praise." The praise, unless Mr. Maugham is undiscriminating about the applauders, is likely to be little indeed.

Mr. Powell's book displeases by its earnestness as much as Mr. Maugham's by its bored off-handedness. It defends an illusion with banalities. I have not been in Bali and consequently cannot say "no" when Mr. Powell says "yes." Nevertheless I find Mr. Powell's evidence unconvincing; and I am reminded of too many other "last paradises." Some years ago D. H. Lawrence discovered one in Sardinia. Others have been located in all the archipelagoes of the Pacific Ocean. One enthusiast recently reported the "last paradise" among the Dukhobors in Canada; only last season Mr. Larson established it on the cold steppes of Mongolia. And Mr. Waugh says that the Tahitians have some hope of finding it in Europe. Mr. Powell's process is the old one. There are only motes in the eye of Bali, but beams always in the eye of Western civilization. Everything in Bali is acceptable—at least what is objected to is not mentioned—including cockfighting and feudalism, for both of which Mr. Powell finds ingenious defenses. In contrast, nothing in the West is acceptable, though Mr. Powell inexplicably returns to it.

Now Mr. Powell may be right, but he does protest too much to persuade me. If he could only have forgotten his thesis and not confused each description and each incident with a comparison in disfavor of the West he might have had room to tell more. I found his few pages of matter-of-fact notes more interesting than the adjectival text. Mr. André Roosevelt, who contributes the supplement of photographs, tells us in a preface that Mr. Powell can write. One can only add an irreverent "and how!" The writing is an almost continuous purple patch. It is precisely the sort of writing that has produced the recent revolt against style and made a great deal of plain and dreary writing popular.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

This Side the Land of Promise

New Zealand in the Making. By J. B. Condliffe. University of Chicago Press. $5.

A GENERATION ago the eyes of liberals and radicals were fixed upon New Zealand, then regarded as the world front of progressive political and industrial democracy. Interest waned with the triumph of a conservative government in 1912, and since the birth of Soviet Russia has almost ceased. This is natural but unreasonable on the part of those liberals who still have a sneaking belief in democracy; for Russia is avowedly contemptuous of democracy, while New Zealand, in spite of conservative control for the last eighteen years, has not canceled much of the advanced program put into effect before then and is able to show democratic experiments of nearly two score years' standing.

Mr. Condliffe, formerly professor of economics in Canterbury College, New Zealand, and a resident of the Dominion for a quarter of a century, tells the country's story admirably from the viewpoint of an economist. He is perhaps a little niggardly in the credit or blame which he assigns to legislative experiments in the making of New Zealand. Agricultural efficiency rather than any ventures in state socialism has been the primary cause of New Zealand's prosperity, he thinks. "All of the essential features of mass production, usually credited only to the newer factories in America, are to be observed in a well-organized shearing shed, and most of them anticipated and owe little to Henry Ford or the Fordization of industry."

Whatever exaggeration there may be in this view, Mr. Condliffe is in accord with all students of New Zealand when he points out that neither socialist theory nor trade-union influence had any considerable part in the Dominion's political-industrial innovations of a generation ago. They were essentially opportunistic; and they bore no labels. The lack of political philosophy is not improbably the reason, although Mr. Condliffe does not suggest it, why the movement spent itself so soon. There was no continuing program, no ultimate goal. The movement began as a demand for land in a population shut off from the soil by the existence of great estates, closely held but poorly used. Yet when the gnawings of soil hunger had been somewhat appeased, land nationalization was forgotten in a gradual gravitation toward freehold ownership. Land reform ended in the ground instead of in the sky. So, too, with the wage worker. He sought only higher pay and better working conditions, not control of industry, and when he had become relatively well off he let it go at that, leaving New Zealand industry as completely capitalistic as that of the United States. Nor will our liberals who look forward to a union of the small farmers with the city workers find much comfort in New Zealand experience. The political-industrial program of a generation ago was made possible by small farmer–city worker cooperation, but since then class cleavages have appeared, so that today the small farmer believes he has "little to gain and much to lose from alliance with the Labor Party."

Mr. Condliffe's explanation of why New Zealand liberalism petered out into "satisfied mediocrity and provincialism" is the arid and bureaucratic educational system. In consequence of, or in connection with, the pallid intellectual life, "there are many evidences of failure to evince any very real trust in freedom of thought and expression," and imported books are subject to a censorship as ridiculous as that of Boston. Mr. Condliffe complains with justice that "in a world which is eagerly discussing disarmament New Zealand stands stoutly by its system of compulsory military training," and he finds it equally incongruous that the Dominion has neglected to send representatives to the conferences of the International Labor Organization or to ratify any of its conventions.

No, the New Zealanders of a generation ago never reached the Land of Promise. Without the excuse of a blow-out or a lack of filling stations en route, they failed from more ignoble reasons. They found pleasant picnic grounds along the road and dallied in them. Lacking maps and programs and dreams, they quit the trail to become realtors or butter-and-egg men. But they have left some institutions which are still unique and an experience which is priceless. New Zealand is still the only democracy which settles industrial disputes through compulsory arbitration; has done so for thirty-six years. The court has had three periods. First it was opposed by the employers and championed by the workers; then it was championed by the employers and opposed by the workers; today it again has the support of organized labor and some opposition from employers, though it is so generally accepted by the country as a whole that there is no serious thought of trying to abolish it.

Since New Zealand was the first country to introduce woman suffrage (in 1893), one notes Mr. Condliffe's appraisal of the movement with curiosity. He finds its influence conservative, especially in protecting the institution of the family. "The integrity of family life persists in New Zealand and is less shaken by new and disturbing ideas of sexual morality and human relationships than in most countries." It seems that "entry into clerical and professional occupations is free; but there is far less advantage taken of these opportunities than one might expect in a country of universal education and sex equality. Women lawyers, doctors, and dentists are rare; there is only one woman professor (of home science) in the whole university." No woman has ever been elected to New Zealand's Parliament.

ARTHUR WARNER

Beyond Death

After-Walker. By Leonard Cline. The Viking Press. $2.

LEONARD CLINE was skilful in the use of verse patterns as well as in the writing of prose (he published three novels), but the general subject matter of this book of verse is commonplace and the vision is not at all extraordinary save in one instance, After-Walker, a poem which may or may not have specific reference to the tragedy of the author's own days.

The After-Walker—the title is excellent—is a man looking upon himself hanged, the spirit gone out of the flesh and addressing the dead body. Once or twice, especially in the very closing portion addressed to love, the poem descends to the sentimental, but for the most part it is a stark picture of the body hanging and the day of that hanging passing into sunset.

> From the gibbous moon he hung,
> Through the stars his body swung
> All a long night, a night long:
> With the rhythm of tired song
> Between the clouds his body sweeps
> Hanged by the neck until he sleeps.

And as the day finally ends:

> But the gold waning with one knell
> Of throbbing saffron fades away.
> Brown is the ending of death's day.
> And reft of wings the haggard light
> Like dawn at cockcrow quivers white.
> This was the hour when Love thought best
> The babe should wail at Mary's breast:
> Himself, and on His brow her kiss.
> The dead know well the truth of this.

Now and then the emphasis on the universal significance of the poem is lost because lines are allowed to flow a little too easily, and sometimes too much mass for perfect structure is granted a single image.

Mr. Cline could write excellent ballads, as his Snake will testify, and he had always a command of rhythm. Intensity is sometimes lacking in his work, and his talent is not always directed in the best way, but that he had talent there can be no doubt.

EDA LOU WALTON

The Making of History

World Politics in Modern Civilization. By Harry Elmer Barnes. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.50.

THE more that intelligent men look about them, the more they realize that inherent unity of the world which manifests itself in the minutest and seemingly most local facts of our social life. A perusal of post-war bibliography would, I feel sure, afford impressive proof of the rapid progress which the world view of things is making, at least in that minority of men who use their minds. Professor Barnes has just added an invaluable item to this bibliography in the shape of a substantial treatise on "World Politics in Modern Civilization."

The scale of the work is thus marked from the very outset in its title. It is world politics which Professor Barnes is going to discuss; not the politics of this or that state. And, as it should be, his book unfolds before our eyes vast perspectives of world import. In a first part entitled The Origins of Nationalism, Capitalism, and Imperialism the author discusses successively nationalism, its origins and significance; the origins of the old colonial movement and the expansion of Europe; and the commercial revolution with its outstanding economic, cultural, and institutional changes. Modern capitalism and national imperialism are then tackled in the second part in a series of scholarly chapters devoted to the capitalistic revolution; the social and political changes due to it; the rise and development of nationalistic patriotism—a chapter which Professor Barnes somewhat provincially designates The Emergence of the Hundred-Percenter—the repressed nations on the eve of the war; the activities of modern capitalism and national imperialism in Africa, Asia, and Oceania; the British Empire and Latin America; and finally the general results of contemporary national imperialism. With Part III of his work Professor Barnes enters frankly into the study of the World War, which he considers as the outcome of the forces described in the two previous parts. This part contains chapters on the war complex in contemporary culture, the World War in the making, the outbreak of the World War, and how the United States became involved in the international anarchy. Part IV describes what Professor Barnes calls the rise and fall of the legend of a Holy War in chapters devoted to the Wilson epoch, the genesis of the legend of a Holy War, the secret treaties and the just peace, the collapse of the fiction of a Holy War. Finally, in Part V, under the title Patriotic Mendacity Versus World Order: the Attempt to Salvage the Wreck of Europe, Professor Barnes invites us to discuss in succession the importance of the question of war responsibility in contemporary history, American historians and the war-guilt controversy, the end of the war myth, the League of Nations and world peace, the peace movement from Kant to Kellogg, war debts and reparations, war guilt, the post-war treaties and international politics in contemporary Europe, and a sensible foreign policy of the United States.

I have made a point of enumerating in all detail the subjects dealt with by the author, first, because I know by experience how unfair it is for the reviewer to fail to do so, since the chief purpose of a review ought to be to give as accurate a notion as possible of the scope of the work; and secondly, because the bare enumeration of the subjects discussed in Professor Barnes's work shows how vast his conception has been, so vast indeed as to do honor to his imagination no less than to the college which enabled him to gather together such immense masses of material in the midst of his other work. This mass of material is so impressive that it may well account at least in part for the feeling that the author has not allowed himself sufficient time for sifting, weighing, and above all organizing it.

The work deserves so much respect for its excellent historical understanding and so much admiration for the courage with which thorny issues are tackled that it calls forth a frank and open discussion of its shortcomings in the hope of future improvements. On the whole it would appear to suffer from a lack of distance from the facts. Facts are the enemies of the constructive historian, for if he has the stuff of the historian in him he falls in love with them and therefore cannot get away from them. Now just as poets when they sing must be at a certain distance from their emotions—for otherwise the matter of the poem will not cool down into form—so historians must write at a certain distance from their facts—for otherwise they will fail to see the fact of facts, which is their synthesis.

It is doubtful whether the reader of this otherwise excellent book will feel his mind any clearer for having read it, though he will feel it pretty well stocked for the next twenty years of international discussions in club and drawing-room. From this vast survey of events and tendencies few if any general ideas can be said to emerge. Nor am I to be lightly dismissed with an airy contempt for "abstractions" and "generalizations." But for abstractions and generalizations mankind would be still on the level of apes. When the illiterate peasant answering the inquiring motorist says "straight on," meaning by it "you keep on this hopelessly winding and meandering road," he is indulging in pure abstraction; when a baby just learning to speak calls a white cat "pussy" because he called a black cat "pussy" the day before, he is generalizing. Let us once and for all drive out of civilized society that contempt for abstractions and generalizations which if indulged in would destroy civilization altogether. The danger that may be found in them, that is, an insufficient basis of fact, is far from us as we sit in front of these 600 pages.* The danger of doing without them is apparent in several features of this remarkable work.

And to begin with—in its defective perspective as shown in a curious disproportion between the importance of the facts and the space granted them. Thus, for instance, out of the seven pages devoted to contemporary international migrations no less than four are given over to a detailed discussion of the Sacco and Vanzetti case. No comment is needed to show that there is here an example of lack of proportion. Now this is not an exceptional case. Several other examples might be quoted of vast international issues sidetracked into discussions of incidental subjects, important and interesting in themselves, excellently treated in themselves, yet wholly or partly irrelevant and always out of proportion in the general scheme.

This line of criticism applies also to the central theme itself. For here, in "World Politics in Modern Civilization," there was a general subject which, treated in a general way, with distance and elevation, might have yielded fruitful results. The author may forgive me for saying that in my opinion he sidetracks the issue into a discussion of the war-guilt question. Most of Part III, the whole of Part IV, and most of Part V are devoted to a scholarly, painstaking, and detailed discussion of this vexed and insoluble question. Professor Barnes attaches great importance to it. There is weight in his reasons but possibly a lesser weight than he imagines. For is it in the contemplation of past errors that progress lies or is it rather in the contemplation of future achievements? In answering our query we would willingly suggest as an argument in favor of the second alternative Mr. Barnes's own treatment of the war-guilt problem. Even if we took at his estimate the importance of the matter itself we do not gather that much utility could be obtained out of a discussion which even a mind of so pure an intention and so painstaking a historical sense as Professor Barnes's cannot undertake to our satisfaction. I venture to suggest that I am in mind and heart as neutral as any man—by nationality, by taste, and by training—yet I honestly declare that Professor Barnes's treatment of the war-guilt question seems to me lacking in judicial detachment, as a number of quotations from his book would, I think, establish beyond doubt—to the very few neutrals who remain on earth (most of them have fled to heaven or are making arrangements thereto).

Here again it is a matter of distance. Raw materials are everywhere in the form of statistics and long and frequent quotations. Raw materials are also everywhere in the form of strong adjectives pleading and in continuous judging of men and things. We may perhaps be forgiven for insisting on this last point, which seems to us important. There is an admirable ethical passion in this book, an earnest desire to better things and to make life nobler. But this very quality of the author's mind does disservice to the book by upsetting the fine balance of dialectical discussion to be expected in history and by setting the discussion in a mood which is altogether unfit for understanding. The whole discussion of war guilt, irrelevant as it seems to us in substance, is even more irrelevant in manner. Far from me the cynical indifference to moral issues in public life which for some reason or other is associated with the name of Machiavelli. But then I am not, thank heaven, the confessor or spiritual director of any of the protagonists of the great tragedy of 1914-1918. Let the Greys and Poincarés, the Izvolskis and Hohenzollerns settle the matter with their own consciences. Let the world, moreover, register as soon as possible the obvious conclusion that the singling out of Germany to bear the burden of war guilt is silly. But for heaven's sake let us grow up and cease talking of nations as if they were characters in a play.

Distance again would have enabled the author to delve deeper into his facts. Perhaps the weakest spot in his treatment is due to his handling of psychological factors. Such is the case in his discussion of nationalism, in which, in my opinion, the natural element is neglected, and also in his analysis of the causes of war. But the observation applies to all the book. Psychology is the core of politics, and, for instance, a sound psychological discussion of the world in 1912 would have been far more illuminating than the comparison of delicately shaded half-truths emitted by both sides of the World War before, during, and after it.

The pity of it all is that owing to this shortcoming there is no question that the constructive part of Mr. Barnes's work does not correspond to the admirable industry with which the materials have been gathered for it. This is particularly striking with regard to the great economic forces of our contemporary world. Germany, France, Great Britain, Italy occupy the front of the stage. But those other great powers of our day—banking, coal, steel, shipping—are but shadowy figures in the background. For similar reasons the League of Nations is treated in a manner hardly above the journalistic level and such things as the Kellogg pact are discussed without sufficient penetration. I would go farther and say that despite a fine effort there are one or two cases, not unimportant ones, in which the author fails to reach an international point of view with regard to American foreign policy. The last chapter, A Sensible Foreign Policy for the United States, seems to us hastily put together, for otherwise the suggestions made would have been more in harmony with the courage and ability of this exceptionally gifted American intellectual.

*While on this point of facts, and to show that we can all play at this game, let me point out that Dreyfus is spelt Dréyfus on page 133 and that there is no excuse for describing an Argentine statesman as Signor Drago. I may add that the version of my name given in the footnote to page 533, though an improvement on it, is not an authorized version.

SALVADOR DE MADARIAGA

Books in Brief

Wooden Swords. By Jacques Deval. The Viking Press. $2.50.

"Wooden Swords," which is the choice of the Literary Guild for July, is at once a leap in the dark and a descent from the sublime to the ridiculous. M. Deval does not hold with those who took their war too seriously. Relegated by the examining physicians to the Service of Supplies, he was naturally in no position to do so. He may have observed that the gap between laughter and tears is often infinitesimal and that the postures of tragedy are often the instruments of comedy. It is not a new formula, even as applied to the war. Both E. E. Cummings and Jaroslav Hasek have applied it before, the one to his experiences in "The Enormous Room," and the other to the adventures of "The Good Soldier, Schweik." Simple justice might ask an explanation of why Mr. Cummings's eight-year-old book has been delicately accepted as caviar while M. Deval's pleasant but inferior offering becomes the meat loaf of the season's reading. But the answer need interfere with no one's enjoyment of a moderately entertaining book.

A Short History of British Expansion. By James A. Williamson. Two volumes. The Macmillan Company. $12.

This is a revised and greatly enlarged edition of a one-volume work first published in 1922 and reprinted with some corrections in 1927. The revision consists principally in the expansion from eight chapters to seventeen, naturally with a good deal of rewriting of the old material, of Part V, dealing with the development of the British Empire after 1783. In its present form the book offers a readable and on the whole impartial sketch of the history of the dominions and other possessions, the evolution of imperial policy in the nineteenth century, and the emergence of the idea of a British Commonwealth of Nations in place of the earlier idea of an Empire. The chapters on imperial aspects of the World War and modern India and the accounts of the various Imperial Conferences are specially to be commended as useful summaries.

People of the Small Arrow. By J. H. Driberg. Brewer and Warren. $3.

Intimate, vivid sketches like these of the life of a primitive tribe are rarer than they should be. These are written without condescension, with an obvious delight in the very charming native scene. They are equally free from the pedagogue's responsibility to inclose the greatest possible amount of information in the given sugar coating. The loves and wars, the personal successes and defeats, the herding and mourning, and the mud-cattle play of the children are pictured with restraint and verisimiltude. There are perhaps not many tribes in Africa that are as gracious, as unbranded by the terror of witchcraft or the custom of wholesale slaughter as this Nilotic tribe of Uganda, and there is double good fortune in the fact that Dr. Driberg has recorded their daily life in such gracious and unforced prose. The drawings by Pearl Binder are decorative and distinguished.

Rapallo to Dawes, 1922-1924. The Diary of an Ambassador. By Viscount d'Abernon. With Historical Notes by Maurice Alfred Gerothwohl. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

This second instalment of the d'Abernon diary, covering the year and a half from June, 1922, to the end of 1923, is prefaced by an introductory survey of the period, an essay containing some acute observations on the character of the French people, and a series of personal appreciations of Poincaré, Asquith; Winston Churchill, Wirth, Maltzan, von Seeckt, and Stinnes. As in the previous volume, the editor contributes a number of explanatory or connecting passages and some brief biographical notes. The interest of the period for Germany centered in the decline of the mark and the French invasion of the Ruhr, and the entries in the diary reflect the gloom and anxiety which those events occasioned and the grave political uncertainty of the immediate future. Beyond these matters, Viscount d'Abernon received a good deal of intimate and more or less confidential information about political conditions in Italy, Austria, France, and Russia and kept in pretty close touch with what was going on in England. His personal appraisals, especially of Poincaré, Tchitcherin (of whose abilities he appears to have formed no high opinion), Bonar Law, and the German leaders, are keen and illuminating, and he sets down a number of good stories about contemporaries and others. A third volume, carrying the record from the Dawes plan to Locarno, is promised.

Confucianism. By Frederick Starr. Covici-Friede. $3.

Confucianism began as a system of ethics some twenty-five hundred years ago; it developed into a philosophy, and later into a religion. Though it became a state religion adopted even by the alien Manchus it retained its ethical and philosophic aspects. It is this evolution, with its interrelations with Far Eastern social, cultural, and political developments, that Dr. Starr designs to give us. He is not successful. In a modest preface he disclaims any originality and declares that the book is, in the main, the opinions of other scholars pieced together and filled out with biographical and historical comment. It would have been well if Dr. Starr had been more ambitious. The book is too small in bulk and in essential insight to be useful. The quotations appear without sufficient supporting context; the biographical and historical comment is too sketchy to contribute the sense of contemporaneousness and personality which might have helped our understanding.

The Growth and Decadence of Constitutional Government. By J. Allen Smith. Introduction by the late Vernon Louis Parrington. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

The late professor of political science in the University of Washington offers in this book trenchant criticisms of a number of tendencies in American government, chiefly those which have magnified federal authority at the expense of the authority of the States, given to the Supreme Court a virtually uncontrollable veto on legislation, and fettered the expression of public opinion. In all these things he sees a lamentable departure from the original conception of the federal system which Calhoun, whom he particularly admires, expounded unsuccessfully in opposition to the centralizing doctrines of Marshall and Webster. Much of the responsibility for the untoward trend he finds in capitalism, the natural ally of governmental centralization, while at the door of Christianity, with its emphasis upon one true religion and a universal church, he lays the burden of aiding the imperialism which characterizes American foreign policy. Precisely what he would like to see done about it is not quite clear, but he evidently thinks that the future of the country would be safer, morally and intellectually as well as politically, if the constitutional independence of the States could be restored, if local communities could be emancipated from the control of ignorant and incompetent legislatures, and if individual liberty might go the length of admitting "the right to act as one's own judgment dictates where his opinion is opposed to that generally held." There is much excellent writing in the book, and its general contentions, if not always convincing, are thoughtfully and ably argued.

History and Monuments of Ur. By C. J. Gadd. E. P. Dutton and Company. $6.

A hundred years ago the whole of the pre-Persian history of Asia Minor was a blur. Today it is possible to set down in fair detail the record of a single city. Dr. Gadd adds to his scholarship so fine a writing gift that his book becomes at once one of the outstanding volumes on Mesopotamian history and civilization. A considerable portion of the book is a careful and comprehensive description of the numerous fine illustrations. This method, so ably used by the Russian historian Rostovtseff, may point to a valuable technical innovation in historical writing. By means of it the reader's share becomes, to a small extent, participatory.

Portrait of a Chinese Lady. By Lady Hosie. William Morrow and Company. $5.

The Chinese lady is said to be the wife of one of the Kuomintang leaders. She is a charming figure and through her story the author leads us upon her larger quest, an acquaintance with Chinese life. Lady Hosie introduces us not to monuments and Bibles, but to the living people of China. Her book is full of charming incidents, pleasant anecdotes, and delightful personalities, chatty and eminently companionable. It is occasionally gushing; and it is disposed to be rather too trusting of Westerners living in China. One seems to feel in her account an unconscious championship of the Western missionary and teacher caste to which she belongs. However, the sincerity of her love and understanding of the Chinese cannot be questioned. Her book illustrates once again the banality that humanity is the same everywhere, but this is a truth that seems to need perennial restatement.

A Short History of California. By Rockwell D. Hunt and Nellie Van de Grift Sanchez. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $4.50.

This book will be hailed and approved by boards of education, colleges, and libraries of official California. Only one scanty and inexplicit chapter can be in the least displeasing to them—that dealing with the routing of the hundred and fifty thousand native peoples whom the settlers regarded and treated as just so much of the fauna of a new land. In two generations this original population has been "reduced" to twelve thousand, and driven into the desert to starve or to the short grass of the upper hills "to compete with the squirrels for acorns." After the early legislatures had accorded them legal status they were further despoiled and euchred of their holdings by the courts in the blithe and care-free California way. The modern student will seek elsewhere for a better accounting for the State as a social compound as it is found today with its Tom Mooney case and its score or more of political prisoners confined in the prisons of that fair land.

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □

THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS
The NEW GARRICK GAIETIES
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

"LYSISTRATA"
"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockridge, The Sun
FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre W. of B'way, Eves. 8:30 Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:30

"MIGHTIEST WAR DRAMA EVER SEEN"
—N. Y. American.
"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"
A Universal Picture presented by Carl Laemmle
Directed by Lewis Milestone
"A notable achievement, sincere, earnest, vivid and graphic. Better than anything so far done."—Mordaunt Hall, N. Y. Times.
"Enormously compelling talking motion picture. As a show something to get definitely excited about! A very fine motion picture."—Howard Barnes, Herald Tribune.
CENTRAL THEATRE, B'dway and 47th Street Twice Daily: 2:45—8:45. 3 times Sat. & Sun., 2:45—5:45—8:45.

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street
Cooled by Refrigeration
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

RKO COOL CAMEO 42nd St. & B'way
All Week Starts Fri., July 25
Remarkable—Amazing—Real
"The Law of the Siberian Taiga" newest Sovkino drama . . . a chronicle of the TUNGUS tribe in the frozen wastes of Siberia. . . . Battling for life. . . . Fighting for food!

Women Mill Slaves in Japan

THE following article on the conditions under which women labor in the Japanese cotton industry is taken from the New Statesman, English liberal weekly. According to the editor of the New Statesman, it was written by a correspondent who has lately returned from Japan.

Something is known of the way in which girls in Japan are contracted to the factories for a term of years. What is less familiar is the reason why farmers in Japan send their daughters to the mills, where their health is often ruined at the end of the three years' contract. The reason is poverty. The same grinding poverty which makes the Japanese peasant sell his daughter to the brothels of the Yoshiwara forces him to contract his daughter to the factory in order to eke out his subsistence from her earnings. . . .

It is quite true that labor conditions in Japan have greatly improved during the past few years, or at least that they have done so in the bigger factories in large towns. . . . Girls in the big factories are no longer held to their work by the large sums borrowed by their parents through the recruiting agents and put down in their contract with the company which employs them as a debt that must be worked off by their labor. Conditions have been made tolerable enough for them to work out their two or three years' contract without the security of a large debt, and without running away to become inmates of unlicensed houses or waitresses—a profession which in Japan is in the same category as geishas and prostitutes. Nevertheless, even in the model factories conditions are far from ideal. The girls sleep ten or twelve to a room, occupying usually one and a half mats each—a mat is six feet by three. They used to work ten hours and have four or five rest days a month. Since the curtailment of night work by the law which came into force in July, 1929, they have worked eight and one-half hours and had two rest days only. And the latest reports from Japan show that labor has been made so much more intense to compensate for the shorter working hours that tuberculosis is now becoming even more prevalent than before. Their food consists of rice and a little vegetables and pickles, with a piece of fish three times a week and meat very occasionally. In one factory, after a strike, curry rice was given once a month. This diet, though probably more abundant than what the girl has received in her poverty-stricken peasant home, is clearly not adequate for the strain of work in a modern factory . . . which probably accounts for the fact that most girls cannot stand the strain of factory life for more than two or three years.

But apart from the physical conditions of work, there is an extraordinary lack of freedom. Here are girls spending two or three years away from home, without friends, without anything to look forward to beyond their day's work, and without being allowed to leave the factory freely or to spend their earnings as they please. Even a girl earning 30 yen a month*—the average wage after six months' training—only receives about 5 yen as pocket money. Of the rest, 4.50 yen is taken for her board, 2 yen to pay her debt to the company for the 20 or 30 yen paid to her or her parents in advance for railway fare and equipment, 60 sen for health insurance, and about 12 yen is usually sent home to her parents. Whatever is left over is "saved" for her by the company, whether she wishes it or not. She spends her 5 yen on sweets and cakes to supplement her dull and inadequate diet. If she wants extra money for a kimono or other purchase she has to get permission from the matron to draw it. On the other hand, she can buy "on tick" from the factory shop. . . .

Nor are the girl workers able to better their condition by organized or cooperative action. Trade unions are not allowed, and although in a few factories the workers are members they have to keep it secret. When a strike occurs among the men and the girls join in, it is usual for the management to lock up the girls in their dormitories and prevent their communicating with the men outside. Anyhow, if the girls could get out they would be helpless, as they cannot touch their savings held by the management and their homes are too far away for them to get to. Further, the police usually assist the employers by arresting the men's leaders. In the big towns like Osaka and Tokio it is not always possible to prevent the girls being drawn into trade unions in spite of their very short hours of contact with the outside world. They are sometimes drawn in by the men workers. When this is the case the manager of the factory writes to the girl's parents or even brings them up to the factory if necessary, threatens them that their daughter will have to leave and that they will no longer get their twelve yen a month from her wages, tells them that she has come under the influence of dangerous radicals, and so on. The parents, often not yet freed from feudal sentiments, terrified and frightened, then bring pressure to bear upon their daughter and she has to abandon the union. . . .

In Japan there is no unemployment insurance and no poor relief, in spite of the increasing amount of unemployment in the towns, nor are any sanitary services provided. The total expenses incurred per head for the women operatives under the heading of "welfare" are from 20 to 25 sen a day, or 7.50 yen a month, inclusive of loss on food, for which the girl pays 4.50 yen a month, but which costs about 9 yen. The 4 yen a month which goes toward her food may legitimately be added to the wages cost to raise the average wage from 30 to 34 yen a month. The remaining 3.50 (taking the higher figure of 25 yen) is equivalent to about 6s. 4d. [$1.50] a month. Set against this the English employer's expenses for health and unemployment insurance and rates and the balance is pretty plainly in favor of the Japanese employer, even if £2 or £3 a head, spread over two or three years, is allowed him for recruiting expenses. . . .

As regards the actual amenities provided for the Japanese workers in the big factories, there is some instruction in sewing and "flower arrangement," and in some factories by paying a small fee the girls can attend classes to continue their education. A cinema show is occasionally given. There are also lectures on "ethics," which means the inculcation of filial piety, and of loyalty to emperor and to employer, with a view to keeping the girls obedient and amenable to strict discipline and to prevent them from joining trade unions. Then there is the provision of baths and the hospital, which is kept up partly by the management and partly by the workers' health-insurance contributions. This is about all that comes under "welfare." The girls, of course, clean their own rooms and do their own washing, and they also clean the halls and passages.

Outside the big combined spinning and weaving concerns which belong to the Japan Master Cotton Spinners' Association are many small weaving mills where conditions have changed little in recent years, where hours are longer and working conditions worse, but where labor is not usually so

* These figures relate to average earnings for ten working hours daily. When hours were curtailed by forbidding work to go on between 11 p. m. and 5 a. m., piece rates were left as before and the girls told to make up the loss by working harder.

The yen is now at par [about 48 cents], but was then and had for long been less [about 44 cents].

intense. Here girls are still kept locked up till they have worked off the debt set down in their contracts; and one reads in the Japanese press of girls caught trying to escape over the high walls and injuring themselves, and of girls burned to death when a fire occurs because their windows were barred and the door locked. There are only a few dozen factory inspectors for the whole of Japan, and, moreover, fines, when imposed for working more than the eleven hours allowed by the law or for other offenses, are exceedingly low. More than half of Japan's 145,000 wide power looms, as well as all her narrow power looms and hand looms for manufacturing cloth for the home market, belong to small concerns outside the association, and of those concerns within the association only the model factories are shown to the foreign visitor.

But in these small weaving sheds, and to a lesser extent in the big mills, there is a growing number of women operatives who remain at work after marriage and come to the factory daily from their homes. As yet they are unorganized and in many places still belong to the rural population. But it seems inevitable that, with the growing unemployment in the towns, a permanent factory population must soon grow up around the cotton factories, large or small. In that event the trade unions will develop and the cotton workers will be able to force the employers to pay higher wages. This is the hope for the future from the point of view of the workers of both Japan and Lancashire. The Japanese employers, on the other hand, will endeavor to continue the present living-in system, since they are well aware that ignorant and helpless peasant girls can be paid lower wages and forced to harder toil than workers living outside the factory.

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

Plays to See

‡Flying High—Apollo—W. 42 St.
†Lost Sheep—Selwyn—42 St., W. of B'way.
†Lysistrata—44 St.—44 St., W. of B'way.
†Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45 St.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47 St., W. of B'way.
*The Last Mile—Sam H. Harris—42 St., W. of B'way.
‡The New Garriick Gaieties—Guild—52 St., W. of B'way.

Films

All Quiet on the Western Front—Central—47 St. and B'way.

Born Reckless, Saturday, July 26 to Tuesday, July 29; Safety in Numbers, Wednesday, July 30 to Friday, August 1—Little Carnegie Playhouse—57 St., E. of Seventh Avenue.

In Gay Madrid, Saturday, July 26 to Tuesday, July 29; Big Pond and With Mr. and Mrs. Gifford Pinchot in the South Seas, Wednesday, July 30 to Friday, August 1—The Plaza—58 St., E. of Madison Avenue.

Miracle of the Wolves, week beginning Sunday, July 27—Fifth Avenue Playhouse—66 Fifth Avenue.

News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.

Social Lion, Friday, July 25 to Sunday, July 27; Born Reckless, Monday, July 28 to Thursday, July 31—Eighth St. Playhouse—52 West 8 St.

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

SHOPPERS' CORNER

30% during July and August only, on Eastman Cameras, Kodaks, Films, and Supplies. As usual our discounts of 25 to 50% on other standard advertised merchandise still holds good. Write us or call John 1427 for prices. SERVWELL SYSTEM INC., 35 Maiden Lane, N. Y. C.

SPECIAL MID-SUMMER CLEARANCE SALE

10 to 20% discounts on all antique and modern blankets, rugs, Navajo jewelry, Pueblo pottery, Mexican glass, baskets and Guatemalan weavings.

Sale lasts until Aug. 10th only.

Open until 10 every night.

LA FIESTA—INDIAN TRADING POST
38 WEST 8TH STREET

POSITIONS WANTED

SECRETARY, editorial assistant — college woman, at present employed by eminent editor, will be free from September 1st or later. Well recommended. Box 2487, % The Nation.

YOUNG WOMAN with university degrees seeks position. Business and community experience:—personnel; magazine subscription-routeing; typist-correspondent; inventory; library; advertising; editing; interviewing; research; art and dramating directing. Civilized American. Box 2492, % The Nation.

HELP WANTED

WANTED; young lady to do stenography and typewriting for a couple of hours daily for a month, in exchange for accommodations in country. Slocum 8200, ask for Superintendent.

GRAPHOLOGY

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS is a practical method for taking personal inventory. No personal bias in graphology. Send handwriting. Character or vocational analysis, $1.00. Miss Florence Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

EDUCATIONAL

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN
Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 13th year.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN
GERMAN. Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th year. Also neglected English education.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

Psychoanalysis and Psychology
PRIVATE lessons and evening courses conducted by trained Swiss Psychologist, Ph.D. Reading and discussion of important scientific works in English, French, German. Introductory and advanced classes. Call 9-11 A.M. Cathedral 9544, Apt. 6; Dr. Moser.

RUSSIAN taught by university graduate, instructor in Russian at Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes.
VICTOR RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 25 W. 123rd St. Harlem 0487

To Nation Readers

When you make an inquiry on an advertisement appearing in The Nation do you use the "key address" or mention the fact that you saw the advertisement in The Nation?

It means much to the advertiser to know.

SUMMER

APARTMENT AT SEASHORE

SEA GATE, N. Y. Harbor. Convenient transportation by train or boat; restricted surf bathing. Will sublet for remainder of season, desirable apartment—2 rooms, kitchen and porch. Reasonable. Phone Mayflower 4186.

HIKING TOURS

DYRUS and Edith Cook are now conducting hiking tours over the old trails of the Catskill Mountains. Five-day trips. Two-donkey pack-train. All camping equipment provided. If your vacation period coincides with our yet unfilled dates we can make you reduced rates. Box 353, Woodstock, N. Y.

FOR SALE

A Unique Development
AN opportunity to create a permanent retreat for summer vacation and winter weekends for your family, near enough for New York commuting, is offered a few congenial professional families. Tennis, handball, social hall, children's playground, horseback riding, swimming on property. Golf courses and Sound bathing nearby. Unusual studio bungalow can be built to your specifications in an artistic, intellectual colony at Westport, Conn. Why continue to pay high rentals for unesthetic bungalows and send your children to camps? We should like to show you this mountain-like retreat, 1 hour from New York. Prices range from $2,500 for an acre and bungalow.
Royce, Wisconsin 1649

IN Adirondack Mts.—160 acres—5 room log cabin—peeled spruce—built 1865. Perfect condition. Wonderful summer home or hunting camp; cellar, garage. $3.800.00; easy terms. 100 other camps and cabins. Booklet. Earl Woodward, Luzerne, N. Y.

Summer advertising continued on following pages

SUMMER SUMMER

SCOPUS

The Vacation Playland

Away from city dirt and noise—at beautiful Trout Lake in the Adirondacks — delightful companions — unusual sport and social facilities — return to the city refreshed, invigorated —ready to tackle the job right!

Pep! Fun! Sport!

Swim! Row! Play!

Dietary Laws Observed.

SCOPUS

An Adult Camp of Distinction

IN THE ADIR[illegible]

P. O. LAKE GEO[illegible] Y.

City Ad[illegible]

11 WEST 42n[illegible] EET

Longacre [illegible]

ROCKY DALE LODGE

An Adult Camp in the Hills—Sellersvil[illegible] Pa.
2½ hours from N. Y.—1 hour from [illegible]hila.
Outdoor activities—NO GREENS FEES
Rates July and August $37.50

Write for Booklet

Executive Directors
WM. J. HELEGOTT WM. D. TENDLER
Social Director: "MORRY" GOLDBERG

Camp Sports · Hotel Comforts

Boating, Bathing, Fishing, Dancing, Entertainment galore. Tennis, Riding, Golf; large [illegible]cial and physical staff.

KENMORE

on the Beautiful Lake
N. WHITE LAKE, N. Y.
Phone: White Lake 114

Write for Booklet "N"

THE CRYSTAL VILLA

WOODCLIFF LAKE, N. J.

A rare combination of Country Pl[illegible]sures with City Comforts. All modern im[illegible]ments. Beautiful surroundings. Altitud[illegible]. Free of Mosquitoes. Excellent Meals [illegible]lightful Bathing and Fishing. 23 Mile[illegible]m New York City. Very Easy Commutation. Write for Booklet. Telephone Park Ridge 404.

THE SEA GULL

Something different for your holidays or vacation at this Russian-American Inn facing the [illegible]. All outdoor sports; cui[illegible] for the epicurean, also the seeker of [illegible] health diet; beautiful rooms.

1300 Ocean Ave. Phone Belmar 2
Belmar, N. J. N. Y. Phone Sprin[illegible]

BOARD—TUTORING—

BRYN MAWR graduate would take desirable boarder; would tutor girl or boy (specialties English composition, Latin). Beautiful house and grounds, one mile from village center, one mile from country club. Box 265, Ridgefield, Conn.; telephone 636.

Spend Your Vacation on the shores of the Queen of Mountain Lakes

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

Superb location at "America's first summer resort." All the most desirable camp features. The Wunnishaunta Booklet, sent free, includes pictures of camp activities, auto routes, train and airplane information.

MRS. SADIE BRICKMAN, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

HIDDEN IN THE CONNECTICUT HILLS

Swimming Boating Horseback

Tennis Handball Basketball

165 Acres of Rustic Beauty
Delicious food from our own farm
RATES FOR JULY $25
RATES FOR AUGUST $28
Reservations limited to [illegible]
Bungalows for two, three or more.
Write or Phone Direct
UNCAS LODGE, Uncasville, Conn.
Norwich 1858, Ring [illegible]

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

WARRENSBURG, N. Y.
A Camp for Adults in the Adirondacks
Most modern facilities for comfort and sports including golf
Booklet on request
City phone Lex. 8870

CAMP BETHLEHEM

Bethlehem, Conn.
Tel. 48—Ring 2, Woodbury, Conn.
Simple Camp Life in the Litchfield Hills
ADULT CAMP FAMILIES ACCOMMODATED
Sports: Boating, Bathing, Tennis, Handball and Dancing
Rates: July $25 August $27.50
Fare, Round Trip by Bus $5.00

HAMBURGER'S EVERGREEN (Health) FARM

Tel. Farmingdale 40 F 31—
near Asbury Park, Farmingdale, N. J.
VEGETARIAN HOUSE
A farm resort in a delightful rural setting [illegible] hr. from New York. Plenty of ground [illegible] about, [illegible] ball, [illegible]ming [illegible] and sport. [illegible] delicio[illegible]eal! [illegible] for in[illegible]

The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only [illegible] miles from New York.

Sports
Tennis, Boating
Swimming, Dancing
For reservations call Peekskill 1276

MILFORD

KENT, Connecticut

'The Camp for YOUth!'

A beautiful summering place for intelligent young folks and folks who stay young; informal, athletic, carefree; sheltered tent accommodations and log cabins; excellent meals.

"Mickey" Michaels is especially desirous of greeting Nation readers.

Rates Moderate.

Camp 'phone Kent 1-8
In New York : 1440 Broadway
PENnsylvania 7842

SEA GATE RENDEZ-VOUS

Where food is the best

A VACATION is a necessity; a change of surroundings greatly beneficial; wholesome food an elixir. You will enjoy all this at the Sea Gate Rendez-vous, where food is the best, where comfort, coziness and simplicity, aided by the sea air, and the health-giving rays of the sun, combines to restore poise, harmony and well being to the vacationist. Arrangements by week, day, or as long as your vacation lasts. Write 3913 Laurel Ave., Sea Gate, N. Y. Harbor, or Telephone Mayflower 8655.

CAMP TOPSTONE—For Adults

A Jewish Camp with a fine American spirit

All land and water sports, with free instruction. Splendid social activities. Excellent strictly Kosher meals.

Write for illustrated booklet
SHAPIRO BROS. Branchville, Conn.

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 122-F-3

Most beautiful estate, surrounded by brooks, lakes, woods and flowers. Absolutely private; Boating, Fishing, Tennis and other sports on premises. Golf and Saddle horses nearby. Limited accommodations, select following. Excellent Jewish Cuisine.

1½ hours on Erie ($2.60 round trip) on Route 17

FOR complete rest come to a quiet village in the Berkshire foothills. No swimming, no sports, but restful forest. Limited number of guests. Modern accommodations. Excellent food. $21-$25. Call weekdays Trafalgar 3574.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 6, 1930 No. 3396

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 137
EDITORIALS:
A Hoover Commission for Hoover 140
Fishing for Trouble 141
Stars of Bethlehem 141
Pitiful Rich 142
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 143
HOW PURE ARE THE MAILS? By Paul Telco 144
NO MEN WANTED. By Karl Monroe 146
THE PUBLIC DOMAIN. By Henry S. Graves 147
CATHOLICISM AND LIBERALISM. By the Reverend John A. Ryan 150
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 152
CORRESPONDENCE 153
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 154
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Belated Sheep. By Audrey Wurdemann 155
Desire for Oblivion. By Eda Lou Walton 155
Archbishop Laud. By Donald A. Roberts 156
A Political Theorist. By William Seagle 156
This Negro. By V. F. Calverton 157
Augustine of Tagaste. By Eugene Löhrke 158
Female Decorum. By Dorothy Van Doren 158
Books in Brief 159
Films: Where Broadway Scores. By Alexander Bakshy 160
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Struggle for Power in Persia. By Jan Van As 162

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE SWEEPING CONSERVATIVE victory in Canada goes far beyond all expectations even to insuring a clear majority for the Conservatives in the House of Commons. That the time was ripe for a change, even had there been no major issue, is plain. But there is no gainsaying the meaning of this outcome: the Conservatives were given the government thanks largely to Herbert Hoover and the Smoot-Hawley tariff. Unemployment was an issue and so was the plight of the farmer, but the tariff question predominated. The Canadian electorate felt that the time had come to make a stand against the United States and treat us to a dose of our own bitter tariff medicine. No less than $500,000,000 is the estimate the New York Times gives of the impending loss to the foreign trade of the United States if the Conservatives carry through their tariff reprisals. Why should they not? It is certainly time somebody taught the United States a sharp lesson that two can play the tariff game. Just now several are at it. Spain, France, and Germany have all acted. The Argentine is deeply stirred and is unofficially boycotting us. Now if Matthew Woll and the Fish committee and other seekers after notoriety by means of attacks upon Russia succeed in cutting off our commerce with that country with its vast potentialities, our foreign trade will be crippled and the task of disposing of our huge surplus crops and merchandise more difficult than ever. Even the vast wealth and power of the United States cannot be indefinitely maintained if we persist, by a short-sighted tariff policy, in flouting or ignoring the rest of the world.

SENATOR SIMEON FESS in place of Claudius Huston as Republican National Chairman? It would seem incredible if President Hoover's attitude toward Huston had not itself been incredible ever since the revelations which have made Mr. Huston's remaining in this office a stench in the nostrils of all decent Republicans. There can be only one interpretation placed upon the choice of Senator Fess: President Hoover wishes it known that he has definitely thrown in his lot with the most reactionary elements in the Republican Party. There is nothing even faintly progressive or liberal about the Senator from Ohio. In his point of view and general outlook he belongs back in the gay nineties with William McKinley. A more uninspiring chairman was certainly never chosen for a high political position. His personality is cold, his speeches are dull, lifeless, and certain to weary his audiences. The only groups that this selection will please are the ultra-dry Methodist and Baptist parts of the electorate. From now on we hope that no one will talk about the liberalism of Mr. Hoover or of his desire to make over the Republican Party along modern and progressive lines. The breach between himself and the Progressive wing of the party is complete.

ONCE MORE MR. HOOVER shows his hand, in his extraordinary letter to Representative Reece of Tennessee in which he goes out of his way to deliver a slap at that gallant soldier, Senator Norris of Nebraska. "I hear," writes the President, > that your opponents are charging you with failure to serve the interests of your constituents because you refused to accept the Senate plan for dealing with Muscle Shoals. The fact is that the House plan will secure developments of this great resource more effectively and more greatly in the interest of Tennessee than would the Senate plan. I am assured that the Senate plan cannot be passed in the House. Nor would I approve the plan, because it is not in the interest of Tennessee or the rest of the nation. . . .

We thus have the almost unprecedented spectacle of a President of the United States taking the trouble to become a partisan in a primary fight between two candidates of his own party. That this is undignified and humiliating even Mr. Hoover's friends must see. But he is evidently determined that everybody shall know where he stands on the power issue. When announcement was made that he would select Lieutenant Governor Edgar Jadwin as chairman of the Federal Power Commission it was assumed that Mr. Hoover had come out squarely for the power trust. Now, with his letter to Mr. Reece, there can be no possible doubt of it. No liberal can now fail to see that we are dealing with as complete a reactionary in the White House as the country has beheld there.

PUBLIC LIB

SIGNS OF BUSINESS RECOVERY, or even of stability on a moderately prosperous basis, are worth noting as an offset to the general feeling that business is in the doldrums and likely to stay there for an indefinite period. In spite of a good many cuts in dividend rates, leading industrial companies are reported by the Wall Street Journal to have paid out during the first six months of the present year more than $38,000,000 in excess of their dividend payments for the same period a year ago. Over $12,000,000 of this increase came from iron, steel, and equipment companies, only 4 out of 26 companies reducing their payments; payments by 38 oil companies showed a large gain, as did those of 16 chain-store organizations, and payments by drug and chemical industries were mainly upward. The railways placed in service during the first six months of the year 49,208 new freight cars and 411 new locomotives, compared with 32,794 cars and 319 locomotives in the first six months of 1929. Baldwin Locomotive Works, which for a number of years paid dividends out of a reserve set up from surplus, earned its common-stock dividend one and one-half times in the six months ended June 30, this being the first time for several years that the dividend has been covered by earnings. Savings banks report large gains in deposits, and money for real-estate mortgages is easier to get. Such items do not spell boom, but they are equally far from spelling calamity.

PREMIER TARDIEU has spoken out about parliamentary government in France in a tone which suggests that politics in his bailiwick are turning sour. With a really touching simplicity he laments that the French Parliament, instead of keeping to its original idea of serving the general interest, is looking after particular interests and spending a whopping lot of money in doing it. During the past year, for example, this aggregation of friends of the people added to the budget some $160,000,000 of expenditure for various schemes many of which the government opposed; while if sinking-fund charges and local expenditures are included, a quarter of the total national revenue is going annually for taxes. This is pretty bad, of course, even if some other countries probably make quite as bad a showing. The explanation which M. Tardieu offers is a familiar one, namely, that organized interests are stronger and more articulate than the mass of taxpayers. The important question is what M. Tardieu is going to do about it. Mussolini disposed of the apple of discord a decade ago by putting parliamentary government on the shelf and making himself dictator. The Germans, when they framed their constitution, thoughtfully provided for a temporary dictatorship such as President Hindenburg and Chancellor Bruening are now administering, and there is a dictatorship in Jugoslavia. Is M. Tardieu throwing out a hint of what may happen in France?

A DICTATORSHIP with a string tied to it is what we are witnessing in Germany, for the next Reichstag, under the constitution, will have to confirm all the acts of the Government under Article 48. This authorized the remarkable performances which Chancellor Bruening has had to his credit in the last few days. Not only has he put into effect the budget for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1931, at which the Reichstag had balked, but he has also decreed all the unfinished legislation on the docket. This included revision of the unemployment-insurance laws, relief for East Prussia's agrarians, authority for the Government to dissolve industrial cartels in certain cases if negotiations for price reduction break down, and additional tax measures calculated to bring in $115,000,000. This additional burden on the already sorely taxed German calls for a 2½ per cent "emergency sacrifice" levy on salaries of all higher officials and a 5 per cent increase on all incomes above 8,000 marks, or $2,000, in addition to a 10 per cent surtax on all incomes of bachelors and spinsters—surely an unusual, and probably in many cases, a cruel punishment for celibacy. For the moment the situation is tided over, and now that the temporary truce between the parties during President Hindenburg's trip to the freed Rhine territory is over, the election campaigning is in full swing, September 14 being the election date. Ominous is the announcement that the great Siemens-Halske electrical company has declared its intention to drop 10 per cent of its workers and that three other large companies will follow suit, for the official unemployment figures have gone up to 2,770,000—twice as many as a year ago.

CHILE AND GUGGENHEIM have been practically synonymous terms as far as the nitrate industry is concerned, and the identity will be still closer if an arrangement which has just been announced goes through. A merger in a new company, known as the Chile Nitrate Corporation, of all the nitrate properties in Chile, some 35 per cent of which are under Guggenheim control, is planned, with the Chilean government holding 50 per cent of the stock. The financial consideration involves the abandonment by the government of the export tax on nitrate and iodine, from which it has received about $30,000,000 annually, and the payment to the government by the new corporation of a minimum return of $22,000,000 for 1931, $20,000,000 for 1932, and $17,500,000 for 1933, after which latter date the government will have the dividends on its stock and the proceeds of a 6 per cent income tax. It is believed that the receipts of the government under the new arrangement will considerably exceed those which it has had hitherto. What the Guggenheim and other interests expect to get is not stated, but it is safe to conclude that they do not expect to lose anything. As Chile has about all the deposits of sodium nitrate known to exist in commercial quantities, the conditions of a joint and several monopoly would seem to be ideal. What one would like to know is which of the parties to the fifty-fifty scheme really expects to control the other.

DETROIT HAS RECALLED its mayor by a large majority in a heavy vote. Mayor Charles Bowles, political adventurer, became mayor of Detroit in November on a reform platform with the backing of the Anti-Saloon League and of Robert Oakman, wealthy real-estate dealer and a great political power in Detroit. Oakman withdrew his support from Bowles when the latter appointed as Commissioner of Public Works John Gillespie, an ancient enemy of Oakman's and president of a company that bonds contractors on city jobs. Mr. Gillespie's appointment was one of several moves in what appeared to be an attempt to build up a political machine in Detroit's non-partisan municipal government. Mayor Bowles was charged in the recall petition with tolerating lawlessness, dismissing faithful public servants, and ignoring campaign pledges. The twelve-day campaign preceding the vote was conducted almost entirely by radio and was notable for its vituperative violence. The Detroit News and the Detroit Free Press, which have been enemies for years, united to oust Bowles. On the other hand, many prominent citizens, including Henry Ford, opposed the recall. Meanwhile Gerald E. Buckley, a radio announcer who was active in the campaign against the mayor, was killed by gangsters an hour after he had given out the final results of the election. Bowles automatically becomes a candidate in another election which must be held within thirty days. Whether the recall, which has here been exercised for the first time in a large American city, will be effective in improving Detroit's municipal fortunes remains to be seen.

A FINE OF $500 is the reward handed to John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, for violating an injunction debarring him from interfering with the officers and workers of the Illinois district. The row between Lewis and the miners is of long standing, but the quarrel which led to injunction proceedings dates back to the summer of 1929, when Lewis made serious charges against the president and other leaders of the Illinois federation and presently revoked the State charter, set up a provisional organization, and tried to get possession of the records and offices. At this point the injunction interfered, the deposed leaders and their followers contending that the constitution of the United Mine Workers, not having been extended for another three-year period in 1929, was void and that Lewis was without authority. At Springfield, Illinois, last March, a reorganization convention adopted a new constitution and declared Lewis's place vacant, while forty minutes later another "regular" convention at Indianapolis approved a referendum which purported to keep the old constitution in effect and gave Lewis its unanimous support. Lewis, it is announced, will appeal the fine, so the controversy may go on until frost comes. As Lewis's supporters apparently number only a handful of the miners, his salary of $12,000 appears to be imperiled.

THE OLD-TIME RELIGION is on its last legs, if a questionnaire sent to a hundred prominent evangelists by the publicity director of various religious organizations is to be believed. Thirty of the hundred answered the inquiry by saying they had given up evangelism because they could no longer make a living by it. Those who still practice the profession complain that converts are few and far between, that free-will offerings are distressingly small, and that the motion picture, the radio, the automobile, and sports are, among other things, responsible for the falling off of a desire for things of the spirit. This, of course, is directly in line with what is happening in the Protestant church generally. Life is rushing away from the church, and the church cannot keep up. Our god is science; we see him in the wind and upon the waters, we hear him through the invisible air, and he dwells in a black rubber sound box, or a silver wing, or a smooth-running wheel. He is ubiquitous, omniscient, all-powerful. It is no wonder that the god of churches has fallen behind. The race is to the swift. We have no time for contemplation, for self-examination, for sitting still and listening to a discourse on conduct. The evangelism which is dying out is perishing not only of its own anemia, but because it has been wounded to the heart by a stronger, faster, louder faith. We can be glad that the evangelism is disappearing; but we cannot be unqualifiedly grateful for what has taken its place.

ONE COULD AS SOON THINK of the disappearance of Bunker Hill Monument from Boston as of anything happening to the Boston Transcript. Hence, the news that the Transcript is celebrating its centennial does not occasion us surprise, except that it is not its second centennial which it is celebrating. In some respects, it is true, one sometimes feels that the Transcript is being edited with the point of view of Plymouth Colony about 1650. In its narrowness, often in its bitterness and its prejudice, it has usually seemed to typify the Boston of the censorship, the Boston of the Watch and Ward snoopers, the Boston that murdered Sacco and Vanzetti. Yet it would be entirely unfair to dismiss the Transcript as standing only for this. If it is reactionary, it is also clean throughout; it carries an amazing amount of news; it is admirably devoted to the interests of its city; it has for years printed able articles on foreign happenings and is distinguished in the space it gives to art, music, and the drama. In short, it has retained untarnished many of the highest standards of the old American journalism, not the least of which is its typographical excellence and individuality. We wish it another hundred years of conservative existence with a full treasury, but it will have far more than that. The day that Boston is in ruins and the last dweller of the Back Bay passes into history, we are certain that he will enter eternity clutching in his hands a copy of the Transcript, with his glazing eyes fastened upon the latest news of Harvard, of Mrs. Jack Gardner's museum, the Arnold Arboretum, and the last nuptials of a Higginson to a Cabot.

AS A PIONEER in aviation, Glenn H. Curtiss was second in this country only to the Wright brothers. Like them, he began his career in a bicycle-repair shop. With the advent of the motor cycle he turned his attention to the manufacture of light gasoline engines, and in the Curtiss motor cycle he established speed records that endured for twenty years. When he began to be interested in the airplane he followed the same principles that had brought success to the Wrights. It is interesting to recall that the changes from the Wright planes which Curtiss adopted for his early machines—notably, the wheel landing gear instead of skids and the use of special ailerons for lateral control instead of a warping of the entire wing—are retained by the airplane of today. He made an interesting theoretical contribution when, by equipping the old Langley "aerodrome" of 1903 with a model engine and making some adjustments in minor details, he showed it to be capable of successful flight. When Curtiss began his experiments the present separation of designer and aviator had not begun; the inventor had to fly his own machine, and this before any predecessors had developed an art of flying that could be passed on by instruction. The inventor, in brief, had to be willy-nilly a daredevil, and the early flights that now seem ridiculously brief called for real heroism.

A Hoover Commission for Hoover

THAT Mr. Hoover's administration is a good deal of a flop even his friends are admitting. They point out, of course, that he was not responsible for the Wall Street collapse, which ought to be called the Coolidge slump, and they insist that when he finishes his term of office he will be recognized at his true worth because by then his long-term policies will be going into effect. That may perhaps be true; we should feel more certain of it if we could identify any of those long-term policies. But even his best friends admit today that his is now the most unpopular administration in many years; that when his picture is shown in the movie houses there is never a hand-clap for him; that he has alienated many groups of citizens; that he has made a number of hurtful appointments; that he has made no progress whatever toward the promised complete reorganization and modernization of the government.

Now what to do about all this? Fortunately, we have a genuine remedy to suggest. It is Mr. Hoover's invariable custom when a problem presents itself to appoint a commission to deal with it. That has a double purpose: first, it gives the comforting feeling that something has been done about it, so that the public can forget all about the matter with complete satisfaction; second, if the commission ever reports, say in a year or two, its recommendations may or may not be acted upon as the Great Engineer deems best. As our readers are, we think, aware, Mr. Hoover is about to appoint his nineteenth commission—one to deal with our timber situation. That will make it all the easier for him to accept this weekly journal's suggestion to appoint his twentieth commission to sit upon himself and find out just why he has slipped off the track so completely. The Hoover Commission on Hoover (patent applied for) is our proposal and we deem it to be one of the most constructive ever advanced in this journal's sixty-five years.

The more we think of it the more we, and those of our friends whom, in strict confidence, we have sounded out on the matter, are pleased with the whole project. It must appeal to Mr. Hoover, for we are paying him that sincerest flattery of imitating his own technique. The commission itself would not be difficult to select. For chairman we nominate William E. Borah. In view of his insistence in the campaign of 1928 that Herbert Hoover was the American best fitted to assume the Presidency, it is obviously proper that the Idaho Senator should preside over the committee to ascertain why the President appears to be one of the least-fitted to conduct his high office. To represent the press we nominate the dearest of his journalistic apologists and Rapidan guests, Mark Sullivan; on second thought, however, we substitute in his stead William Hard, than whom no one has better or more eloquently described the Hoover method of reform by commission or by conference within an industry. It was Mr. Hard who wrote of Mr. Hoover: "He has established among us a fundamental and audacious political novelty. He has evolved the private-public governmental department. He has evoked the public-private business citizen."

Our next selection is the Honorable Bascom Slemp. Our reason for this will be plain to those who have been in contact with the Great Engineer's occupancy of the White House. For truth compels us to state that there is a great deal of creaking in the White House machine. Occasionally sand seems to get into the gears; for the first time in the memory of man serious letters to the President are not even being acknowledged, while some of the most important are being merely referred by the third secretary to the War Department or the State Department or some other official pigeonhole. More uncomfortable than that is the regrettable fact that since President Hoover assumed office the cost of running the White House and its offices has increased no less than $90,000 a year—rather surprising, this, for the most efficient and experienced administrator, et cetera, that we have ever had in the White House. An increase in the size of the staff is to be found both in the offices and in the executive mansion. There are now no fewer than thirty-seven persons employed in the executive offices, while seventy-seven persons minister to the needs of the President and his Lady in the White House. In one year the cost of the mansion has risen from $249,280 to $287,320. In the executive offices the increase is from $96,480 to $126,120. We are aware, of course, that the increases were made for the sake of efficiency. But what the Hoover Commission on Herbert Hoover should find out is whether the extra help has really helped or hurt and whether the President and his wife could not perhaps get on with fewer than seventy-seven servants, who do not include in their numbers the special White House police. Bascom Slemp was Mr. Coolidge's secretary in the days of Coolidge economy; who better than he to sit upon our commission?

As for the other two members, we nominate first Senator David Reed, both as a reward for his services in London in keeping the British aristocracy in line for the naval treaty and in order that the ablest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton may be represented by his most immediate political lieutenant. Now it will be noticed that all of those thus far nominated are quite friendly to the President. In order that there be a touch of the critical spirit in the commission we nominate for the last place Norman Thomas of New York. It is especially fitting that one of the two men whom Mr. Hoover defeated for the Presidency should pass judgment upon the incumbent.

We hope that no one will believe we are captious in this matter. On the contrary, we think it would be one of the most remarkable happenings in the history of the administrative life of the United States if one Chief Executive should use this admirable means of certifying to the country at large his own efficiency, besides receiving from it suggestions as to how he may best charm the country back into the state of mind it had on election day in 1928. We can well imagine that, in the years to come, writers on the governmental evolution of the United States will find no more striking subject for comment than the remarkable and spontaneous creation of just the right machinery at just the right time, known as the Hoover Commission on Hoover (compliments of the New York Nation).

Fishing for Trouble

IN directing toward the chairman of the Amtorg Trading Corporation questions concerning the political beliefs of Communists in general and the trade relations existing between the United States and Soviet Russia, the Fish investigating committee into red activities in this country has gone far beyond the limits it originally set for itself. Moreover, it was rebuked not only by Acting Secretary of State Castle, who announced that "the policy of the department has been and will continue to be to extend to Soviet business men the same courtesies granted to other nationalities," but by our best-known citizen, Calvin Coolidge himself. Mr. Coolidge said very sensibly in the Herald Tribune on July 25:

> Our government has no diplomatic relations with Russia. But it is perfectly lawful for our nationals, at their own risk, to trade with Russia, or for her nationals to trade here. . . . It is not the practice to inquire very minutely into the beliefs of foreigners coming here temporarily for genuine mercantile purposes. . . . It had been supposed that the agents of the Amtorg were not engaged in anything but trade. If an investigation shows that they are taking advantage of the hospitality we have granted them . . . our government will take proper notice of that fact. Meantime it is proper to await proof before reaching final judgment. Our people are so thoroughly attached to their own system of self-government that we need not feel it is in imminent danger.

Representative Fish and his colleagues set themselves the task of investigating red activities in the United States. To that end they made themselves ridiculous by their examination of New York City schools, in which 3 out of the city's 810 schools were found to be very slightly infected with the "virus of communism," and by visiting certain Communist camps where they were greeted by nose-thumbing Communist children and treated to denunciatory speeches, highly uncomplimentary to themselves. They then commenced their examination of the Amtorg Trading Corporation, with offices in New York City. From the first the inquiry was evidently packed against the Amtorg. Every witness called previously had been permitted to read a prepared statement to the investigating committee. Mr. Bogdanov asked permission to submit a similar statement and was refused. The committee, he was told, wanted to ask its own questions. Later, Mr. Bogdanov was allowed to enter his statement in the record after it had been censored by the committee! Representative Fish desired to show that Amtorg was not only a trading corporation but was engaged in political propaganda in this country. To this end he adduced as evidence only the documents offered by former Police Commissioner Whalen. John Spivak, a reporter on the New York evening Graphic, told how he had traced the Whalen documents to a New York printer, and pronounced them the work of Russian monarchists. Internal evidence was offered by Joseph Michael, attorney for Amtorg, of some twenty-odd errors in the documents which indicated that they were forgeries. Mr. Fish was thus left high and gasping, with the wicked Russians at least temporarily triumphant.

Meanwhile the Soviet press has reacted to the investigation in very positive language. If the United States does not wish to trade with Soviet Russia, it says in effect, then Soviet Russia will take its trade and the millions of dollars attached thereto elsewhere. In answer to this threat Matthew Woll, of the American Federation of Labor, announces himself the spokesman of the Wage-Earners' Protective Conference, whatever that may be, which sets itself to invoke the new tariff law with regard to forced labor—to go into effect January 1, 1932—against Soviet imports. Stop trade with Russia, says Mr. Woll, and protect the American workingman and the American system of high wages from products made by the miserable, exploited, enslaved, impoverished Soviet laboring men. If this is a picture which American visitors to Russia do not recognize, Mr. Woll believes in it with all his heart. We shall, therefore, see a duel between American business men desirous of capturing the millions of dollars worth of trade annually which Soviet Russia will offer us and those other business men, represented by Mr. Woll, who, with a bias against the red bogy man, fear that their own profits will be endangered by "dumping" of Soviet goods. The struggle between capitalism and communism is only beginning. It is beginning because for the first time communism, not by political propaganda to overthrow our government, but by increasing its economic strength to formidable proportions, is actually becoming a menace to the capitalist system. We shall see the tide against Russia rising. It behooves those of us who desire not to be drowned in a sea of partisanship to steer carefully through the troubled waters. The Soviets must have their chance to put Russia on its legs economically; gestures to prevent from a Hamilton Fish or a Matthew Woll, one suspects, will be futile.

Stars of Bethlehem

JUST how much financial inducement a man has to have to make him a first-rate business executive is a question which it would be difficult to answer satisfactorily in the abstract, but how the matter works in the concrete is a bit clearer now than it was before the merger of Youngstown Sheet and Tube and Bethlehem Steel got into the courts. Mr. Cyrus S. Eaton, principal representative and spokesman of the Youngstown stockholders who have opposed the merger, became uncomfortably insistent some days ago in demanding specific information about the salary and perquisites paid to Eugene G. Grace, president of the Bethlehem corporation. Mr. Eaton, of course, was not trying to nose into Mr. Grace's private affairs, but he had a suspicion that the payments to Mr. Grace were not only extremely large, but that they also constituted an unwarranted burden upon the financial structure of the corporation. Moreover, he insisted that the Youngstown stockholders were entitled to know about the matter even if they were not holders of stock in Bethlehem Steel, since the charges which the services of Mr. Grace imposed upon the latter company were a subject regarding which the Youngstown stockholders ought to be informed as an aid in making up their minds about going into the merger or staying out.

When, after strenuous objection by Bethlehem attorneys and due deliberation by the court, the information was at last forthcoming, it appeared that Mr. Grace had been, on the whole, quite handsomely treated. His salary, it seems, was only a paltry $12,000 a year, but since 1925 he had been paid an annual bonus of 3.319 per cent on the total fund on which the bonus payments are calculated. In 1929 this fund amounted to about $49,000,000, so that Mr. Grace's bonus for that year came to the tidy sum of $1,623,753. For the past five years and the first six months of the present year, Mr. Grace testified, he had received $5,431,684 in bonuses. Adding his salary of $12,000 a year, this useful executive had contrived to harvest $5,497,684 since the glad New Year's Day of 1925 when the reaping season began.

There is nothing mean about the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, and if it singles out Mr. Grace for special favor because of his go-getting ability it also dispenses some rather substantial blessings to others. The corporation has a system of "incentive bonuses" which Charles M. Schwab, chairman of the board, administers. A letter written by Mr. Schwab in 1917 explained the system to the court. Briefly, the bonus payments are made on a sliding scale, beginning with 4.73 per cent for net earnings of $2,000,000 less fixed charges but before depreciation, and rising to a maximum of 8 per cent for earnings of more than $36,000,000. In 1917 these bonuses were shared by ten executives, including Mr. Grace; they are now, Mr. Grace testified, shared by fourteen or fifteen. The total amount paid in 1929 was $3,425,306. For the first six months of 1930 it was $1,390,107, or about 6½ per cent on the net earnings—not so bad for a dull period.

Every little while, when the report of some big salary gets into the news, financial writers fall to debating the question whether any man anywhere is worth a million dollars or more a year to anybody for anything. Of course they never agree that he is or is not. Obviously, there is something to be said for a bonus as an "incentive," provided the person who gets it really earns it by what he does instead of getting it as a rake-off from the ability or labor of others. The Wall Street Journal, which cannot be accused of hostility to big business, nevertheless remarks, apropos of the Youngstown-Bethlehem controversy, that if such bonuses as the Bethlehem company affects are to be paid, the stockholders ought to be told of it. A search of the annual reports of the company, it declares, "fails to reveal any other reference to the bonus system" than that contained in the report for 1917, the year in which Mr. Schwab wrote his letter, and it is twelve years since the stockholders, in 1918, approved the system. Everybody knows that the stockholders' list of Bethlehem Steel, like that of every other large corporation, has changed very considerably in the past twelve years, and it may well be doubted if any large number of the present stockholders knew of the existence of this onerous bonus system until Mr. Eaton irreverently brought the whole thing to light. Here is a phase of high finance well worth looking into, especially now when American industry feels a good deal depressed. We do not want to seem inquisitive, but it would be highly interesting to know just what Mr. Grace does for his million and more a year that could not be equally well done by any one of a number of other persons for a fourth or a tenth of that sum.

Pitiful Rich

ON July 20, at Quogue, Long Island, Mrs. Rebecca Wendel Swope, eighty-seven years old, breathed her last. Her property was left to Ella, now eighty, the last of six Wendel sisters. It consisted of real estate, accumulated in the family for two centuries, and worth more than $100,000,000.

The founder of the family fortunes was John Wendel, who left the fur business at the same time as the first John Jacob Astor, and laid upon his descendants the duty of never buying anything but choice New York real estate and never thereafter letting it go. John Gottlieb Wendel, his descendant, opposed marriage for any of his six sisters on the ground that it would disperse the accumulated property and put it under other names than Wendel. So he kept his sisters in the four-story brick-and-brownstone house that has stood on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street since 1856, and still stands as it was built, without telephone, lit only by gas, shuttered. There the sisters have lived. They continued, until they died, to wear the round sailor hats popular in their 'teens in the sixties and seventies, and to make their own clothes—always black, and worn till shabby—without the aid of a sewing machine. There was a rebellion in 1899, when Georgiana, at fifty, ran away and appeared alone at the Park Avenue Hotel. Her brother had her committed to the psycopathic ward in Bellevue. When John Gottlieb Wendel died in 1915, the four surviving sisters turned over the management of the property to Rebecca Wendel, who late in life had had the strength of will to defy her brother and marry Professor Luther Swope. Ella Wendel still lives in the house on Fifth Avenue, now surrounded by skyscrapers. Last year the coachman died and the horses and carriage were disposed of. The family has had no known charities.

All this sounds more like a novel by Balzac (though the New York Times is to be congratulated for an admirable news story) than a literal account of anything probable in the New York of 1930. So rare is such avarice among our own rich that many of us had imagined that the last of the type passed with the death of Hetty Green. In the life of the wealthy we have been taught to deplore a senseless extravagance; but here we face a senseless penuriousness. We have been taught that conspicuous waste not only breeds envy but draws capital and labor away from the production of more necessary goods and raises living costs for the rest of us. The Wendels were never guilty of conspicuous waste; but neither, apparently, did they recognize any social obligation that great wealth might entail. What they did was simply to forget entirely that property was a means and to treat it as an end. They never in any proper sense owned their real estate, but were owned by it. Great wealth brings an opportunity for great personal enjoyment and for great public service. The Wendels muffed both.

What we seem to need is more adult education for millionaires. There are too many books on how to be successful, and too few on what to do after that. Any great magnate will tell you with pride how he made his first million, but he is likely to look angry or uncomfortable if you ask him how he spent it.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

NEW YORK, I fear me very much, is turning moral. The task upon which one reformer after another barked his shins was finally accomplished by the bears of Wall Street. Broadway is not Broadway any more. It is not the contention of this Jeremiah to assert that no place still stands where an amendment may not be violated. Indeed, I am by no means certain that the speakeasies have declined numerically. It is the spirit which is weak. Even the dealers in synthetic gin are suffering in much the manner of Western farmers. The bootlegger has begun to feel the pinch occasioned by overproduction. The dreadful truth of the matter is that the young and old of Manhattan have begun to learn the habit of early to bed. After three in the morning one will find hardly a single familiar face though he ride or walk the length of the island. Possibly one may sit about a little later if he happens to know the haunts of Harlem, but most inhabitants of what was once the nation's metropolis can only choose in the early morning between a glass of buttermilk in a dairy lunch or a good night's rest at home.

Even by midnight the greater part of the town lies now in oafish slumber. We are confronted not with a theory but a fact. That Bagdad on the Subway for which O. Henry wrote his heart out is dead and all but buried. If some Coal Oil Johnny were to come whooping into town tomorrow there would not be sufficient enterprise left among the night-club men to make them sit up and help him spend his money.

The most alarming symptom of the debacle was observed personally by your correspondent within the fortnight. By dint of great executive labors and the use of personal charm he managed to assemble a party which consented to motor across Long Island in order to observe the gay and frenzied doings of a Sunday night at Texas Guinan's. The first shock came when the local hackman confessed that he had never heard of Miss Guinan nor of her cabaret. And this was no remote mountain guide but a public chauffeur living not more than twenty miles from the place where once the hundreds came to give the little girl a great big hand. By means of flares and radio beacons the party did manage in the end to hit upon the haven. We were helped a little by the fact that above the door there hung a huge electric sign proclaiming that here indeed was "Texas Guinan's Show Place."

Yet all is not gaiety which glitters. Though one in the morning had hardly passed Miss Guinan's show was over. The waiters were about to pile the chairs upon the table and the sprightly revue apparently had been performed for the edification of scarcely more than half a dozen. Where were the men of spirit who once made entertainment hum in this and other jovial haunts? Quite obviously, they were not at Texas Guinan's. Anaconda, I suppose, had slain its hundreds and United States Steel its thousands. But I am much afraid that something more than a stock-market slump has gone into this period of retrenchment. It may even be that the old pioneer spirit has ended. Indeed, as the Macy advertisements maintain, it has become fashionable to be thrifty.

Henry Ford and Miss Guinan are representatives of the old school which is passing. Mr. Ford, if I remember correctly, once advised young men that there were better things to do with money than to save it. Miss Guinan, I am certain, ran her business upon the selfsame premise. And even though the reckless age has ended I cannot help paying some slight tribute of sorrow to the older generation which ordered things more adventurously. American greatness was established by a spendthrift crew. The makers of the West never thought of the morrow. Conservation was unknown to them. In one of Harvey Fergusson's books I remember his telling of how miners in the great undeveloped Southwest would dynamite an entire lake just to get a couple of trout for breakfast.

Of course, from one point of view these fellows were gross fools. The lake once dynamited turned forever barren, except perhaps for bullheads. And yet they were blessed and romantic fools and but for their recklessness America would still be a straggling wilderness as far as the country west of the Mississippi is concerned. The pioneer used up the natural resources which he found and with each spring he had to press west in search of newer hunting grounds. He was no conservationist. What he had to spend he tossed about with lavish hand like any gilded youth on Broadway. It would be foolish to contend that waste is ever admirable. I will admit that it is somewhat sentimentally appealing. And, for better or worse, it is part of the American heritage. Possibly the old mining-camp spirit of Manhattan may yet be restored, not by the inhabitants but by a new influx of pioneers. There could come a rebellion against the smug complacency of California and all those sections of the West where a conservative puritanism has rooted in. Perhaps we may hear the cry, "Go East, young man." This is not Eldorado possibly. Few find it possible to gather gold in the streets of Manhattan but at least they will have a chance to toss it about. If they bring their own. I think that the decline of the metropolis may be explained by its present readiness to compromise with the thrifty. Things were handled better by our grandfathers. For instance, I am told that the theater is dwindling because of the excessive prices charged by speculators. Now the managers will war upon them and possibly exterminate them. I cannot speak for the newer generations. In my day this would have been a suicidal psychology. There was nothing the old New Yorker enjoyed more than paying some fantastic price, which he could not possibly afford, for his theater tickets.

When a patron has to hand out nineteen or twenty dollars for two theater tickets his first reaction is one of protest. But in the long run he gets his money's worth. Ours is a rigorous climate and through hot summer nights and long winter evenings every New Yorker may spend his spare time in complaining to his neighbor of the manner in which he has been exploited by landlord, bootlegger, and ticket speculator. Once we lived by listening to the complaints of each other. That day is gone. But let us hope that it is not forever.

HEYWOOD BROUN

How Pure Are the Mails?

By PAUL TELCO

HOW pure are the United States mails? In the first place, they are as pure as the Post Office Department cares to make them. The solicitor at Washington, as everyone knows, has arbitrary power to bar from the mails anything he may judge to be fraudulent or offensive. His ruling can be reversed only by expensive recourse to the federal courts.

No one can accuse the Post Office Department of lack of zeal. Alert postal inspectors are constantly on guard in all sections of the country ready to swoop down on any offending bit of mail. An unfavorable report to Washington sets the machinery of investigation and censorship in motion. The discrimination of the postal authorities, on the other hand, has been seriously challenged. It is fair to judge the department by its works. What is barred from the mails is more or less common knowledge. "The Decameron," the works of Rabelais, "Madeleine," and on occasion the Birth Control Review, the American Mercury, and Life have been refused mailing privileges by a sensitive Post Office Department which objects to the use of the word censorship as a description of its activities. Mary Ware Dennett's pamphlet "The Sex Side of Life" was the last notable object of post-office censorship, though it has since been reinstated as fit for the mails by three federal judges.

But what of the material that goes through the mails continuously and without question? Let us begin with gambling devices.

The Paramount Manufacturing Company of Kansas City, Missouri, makes playing cards—but let their own advertisements, which enjoy the freedom of the mails, tell the story:

> Our cards are all made by the new "factory process." The work cannot be detected unless you know the Secret Key. . . . All in sealed packages. These are GENUINE Bicycle and Bee cards and not an imitation.
>
> LUMINOUS CARD WORK No. 999
>
> This is one of the cleverest styles of work ever placed on cards. The illustration to the left shows how they look to the naked eye. The illustration to the right shows how they look when you wear our special glasses. BANG! The numbers show up so big that they can be seen twenty feet away. . . .
>
> . . . Card Wrappers. These are glassine wrappers which are an exact duplicate of the inner wrappers used in playing cards, a necessity to those marking their own cards. . . . Line and Blockout Ink. This ink was developed by a Southern gambler of long experience. It will give perfect results. . . . Thumb-Nail Punch. This clever little punch fastens under the thumb nail. Pricks cards during play. Fine for second dealing.

The Paramount Manufacturing Company claims leadership in its line. Evidently it caters to a prosperous clientele, for the price of the cards is $7 or more per deck.

Another mail-order house which patronizes the United States mails specializes in slot-machine slugs.

> We make the finest nickel slugs obtainable for slot-machine use. This avoids the trouble of making change and they will work in any machine where silver is used. . . . Prices: five-cent slugs, $1.50 per hundred; ten-cent slugs, $1.25 per hundred; twenty-five-cent slugs, $2.00.

The Central Novelty Company of Chicago advertises "perfect steel slugs for telephones only, size of nickel, avoid delay by having slugs. Price 80 cents per hundred postpaid."

The Winner Supply Company, of Kansas City, Missouri, manufactures loaded dice, "missers" and "passers," "special filled transparent dice," "quality dice with gold and platinum loads," special "dead ace," "dead deuce," "dead trey," and "ace-deuce" sets. For a pittance of $36.50 a very good set of "missers" can be obtained, red or green transparent, with extra heavy platinum loads. It's a bargain!

So much for gambling devices, though there is one thing further to be pointed out, in justice both to the companies who put them in the mails and to the postal inspectors who let them go through. Each manufacturer is scrupulous to state in his literature and on his packages that his wares are sold for "magical purposes only" and not for gambling!

Medicinal panaceas, of course, offer a great field. They are not labeled "for magical purposes only" but they might as well be. For instance, anyone who suffers from gallstones, jaundice, constipation, liver and stomach trouble, sourness, heartburn, gas, thick bile, torpid liver, inflammation of the gall bladder, loss of weight or too much weight, chronic dyspepsia, or vomiting—or all of these—may receive through the mail from the Eklum Distributing Service of Dunkirk, New York, the guaranteed product of Beyer's System's Medical Department, Beyer's Stomach Tablets (good for what ails you, if you haven't got it you get it). These tablets will relieve you, if not of your pains, at least of $3. They will probably travel in the same sacred mail pouch with the literature of the D. Smythe Company of Newark, Missouri. This company specializes in "black magic" and "herb curios." They are distributors of "Pow-Wows or the Long-Lost Friend." "Containing a collection of the most mysterious, wonderful, and valuable arts and remedies for man and beast. Per copy, $1."

The same company dispenses, with the help of the United States Post Office, one of the most popular herbs on the mail-order market. It is called the "Adam and Eve root," and consists of > . . . a pair of roots in one, called Adam and Eve. The upper one is Adam and the under one Eve. Valued for its magic qualities in restoring vitality . . . also to bring back and hold the love of a husband, wife, or sweetheart. Sold by us at 35 cents a box for its medicinal value in bladder and kidney diseases. As it is impossible to always get the roots we reserve the right to send it in powdered form, which is just as good.

And this is only one of many restorers of "vitality" which are advertised and may be obtained by mail.

It is well known that birth-control information is legally barred from the mails. The Milo Chemical Company of Brooklyn, maker of contraceptive suppositories, gets around this slight difficulty by the device commonly employed by makers of supplies used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. The maker of malt and hops prints on his products the warning words "Do not," followed by explicit directions for making intoxicating beer. The Milo Chemical Company warns its customers not to use its product under certain conditions or it will act as a contraceptive. The De Luxe Agency of Reno, Minnesota, and the Davidson Company of Port Arthur, Ontario, Canada, are less scrupulous. They not only send contraceptives through the mail. They label and advertise them as such. And these are only three of several hundred concerns and individuals engaged in the same business. The fact that such scientific works as Dr. Konikow's "Voluntary Motherhood" and Margaret Sanger's "Family Limitation" are never allowed to darken a post-office wicket helps to increase the sales of compounds which medical opinion describes in terms ranging from "questionable" through "absolutely unreliable" to "harmful" and "poisonous."

To go on with the list. In sunny Florida Judge Daniel A. Simmons has discovered that the thing most desired in the world is happiness. Fortunately he has discovered that happiness can be obtained by any man or woman the instant he or she becomes free, "free from disappointment, sickness, fear, worry, poverty, and failure." And anyone can free himself from any or all of these afflictions by means of Judge Simmons's brand-new religion, Christian Psychology. The good judge, trading under the name of the American Institute of Psychology, is now busily engaged in the charitable act of freeing his brethren from their misery and making them happy by selling them his new religion for the special introductory price of $25 cash, "$27.50 on easy payments, or for $30 on still easier payments." Any one or more of the following blessings may be obtained through its exercise: "more money, success in profession, more friendship, love and popularity, a coveted position or promotion in business, society, or public life, a home for yourself and family, better health and more peace and poise of mind," and last but not least, "a happy love relation." He is ready to tell his customers "how to pray for the things we want in such a way as to get them," and he guarantees results or your money back (try and get it).

If you are not in the market for happiness perhaps you would like a touch of height. Malcolm Ross, British "Height Specialist" of Scarborough, England, solicits customers for his height-increasing services through the United States mails. Those who wish to grow may send $10 to Mr. Malcolm. He will cheerfully accept it. Or if you are out of a job, writing to John C. Hohn of Cullom, Illinois, will give you something to do. Few persons in desperate need of employment would hesitate to send the measly sum of ten cents to one dollar to Mr. Hohn—and there are others—in return for his secret and presumably infallible advice on "How to get the job you want" and "How to get it when all other methods fail." In these days of Hoover prosperity the dimes and dollars must be rolling in.

Last but not least, there is the great field of love and sex, as exploited by the mail-order publishing houses. Bearing in mind the extraordinary activity of the Post Office authorities in keeping such literature as "The Decameron" and the works of Rabelais out of the nation's mail boxes, let us examine, for instance, the books written by anonymous "authorities" and distributed by the mail-order house of Stephen Wetzel Company, Valhalla, New York.

In one instructive book is to be found a chapter on The Philosophy of Hugging. (I purposely refrain from too free quotation from the works under discussion lest The Nation be deprived of its mailing privileges.) The "philosophy" runs in part as follows:

> Too much care cannot be exercised in putting arms around the young girl of today, and we wish to impress this fact upon the mind of the young men who are just coming upon the stage of action. . . . Hug easy until you find the patient will stand more, and then you can apply the proper squeezer.

Psychometric Charming also contains valuable information.

> You must feel friendly toward the lady whom you desire to win. . . . When in her company always act kindly toward her. . . . Whatever you may FEEL never SHOW any signs of ANGER or JEALOUSY. . . .
>
> By following the instructions given above you will soon win the lady's affection and have her under your control, but beware of the least UNKINDNESS, or of using the power you have obtained for an evil purpose. . . .

The instructions on How to Kiss a Lady are also very enlightening.

Ladies seeking information on various vital subjects can be sure of finding it in a special "book for ladies," "The Art of Pleasing Men," written by a lady who knows whereof she speaks. Here are a few of the subjects treated in the volume: Women and Maternity, How to Win a Man's Heart, Some Unfailing Methods, Secrets of the Widow's Power, A Word of Warning. "How to Woo, When, and Whom" is well worth reading. It gives full and interesting rules on the etiquette of courtship, the time and place for conducting it, and some good advice. Of course, some of the books equally enlightening go deep into the subject of sex.

As for desirable post cards, Mrs. Stella Brown offers "Original Photographs of Young French Girls in Daring Art Poses. . . . Each photo is clear and distinct on photographic paper, giving them a good glossy finish. They are post-card size showing full front view, the kind you like to see. . . . These photos are for men over twenty-one only"; while Jack O'Brien, an ardent lover of art and Mrs. Brown's local competitor, advertises his wares as follows: "If you wish Art Photos of the Forbidden Kind we have them. We also have stories of the Forbidden Kind. . . ."

How pure are the United States mails? A liberal or radical publication containing any matter that may be construed as obscene is pounced upon and sent back where it came from before the ink is dry. Mary Ware Dennett's pamphlet, strangely enough, had polluted the mail boxes of Y. M. C. A. secretaries and theological seminaries for years before the postmaster discovered it in all its obscenity and barred it from the mails. But the following advertisement, for men only, is probably to be found at this moment in mail trains from Boston to San Francisco: "Men send $1 for 'From Town to Town.' Tells where to have a good time. Sample name and address 10 cents. P. O. Box ——, Peekskill, New York."

No Men Wanted

By KARL MONROE

WITH assets of perhaps twenty dollars and some nine years' experience as a reporter in New England I came to New York to find a job. The round of newspaper offices and news bureaus netted me a series of polite but firm statements to the effect that "there's nothing open just now, but you might leave your name and address." After two weeks of this I set myself to what I believed would be the much easier task of securing a clerical place, or even something like ushering in a theater, "hopping the bells" at a hotel, or running an elevator in an office building.

Innocently enough, I followed the crowd to the agencies in Sixth Avenue. Visions of being sent to a position where a percentage would be taken from the first month's salary for a fee were quickly dissolved in the face of the cold fact that any position must be paid for in full and in advance. I learned from one young man that he had paid $10 for a job at which he had worked only four days, receiving $13.50, or a net profit of $3.50 for his four days of work. He and other victims told me, apparently from experience, that many of the agencies make a regular practice of sending men to jobs for which they are obviously unfitted, so that the same job might be sold several times. Many of the men, I learned, realized this, but were willing to "take a gypping" in order to earn a few dollars.

My funds were getting low, and rather than spend any more of the bit of cash I still had I resolved to ride the subways for the night. Not only did I find this fairly easy, but I found that hundreds of others were doing it. Experts at the game—men who live a hand-to-mouth existence by panhandling and petty racketeering—told me that the most satisfactory system was to ride the B. M. T. trains which run from Times Square to Coney Island, swinging around a loop and returning. The trip consumes nearly two hours if a local train is taken. A good corner seat gives the rider a chance to get a fair nap, and the thing can be repeated endlessly. When morning came I went to the Grand Central Terminal, where I washed for a nickel.

Sleeping in the parks, I found, was much less satisfactory than the comfort offered by the rapid-transit companies. Tired, hungry, and cold, I stretched out on the bench, and despite the lack of downy mattress and comforter eventually fell asleep. The soles of my feet were swollen with blisters, because my shoes had not been removed in at least seventy-two hours and I had tramped the sidewalks for three days. Suddenly I was awakened by a patrolman who had swung his night stick sharply against the soles of my feet, sending an indescribable electric pain through my hunger-racked body.

For three nights I slept in an institution in Twenty-third Street maintained for the benefit of released prisoners, who were given food and lodging until they found work. Along with the others, I was given a hearty breakfast in the morning and a good meal at six at night, but none but jailbirds were aided in finding work. When I entered the place, on recommendation of a social-service agency, I had walked the streets for two days and nights, and my first real pleasure came when I found I could wash with hot water and soap. At the end of the three days the superintendent told me I must leave, explaining that the institution was maintained solely for ex-prisoners.

Finally, I stood in the bread line in Twenty-fifth Street, where the women's section of the Socialist Party daily distributed soup, coffee, and bread. To my surprise, I found in the line all types of men—the majority being skilled craftsmen unable to find work. One of them told me he had been a civil engineer and had earned $8,000 a year. Since losing his job almost a year ago, he had drifted from bad to worse, occasionally picking up odd jobs, until he had sunk to the bread line. The professional bums usually found in such a place were conspicuously lacking. True, there were several unemployables—men in the sixties, who stood no chance in competition with the thousands of younger, healthier men. There were also a number of middle-aged men who had long since given up the idea of finding work. Having started honestly enough in a sincere effort to get placed, they had met disappointment so consistently that their ambition was broken. Now, their attitude was expressed in the philosophical comment one of them made to me: "Why should I work? I'm living along on one charity and another." Such men never think of the future in terms of more than one or two days.

Perhaps more to be pitied than this class is the young family man whose ambition has been stifled. The other day, desperate for money, I answered one of those constantly reappearing advertisements that read as follows: "MEN, distribute advertising; money daily; steady; apply 7 a. m. at ——." Arriving promptly, I found that the rain had halted work for the day, and I fell into conversation with a bright young Irish lad who was keenly disappointed to lose a day's work. The men work in groups of four, each group being given a clearly defined territory and some 5,000 circulars. The pay for three of the group is $2.80 a day each, the fourth being honored with the title of crew manager and an advance in wages to $3 a day. My young Irish friend advised me to stay in the work: "Like me, see. I've woiked up to crew manager, and if I stay long enough I can be district superintendent. That's where the money is. Why them boids gets $5 a day!" Subsequent conversation revealed that the young man—he was perhaps twenty-three—was married and a father. Once he had been a construction worker at $40 a week, but he had been laid off and couldn't find a new position in that line.

There are many men who still hope despite months of failure. Of a dozen men in the park of nights, at least eight will tell you that they have something in mind for the following day, and they actually convince themselves. A few nights later a casual search will reveal the same men, still with "something in mind for tomorrow." For most of them that tomorrow is many months ahead. Perhaps it will never come. In the meantime, they read, under the arc light in the park, in second-hand newspapers, predictions that business will be normal again within sixty days.

The Public Domain

By HENRY S. GRAVES

THE last chapter in the story of the federal public domain is about to be written. President Hoover has brought before the country, as a definite issue, the question of the disposal of the last remnants of the unreserved public lands, which are now without any semblance of supervision and control and are being rapidly ruined by abuse. On authority from Congress, he has appointed a commission to study the problem and to submit recommendations for its solution. He himself has proposed a tentative plan, namely, that the federal government should cede the remaining public lands to the several States in which they are located, with the reservation of certain mineral rights.

The President is to be highly commended for his insistence that some constructive steps be taken to provide for the right handling of the public lands. The appointment of a commission is an excellent method of dramatizing the situation and securing the advice of a group of well-informed citizens in formulating a new public-land policy. The tentative proposal for the transfer of lands to the States will, however, meet strong opposition. Many persons, including the writer of this article, believe that the plan to grant the lands to the States is not a real solution of the problems involved and that it would not be in the public interest from the standpoint either of the nation or of the States.

The public domain had its beginnings with the cession to the United States by the original States of their unsettled Western lands after the Revolutionary War. It was enormously increased by the acquisition of Florida, the Louisiana Purchase, the Oregon treaty, the accessions from Mexico, and the purchase of Alaska. There was no federal land in Texas, for upon the entry of that State into the Union it was stipulated that the public lands should remain in possession of the State.

The first public-land law was passed in 1785. It provided for a survey of the public properties and established a procedure for their sale. There has followed a long series of acts of Congress for the disposal of the federal lands, as changing conditions have called for new legislation. The early policy of selling the lands was replaced by one designed to encourage agricultural settlement, culminating in the free-homestead law of 1862. Subsequently, laws were passed for the disposal of arid lands requiring irrigation for cultivation, of so-called "dry-farming" areas, and, more recently, of grazing lands. Special laws were passed for mineral lands, though, curiously enough, not until 1866. At the late date of 1878 an attempt was made to meet the special timberland problem, but the legislation was so faulty that it served chiefly as an instrument of fraud. There have also been large and numerous grants for education, for canals, highways, and railroads, for reclamation of arid lands, for reclamation of swamp lands, and for manifold other purposes.

The history of the public domain is intimately related to the industrial history of the country. The migration of a great population over the public lands, the establishment of millions of farms, the construction of the great system of railways, the development of industries depending on minerals, timber, forage, and other natural resources, the building of cities and towns, and the creation of independent States, all within a comparatively short period of time, constitute one of the most extraordinary epochs in all history. Unquestionably, the liberality of the government in its disposal of the public domain was a large factor in this economic and industrial expansion. Quick peopling of the land was accomplished. But the process was accompanied by many serious blunders, by a lax administration of the laws, resulting in speculation, fraud, and often corruption, by tremendous waste of valuable resources, by loss of control of lands which should have been retained in public ownership, by local social distress, much of which will never be known, and by other consequences that will fall as a burden upon generations to follow.

We often think of the public domain as a chapter that is closed. It is true that the public domain is no longer an important factor in our industrial expansion. The westward migration has ceased. The pressure for new lands for settlement has stopped because there are no more public lands fit for agricultural settlement. Moreover, the industrial and economic changes of the past fifty years have created new conditions which could not be met in the old ways even if we still had an expanse of public lands comparable to that of 1880. The problem of acquiring natural resources has now been replaced by the problem of using them.

Nevertheless, the nation still owns a large area of lands, the residue after more than a century of picking over by men seeking to acquire lands under the various laws. More than 340,000,000 acres in the United States are still owned by the government. In addition, there are about 20,000,000 acres upon which the mineral rights have been reserved though the ownership of the surface has passed to private individuals. This grand total includes about 140,000,000 acres in national forests and parks and about 12,000,000 acres in lands withdrawn for the control of coal, oil, potash, and phosphates. There remain about 190,000,000 acres of land, unreserved, unappropriated, awaiting constructive administration and development. Nearly all of it has no more protection and administration than on the day it was acquired, and because of abuse it has been steadily deteriorating in productive value. This is the land which the President has suggested should be transferred to the States.

The remaining open public domain is chiefly located in the arid and semi-arid portions of sixteen Western States. Seventy-five per cent of Nevada is still unreserved public domain, 50 per cent of Utah, 23 per cent of New Mexico, 22 per cent of Arizona, 18 per cent of California, 16 per cent of Idaho, 22 per cent of Oregon, 29 per cent of Wyoming, and smaller proportions of other Western States. Five or ten million acres are natural timberlands; several million acres are open woodlands or low scrub; the remaining lands are clothed with grass and other herbaceous vegetation or with dry-land shrubs. Some are virtual deserts.

About 15 per cent of the present public domain may be classed as unproductive desert owing to lack of water or to alkaline soil or both. The areas of real desert are situated in southern California in the Death Valley and the Salton Sea region, in Utah west of Salt Lake, and in southwestern Arizona. The remainder of the open public lands—about 160,000,000 acres—is naturally clothed with grass and other herbaceous vegetation, or with low woody plants such as sagebrush, creosote brush, mesquite, and other types of shrubs or small trees, many of which have some nutritious value as browse for live stock. The land has been used for grazing for more than fifty years and some of it for a much longer time. It is public land, unfenced and open, for the use of any or all who may be able to place their stock upon it. There has never been any control of its use by the government, no restrictions as to the number of stock or methods of grazing, and no efforts to prevent injury to the land.

For forty years or more these ranges have been overgrazed. The effect of overcrowding the land with live stock has been disastrous, a progressive march toward devastation. The first injury is the destruction of the more nutritious forage plants. The reduction in the density of the grass and other vegetation exposes the soil to sun and wind. The water-holding power is impaired and the remaining plants are less vigorous in growth. From year to year the carrying capacity of the land for live stock has declined. On an average, the productive power of the land has been reduced 50 to 75 per cent and in places 80 to 90 per cent.

A second consequence of overgrazing is the loss of the surface soil by erosion. It may seem odd to discuss erosion in connection with arid lands, where the lack of water is the most conspicuous characteristic. Erosion depends not only on topography and soil but on the character of precipitation. In the dry regions the storms are often cyclonic and the rain falls in heavy showers. A large part of the Western ranges is rolling, hilly, or actually mountainous. Under natural conditions the soil is held in place by the protective vegetation. Even the cactus plays its part. Under normal conditions the degradation of the hills and ridges is very gradual and violent surface changes occur only occasionally through unusually heavy storms. Overgrazing loosens the soil and every storm carries off large quantities of the upper surface. Great gullies are formed that change the whole character of the run-off of water. The more compact subsoil is exposed, less water enters the ground, and the general water table is lowered. In the rich valleys the agricultural lands are gullied out and great arroyos are formed, often ten feet deep and thirty feet or more in width. Irrigation ditches and reservoirs are filled and frequently tons of detritus are deposited on fertile farm lands in the valley bottoms.

The problem of instituting a reform in the handling of the public domain offers complexities because of the varying character of the lands, the extent of the damage by overgrazing, the present distribution of the lands, and their intimate relation to the local industrial development. Leaving out of consideration the areas of actual desert, there are about 160,000,000 acres of range lands which constitute the real public-land problem. These may be divided into three classes, as follows:

1. Very large areas which are chiefly in federal ownership. The most important areas in this category are the West Desert in western Utah and eastern Nevada, comprising some 16,000,000 acres; the Red Desert in Wyoming, covering about 7,000,000 acres; the Owyhee Desert in southeastern Oregon and southwestern Idaho, containing about 25,000,000 acres; the Ralston and Pahute Desert in southern Nevada, with perhaps 15,000,000 acres; and the Jornada Desert in New Mexico, comprising about 6,000,000 acres. It is probable that about 70 per cent of these lands is in public ownership.

2. Areas comprising more than 100,000 acres in a body, but far less extensive than those mentioned in the preceding paragraph. It is probable that this class aggregates nearly 30 per cent of the public range. The blocks of land are not compact bodies of government property but are interrupted by State holdings, railroad sections, and other private lands.

3. Areas varying in size from a few sections to 100,000 acres. A considerable portion of these lands is adjacent to the national forests and its development is closely dependent on the use of the forage in these public reservations.

The problem of the public domain cannot be met by the old methods of land disposal. The various homestead laws do not apply, except to a very limited extent. A general sale law would not be effective unless very large units were placed on the market, which would inevitably be embarrassing to small ranchers who now use the lands for grazing and which would give monopolistic control of the lands to large concerns. Moreover, a great deal of the land has been so depleted in productiveness that private owners cannot afford to hold it. The new policy to be adopted should make possible the handling of each portion of the public domain in a way adapted to the conditions prevailing on the land itself. Abuse by overgrazing not only destroys a natural resource which sustains one of the great industries of the semi-arid portions of the West, but it results also in erosion and in torrential conditions that have a far-reaching effect on stream flow, irrigation, and community welfare generally. Nearly all the public domain, outside the real desert areas, is situated on the watersheds of important river systems, including the Rio Grande, Gila, Salt, Arkansas, Snake, and Missouri rivers. The disturbance of the normal conditions of run-off on large masses of land inevitably affects the rivers and their beneficial service. The neglect of the public domain over the years is releasing natural forces that may be felt in increased irregularity of river flow, embarrassment in irrigation and power development, and public injury in many other ways.

An analogous situation was encountered more than thirty years ago in the forests on the public domain. They were being ruined by fire, overgrazing, and abuse. The solution was found in the establishment of the national forests. For twenty-five years about 160,000,000 acres of public property have been successfully administered and the forests and other resources protected and developed. The grazing lands within the national forests were brought under systematic control, erosion was checked, and the productive power of the land for grazing progressively restored. The handling of the national forests points the way for the administration of public domain.

The policy which, in the opinion of the writer of this article, should be followed by the government in handling the public domain is as follows:

1. To establish at once a system of control of grazing on all the public land analogous to that in successful operation in the national forests. This would involve a curtailment of the number of stock using the lands to the extent necessary to begin the restoration of the range.

2. To make a charge for the privilege of using the range for grazing, with provision for payment to the States of as liberal a proportion of the receipts from this source as Congress may deem appropriate.

3. To add to the national forests the areas of public grazing lands adjacent to them, where the grazing use may best be administered in conjunction with that in the national forests. The area of lands so situated is estimated to be about 16,000,000 acres.

4. To add to the national forests the lands in the public domain which are covered with forest growth and so located as to be best administered as permanent reservations. There are about 8,000,000 acres of such lands.

5. To establish permanent federal grazing reserves wherever conditions are such that the development and use of the lands and the protection of water resources can best be secured through this means.

6. To provide for the exchange of lands with States, railroads, and private owners in order to consolidate the federal and other holdings.

7. To provide for grants of lands to the States where this is desirable to round out existing holdings or to meet other special local problems.

8. To provide a procedure for the sale of land to individuals or companies where it is clear that private ownership is the best means to promote the beneficial use of the property. Authority should be given to dispose of blocks of land large enough to meet the economic conditions of grazing but with clear limitations essential to prevent monopoly and interference with the interests of the small ranchmen. A very liberal proportion of the proceeds of such sales should be granted to the States.

9. To transfer the administration of the public ranges from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture, where there is a corps of men trained in problems of range control.

Such a program would involve extensive field study, and each step naturally would be subject to sanction by Congress on the basis of administrative recommendations. The plan has the advantage of an immediate check to the present abuse of the range. It provides a method of progressively disposing of all the land through the incorporation of a portion in permanent reservations and through transferring the balance in an orderly way to other ownership.

The restoration of the lands to productive condition will be a slow process. Generally speaking, it takes twenty years or more to rehabilitate a badly depleted range, and this is accomplished only through expert control and management. Improvements are also necessary, such as roads, water developments, drift fences, and the like, involving considerable capital outlay; and some engineering works must be constructed to prevent torrents and erosion which result from the past abuse of the land.

The proposal that the nation surrender to the States the responsibility of meeting the situation on the public domain is made presumably on the ground that the problem is a local one. There are, however, great national interests involved. First of all, the lands belong to the nation and the responsibility for handling the properties in the best interests of the public is in itself a national one. In the next place, watershed protection is an interstate problem of the first order. Still again, the problem of range control and use is interstate in character. On the great ranges immense numbers of stock are driven out of one State to graze on areas located in another State. The use of the public range has been a large factor in building up the existing live-stock industry, which involves large investments in stock and plant. The division of the jurisdiction over these lands would involve serious consequences for the industry if the several States should inaugurate different policies of land administration. Finally, the proper handling of the problems of the public domain is beyond the power of most of the States. The sheer magnitude of the undertaking places it in the category of a national problem.

Some persons entertain the belief that under State ownership the lands would pass to private ownership and thus increase the grand list. Some lands would doubtless be sold. The government, with appropriate authority from Congress, can also sell such lands as should not remain permanently under public control. The States in the long run will gain far more from a liberal grant of the annual proceeds from grazing fees and other sources of income than by the effort to handle the lands themselves, especially if the States should undertake to restore them to productiveness and provide the improvements that are necessary.

The proposal to transfer the public lands to the States has been referred to as the new conservation. As yet I have been unable to find any evidence that the lands would be better handled by the States than by the government from the standpoint of conservation. The fact that the government has failed so far in administering the open ranges is not proof that it will continue to do so. The government has demonstrated that it is wholly competent to meet problems of this kind in its successful management of 160,000,000 acres of national forests. It can do as well on the public domain. The failure of the government in handling the open ranges may be charged to a number of causes. The chief responsibility lies in the lack of determined leadership by the Department of the Interior, which has charge of the public domain. This department is not organized and equipped for the administration of problems of soil production and land use. Formerly it had charge of the public forests and failed in exactly the same way that it has failed in the administration of the grazing problem on the public domain. The constructive handling of the national forests began when they were placed under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, where there was a corps of trained foresters. The administration of the grazing lands involves precisely the class of problems which the experts of the Department of Agriculture are qualified by their training and experience to handle.

The President has chosen an excellent commission to study the problems of the public domain. The chairman, Honorable James R. Garfield, was a leader in conservation when he served in President Roosevelt's Cabinet. Fifty thousand dollars has been provided by Congress for the expenses of the commission. It is hoped that a constructive plan will be developed, a plan which will not involve a shirking by the nation of its plain responsibilities.

Catholicism and Liberalism*

By the REVEREND JOHN A. RYAN

TWO Roman documents published during the past year have provoked questions concerning the intellectual integrity of Catholics who profess to be loyal to the Holy See and who call themselves "liberals." These documents are a revised edition of the "Index of Prohibited Books" and the Encyclical of Pope Pius XI dated December 31, 1929. The former forbids Catholics to read certain proscribed books, while the latter commands them to send their children to Catholic schools. In the criticism directed at "liberal" Catholics who accept such prohibitions and precepts one finds a considerable amount of misunderstanding and inexact language.

An artificial definiteness has been accorded to the terms "liberal" and "liberalism." Some of the critics assume that any Catholic who accepts the designation "liberal" necessarily uses the word in the sense attached to it by the critics themselves. When we consider the history of these two terms we are surprised at this assumption. Liberalism may denote a disposition of will, an attitude of mind, or adherence to a set of opinions. Accordingly the liberal is a person who is generous, tolerant, and inclined to credit with sincerity those who differ from him; or he is unprejudiced and open-minded; or his opinions tend to magnify the importance of freedom and to diminish that of restraint and authority. Liberalism may exist in many fields of thought and discussion: economics, politics, governmental policy, religion, education, science, philosophy, ethical theory and practice, and social conventions. A person can logically and consistently be a liberal in some of these departments and a conservative or authoritarian in others. He can look upon complete and centralized authority as reasonable in some and as unreasonable in others of these spheres of thought and action. For example, he can be a liberal in politics and economics and at the same time an authoritarian in religion. Many may find no difficulty in taking diametrically opposite positions under these two heads.

One of the best-known uses of the term "liberalism" is that which has for many years prevailed on the Continent of Europe and in some Latin-American countries. Those who profess this variety of liberalism are almost invariably anticlerical, which is frequently a euphemism for anti-Catholic. On its theoretical side, this liberalism denies or minimizes the authority of God and of the church over the human intellect. On its practical side, it denies or minimizes the authority of God and of the church over human conduct. Both the theoretical and practical forms of Continental liberalism exhibit several degrees, from the complete denial of divine authority, doctrinal and legislative, to the rejection of church authority outside those principles of faith and morals which are assured by the prerogative of infallibility.

Now it is this species of liberalism which the European ecclesiastic usually has in mind when he employs the term without qualification. Probably this is the kind that Cardinal Merry del Val was thinking of when he referred recently to "that moral pestilence known as liberalism." An editorial entitled A Moral Pestilence in The Nation of December 25, 1929, declared that the doctrine of the Catholic church "is unalterably opposed to very nearly every tenet of the liberal creed." If the "liberal creed" is identical with the liberalism described above, the assertion just quoted is obviously correct. Were the church to accept or even to compromise with this kind of liberalism it would commit intellectual and moral suicide.

It should be evident that this species of liberalism cannot be accepted by any Catholic who is at once loyal to his church and adequately instructed. There have, indeed, been Catholics, particularly on the Continent, who designated themselves as "liberal Catholics," precisely in order to express their adherence to a mild form of the liberalism that we are now discussing. While accepting the authority of the church in matters of faith and morals which had been defined ex cathedra, they denied the right of the Pope to impose as of obligation doctrinal declarations or disciplinary rules which do not enjoy infallibility. Belonging to, or closely akin to, this class are those American Catholics whom The Nation calls "liberals" and whom it thus described in the editorial referred to above: "Their sentiments are known by their conduct; they disobey many of the commands of the church, and they are willing to explain away many of its doctrines." If the disobedience of these persons is based not upon human weakness but upon deliberate rejection of the divine right of the church to impose precepts of morality and discipline, they are not faithful Catholics. A similar statement applies to the device of "explaining away" church doctrines. Both these attitudes have been condemned on various occasions by more than one pope. An American Catholic who practices or professes this degree of liberalism is either intellectually dishonest or inadequately instructed.

When the writer of The Nation's editorial speaks of the "liberal creed," perhaps he does not wish to include the cruder and more extreme forms of Continental liberalism: for example, the denial of the right of God Himself to impose restraints upon intellect, conscience, or conduct. Perhaps he desires to emphasize what are sometimes called "modern liberties," that is, freedom of opinion, of teaching, of speech, of writing, and of printing. Undoubtedly the Catholic church does reject unlimited freedom in all these spheres. She denies the moral right of men to accept or to profess false opinions or to propagate doctrines or practices which are contrary to the moral law and therefore opposed to human welfare. She holds that a man has no more right to utter falsehood and wrong than he has to perpetrate them. She maintains that the intellect and the vocal organs are as subject to the moral law as any other human faculty. As a matter of fact, no government has ever admitted, no modern government admits today, unlimited freedom of expression. Men may not, with legal impunity, calumniate their neighbors, or publish obscene literature, or make indecent speeches in public, or corrupt the morals of the young in the schoolroom. The decision of the Supreme Court in the espionage cases (1918), written by Justice Holmes himself, showed that our federal Constitution restricts very considerably the scope of the guaranty of freedom of speech contained in the First Amendment. Therefore, the principle of absolute and unlimited freedom of expression seems to be rejected by the better and saner part of the community, if not by all but a few extremists.

* This article was written by Father Ryan upon request of the Editor, at the instance of a non-Catholic reader of The Nation who wished a treatment by a liberal Catholic of the problems here discussed.—EDITOR THE NATION.

To be sure, the practical question of drawing the line between reasonable and unreasonable freedom with regard to opinion and expression is one that different persons will answer differently. The way in which it has been answered in the constitutions and statutes of our federal and State governments is quite satisfactory to American Catholics. They are never conspicuous in the groups that appear before Congress and State legislatures seeking diminution of this class of liberties. They perceive no conflict between their Catholicism and the traditional American policy.

So much for definitions and classifications. Our discussion thus far has evidently touched only a few of the accepted uses of liberals and liberalism. But these are the species that seem to be most frequent in the minds of men who discuss liberalism in relation to the Catholic church. Happily it is possible to get away from ambiguous terminology and discuss the actions and attitudes themselves which are called into question. A certain writer seeks to "understand the position of liberal members of the Catholic church," and to learn the "processes by which the claims of absolutism in religion and relativity in rational thinking are reconciled."

"Absolutism in religion" is probably intended to denote that theory or attitude which accepts religious doctrines as certain and recognizes the unconditional authority of the church to lay down the principles and rules of faith and morals. Surely this attitude is not confined to Catholics or to the domain of religion. In all probability the writer of the quoted phrase accepts "absolutism" in mathematics, in physics, in chemistry, and perhaps in other sciences. That is, he believes that he can have certainty and not merely "relativity" or probability in these fields. When he uses the phrase "relativity in rational thinking" does he mean that all truth is relative, that there is no such thing as certainty? In other words, is he a complete skeptic or subjectivist? Inasmuch as Catholics, whether they call themselves liberals or not, do not accept this position, they are not called upon to reconcile it with their belief in religious absolutism. Probably the writer merely intends to say that in some fields of thought there is no authority nor any compelling array of evidence to guarantee certainty, that in them men can possess only opinions and greater or less degrees of probability. This statement is true to a greater or less extent of politics, economics, sociology, philosophy, history, and in a large portion of the territory occupied by the physical sciences. The Catholic who accepts this so-called relativity of knowledge, who admits that he cannot have complete certainty throughout these domains, has no difficulty in accepting the absolute truth and absolute authority of the church in religion and morals. There is no contradiction, because the realities covered by these two classes of thought are different and the appropriate methods and instruments of knowledge are different. To demand or expect identical judgments concerning the knowableness of different kinds of realities is quite unreasonable.

Another objector wonders how liberal Catholics can honestly accept "their church's attitude toward the individual's right to read and think for himself." In a preceding paragraph this question has in part been answered in the statement that Catholics who refuse to accept the authority of the church in matters of discipline are not loyal and orthodox Catholics, even though ignorance may prevent them from perceiving this fact. Let us, however, examine on its merits the assumption that the individual has a "right to read and think for himself." Apparently the questioner regards this so-called right as an essential element of genuine liberalism. His use of the term is unprecise and ambiguous. He cannot mean legal right, for no one denies that the civil law in the United States concedes this. Perhaps he means moral right—that is, a right or claim which is in accord with reason, inasmuch as it is necessary or useful for human welfare. As pointed out above, there is no moral right to do wrong. It is wrong for a Catholic to disregard the authority which Christ has conferred upon the church. The thinking and the reading which the church forbids is, generally speaking, harmful to the true faith and to sound morality. I say "generally speaking," because the church does not profess to be infallible in such matters as are covered by the "Index of Prohibited Books." Nevertheless, faith and morals and truth are safer as a result of the church's legislation in this field than they would be in the absence of such legislation.

Let us test this assertion by reference to the works on the Index which are adduced as horrible examples in The Nation's editorial above referred to. Let us leave out of consideration those Catholics who have a special reason for reading these books because they are teachers, or writers, or clergymen; for they will not generally find great difficulty in getting the required permission. Let us take the average Catholic, the average educated Catholic, if you will. I venture to say that such a one could employ his time more profitably in reading other works, in the same respective fields, than in reading, say, Gibbon's "'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," Darwin's "Origin of Species," Kant's "Critique," and the works of Maeterlinck. As for "The Book of Common Prayer" and the Protestant versions of the Bible, it is difficult to see what benefit the ordinary Catholic would derive from their perusal. After all, we have incomparably better prayer books of our own, and the church possessed and preserved the integral Scriptures for many centuries before the emergence of Martin Luther and King James I. A great part, if not the greater part, of the reading done by this generation is sheer waste of time, if not worse. Bertrand Russell's "Marriage and Morality" contains some amazing history and anthropology, some ignorance of the Bible, considerable misrepresentation of Catholic doctrine, much superficial reasoning and immoral ethics. In a word, the book is unscientific. Yet it is and will be accepted unquestioningly by thousands of persons who think that they "think for themselves," and who pride themselves on their intellectual independence.

The Nation's editorial finds fault with liberal Catholics who have not repudiated the ban laid by a certain cardinal upon other than parochial schools. But this is the general and traditional Catholic discipline and it has been restated in the recent Encyclical of Pope Pius XI on education. Our position is very simple and very logical. We hold that religious training is the most important element in education, that as a rule it cannot be adequately obtained if it is excluded from the school, and that there can be no such thing as a genuinely neutral school. If the school does not teach religion it shows itself indifferent to religion. This attitude of indifference, insensibly perhaps, but more or less effectively, conveys to the pupil the impression that religion is not an important element in education or in life. Obviously, such a school cannot be completely satisfactory to an intelligent Catholic. Quite as obviously, it is the business of the church to safeguard the spiritual welfare of her children by appropriate legislation.

The most astonishing and disturbing statement in the editorial above mentioned is that the liberal who is logical "cannot be other than anti-Catholic." This suggests a very illiberal brand of liberalism. To be "anti" is to be opposed; but it implies something more than negative opposition by withholding agreement. Frequently it denotes some measure of hostility. Always it implies that one seeks to thwart the program and purposes of the institution to which one is "anti." No such threat is offered by the Catholic church against the American liberal who refuses to accept her authority. She does not seek to take from him any of his cherished liberties. Why should he scold Catholics merely because they accept what he regards as tyrannical authority? Why can he not permit us to involve ourselves in what seems to him intellectual stultification? Or does this brand of liberalism insist on saving men against their will from foolish loyalties? This seems to be the essence of toryism.

At any rate, the position of the intelligent Catholic, whether or not he calls himself a liberal, who wholeheartedly accepts the authority of the church in faith and morals and discipline is neither disingenuous, nor self-contradictory, nor unreasonable. His interpretation of history impels him to the conclusion that Christ was God and that He endowed the Catholic church with plenary authority to teach and to govern in spiritual and moral affairs. The non-Catholic may, as he does, reject both the premises and the conclusion of this reasoning, but he cannot fairly accuse those who accept it of either inconsistency or intellectual stultification.

I have never experienced any temptation to become a liberal in the sense of rejecting any part of the authority claimed and exercised by my church. Nevertheless, I suppose that I should be classed as a liberal in economics and in politics. As such, I would suggest to the editors of The Nation and to all others who desire to see established a reign of wider industrial and political justice that the task before them, before us all, is formidable enough and sufficiently worth while to command our united efforts. This cause will not be served by lecturing, threatening, and antagonizing Catholic economic and political liberals merely because they refuse to accept the anti-church variety of liberalism. This mistaken and unnecessary course is mainly responsible for the ultra-conservative position taken by many prominent Catholics on the Continent of Europe. To protect their religious interests they were compelled to align themselves with economic and political reactionaries. Should a similar alignment take place in our own beloved country the blame will surely rest upon those liberals who will not concede to Catholics the right to profess and practice in their own way the religious loyalties which they cherish above everything else in life.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has often pondered on why the weather should constitute an infallible topic of conversation. After the invariable inquiry as to the health of another comes the equally invariable comment on the wetness or dryness or hotness or coldness of the day and the day before, not to mention prophecies on the morrow. And of all these weather data, none is more infallible than that furnished by a hot spell. It is true that New York City in hot weather can hardly be forgotten. The subways are full of white, limp, shiny-faced men and women. Those occasional more fortunate souls who have been away from the city long enough to get brown or red stand out like another race. But they, too, are shiny. Even the most ardently bepowdered nose is likely to gleam in a hot spell. No, these people cannot forget the weather. When they walk on the streets the asphalt slides under them; when they go home a hot blast of air reaches them from the kitchen and chases them all the way into the parlor.

* * * * *

BUT discussion is equally prevalent on a bright, cool, fair morning. "Nice day," you say and you hear. "Pretty wet, eh?" is the comment for inclement weather. When it snows everybody tells you so; when it is cold there is not a man or woman in the country who does not remark on it. Why should this be? There are other phenomena as common as the weather. We all breathe by air taken into our lungs. Yet you almost never hear comment on the fact. "Good morning; are you breathing today?" How strange that would sound. "Well, pulses are running around seventy-eight today. Have you counted yours?" This, too, is not a common form of greeting. Only the weather is eternally with us for conversational purposes.

* * * * *

THE reason, of course, may be that the weather is linked so closely with man's sense of well-being. When he is too hot or too cold he feels uncomfortable; when the temperature and the amount of sunshine are just right he feels good, and wants everybody to know it. Thus, comment on the kind of day is only comment on one's health. And health is the conversational topic par excellence for any given individual. Man thinks first of how he feels. After he has exhausted that subject he may turn to action or intellectual activity. There are more cults for health today, probably, than for any other state of being. We no longer think it important to save our souls; but by diet and exercise and hocus-pocus of every conceivable sort we must save our bodies. Disease must be stamped out, food must be of the proper sort and amount. our children must eat spinach or they must not eat spinach, according to the fad of the moment. We must lie in the sun because without violet rays plants die; we must get enough sleep, we must brush our teeth, we must use quantities of soap, we must not neglect intestinal toxicity. Why? So we shall live forever—or if not forever then as long as possible. Man is eternally afraid to die. He takes every precaution to keep himself alive. And the weather is an index of how he is feeling.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

An Intellectual Treat

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I wish to convey to you my appreciation of the excellent essay in The Nation of July 23 by J. B. S. Haldane. Of the many intellectual treats I have had in your valuable weekly, this clear-cut and courageous exposition of an individual Weltanschauung is certainly one of the best you ever published. This young English intellectual and radical thinker is refreshing and thought-provoking.

His statement that "since 1921 the death-rate of Americans at every age from thirty upwards has been increasing steadily" is perhaps only too true. We are the victims of wealth illy digested, which is unmanning us physically, ethically, and morally. We wallow in luxuries and insane living. The simple life as an Emerson or Walt Whitman or Thoreau knew it is a lost art. Intellectual attainments are with us a balderdash of religious mysticism and timid pseudo-science. We are afraid of the truth. We are Don Quixotes who imagine we can cure our social evils by idiotic thrusts (laws) which infringe upon individual liberty. Our hypocrisy is indescribably fatuous. The world may admire us for our business ability; but of real culture (excepting perhaps 1 per cent of us) we have none.

Chicago, July 21 August Ruedy

Rude Again

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: May I trouble you to discontinue sending me The Nation? Your references to President Hoover have been such that I do not care to have a paper containing them come into the midst of my family. Honest and dignified criticism of the Chief Executive I would have no objection to, but the terms in which you refer to him are not only unbecoming but disrespectful to the office. A sneer is a poor corrective and the terms in which you have referred to the President in a number of issues can be classed among the sneering utterances which men unfortunately use when they are not pleased.

Philadelphia, June 26 J. S. Ladd Thomas

The Great Babson

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: At last the great Babson has spoken on the subject of unemployment and trade depression. In a special letter issued June 30 he tells us that while "everybody is naturally very much interested in stopping the trade depression from which we are now suffering," this "cancer," like all illnesses, must run its course and, at best, all we can hope to do is to make the suffering more bearable.

Mr. Babson consoles us with what he tells us is his firm opinion—that the unemployment of millions of people has its spiritual and intellectual values which "fill an important economic function." As you are pawning the family jewels in an effort to feed the youngsters or to satisfy the landlord and groceryman, remember that you are "performing an important economic function" which has "spiritual and intellectual values."

Furthermore, and this is of even greater importance, "unemployment gives the wage worker a chance to rest and get in physical condition for the next pull." I wonder if Mr. Babson has ever tried resting for the "next pull" on an empty stomach.

But let us continue: ". . . man develops spiritually during periods of depression. . . . Ask any preacher, priest, or rabbi." In prosperity "we forget God and become pagan"; but in times of unemployment church attendance increases and every unemployed worker looks to a higher source for aid and guidance. It seems to me that according to Babson unemployment and trade depressions must be of divine origin and intended as an incentive to a "back-to-the-church" movement.

Of the relationship between cyclic economic depressions and the profit motive in our present economy, with its consequent overproduction, and of the effect of the machine age on the wage-earners, the great Roger W. Babson, strangely enough, says nothing.

Oakland, N. J., July 8 Jack Brooks

The Butte Daily Bulletin

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In Butte, Montana, Eastern liberals were wont to visit a church in the basement of which was printed the most militant newspaper of many a day—the Butte Daily Bulletin. Entering the editorial room one was confronted with a rack holding six loaded Winchester rifles. It was no uncommon sight to see busy editors with a gun beside their typewriter. At night, workers did sentry duty guarding the plant from possible attacks by company gunmen. One morning the city was stirred by the finding of a battered and bruised I. W. W. hanging from a railroad trestle. The editors of the Bulletin were warned to leave town or expect a similar fate. On another occasion 600 workers marched to the mines to do picket duty. In a few moments the road was strewn with their wounded and two lay dead. In such a city, amid such recurring scenes, the Butte Daily Bulletin sounded the note of defiance to the employers and brought hope to the struggling workers. Lack of advertising, due to the bank boycott of those who did advertise, and the espionage system of the employers which prevented workers from subscribing gave the paper a hard struggle to live. Paper used to remain on the siding for days; no delivery was made without cash.

Senator Wheeler could never have survived politically if it had not been for the Bulletin. When Senator Wheeler was beaten up in the streets of Butte it was the Bulletin crowd that enabled him to carry on. The West realizes the loss of the Bulletin. As long as the West is the West the workers will remember the Bulletin.

New York, July 6 Mina Carney

Right Today, Wrong Tomorrow

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Heywood Broun is afraid the radios will train the whole nation to pronounce alike, and then everybody will pronounce all the consonants in "five-sixths" as long as the world lasts. I wouldn't worry. Just as surely as the place of the waist line on women's dresses will change again, just as surely as patronizing the bootlegger will come to be the not-quite-up-to-date thing among collegiate youth, so surely will "me dear" be the preferred style in one decade and "muh dear" in another decade and "my dear" in yet another. Some folks will take pains to keep up with every change, but the majority will stick to what was stylish in their youth, and thereby will furnish a starting-point for the next change of fashion. Remember how the dictionaries used to tell us that the noun

ONLY SAPS WORK

An Exposé of Racketeering

[America's billion-dollar-a-year industry]

BY

Courtenay Terrett

Foreword by Morris L. Ernst

VANGUARD

$2.00 at bookstores

"rise" must be pronounced like "rice"? But now the dictionaries say not only that the noun must be pronounced like the verb, but that there never was a time when anything else was right, and that everybody who in my younger days pronounced the noun as the dictionaries then told him to was using a pronunciation that was then wrong. The dictionaries have now decided that the most proper distinction between "recipe" and "receipt" is that "recipe" is for medicine and "receipt" is for cookery, but most of the household columns in the papers are still run by people who were educated in the days when the dictionaries said that it must be "recipe" for cookery.

Ballard Vale, Mass., July 10 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

An Article for Republicans

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just read Mr. Herrick's article, Our Super-Babbitt, in your issue of July 16, and I have been so impressed with its calm and vigorous conviction that I urge you to have it printed separately as an anti-Republican leaflet. I should take a great deal of delight in handing this article to hard-shelled Republicans. Of course, it would only make them angry, but it would assist a great many others, who have been buncoed by party talk, to see a glimmer of light.

Everett, Washington, July 20 V. C. CHRISTIANSON

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL TELCO has contributed critical exposés to various periodicals.

KARL MONROE is the pseudonym of a New England newspaperman.

HENRY S. GRAVES is dean of the School of Forestry at Yale University.

JOHN A. RYAN is professor of moral theology and industrial ethics at the Catholic University, Washington, D. C.

AUDREY WURDEMANN is the author of a book of verse entitled "House of Silk."

DONALD A. ROBERTS is a member of the English department at the College of the City of New York.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is the author of "Cato, or the Future of Censorship."

EUGENE LÖHRKE is editor of "Armageddon: The World War in Literature."

JAN VAN AS is an Orientalist who has recently made a trip to Persia for research purposes.

NO ONE MUST KNOW

A single phrase found in a year-old love letter to her son told her the truth. Now she must hide her secret deep within herself, suffer . . . and tell no one . . . that the letter was from a man. Rupert Hughes calls this strangely beautiful study of a mother's mind "a masterpiece of art and a work of profound and noble mercy toward all people, the peculiar as well as the normal." $2.50

REVELATION

By ANDRÉ BIRABEAU Translated by Una, Lady Troubridge

THE VIKING PRESS : : 18 East 48th Street, New York

REAL HARRIS TWEED Direct from the Makers. Suit-lengths by Mail. Postage Paid. Sample free on stating shades desired, and if for Gents or Ladies wear. NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland

SOVIET RUSSIA

An extraordinary combination of low price and tour value for Students. $280 complete. The itinerary is fascinating.

Aug. 16 S.S. Statendam or
Aug. 27 S.S. Berengaria.

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

175 Fifth Avenue, New York. Algonquin 6656

Books and Films

Belated Sheep

By AUDREY WURDEMANN

Under a night sky bluer than the breast
Of royal peacock, under a far sky
Where the white moon paints cleft and sudden crest,
Swaying and silent-hoofed the sheep go by.
Flooding like curds over the valley floor,
They tread upon the carpet of the night,
And black rock gleaming like a silver door
Widens before them in the frosted light.

Wrapped to the eyes, a-dream, the shepherd goes,
Nor heeds the drowsy murmur of his sheep.
Into a velvet slumberous and deep
The ram's bell leads them on where no wind blows.
Through moonlight silver-clear and crystal-cold
They pour from mountain pasture into fold.

Desire for Oblivion

Ash-Wednesday. By T. S. Eliot. New York: The Fountain Press. $5.

THAT T. S. Eliot was in "The Waste Land" already bent toward a search into religious faith is, I believe, undeniable. In that picture of sterility he made his accusation against his age, stated his desire for perfection, and began his search for faith and for God. He could not continue to cry against drought; he must find the principle, for himself at least, of life. Nor would he be likely to find this in any adaptation to a scientific point of view. There is therefore no break between Eliot's earlier poems and his later. The difference is merely one of development. His passion was always for the past; it was therefore more or less to be expected that he would finally accept not only classicism in form but one of the oldest of religions, the Anglo-Catholic.

It is with the theme of the later poems that we are concerned. Has Eliot found in the acceptance of the Anglo-Catholic religion anything that has greatly altered his poetry? I do not believe so. The fundamental emotion, the emotion which is the source of the man's creative ability in poetry, remains the same. Every poem published since his pronouncement of his creed is upon the theme of death in life, life in death, and the sincere desire for oblivion. Life is a slow dying, death is a rebirth, and neither process is subject so much for ecstasy or rejoicing as it is for pain and denial. Whenever Eliot has developed his argument up to the point where a moment of vision might shatter doubt, he takes that last step toward faith not by vision, and not intellectually, but by a cry for the Word:

> Lord I am not worthy
> but speak the Word only.
> . . . . . .
> And pray to God to have mercy upon us
> And I pray that I may forget
> These matters that with myself I too much discuss
> Too much explain
> Because I do not hope to turn again
> Let these words answer
> For what is done, not to be done again
> May the judgment not be too heavy upon us.

In The Journey of the Magi, one of the several poems published in pamphlet form before "Ash-Wednesday," Eliot speaks of Christ's birth as "a hard and bitter agony for us, like Death, our death." In another, Song for Simeon, his theme is death. And, finally, in Ash-Wednesday we have a long ritualistic chant or prayer for the acceptance of faith. The poem is very difficult of interpretation because it relies upon no ecstatic penetration of the mysteries, but upon a symbolism not so much Catholic as it is personal. The poem opens with lines reminiscent of Dante and Shakespeare, but the poet does not resort thereafter to quotation:

> Because I do not hope to turn again
> Because I do not hope
> Because I do not hope to turn
> Desiring this man's gift and that man's scope

The theme of the entire first part is renunciation of life, of life which cannot find its reason for being as do trees and plants. Part II then develops through a series of symbols—three leopards who feed on the flesh and the bones, the lady who may be the church—the idea that the flesh and the spirit wish oblivion. The bones finding peace in oblivion, the spirit comes upon the symbol of unity:

> The single rose
> Is now the garden.

Part III may be said to recall Dante again. An ascent of three stairs toward paradise is described. On the first step one leaves behind the demons of hope and despair; on the second is a blankness (again the Waste Land), an "old man's mouth driveling beyond repair." The third stair affords a renewed consciousness of sensual living. Only after this memory which fades comes the cry:

> Fading, fading; strength beyond hope and despair
> Climbing the third stair.
>
> Lord I am not worthy
> Lord I am not worthy
> but speak the Word only.

Part IV is difficult of exact interpretation. Here the forces of life and death are interwoven. Mary, the Virgin, spirit of life walking between the violet and the violet, renews all things. The years walk there too and take away the fiddles and the flutes; the new years cry "redeem the time, redeem the dream." This is followed by Part V, where the answer as to the way of redemption is found in the Word:

> And the light shone in darkness and > Against the Word the unstilled world still whirled
> About the center of the silent Word
> O my people, what have I done to thee?

Part VI comes back to the refrain of Part I, "although I do not hope to turn again," and to the statement that this is the time of the tension between dying and birth, when the spirit is reborn. The whole poem closes on these lines:

> Teach us to care and not to care
> Teach us to sit still
> Even among these rocks
> Our peace His will
> And even among these rocks
> Sister, mother
> And spirit of the river, spirit of the sea
> Suffer me not to be separated
> And let my cry come unto Thee.

The poet never reaches, it seems, any overpowering certainty. The emotion never reaches great pitch. There is more intensity in those lines which state the poetic desire for oblivion than in any affirming religious faith. Throughout, the mood is almost desperately sad.

EDA LOU WALTON

Archbishop Laud

Laud: Storm Center of Stuart England. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin. Brentano's. $3.50.

OBVIOUSLY Mr. Coffin realized the dramatic value of Archbishop Laud as a subject for biography. He draws from the available historical material every possible conflict and climax, and shows little need to heighten the natural colors of his scene. Too readily, however, he falls into the Restoration spirit of angry scorn when he speaks of Laud's antagonists. The Puritans, typified by Prynne in his book, are wreckers of Maypoles and smashers of stained glass; they never appear as austere, even fanatic, proponents of those liberties of conscience and of person upon which modern concepts of democracy rest. It is proper enough to write an apologia for Laud, but it is reprehensible in doing so to belittle even by silence the spirit of those whom his tyranny sought to crush. This fundamental inaccuracy, misunderstanding the Puritans, overshadows but unfortunately does not obliterate several lesser errors of fact and interpretation, such as calling Catholics Separatists, and saying that Bacon foretold "an entirely new method of approach to knowledge."

In view of Mr. Coffin's reputation as a poet the style of this volume will, it must be feared, cause keen disappointment. How is it possible for the same person to rise, on one page, to the mellow beauty of "But his heart was like living coals under this ash of silence," and on another sink to the cheapness of "For George Abbot had finally gone to join the company of those to whom the sound of jeers is very much the same as the sound of cheers"? Though happily one can find few sentences quite as inept as this one, too many suffer from either rhetorical flatulence or mechanical clumsiness.

DONALD A. ROBERTS

A Political Theorist

The Dangers of Obedience and Other Essays. By Harold J. Laski. Harper and Brothers. $3.

PROFESSOR LASKI is one of the principal cultivators in England and America of that field which has come fashionably to be known as "political theory." Lest, however, it be supposed by the uninitiated that political theory really has very much to do with the present great exigencies of politics, it should be said at once that the political theorists are really not more than historians of political theory. The cult in its present form has been encouraged by sociologists who as students of the science of society are interested in ideas of politics and political organization. It has become established almost as a separate discipline and an integral part of the philosophical apparatus of the social sciences. It has apparently been decided that political theory represents that part of the old metaphysics which is to be preserved as the new metaphysics of sociology. The difficulty that the great ideas in political theory in the past have been contributed chiefly by general philosophers whose primary interest was metaphysics has been overcome by not studying these philosophers as total personalities but only in the aspects which are held to remain of value. Thus, while Kant may not be considered as a metaphysician, he may be read as a political thinker. A great churchman's theology is taboo but he is deserving of notice for his views on the relation of church and state.

Thus is introduced the first element of unreality in the study of political theory. Ghosts of the past, not living men, are invoked. Equally unfortunate is the continued preoccupation which the discipline of political theory encourages with the great ideas of the past in political philosophy. The academicians of political theory discourse with endless patience of those supremely vicious formalisms which are called state and sovereignty, forms of government, liberty, equality, democracy, the separation of powers, centralization and decentralization, cabinet government and congressional government. They are cultivated ever so lovingly like pallid roses in a well-kept garden. No rude scamps intrude into the closed and guarded precincts, and it is all very polite and charming. To qualify for the pleasant fellowship, the neophyte need, of course, to have gone through the arduous initiatory ceremonies of having read his Plato and Aristotle, his Hooker and Harrington, Milton and Hobbes, Machiavelli and Rousseau, so that he may be able to produce in time an essay upon one of them as a political theorist. Then, he must have read, too, a few good general histories of political theory, preferably by some of the indefatigable German masters such as Mohl, or Bluntschli, or Gumplowicz—this either to fill in the gaps in his reading of the original sources or to produce in due course a history of political theory of his own. At no time, particularly if he is so fortunate as to live in America or England, need his peace of mind be disturbed by the fact that his cultivation of political theory will actually affect the movements of events. Particularly in these great plutocracies have political ideas really ceased to count, if they ever did count for very much, and politics is in a complete state of frustration, the political masters no longer being the real masters of society. But for that very reason there is presented a large and leisurely opportunity for writing perfectly monumental studies of political theory.

Professor Laski is one of the most notable and intelligent of the masters of political theory. Of his style it may be said that he writes with more grace and charm and wit than any of the others. He is theoretically not unaware of economic realities in politics. If I may judge from his justifiably low opinion of the academic mind, he might even admit the general indictment of the academicians of political theory. Nevertheless, he exhibits their habits of mind and barrenness of ideas. He is in love with great general principles, not so much with specific problems. He has written studies of many great figures in the history of political theory, and with as little specialization and one-sidedness as possible. Among political theorists his name is connected chiefly with pluralism. Here he has dwelt upon a really vital problem in political theory, and has done a great deal to bring it to popular attention. But in his attack upon the monistic theory of the state he has essentially propagated the ideas of other men—of Figgis and Maitland, Gierke and Duguit.

The present Laski miscellany exhibits the typical professor of political theory. You will find a graceful essay on Machiavelli and another on Rousseau. One can only say that they are very nice and useful, for studies of this sort are always justifiable as critical biography. Two other essays deal with education but the majority of those in the volume are concerned with the present problems of politics. Writing them originally for popular magazines, Professor Laski is presumably giving us his judgments upon questions that trouble the times. Yet all he does is to voice the criticisms of the present political system that have been heard so often that they have become commonplaces, and to offer constructive proposals that can hardly be called more than evasions. His basic ideas are so weak that he is always being carried away by the current of his themes, a fault that is also to be attributed in part to the demands of popular magazine writing. The result is often a farrago of inconsistencies. One is often at a loss to guess whether Professor Laski thinks that democracy has succeeded splendidly or failed dismally. One cannot be sure whether he is optimistic or despairing. A peculiarity all his own especially distinguishes him. Having lived in America as well as in England, he attempts to write with reference to the experience of readers on both sides of the water, with the result that he describes a sort of composite Anglo-American experience that has no real existence.

The essays are full of echoes and platitudes. The one called The American Political System is, as far as I can tell, compounded in various proportions of Walter Bagehot's "The English Constitution," Woodrow Wilson's "Congressional Government," Lindsay Rogers's "The American Senate," and Walter Lippmann's "The Phantom Public." One comes across cleverly worded paraphrases of "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and "government by the consent of the governed." In another essay, A Plea for Equality, we are solemnly told that "where there are rich and poor, educated and uneducated, we find always masters and servants. To be rich is to be powerful, to be educated is to have authority," and "what we call embezzlement in a junior clerk becomes high finance in a millionaire"; and there are many more remarks of the same character. At that it turns out that the plea for equality is really one for social justice. It is hard to see any reason for the avoidance of this idea except the desire to sound paradoxical. The opening essay, The Dangers of Obedience, which is a justification of the right of revolution and a call to revolt, has a theme which will be familiar to every Jeffersonian Democrat. Somehow I am not moved to go out and hit a policeman in Union Square; in fact, I am only left good and mad with its obvious parlor terrorism; I am somehow not comforted by the assurance that there have been revolutions that have succeeded.

I think that the essay The Recovery of Citizenship may especially be taken as the measure of Professor Laski's depth as a political thinker, since it preaches the gospel of pluralism with which his name is particularly associated. The meaning of democratic citizenship is to be recovered by the participation of the citizen in the activity of self-governing associations to which the state will concede various present functions of government. The association will be governed by councils, and in the work of general legislation the state will seek the benefit of their experience through advisory committees. Now, I will not argue about English experience, but as far as the American scene is concerned there is something very queer about this. It seems to me that Professor Laski is somewhat in the absurd position of an idealist who has dreamed so long of Utopia that he is unable to perceive that it has come to exist. In these United States political pluralism is practically an accomplished fact. There is in the first place no real conception of the state in American constitutional theory in any terms that would be familiar to a European political thinker. The people organized in their voluntary associations are the decisive factors in government. This fact was immediately perceived by another foreigner, Professor Siegfried, a realistic Frenchman and a more acute observer than Professor Laski, and the situation was admirably expounded in "America Comes of Age." Geographical political organization exists in the United States only upon a formal basis. The real power is exercised by scores of great associations of which the Anti-Saloon League, the American Federation of Labor, and the United States Chamber of Commerce are only a few of the greatest. The voluntary advisory committees which Professor Laski urges as aids to the legislatures puzzle me even more. Has Professor Laski never attended a hearing on a bill in Congress or a State legislature? The poor legislators are already besieged by advisory committees a plenty. The real problems of American pluralism that might have been considered are such ones as the viciousness of many of the associations and the absence of democratic control by the rank and file—in other words, it might have been perceived that even under pluralism the problems of political government often remain.

The place of business in the "future" pluralistic state apparently troubles Professor Laski particularly, for he considers the problem in a separate essay entitled Can Business Be Civilized? I pass over the fact that the issue might have been better stated Can Industry Be Socialized? But it is less easy to let rest the proffered idea that business be made into a "profession," presumably with ideals of service. The analogy is derived obviously from the existence of bar associations and medical associations, but it can hardly be considered as more than quaint in an age and country that has seen the professions degenerating into businesses to all intents and purposes. Professor Laski does not say very much of big business, but if he did he might discover perhaps the most powerful of all established forms of pluralism. In this he shares the blindness of all the exponents of political pluralism, who are always perplexed if not terrified by the threat of labor unions to the state but practically ignore the fully established power of the great corporations in the state. Yet the existence of this corporate pluralism is the decisive factor in the futility and sterility of political theory.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

This Negro

Not Without Laughter. By Langston Hughes. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

HERE is the Negro in his most picturesque form—the blues-loving Negro, the spiritual-singing Negro, the exuberant, the impassioned, the irresponsible Negro, the Negro of ancient folk-lore and romantic legend. "Good-natured, guitar-playing Jim Boy"; Angee Rogers loving Jim Boy no matter where he goes or whom he lives with; Aunt Hager, the old mammy of a dead generation, "whirling around in front of the altar at revival meetings . . . her face shining with light, arms outstretched as though all the cares of the world had been cast away"; Harriet, "beautiful as a jungle princess," singing and jazzing her life away, sneering at sin as a white man's bogy, and burying beneath peals of laughter "a white man's war for democracy"; and Sandy, seeing his people as a "band of black dancers captured in a white world," and resolving to free them from themselves as well as from their white dictators—these are the Negroes of this novel, these the people who make it live with that quick and intimate reality which is seldom seen in American fiction.

"Not Without Laughter" continues the healthy note begun in Negro fiction by Claude McKay and Rudolph Fisher. Instead of picturing the Negro of the upper classes, the Negro who in too many instances has been converted to white norms, who even apes white manners and white morality and condemns the Negroes found in this novel as "niggers," McKay, Fisher, and Hughes have depicted the Negro in his more natural and more fascinating form. There can be no doubt that the Negro who has made great contributions to American culture is this type of Negro, the Negro who has brought us his blues, his labor songs, his spirituals, his folk-lore—and his jazz. And yet this very type of Negro is the one that has been the least exploited by contemporary Negro novelists and short-story writers. It has been white writers such as DuBose Heyward, Julia Peterkin, Howard W. Odum, and Paul Green who have turned to this Negro for the rich material of their novels, dramas, and stories. These writers, however, have known this Negro only as an exterior reality, as something they could see, listen to, sympathize with, even love; they could never know him as an inner reality, as something they could live with as with themselves, their brothers, their sweethearts—something as real as flesh, as tense as pain. Langston Hughes does. As a Negro he has grown up with these realities as part of himself, as part of the very air he has breathed. Few blurs are there in these pages, and no fumbling projections, and no anxious searching for what is not. Here is this Negro, or at least one vital aspect of him, as he really is, without ornament, without pretense.

All this praise, however, must not be misconstrued. "Not Without Laughter" is not without defects of style and weaknesses of structure. The first third of the novel, in fact, arrives at its points of interest with a pedestrian slowness; after that it picks up tempo and plunges ahead. Unfortunately, there are no great situations in the novel, no high points of intensity to grip and overpower the reader. Nor is there vigor of style—that kind of vigor which could have made of Sandy's ambition to emancipate his race, for example, a more stirring motif. But "Not Without Laughter" is significant despite these weaknesses. It is significant because even where it fails, it fails beautifully, and where it succeeds—namely, in its intimate characterizations and in its local color and charm—it succeeds where almost all others have failed.

V. F. Calverton

Augustine of Tagaste

St. Augustine. By Giovanni Papini. Translated from the Italian by Dorothy Emmerich. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THE aim of the creative biographer is more simple of statement than accomplishment, but Signor Papini in his life of one great Christian apologist has avoided most of the difficulties by remaining apologist himself. He prefaces his book, in the main an abridgment of the "Confessions," by a necessarily strained comparison between the redemption of Papini and that of a saint "who had also been a man of letters and a lover of words, but at the same time a restless seeker after philosophies and truths even to the point of being tempted by occultism." And whatever its later conclusions, the same basic chord is struck again and again through the book.

The most sympathetic reviewer might be hard put to it to determine the specific value of such a volume aside from its importance as an addition to the literature of apologetics. Since Signor Papini has no additional light to shed on Augustine the man, on the fond woman, his mother, who doted on him, wept over him, and persecuted him in the manner of many mothers since whose sons have become saints or worse, on the irascible father who birched and cuffed him, and on the various teachers who misled him on the whole no more flagrantly than youth is misled today, we are further put to it to share in Signor Papini's rather introverted agitation. There is not the slightest doubt after reading the "Confessions" that Augustine of Tagaste was a good deal of a prig. But Signor Papini's apologetic leaves us in some confusion as to why he was a saint.

Such statements as that "Augustine did not wait for Freud to discover that the child from its mother's womb is less pure than most people believe" is not only pointless but, by inference, misleading. The doctrine of original sin preceded Augustine and was borrowed piecemeal from a cult some centuries at least older than Christianity. Nor is there any very apparent connection between categorical sin and the Freudian terminology.

By such triumphs of logic it is naturally possible to prove that the lily is white because the dandelion is yellow, but the results are no more informative than the answer to the riddle of the number of angels on the point of a pin. The normal reaction of the reader to such extended excursions into bafflement is one of mild disgust. If anything else were needed, it might be pointed out to Signor Papini that St. Augustine has written his own apologia.

Eugene Löhrke

Female Decorum

Years of Grace. By Margaret Ayer Barnes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

THIS is a woman's novel about a woman's loves. And its limitations lie in the fact that it is so unmistakably, so exclusively feminine. We see Jane Ward, in the course of her pilgrimage from fourteen to fifty, in love three times—or rather in love twice and married once. When she is seventeen she loves the nineteen-year-old sculptor son of a French consul and an Englishwoman; when she is twenty she is married to a rising young banker whom her family looks on with a kindly eye; when she is thirty-six she falls in love again, with an agreeable vagabond who happens to be married to her best friend. And in each case she behaves with seemliness, with decorum, as her family expects her to, a little against the wishes of her own heart—except that she thinks her heart so unreliable a guide. She allows herself to be separated from the young sculptor and promises not to write him; she puts away resolutely the temptation to elope with the vagabond, although for the second time in her life she really loves and wants what love offers her. When her children, less bound by "conduct," by "grace," by what is fitting and orderly in human behavior, marry young and divorce without hesitation she is not shaken in her course. There are values, there are things one must do. In the end everything comes out at the same place anyway; meanwhile, one must not start things without finishing them.

This, of course, is an old theme and an always interesting one—the conflict between desire and duty—only Miss Barnes would not call it duty. She calls it "grace." It is an argument that not only each age but each individual in an age must settle for himself. To Jane Ward, the heroine of this book, love and individual desire did not matter so much as not making her parents unhappy, not doing foolish things, not hurting her husband's feelings although she no longer loved him, not endangering her children's status in the world by a divorce. To her daughter the only thing that mattered was that she wished to live with a man she loved instead of one she did not. Each man and woman must make his or her own choice in the matter. There are no rules. To do Miss Barnes justice, I do not think she intended to indicate any. She sets the problem: grace versus a kind of honesty and frankness; you follow your nature when you decide.

The excessively feminine character of the novel, however, does not lie in the theme, which is universal enough. It lies in the minute attention to details of dress, deportment, and house furnishing for the last fifty years in the United States, and especially in Chicago, where Jane Ward grew up, married, and brought up her children. There is, I should say, too much quaint costuming, too many rooms described too carefully, too much mise en scène, in short. The characters are smothered in a cloud of ruffles. Thus, much of the power of a family chronicle is lost. And the parallels between the generations are too apt. Exactly the same scene should not take place between Jane and Jimmy as took place between Lily Furness and Bert Lancaster twenty years before. History repeats itself, no doubt; but it should, in a fine novel, show some subtlety at the same time.

And there is no doubt that in many ways Miss Barnes's is a fine novel—thoughtful, impartial, wise. It wants cutting, perhaps, cutting out of some of the black-walnut furniture and the cotillions. Then her characters would stand out as they should have stood out—men and women beset by a harsh world. A novelist must play upon the heart; when she is sure of her skill at that she may turn her attention very expertly and discriminatingly to the eye.

Dorothy Van Doren

Books in Brief

A Roumanian Diary. By Hans Carossa. Translated from the German by Agnes Neill Scott. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Hans Carossa's "Roumanian Diary" offers eloquent testimony to the saying that what is one man's meat is another's poison in the light of subjective analysis, and his little book, following hard after the deluge precipitated by "All Quiet," is a distinguished contribution to the war literature of the nations. Distinct from the general flood of war books whose purport is to draw an inference, if not to inculcate a lesson, "A Roumanian Diary" carries no message beyond its natural appeal to the philosophically-minded. Experience, the author would say, is color; and every subjective evaluation of events carries with it vistas beyond good and evil. Safety and comfort are less important when one reflects that few forms of suffering are wholly without compensation, if only in the realm of dreams, and in a world where much is confused the sharpness of pain and the pleasure of victory are never wholly separate. Hans Carossa was a physician before the war, and served with a Bavarian unit in both the Western and Eastern theaters of war. His diary offers little to those searching for war's terrors, splendors, or scenic horrors. But as the reaction of one quiet and sensitive soul to events which we suspect have been viewed too much from the outside, it is both beautiful and important.

Mitsou: or How Girls Grow Wise. By Colette. Translated from the French by Jane Terry. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

"Mitsou" is a better book than "Chéri," which came out in translation last year. Colette, within her limited range, is an extraordinary writer. She goes quickly and effortlessly to the point she is making, and beautifully as well. Part of this story is told in dialogue form, reminding one of a clever French comedy of four characters—Mitsou, the little dancer; her friend, Petite-Chose; the Man of Means, who provides for Mitsou; and the Lieutenant in Blue, whom she loves. Part of the story, the most charming part, is told through letters. Altogether the little volume contains as deft and delicate, and at the same time touching and witty, a story as one is likely to find for an afternoon's entertainment.

Droll Peter. By Felix Timmermans. Translated from the Flemish by Maida C. Darnton and Wilhelmina J. Paul. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

It is peculiarly appropriate that Timmermans, both an artist and a writer, should interpret Breughel, whose painting so much overlapped the boundaries of literature. Moreover, Timmermans, as a representative of those writers who consciously attempt to express the spirit of Flanders, naturally turns to the sixteenth-century painter for his inspiration, and the result is a remarkable example of cross-fertilization in the arts. In his earlier book, "Pallieter," Timmermans hymned the joy of life in a pseudo-naive style which attempted to regain qualities traditional with the Flemish peasantry. The story of Peter Breughel succeeds "Pallieter" very naturally and stresses the carnal side of Breughel, depicting him as the draftsman of dancing peasants, of the battle between the lean and the fat, and of panoramic and populous landscapes. It captures admirably his vitality, his activity, and the homely shrewdness of the proverbial wisdom which inspired much of his work. A tender kind of sentiment always present in Timmermans has developed in subtlety and charm since "Pallieter"; it is only when he attempts to interpret the Breughel of the Triumph of Death that he fails, for this writer is too cheerful, too contentedly pagan to suggest the mystical charnel-house atmosphere which lingers in paintings of that school. "Droll Peter" is a hearty, wholesome, vividly pictorial novel with a note of happiness unusual in modern writing.

Honey Holler. By Keith MacKaye. Brentano's. $2.

Keith MacKaye, grandson of Steele MacKaye and son of Percy MacKaye, was born into the tradition of the theater and of the poet; he has combined these two traditions in his poetic play "Honey Holler," set in the hilly border regions of southern Connecticut. The play is to be presented this season by the Harvard Dramatic Club. It has had the praise of Oliver Sayler, who writes the introduction, and of Barrett Clark. It is rich in poetry—in the poetry of speech and of an idealistic interpretation of life. In its characters there is an interweaving of the natural and the supernatural: the Leather Man, the most interesting character in the book, steps in and out of a well like a spirit of the water; he is, however, only in hiding there and turns out to be an actual person, a person whose whole message is the necessity of searching out beauty. It is this character's passion that frees Lil, the young girl, to go in search of love, but the maternal earth-spirit in a woman's blood brings her home again. All the characters are humorous, lazy dreamers who love talk, and the dialogue moves with a kind of lassitude typical of Honey Holler itself.

Wolfe and North America. By Lieutenant Colonel F. E. Whitton. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

In this volume the author first analyzes briefly the causes of the struggle between France and England for North America and gives the essential facts bearing upon the life and military training of General James Wolfe. Then he deals at some length with the Seven Years' War, in so far as Wolfe was concerned, with special reference to the general strategic situation around Quebec and to the particular strategy of Wolfe's campaign for the capture of that stronghold. Colonel Whitton has done an excellent piece of work. His account of Wolfe's life is vivid and interesting. His analysis of the situation in North America is illuminating, particularly so where he discusses the weaknesses in the supposedly efficient government of New France. His survey of the Quebec campaign will probably rank as the best thing in print on the subject. And in addition to the other merits, the author's style would bring distinction to any historical study.

The American Heresy. By Christopher Hollis. Minton, Balch and Company. $3.50.

The great American heresy, as Mr. Hollis appears to see it, is the notion that America is still a democracy. It started out as a democracy under Jefferson and would have continued as such if Calhoun had had his way, but the Jeffersonian state died with the Civil War. The cause of its demise was the destruction of the States as political units, thanks to which the political power has largely passed out of the hands of its nominal holders and into those of wealth, so that America, like England, is now a plutocracy working "through an apparently democratic mechanism." The natural consequence of this change has been "a collapse of the capacity for political thought." Down to the Civil War politics was a live matter and there were two well-defined theories of what the nation should be. Since the Civil War and Reconstruction there has been only one theory, and that non-political and earthy. What may happen in the remote future Mr. Hollis thinks it would be foolish to predict, but for the immediate future he sees no prospect of "any large change." The book is not exactly a narrative history, but rather a series of four elaborate essays on Jefferson, Calhoun, Lincoln, and Wilson. The general style

THE ONLY WOMAN AMBASSADOR

Katherine Anthony tells the surprising story of Alexander Kollontay, Russia's ambassador to Norway.

This is but one of many provocative articles and short stories in the August and September issues of

North American Review

Others are

SEEING RED by Isabelle Keating
A dispassionate yet graphic description of the scope of Communistic activities in this country.

PROPHET OF PROHIBITION by Ray T. Tucker
An intimate exposition of the Field-General of militant drys, Clarence True Wilson.

THE SPORT OF KINGS by Lupton Wilkinson
How horse racing, the most fascinating sport of all, has fared in this latest year of grace.

TINKHAM by Oliver McKee, Jr.
A personality sketch of the Representative who proved such a thorn in the side of Bishop Cannon.

SCIENCE AND THE SPAN OF LIFE by T. Swann Harding
In which our hopes of all becoming Methuselahs are sadly blasted, along with many legends of centenarians.

These are among the fifteen to twenty-five articles and short stories in each issue.

The North American Review is, according to one of its friends, "the most thoroughly revivified old magazine in the country." It is aimed at people who are interested in sprightly as well as authoritative accounts of the very latest in politics, science, literature, morals, sports and anything else that tickles the intelligent fancy.

Introductory Offer—New Subscribers Only 6 Months for $1.00. Offer open only until September 1st. Mail coupon now.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, N. 8-30
9 East 37th Street, New York, N. Y.

For the enclosed one dollar enter my subscription for six months. (Canada, $1.25; foreign $1.50.)

Name .....

Address .....

City .....State .....

and tone may be gathered from the opening sentence of the essay on Jefferson: "Thomas Jefferson was a sandy-haired man, an architect, a market gardener, and the author of curious works—one, to refute the Comte de Buffon, on American animal life, and another, also on American animal life, called the Declaration of Independence."

The Anatomy of Music. By Winthrop Parkhurst. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

When the layman seeks knowledge about musical structure he is usually rebuffed by technicalities and baffled by explanations that he does not understand. Harmony and counterpoint seem to be recondite matters intelligible only through an innate musical sense. By such a seeker Mr. Parkhurst's book will be blessed. It removes the veils of pedantry, and shows that the arcana of tonal combinations are actually quite simple. Amateur listeners will be benefited by reading it, and prospective students of harmony will find it a lucid introduction.

Stories of the Great Operas. By Ernest Newman. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Some operatic libretti being almost as involved as the quantum theory, guidebooks are always in demand, though not all of them can be trusted implicitly. To have Ernest Newman as a cicerone is to be assured of accuracy, clarity, and geniality. In this volume he disentangles the plots of five operas by Verdi, three by Puccini, and one each by Gounod, Bizet, Offenbach, and Humperdinck. Brief biographies of the composers are included.

Films

Where Broadway Scores

THOSE inscrutable ways of Providence! Haven't we all been bewailing the pernicious influence of Broadway on the youthful and inexperienced talkie? Haven't we been deploring the latter's readiness to ape the ways and habits of the stage, while suppressing the promptings of its own cinematic nature? Today we have to admit that Broadway's influence has not been all for the bad. With the milk of Broadway dialogue Hollywood has been obliged to imbibe some of its intelligence as well. No doubt, in the perspective of even a few years Broadway successes are apt to lose a great deal of their glamor. But in one respect they are undeniably superior to Hollywood creations: they represent adult standards of intelligence if not always of artistic appreciation. Injection of intelligence into pictures by means of dialogue may not be an unmixed blessing from the point of view of future developments, but the future will take care of itself. For the present it is a relief to encounter pictures which are not made expressly for the juvenile mind.

In this class belongs "Holiday" (Rivoli), based on Philip Barry's play of the same name. Of cinematic values expressive of its own medium "Holiday" has none. It has hardly a scene to suggest the searching power of the camera. The development of its plot is borne entirely by its dialogue, and no attempt is made to indulge in cinematic embroidery on the principal theme of the film, the rebellion of romantic youth against Babbittry, even when the story provides such an excellent opportunity as the ballroom scene.

In short, the direction of the film follows faithfully the stage model. And yet "Holiday" is undoubtedly one of the best talkies produced. It is distinguished both by the quality of the play and by the acting. Its story and dialogue, if not profound or important, are fresh and entertaining. Its acting is light and expressive. Ann Harding in the part of Linda deserves the highest honors, for not only is her acting polished, but what is more it is convincing—no mean achievement in a part as vague and contradictory as that of Linda. Miss Harding is also the fortunate possessor of a rare gift among the screen actresses, a voice of a very beautiful timbre, with a tragic note in its well-modulated range of expressions which rings true.

Even if we have to come down a step—intellectually—in adjusting ourselves to the true Hollywood standards, we cannot help giving credit to, and even grudgingly admiring, the display of realistic thrills that is provided in "The Big House" (Astor). This is a mighty good melodrama rising to a climax in the breath-taking spectacle of a pitched battle between mutinous convicts and the authorities. Apart from this scene the chief interest of the film lies in its picture of prison life, a subject sufficiently unfamiliar to the majority of movie-goers to seem startling. It is, of course, only for the experts to say whether the details of the picture are entirely authentic. They have surely enough truth in them, however, to serve as a needed revelation of this ghastly aspect of our civilization. Probably the effect would be even stronger if the story showed a little more originality and eschewed stock characters. But Hollywood will be Hollywood.

In "Raffles" (Rialto) Ronald Colman is no longer the sprightly, easy-going adventurer with a bent for sardonic humor whom we knew in "Bulldog Drummond" and "Condemned." His spell seems to be broken, his touch is no longer sure, and now and again we doubt if this is really the great Raffles. Perhaps in his next picture Mr. Colman will oblige us with something that comes nearer to his stature as a fascinating villain.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

‡Flying High—Apollo—W. 42 St.
†Lysistrata—44 St.—44 St., W. of B'way.
†Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45 St.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47 St., W. of B'way.
*The Last Mile—Sam H. Harris—42 St., W. of B'way.
‡The New Garrick Gaieties—Guild—52 St., W. of B'way.

FILMS

All Quiet on the Western Front—Central—47 St. and B'way.

Behind the German Lines—Beginning Friday, August 1, Eighth Street Playhouse—52 W. Eighth St.

Mr. & Mrs. Gifford Pinchot's Cruise—Plaza Theater—58 St., E. of Madison Ave.

Mr. & Mrs. Gifford Pinchot's Cruise—Little Carnegie—57 St., E. of Seventh Ave.

News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.

Old and New—Beginning Saturday, August 2, Fifth Avenue Playhouse—66 Fifth Ave.

Siegfried—55 St. Playhouse—E. of Seventh Ave.

CONCERTS

Goldman Band Concerts, Monday, August 4, Central Park, Comic Opera Program; Tuesday, August 5, New York University, Wagner Program; Wednesday, August 6, Central Park, English Program; Thursday, August 7, New York University, Symphonic Program; Friday, August 8, Central Park, Wagner-Liszt Program; Saturday, August 9, New York University, Italian Program; Sunday, August 10, Central Park, Tchaikovsky Program. Concerts begin at 8:45 P.M.

Philharmonic Symphony Concerts, Lewisohn Stadium, every evening at 8:30.

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

PLAYS FILMS

"LYSISTRATA"

"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockridge, The Sun

FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre W. of B'way, Eves. 8:30 Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:30

THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS

The NEW GARRICK GAIETIES

GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

"MIGHTIEST WAR DRAMA EVER SEEN"
—N. Y. American.

"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"

A Universal Picture presented by Carl Laemmle
Directed by Lewis Milestone

"A notable achievement, sincere, earnest, vivid and graphic. Better than anything so far done."—Mordaunt Hall, N. Y. Times.

"Enormously compelling talking motion picture. As a show something to get definitely excited about! A very fine motion picture."—Howard Barnes, Herald Tribune.

CENTRAL THEATRE, B'dway and 47th Street
Twice Daily: 2:45—8:45.
3 times Sun., 2:45—5:45—8:45
Midnight Show Every Saturday

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street
Cooled by Refrigeration
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

MR. and MRS. GIFFORD PINCHOT in Their Cruise of the SOUTH SEAS
An Extraordinary Camera and Microphone Record of Unusual Adventures in the Islands of the Pacific
PLAZA THEATRE 58th St., E. of Madison Ave. WED., THURS., & FRI., July 29 to Aug. 1st Also Chevalier in "THE BIG POND"
LITTLE CARNEGIE 57th St., E. of Seventh Ave. SATURDAY TO TUESDAY August 2 to 5 Also "Buddy" Rogers in "SAFETY IN NUMBERS"

SECOND BIG WEEK—JULY 31-AUG. 7
55TH STREET PLAYHOUSE
154 W. 55th St. Circle 0129
COOL
Cont. 1:30-midnight. Popular prices
1st Time Pop. Prices
UFA'S German Screen Masterpiece
"SIEGFRIED"
Dir. by Fritz Lang, creator of "Metropolis" and "Kriemhild's Revenge."
"Siegfried" is undoubtedly the most beautiful film that New York has ever seen."—Telegram

DIR. JOSEPH R. FLIESLER
8TH STREET PLAYHOUSE
52 W. 8th St. SPR. 5095
Fri-Sat-Sun-Mon. Aug. 1-2-3-4
Behind the German Lines
Actual Scenes of the West Front
5TH AVENUE PLAYHOUSE
66 Fifth Ave. ALG. 7661
Week of Sat., Aug. 2
"Old and New"
Directed by Eisenstein

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Struggle for Power in Persia

By JAN VAN AS

NOWHERE so much as in Persia is one struck by the tragic fate of a nation. A weakened, obstructed, pestered, exploited country has replaced the glorious Iranian empire that at one time reigned eastward as far as Greece and Egypt and westward beyond Samarkand and the Pamir. The land of Darius and Cyrus, symbolized by a silver lion and a golden sun, has lost its former power and glory.

The Persian admits that only a progressive program can restore the country, but as a rule he is not able to tear out his deep-rooted fanaticism, his superstition, and his bigotry. Many things, however, have changed for the better since the dictator-king Reza Khan has governed the country. Reza Khan, who has had a very romantic career, a man with great ambitions, much common sense, and a strong will, climbed his way cleverly from the low ranks of a common soldier to the illustrious peacock throne. Not only did he have to sail through a thick fog of Russian and English intrigue, but he had also to steer clear of the very influential Mohammedan priesthood. He reformed the army, hanged the bandits, repaired the roads, made traveling safe, attempted to do away with open corruption, and robbed the Mohammedan priesthood of its undue influence. By his endeavors he inaugurated a new period in Persian history. He has laid the foundations for a new Iran.

After Reza Khan's successful coup d'etat, the government was centralized in Teheran, and an army of officials who were directly responsible to the central government was appointed throughout the country. The autonomous governors of the provinces were replaced by responsible officials. This constituted a radical reform, but these new officials were bent on their personal enrichment and promotion. Under the dictatorial regime the parliament is a sham. It owes its existence merely to the fulfilment of a constitutional paragraph and has not the least influence upon national or foreign affairs. There are no political parties in our sense of the word in Persia; the parliamentary work is entirely in the hands of the Shah and his intelligent adviser Taimur Tash. Illiteracy is so great that it is easy for a strong group to influence public opinion through personal contact, and a corrupt system of elections can hardly be expected to improve the caliber of parliament.

I am convinced that a moral revolution in Persia will have to prepare the way for a material improvement. The various currents of national revival are promising signs in that direction. They usually converge upon the elimination of Arabic and Islamic domination, which among the intellectuals is felt more and more to be of foreign origin and a detriment to the well-being of the country. I think chiefly of the Babi movement, almost unnoticed but widespread, and the Pan-Iranian movement, directed chiefly by Zoroastrians.

But Persia has some strong enemies, who are loath to see her growing independence. The rivalry between England and Russia has kept both from occupying the country. To Peter the Great of Russia has been attributed a last will—authorities on the subject, however, have declared it unauthentic—which illustrates the imperialistic policy which he inaugurated in Central Asia. Paragraph 9 of this document has been the sacred guide for the Russian policies in the Orient. Part of it reads as follows: "He who reigns in Constantinople and India will be the real sovereign of the world. Therefore continually wage war, now with Turkey, then with Persia, . . . hasten the downfall of Persia, penetrate to the Persian Gulf, . . . advance as far as India, the storehouse of the world." Russia has always been inspired by this apocryphal document, and although the red revolution has steered the Oriental policy of Russia in another direction, the Soviet government has not entirely abandoned this imperial order of Peter the Great. Theoretically the Russian attitude toward Persia has been changed profoundly, but practically the principle of penetration is still fully applied. Russian propaganda in Persia is chiefly of a commercial nature. There are no important traces of direct propaganda, which incidentally is forbidden. Individual propaganda for communism is mainly in the hands of Persian-speaking Russians from Azerbaijan.

Public opinion, however, has been influenced favorably by the Russian treaty of February 26, 1921, in which the Soviet government declares Russia's renunciation of the policy of force in regard to Persia. Wishing to see the Persian people independent, flourishing, and freely controlling the whole of their own possessions, the government of the U.S.S.R. declared all treaties, conventions, and agreements concluded by the Czarist government with Persia and tending to the diminution of the rights of the Persian people completely null and void. In accordance with these principles, Russia restored the Persian frontier established by the Frontier Commission of 1881, the islands of Ashur Ada, and the other islands lying along the coast of the province of Astrabad. Furthermore, it returned the village of Firuze and the land surrounding it. The contracting parties agreed that in case there should be attempts by means of armed intervention to realize a "rapacious policy" on the territory of Persia, or to turn that territory into a base for military action against the Soviets, the latter would have the right to take troops into Persia. This is clearly directed against England.

Russia also declared its complete rejection of that financial policy which the Czarist government pursued and which was aimed at Persia's political bondage. None of the Russian loans would have to be repaid; Russia handed over to the Persian people its entire vested interests in Persia, surrendered the strategic Enzeli-Teheran and the Kazvin-Hamadan roads built by the Russians, the railways between Djulfa, Tabriz, and Lake Urumiya with all their buildings, rolling stock, quays, stores of goods, barges, and steamers, all the telegraph and telephone lines within the Persian boundaries, and the port of Enzeli.

One can easily understand what effect this Russian generosity had upon the Persians. Through personal inquiry and investigation into Persian sympathies I have come to the conclusion that the Englishman in most cases does not curry popular approval. The uneducated Persian is inclined to acknowledge the Russian policy as disinterested, the English one, however, as egotistic, although England ably camouflages her activities. England is considered the silent, omnipotent Power.

Russian dumping methods kill off Persian commerce, but the Persian sees only the direct advantages of the cheaper sugar and cheaper printed cotton goods under which the Russians are burying the market. Private enterprise was powerless against the superiority of the Russian trade monopoly. Russia captured about 50 per cent of the trade. Russian oil was sold in the south cheaper than that of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, which has its oil fields right on the spot. Every four or five months a Soviet steamer used to anchor at the port of Buschir in the Persian Gulf. Frightened by the presence of cheap wares, the merchants in the southern towns started lowering their prices. Long after the goods have been taken out of the market for consumption, the confusion remains.

Persia has been badly in need of a railroad, but every attempt at building one has been nipped in the bud. A trans-Persian railway would break the isolation of the country, reduce the immense import expenses, improve the distribution and export of home products, and act as a dynamo for the development of Persian economic resources. The history of railroad building is covered by a heavy cloud of intrigue. Neither England nor Russia has been willing to tolerate the building of one. For a long time they seem to have been of the opinion that no railway at all was by far the best solution of the problem. The country itself was never able to supply the necessary funds, and to a loan were attached certain conditions that would have strangled the independence of Persia.

But in 1928 Reza Khan succeeded in overcoming all these obstacles and made a contract with a German-American company to build a line which will connect the Caspian Sea with the Persian Gulf. The Soviet government would have preferred that a transversal line were built instead of a trans-Persian one—namely, from the Black Sea through Soviet Armenia over Tabriz to Teheran, linking up with the trans-Caucasian railway. But Reza Khan had little sympathy with such a line. He has royal ambitions which would be frustrated if Persia should become communized.

Persia, aiming at economic and political independence, will try to cover expenses out of the national budget. A sugar and tea monopoly, created by the law of May, 1925, is supposed to finance this enterprise. Unfortunately, the burden will have to be carried by the poor, who live mainly on tea, bread, and grapes. On account of the heavy import duties and the costs of transportation, prices are already much too high for the impoverished country. Moreover, the bulk of the money will leave the country. But the future of Persia and the restoration of Iran depend almost entirely on the success of this undertaking. The peaceful penetration of the trans-Persian railway marks the beginning of a new era.

OPEN SHELF

THE BOOKS YOU CAN'T GET ELSEWHERE

may be rented for a nominal fee. Members throughout the United States have access to a large collection of rare, scarce, out-of-print, strange and curious books; limited, privately-printed editions, unabridged translations and extraordinary new books. Please state occupation or profession when writing for information and lists.

Esoterika Biblion Society

45 West 45th Street, Dep't N-6 New York City

GRAPHOLOGY

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS is a practical method for taking personal inventory. No personal bias in graphology. Send handwriting. Character or vocational analysis, $1.00. Miss Florence Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

WORLD TOUR

YOUNG man, writer, 21, desires interesting companion (male) on extensive world vagabond tour. Start September 1st for Central America. Prepare to rough it. Small emergency fund necessary. Box 2497, % The Nation.

HELP WANTED

WANTED—Young man for full-time work in publicity, publications, executive tasks, with American Civil Liberties Union; experience on newspaper and in campaigns desirable. Apply by letter only, 100 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

EDUCATIONAL

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN
Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 13th year.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN
GERMAN. Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th year. Also neglected English education.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

RUSSIAN taught by university graduate, instructor in Russian at Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes. VICTOR RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 25 W. 123rd St. Harlem 0487

POSITIONS WANTED

SECRETARY, editorial assistant — college woman, at present employed by eminent editor, will be free from September 1st or later. Well recommended. Box 2487, % The Nation.

YOUNG man, L.L.B., thoroughly experienced law clerk, desires position with law firm offering a living wage. Box 2495, % The Nation.

TYPING and manuscripts done neatly, accurately; 40c thousand words. Rosse, Barclay 1820, or Box 2494, % The Nation.

LIBRARIAN with knowledge of sciences, languages, typing, proofreading, desires responsible position, preferably with scientific publication. Free Sept. 1. Box 2496, % The Nation.

SHOPPERS' CORNER

SPECIAL DISCOUNTS on Singer Sewing Machine models Nos. 128 and 99, during August only. Other savings from 25% to 50% on standard advertised merchandise. Write or call John 1427. SERVELL SYSTEM, INC., 35 Maiden Lane, New York City.

FOR RENT

APARTMENT TO SHARE

ARTIST, gentleman, wishes to share his charmingly furnished three room studio apartment with congenial young man. Large library and organ. West 28th St. $35 a month. Phone 10-4, Caledonia 6843.

One insertion in The Nation Help Wanted column did this:

An employer, looking for a secretary to assist in research and compilation of a manuscript, received 16 replies from 13 states. Every one of the applicants were exceptionally well qualified to fill the position.

If you are looking for the intelligent worker, send us your requirements immediately.

Rates, $3.08 for one-half inch (30 words) minimum. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Please accompany order with remittance

THE NATION
20 Vesey St., N. Y. Fitz Roy 9074

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

SUMMER SUMMER

SCOPUS

P.O. Lake George, N. Y.

An Adult Camp of Distinction in the Adirondacks

Spend a real vacation on beautiful Lake Trout! All land and water sports—unusual social activities. Dietary Laws observed. Camp open all September, at Special Rates.

N.Y. Office: 11 W. 42nd St. LONgacre 0105

BETHLEHEM COUNTRY CLUB

Bethlehem, Conn.
Tel. 48—Ring 2, Woodbury, Conn.
Simple Camp Life in the Litchfield Hills
ADULT CAMP FAMILIES ACCOMMODATED
Sports: Boating, Bathing, Tennis, Handball and Dancing
Rates: August $27.50, September $25.
Fare, Round Trip by Bus $5.00

QUIET, charming vacation place for limited number of grown-ups with artistic and literary interests. Modest rates. Ask for circular.
CAMP ARTEMIS
Brewster, N. Y.

CHILDREN'S SUMMER

HAVE accommodation for 2 or 3 children between 6-12 years of age, in private New Jersey country home; very good care. References exchanged. Reply Box 2498, % The Nation.

FOR SALE

A Unique Development

AN opportunity to create a permanent retreat for summer vacation and winter weekends for your family, near enough for New York commuting, is offered a few congenial professional families. Tennis, handball, social hall, children's playground, horseback riding, swimming on property. Golf courses and Sound bathing nearby. Unusual studio bungalow can be built to your specifications in an artistic, intellectual colony at Westport, Conn. Why continue to pay high rentals for unesthetic bungalows and send your children to camps? We should like to show you this mountain-like retreat, 1 hour from New York. Prices range from $2,500 for an acre and bungalow.

Royce, Wisconsin 1649

IN Adirondack Mts.—160 acres—5 room log cabin—peeled spruce—built 1865. Perfect condition. Wonderful summer home or hunting camp; cellar, garage. $3,800.00; easy terms. 100 other camps and cabins. Booklet. Earl Woodward, Luzerne, N. Y.

SPACIOUS Old Colonial Homestead, barn, and 4 acres in Southern New Hampshire, 1,100 feet high, for sale at a give-away price; gravity water; electricity; easy of access. Kinghan, Gilmanton Corner, N. H.

SUMMER PLACE WANTED

COUPLE, child 6, wish spend few weeks vacation and recreation with congenial people at reasonable cost. State price and particulars. Box 2498, % The Nation.

INDIAN HEAD

an ideal camp for adults

Echo Lake, Warrensburg, N. Y.

Dancing
Swimming
Fishing
Rowing
Canoeing

Tennis
Golf
Baseball
Basket Ball
Horseback riding

All social and sport activities.
Only five miles from Lake George.

Rate: $32.50 per week.

Take Albany Night boat on any Saturday night and meet our bus at the Albany Pier on Sunday morning which will transport you to camp without any extra charge.

Write or phone for illustrated booklet.

N. Y. Office:
870 E. 149th St. Phone Mott Haven 4703

Spend Your Vacation on the shores of the Queen of Mountain Lakes

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

Superb location at "America's first summer resort." All the most desirable camp features. The Wunnishaunta Booklet, sent free, includes pictures of camp activities, auto routes, train and airplane information.

MRS. SADIE BRICKMAN, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

August Rental

You who are looking for a Summer home for August—

You who have a home to rent for August—

Have you looked over the Real Estate columns in this issue? If there isn't anything there to meet your requirements send them to us immediately.

RATES:
30 words (minimum) $3.08.
Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

THE NATION
20 Vesey St. Fitz Roy 9074

MILFORD

KENT, Connecticut

'The Camp for YOUth!'

JUST BRING A BUNDLE OF SPIRIT!

A beautiful summering place for intelligent young folks and folks who stay young; informal, athletic, carefree; sheltered tent accommodations and log cabins; excellent meals.

"Mickey" Michaels is especially desirous of greeting Nation readers.

Rates Moderate.

Camp 'phone Kent 1-8
In New York: 1440 Broadway
PENnsylvania 7842

SEA GATE RENDEZ-VOUS
Where food is the best

A VACATION is a necessity; a change of surroundings greatly beneficial; wholesome food an elixir. You will enjoy all this at the Sea Gate Rendez-vous, where food is the best, where comfort, coziness and simplicity, aided by the sea air, and the health-giving rays of the sun, combines to restore poise, harmony and well being to the vacationist. Arrangements by week, day, or as long as your vacation lasts. Write 3913 Laurel Ave., Sea Gate, N. Y. Harbor, or Telephone Mayflower 8655.

CAMP TOPSTONE—For Adults
A Jewish Camp with a fine American spirit

All land and water sports, with free instruction. Splendid social activities. Excellent strictly Kosher meals.
Write for illustrated booklet
SHAPIRO BROS. Branchville, Conn.

ZINDOREST PARK
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 122-F-3

Most beautiful estate, surrounded by brooks, lakes, woods and flowers. Absolutely private; Boating, Fishing, Tennis and other sports on premises. Golf and Saddle horses nearby. Limited accommodations, select following. Excellent Jewish Cuisine.

1½ hours on Erie ($2.60 round trip) or Route 17

MONROE, N. Y. (Near). Retreat for educated adults; English family; 100 acres lovely country; 3 baths. Bridge. Badminton. Open always. Will meet train. Mrs. Morse, P. O. Box 547.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 13, 1930 No. 3397

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 165
EDITORIALS:
The Great Republican Handicap 168
Mr. Ford Just Passes 169
Canada and Protection 169
Mooney Still Waits 170
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 171
OUR ATTITUDE TOWARD RUSSIA. By Oswald Garrison Villard 172
WHY STALIN WON. By Louis Fischer 174
"WHEN THE SENATE'S AWAY—" By Paul Y. Anderson 176
PIGEONS WADING. By Ruth Langland Holberg 177
DEER DANCE IN TAOS. By Mary Heaton Vorse 178
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 179
CORRESPONDENCE 180
BOOKS:
The Shadows. By Bert Cooksley 181
Heredity or Environment? By Henry Hazlitt 181
Labor and Religion. By Norman Thomas 182
Western Stuff. By J. Frank Dobie 182
Strindberg. By Eugene Löhrke 183
Portrait of an Intellectual. By Matthew Josephson 183
Educating—for What? By Jerome Davis 184
The Great Liberator. By William Spence Robertson 185
The Fires Die Down. By Anita Brenner 185
Society and Socialism. By Lucy Humphrey Smith 186
Books in Brief 187
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Terror in Western Samoa 189
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 190

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

CHINA'S NATIONALIST GOVERNMENT has its back to the wall. Its effective control covers only a thin ribbon of land along the southern seacoast and the Yangtze River. But within that ribbon lie the great cities of Shanghai and Canton, which means that Nanking still controls two-thirds of the revenue of the nation. So it may be able once more to bribe those of its opponents whom it cannot crush. Chiang Kai-shek, the young President, is a man of most un-Chinese temperament—he is at his best in last-ditch fighting. A month ago he defeated the Kwangsi clique of southern militarists. Then he withdrew his armies from Canton and Changsha in the hope of crushing the northern coalition, which is headed by his former colleague, Yen Hsi-shan, the "model governor" of Shansi, and Feng Yu-hsiang, who, once known as "the Christian general" and later as a Bolshevist agent, is a perpetual thorn in the side of Chinese governments. These men have for a year been in open revolt against Nanking, but thus far neither side has been able to strike a decisive military blow, and Chiang has been unwilling to pay the full price necessary for a peaceful settlement. It was a British tool of Yen's, Mr. Lennox Simpson ("Putnam Weale"), who recently seized the Tientsin customs, a financial blow more brutal than any which Yen's armies had been able to strike. With Yen are also a number of disaffected Nationalists, including the talkative and charming Wang Ching-wei, who was once Sun Yat-sen's favorite disciple but lacks the force of character to build a real government. And now a third enemy has risen to the dignity of the headlines—the "Communist" armies which are reported to have sacked Changsha.

COMMUNISTS OR BANDITS—what are these roving armies of South China? The Third International openly claims them as its own; but it is doubtful whether the ragged soldiers have any inkling of the gospel of Nicolai Lenin. They practice, undoubtedly, the primitive communism which led Robin Hood to despoil the rich and share with the poor, but with about as much awareness of Marxism as he. For a decade the region where these hordes abound has been ravaged by successive armies. When the generals had money they forcibly conscripted the able-bodied farm boys; when they had none the boys were dropped, far from home, and left to get on as best they could. Inevitably, they took to living off the country. Inevitably, too, they drifted to the standards of any capable pirate able to organize efficient looting expeditions. When in hiding, these good folk find it useful to profess sympathy with the peasants and to lose themselves in the fields. Hence, for the most part, the legend of peasant Communist armies. But there is no industrial proletariat in these backward regions, and the village gentry do not possess the visible and seizable wealth which made the Bolshevist program of land seizure so attractive to the Russian peasantry. The economic roots of communism in China are weak; and they are strongest in the great coast cities which are defended by foreign gunboats. There, some day, the decisive battles of China's revolution will be fought. They may come sooner than most foreigners expect. For if anything can fuse China's millions into one effective arm, it is dislike of foreign domination. That is why it is particularly sinister news that an American gunboat at Changsha, eight hundred miles from the sea, was fired upon and fired in return, killing fifty Chinese.

RESISTANCE to the British raj goes steadily on in India, despite wishful newspaper dispatches from Simla and the monsoon rains. In Bombay, which is at present the center of activity, business is almost at a standstill. Daily, the streets are filled with processions shouting for independence. They receive instead lathi blows from British-paid police who have lately been granted a bonus by a grateful and anxious government. Nevertheless, the campaign remains predominantly non-violent. George Slocombe, a British correspondent who has just returned after three months in India, testifies on this point as follows:

> . . . In spite of the incidents of violence which were the indirect results of his campaign, it must be admitted on the whole that Gandhi's teaching of non-violence has been scrupulously observed. To persons familiar with India, the spectacle of the fierce Pathans and the warlike

> Sikhs receiving without flinching and retaliation the formidable punishment which the stick of the Indian policeman can inflict is one of the most remarkable phenomena of the Indian struggle.

And Mr. Slocombe records what others have observed, namely, the increase of unity among all classes. Caste and communal barriers are breaking down and women are taking increasing part in the fight for self-government. Meanwhile, Mr. MacDonald has decided that Liberals and Conservatives shall be represented at the Round Table Conference. He has ruled, however, that there shall be no voting and that the Labor Party shall be responsible for any new legislation on India. At the same time he has barred the presence of Sir John Simon at the conference at the price of antagonizing the author of the Simon report. But the most important thing—the thing that would do more than anything else to give meaning to the Round Table Conference—remains unaccomplished. So far there is no indication that the Nationalists, the strongest and most important party in India, will have a single representative in London in October.

NOT SINCE MAYOR VAN WYCK of New York deliberately insulted the captain of a Spanish warship when he received him at the City Hall just prior to the war with Spain have there been recorded such instances of bad manners as we have witnessed the last few weeks in the treatment of the head of the Amtorg Company by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Lowman, and by the Fish committee. It is Mr. Bogdanov's misfortune that he happens to be a gentleman, a man of education and position, as well as head of the Amtorg. That did not prevent his being subjected to a discourtesy that we believe would be impossible in any other country but our own. When he appeared before the Fish committee Mr. Bogdanov was asked if he would resume membership in the Communist Party when he returned to Moscow. He replied: "I would again join the party if I were to return tomorrow." Whereupon Representative Carl G. Bachman of West Virginia declared: "You'll be lucky if you stay here that long." We suppose that it would surprise Mr. Bachman very much if he were to be told that usually only blackguards perform like this; we hope and trust that there are few other Congressmen who could be guilty of such conduct, especially when sitting in a quasi-judicial committee to seek facts without bias. Mr. Lowman behaved like a pettifogging police magistrate when Mr. Bogdanov and his American lawyer appeared before him, refusing to tell them who had made the charges in regard to the Russian pulp-wood cargoes and what the evidence was. "Do you think I would give my hand away?" said he. Two weeks previously he had declared that there were no complaints in regard to pulp wood. Thus the Russians were given only from Friday until Tuesday to answer complaints by unknown persons in regard to tree cutting in some of the vast Russian forests!

IN VIEW OF THESE PERFORMANCES it is pleasant to read the accounts of the Russian session at the Williamstown Institute of Politics. The whole debate was marked by common sense and freedom from passion. Thus, Colonel Hugh L. Cooper, who is superintending the great hydroelectric power plant on the Dnieper River, pleaded that the Russians be permitted to try out communism and see for themselves whether it really is or is not the road to Utopia, and that their challenge to American capitalism be fairly, honorably, and openly accepted. Mr. Ivy Lee, the chairman, and Congressman La Guardia agreed that the Fish committee's red-hunting inquiry was entirely useless, Mr. Lee pointing out also that there is no necessity for the Bolsheviks to resort to secret distribution of Communist literature in this country when "their most inflammatory utterances are cabled from Moscow and reprinted in this country." Only Mr. Paul Scheffer of the Berlin Tageblatt seems to have dissented, declaring that the secret plans of the Bolsheviks for world revolution "are not so absurd as they seem" and that they should not be discounted. He is emphatically of the opinion that the Bolshevist leaders are working hard in some European countries and seriously threatening their present governments. All in all Williamstown had a sane and reasonable discussion.

SENATOR SWANSON of Virginia has formally demanded a revision of the Hawley-Smoot tariff, declaring correctly that it is beneficial only to a few special interests, that "American agriculture will be further depressed if this tariff continues and the markets of the world will be closed to the United States." He added that "the universal depression in all lines of industry indicates the folly of the Hawley-Smoot bill." While this is not quite fair, since the depression was here before the tariff bill was passed and would have continued had it not become law, the Senator is right in demanding a change. The very fact that one so influential as he is inaugurating a party agitation for its repeal shows how silly was the Republican argument that the bill should be passed in order to take the tariff out of immediate politics. We hope that the Democrats all along the line will follow Senator Swanson's example in putting the tariff well to the front in the coming campaign.

THE NEW YORK EDISON and associated companies, through their president, Matthew S. Sloan, in a letter to Milo R. Maltbie, chairman of the Public Service Commission, offer to cut the rate for electric current from seven to five cents a kilowatt hour, provided they are allowed to make a meter charge of sixty cents a month. The result, according to their figuring, would be a cut of $5,396,000 in their annual revenue; but nearly a million small consumers, using up to thirty kilowatt hours a month, would find their bills increased by a total of more than $2,500,000 a year in all, while nearly $8,000,000, apparently, would go into the pockets of 700,000 larger consumers, including, of course, the great industrial and commercial users. The principle of a basic service charge is economically sound, but Governor Roosevelt properly objects to any arrangement which puts an added burden on the small consumer. Our existing practice of high domestic rates combined with relatively low charges to industrial users is exactly wrong, and this is a good place to fight it out. The public-utilities committee of the Community Councils urges further that the continued prosecution of the city's pending suit, which the companies have already spent $5,000,000 in fighting, will result in a decision granting rates much lower than those now proposed by the companies. Louis Waldman, Socialist candidate for Governor, after a sharp and effective criticism of Mr. Sloan's proposal, concludes:

> The struggle for low rates to the domestic consumer as well as to the industrial and commercial users will continue until the public learns the simple lesson that electricity, being a common necessity, ought to be owned and distributed by public agencies for the sole benefit of the public.

THE SOCIALIST PARTY of New York City deserves public thanks for its campaign plans, which promise picturesqueness as well as education. In addition to selecting Morris Hillquit, Municipal Justice Jacob Panken, and V. Charney Vladeck, manager of the Jewish daily Forward, as Congressional candidates, the party executive has designated Heywood Broun to make the run in the Seventeenth Congressional District, Manhattan, and Norman Thomas in the Sixth Congressional District, Brooklyn. The choice of the last-named district was made after a joint survey by the Socialist Party and the League for Independent Political Action to determine in what district of the city Mr. Thomas's chance of election would be most promising. The league is to be congratulated on its intelligent cooperation in this instance with the Socialists, who have decided to make unemployment and public ownership of electric utilities the major issues of their State campaign. Heywood Broun starts off well by declaring that while the seventeenth is a silk-stocking district "there is plenty of rayon still in it. After all, it is only one block from the big crowds milling around the employment agencies on Sixth Avenue to the big houses and hotels of Fifth." It would be hard to put the basic question more strikingly, and it is a genuine public service for him to run for Congress. New York is evidently to hear some discussion of real issues, and the possibility that Norman Thomas may actually be sent to Congress is cheering.

A FEEBLE-MINDED NEGRO has been accused of attacking and murdering a white woman at her farm near Shamrock, Texas. The woman had formerly lived in Erick, across the Oklahoma border. When news of the murder reached Erick rioting followed in which a mob of white men drove out all the Negro inhabitants of the town and its vicinity. Nearly 300 have been rendered homeless, their property confiscated or destroyed. At Shamrock, Texas, threats against the Negro population were successfully forestalled by the firm policy of Sheriff McLemore, who, with only 12 deputies, faced a mob of 300 bent on mischief in the Negro quarter and told them that he would not move from their path even if it meant bloodshed. The accused Negro was saved from mob violence by the quick action of Sheriff McKinney, of Collingsworth County, who hurried him away to safekeeping in the first place, and later, with the aid of four Texas rangers, outwitted two bands of would-be lynchers and lodged him safe in jail at Pampa, Texas. Meanwhile, at Erick, a few citizens applied for federal aid, and United States Attorney Roy St. Lewis has issued warrants for twenty-three persons—some of them deputy sheriffs and other officials—under a statute that gives the federal government the right to prosecute where two or more persons band together to deprive citizens of the free exercise of their rights under the Constitution. Conviction under the statute carries a fine of $5,000, a sentence of ten years, and deprivation of the right to hold office. We commend Mr. Lewis's action to the notice of Senator Cole Blease, who is quoted as saying in a recent speech: "Whenever the Constitution comes between me and the virtue of the white women of South Carolina, I say 'To hell with the Constitution.'"

THE REPORT on conditions in Auburn Prison, just made public by the special Cayuga County grand jury which has been investigating there, is a shocking indictment of the prison administration. The management of the prison, while not actually criminal, was, according to the report, "headless, spineless, and worthless." The prison was evidently run in fact by the Mutual Welfare League, controlled by the worst and most unregenerate class of prisoners; liquor was manufactured freely and partaken of as freely by the inmates; guards were subject to insult, and insubordination abounded. In addition the food was bad, the prison crowded; long sentences made the inmates despair of anything but desperate measures. It is no wonder riots resulted; one wonders there were not more of them. The grand jury makes several interesting recommendations among others not so good. Work for every man is the most important, after the general improvement of living conditions; pay for work done is also an excellent suggestion. The grand jury recommends that prisoners be divided into the following classifications and kept in their own class: (1) those for whom there is hope and opportunity for regeneration; (2) those for whom the "door of hope has been closed," either because of sentence or for psychiatric reasons; (3) those who have shown that, after a period of training, they may be discharged without danger to society. One cannot agree with the grand jury's suggestion that individual radio sets be forbidden in cells, or that individual lockers be abolished.

DO FAST STEAMERS PAY? The first year of the Bremen's existence seems to prove it, for she carried no fewer than 54,152 passengers, of whom 16,855 traveled third class, 15,123 first class, 12,379 in tourist third, and 9,795 second class. Of these passengers 26,587 came from Europe and 27,566 from the United States. Her fastest speed was 29.5 knots and her best crossing took only four days and fourteen and one-half hours. So great has been her popularity that she has been well filled even during the winter months. It is not to be deduced, however, from her experience and that of her sister-ship, the Europa, that there is endless opportunity for such ships. There is general agreement that the ocean has about fliers enough; hence the extreme caution of the Cunard and White Star Lines in beginning the construction of the 1,000-foot ships with which they are proposing to meet the German competition; the Cunarder has just been made possible by the decision of the British government to assume some of the great cost of insuring this 75,000-ton giant ship which is to carry 4,000 passengers. It has as yet not been decided whether the United States Lines will build the two monsters which, with the Leviathan, are intended to give a fast weekly American service. The cost of a round trip of the Bremen is said to be 2,500,000 marks, or $625,000. If there are too many ships like this none will earn enough and they will lose heavily in the slack winter season.

The Great Republican Handicap

NOW that the candidates for election or reelection to the Senate and House of Representatives are busy with preparations for the "great and solemn referendum" next November, it is pertinent to inquire what aid, if any, the Republicans are likely to get from the record of the Administration during the past eighteen months. Of course they will have to support Mr. Hoover, but that gentleman is a good deal of a problem. Mr. Hoover's notion of leaving legislation to Congress and confining his energies to executive functions has worked out badly in practice, and the tense moments that have occurred in the struggle between the President and Congress for control of the steering wheel have left unpleasant memories. Almost any expert political accountant would set down Mr. Hoover as a liability rather than an asset, but the Republicans have got to carry him on the books as an important campaign item until November 4, and if they win the election then they will have to go along with him thereafter until March 4, 1933. What can the Republicans do with him as an inducement for the country to grant the party in Congress a further lease of life?

On the whole, the offering is not attractive. The most conspicuous fruit in the basket is the Smoot-Hawley tariff, and the Republican who can extract hope or comfort from that performance could draw blood from a turnip or honey from a monument to the dead. The Smoot-Hawley tariff not only satisfies nobody, but it has called out from foreign nations the weightiest volume of protest and the most outspoken threats of retaliation that American tariff history has known. Mr. Hoover, by some occult process, was able to discover in the bill a fulfilment of a party pledge, but the ink of his signature was hardly dry before Congress was beseeching the Tariff Commission to reconsider a whole handful of the monstrous rates. The farmers in particular, who were to be the chief beneficiaries of revision, are likely to provide a bad quarter of an hour for the Republican candidate who tries to explain why this iniquity was added to their burdens.

The record is not brilliant in other directions. Hardly any national or international issue that was pending when Mr. Hoover took office has been advanced far toward settlement. It will be tough business working up enthusiasm over the naval treaty. The grandiose project of federal farm relief which Mr. Hoover approved has gone to smash, with prime wheat selling for less than good ordinary corn, with cotton a drug on the market, and a loss of millions for the Treasury to meet. Unemployment continues on a large scale notwithstanding voluble assurances that the problem was to be taken in hand, and Washington predictions of good times coming have been promptly followed by precipitate declines in stocks. Railway consolidation is just about where it was last year, and the year before, and the year before that, save for the promulgation of a plan which set railway experts by the ears, and the Interstate Commerce Commission shoves up freight rates one week and pares them down the next. The lower Mississippi Valley is up in arms against the government's plan for flood control, the power situation is still a menace, the evils of the Indian service have not been removed, and the slow pace of the public-utilities investigation would put a snail to shame.

On the political side the record is even worse. Without any visible sign of repugnance on Mr. Hoover's part, Claudius H. Huston was allowed to hog the chairmanship of the Republican National Committee for months after his occupancy of that office had alienated sensitive party leaders, and then to retire at his leisure and apparently on his own terms. The designation of Senator Fess as Huston's successor gives the executive direction of the party to a machine politician who defended the Harding Administration, and makes it certain that machine methods, with Mr. Hoover's approbation, will have full play. Most of Mr. Hoover's important nominations have been mediocre and some of them, notably that of Judge Parker for a place on the Supreme Bench, have been distinctly bad. Looked at merely as an executive, one wonders if Mr. Hoover has either strength or courage. At any time since inauguration day a few words from the President, or a line or two of writing on a piece of White House stationery, would have suspended or removed any federal official guilty of illegal or improper conduct, but the unblushing lawlessness of prohibition officers has gone on unchecked, the barbarous enforcement of immigration laws continues, a small army of spies and informers is still in government pay, and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Lowman, takes his time in abandoning an unwarranted attack on Russian trade after Mr. Hoover mildly calls him down.

Some people, doubtless, still affect to believe that Mr. Hoover, in spite of the glaring failures of his Administration, means well, and that he would have done better if Congress had been less unruly. The country is not interested in good intentions, but in performance and ideas. There is much reason for suspecting that Mr. Hoover, in addition to being a lamentable failure as President, is becoming not merely more conservative but reactionary. The faint show of political liberalism that still inheres in the Republican Party does not seem to attract him, and persons of open mind are not his friends. More and more, it seems, he is passing under the influence of machine politicians of a vulgar type, and it is upon the help of machine politics that he relies. Of moral leadership in the nation he obviously has little and of intellectual leadership none; the last place in America to which a thinker, a writer, or a social reformer would turn for inspiration or counsel is the White House. Even the financial and trade journals which sounded Mr. Hoover's praises when he was a candidate have for months been maintaining a suggestive silence. It is one of the anomalies of American politics that the opinions on public affairs to which at the moment the widest and most respectful attention appears to be paid are not those of Mr. Hoover, but those which Mr. Coolidge is putting forward in his daily reflections in the newspapers. When the farm-relief bubble needed pricking and the outrageous conduct of Congressman Fish and his associated anti-Russian zealots called for rebuke, it was Mr. Coolidge, not Mr. Hoover, who spoke out.

We wish the Administration Republicans joy in their campaign. They have their job cut out for them in defending either Mr. Hoover's record or their own. If the Democrats and Republican insurgents have a spark of political wisdom or a shred of ability to handle facts, there should not be enough Republican stalwarts in the next House of Representatives to form a corporal's guard.

Mr. Ford Just Passes

NOW that Messrs. Ford and Edison have picked the winner of the Edison scholarship prize it would be unfortunate if no one marked their own interesting answers to the last test put to them by the newspaper reporters. In the absence of an official examining board, The Nation humbly undertakes the task, allowing 10 for each perfect answer and 6 as a passing mark. We will skip Mr. Edison's paper for the present. He has been taking these examinations at least several times a year for the last forty years, and his answers are too easily anticipated. Mr. Ford, however, is still full of surprises.

Asked whether he thought that much unemployment was the fault of the unemployed, Mr. Ford replied: "Many people are too busy to be unemployed." By "many people" Mr. Ford is apparently referring to persons like himself and Mr. Edison—that is, employers, or people who happen to be somewhere near the top—and not to those, for example, who are thrown out of work when a plant shuts down. His answer is therefore an evasion, and strictly on its merits should be marked zero. However, in view of Mr. Ford's own well-known policy as an employer, we may mark this answer 5. Asked for a solution of business difficulties, Mr. Ford replied: "The solution is new industrial leaders who will sense what the people need and give it to them cheaply. . . . For instance, only about one family in ten has a bathtub. They should be made cheaper, so that everybody could have them." Mr. Ford gets an 8 on the general principle and a 3 on the illustration. It isn't so much the cost of a bathtub that counts, as any farmer can tell you, but cost of installation, plumbing, running water, hot water—all of which lends itself very little to quantity-production methods. Further, more and more Americans are coming to prefer showers, and the bathtub for healthy adults may soon be as out of date as the Model T.

Mr. Ford declared emphatically that there is no such thing as overproduction of any commodity. Pretty bad, Mr. Ford. If you had denied that there could be any such thing as overproduction of all commodities you could have got a 10. Overproduction is a relative term; its existence in one industry implies that the excess capital and labor could more profitably be employed somewhere else. An interviewer immediately countered Mr. Ford's answer with the question: "How about the overproduction of wheat?" "We've got to find new uses for wheat," replied Mr. Ford. "We are experimenting now up at Dearborn to find new uses for wheat, barley, and various other things." We are puzzled to know just what new uses for wheat Mr. Ford's chemists can find; they must know of at least one old use, at present relatively unemployed in this country, for barley, but Mr. Ford would not approve of it. Such questions aside, however, doesn't Mr. Ford think it might be more sensible to wait till the new uses are found first, and then produce the extra wheat, instead of the other way round? A 4 on this one.

Turning to the relation of the machine age to culture, Mr. Ford finds: "Industry itself is a part of culture. The fact that a man knows a lot about industry does not prevent his using good grammar, standing straight, and appearing well." This is a definition of culture that would have surprised Matthew Arnold. Mr. Ford goes on, however, to redeem himself nobly. "We need beauty in everything, and culture should be a thing of practice, not something apart. Every article should be a thing of beauty, well made and well thought out." Here Mr. Ford is way ahead of the "art-for-art's-sake" cult. His principle has already been brilliantly applied to automobiles; he might lend his help to having it applied more extensively to factories and filling stations. Eight is the mark for this. Asked for his favorite fiction work, Mr. Ford replied: "Maud Muller." "That's poetry," he was corrected. "It's fiction, too, isn't it?" he countered. "I read poetry, and I enjoy it if it says anything, but so often it doesn't say anything." Not, perhaps, to Mr. Ford. Three.

What did he think of the Congressional committee's investigation of Communist activities? "Gosh, their last investigation was at our plant. The committee went away with the idea that we were treating the Communists so well that there was no danger of our having any trouble with them. . . . I'm not worried about this country or about the world. If communism ever gets into a country and raises Ned with it, it's because that country needs it." For the wisdom and insight of this, The Nation awards a 9.

Mr. Ford ought to study harder, but all in all we haven't the heart to flunk him.

Canada and Protection

BOTH nationally and internationally, the recent political overturn in Canada is entitled to be set down as one of the major happenings of the year. Political liberalism in the Dominion, once a telling force under the brilliant leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier but in recent years an increasingly uncertain program of compromise, has been swept aside by a wave of conservatism. Even the province of Quebec, an old Liberal stronghold in which for years the Conservatives were able to muster either a mere handful of representatives or none at all, has returned twenty-five Conservatives to the House of Commons—somewhat less than half the total provincial representation in that body. Further, the Conservatives have come into power with a program of far-reaching implications. When the late government of W. L. Mackenzie King, responding to the widespread irritation and alarm engendered by the proposed Smoot-Hawley tariff, suddenly put into effect the Dunning tariff with increased duties and further tariff preference for the United Kingdom, the Liberal program was presently challenged by R. B. Bennett, the Conservative leader, on the ground that preferred imports from the United Kingdom or other British dominions were themselves a menace to Canadian industry, and on a platform of Canada first and no favors for anybody Mr. Bennett carried the country.

There is no need to assume, as an inference from the election, that the new Conservative government will forthwith plunge ahead with the process familiarly known as cutting off the nose to spite the face. Canada and the United States have long been good customers one of the other, and a tariff that was clearly discriminatory would unquestionably provoke an American retaliation from which Canada, as the smaller country, would be the chief sufferer. What the Conservative victory means is that Canada, stung to the quick by the American tariff and definitely enrolled among the nations which openly resent the policy that the American tariff embodies, is to seek relief by adopting precisely the same policy of high protection of which it complains. If Mr. Bennett's attitude during the campaign is an accurate indication of the course which his government will pursue, we shall shortly have a Canadian tariff, on a high-protection basis, in which all countries will be treated alike and under which imperial preference, as far as Canada is concerned, will be materially restricted if it is not eliminated altogether.

Such a policy not only runs directly counter to the movement for a general lowering of tariff walls which has lately been agitating Europe, but also strikes a heavy blow at the scheme of tariff protection for the British Empire which has been playing mischief with the Conservative Party in Great Britain. The essential characteristic of the new imperial protectionism of Lord Rothermere and Stanley Baldwin is that the Empire shall somehow contrive to eat its cake and have it too. There is to be tariff preference within the Empire for the United Kingdom and the Dominions, but a high tariff wall about the Empire for protection against a competing world outside. There seems small likelihood of fitting Canada into such an arrangement now that Mr. Bennett and his party are in control. Before the Imperial Conference meets at the end of September, with an Imperial Economic Conference to follow after that, Canada will have had a session of its Parliament specially convened to apply protective duties to everybody, British and foreigners alike, with no discrimination against which any nation can retaliate and no British preference of which Canada can complain.

Any gratification, accordingly, over Canada's act of national self-assertion in its political overturn is tempered with apprehension. If Canada, spurred by the American threat to its agriculture, its industry, or its trade, claps on a schedule of duties whose only purpose is to check the inflow of foreign products or goods, it will take a long step toward the position which the United States occupies today to its shame—the position of a nation whose foreign-trade policy has earned for it international ill-will. What the world needs for its economic health is not a further restriction of international trade, but freer trade everywhere in everything. The plight of the wheat-grower, the cattle-raiser, the mine-owner, the manufacturer, the merchant, or the laborer is not to be met by limiting or closing world markets but by opening and developing them. It is earnestly to be hoped that Mr. Bennett, in his zeal for the safety and prosperity of Canada, will not be misled into thinking that those things will be assured by building higher the tariff wall. If Canada resents American levies on its goods, why not continue cutting down its imports from the United States, as it has already done in the first five months of the present year to the tune of about $111,000,000?

Mooney Still Waits

GOVERNOR YOUNG of California announced, when he refused pardon to Tom Mooney, that should John MacDonald or any other witness appear for the purpose of recanting his testimony the case must be reopened. Almost the next day MacDonald was discovered in jail in Baltimore. One suspects that the Governor did not expect to have the pestiferous Mooney case on his front doorstep so soon again. Nevertheless, MacDonald has been taken to California and has had a hearing before the Supreme Court of the State. He declared that his identification of Mooney and Billings as the men who planted the fatal bomb was obtained under duress by the San Francisco police. He named particularly Police Captain Charles Goff, who, called subsequently to the stand, denied in toto MacDonald's charges. But more important than the pressure put upon him by Goff, according to MacDonald's testimony, was the almost hypnotic influence exercised over him by District Attorney Charles Fickert.

It is evident that as a witness MacDonald presented a sorry spectacle. He wept and cringed; he was obviously ill and aged beyond his years. He told not one clear story, recanting his testimony, but three or four, not quite knowing what he had seen or heard, a man beset by fears, at the mercy of anyone, claiming to be "under a spell." But if this poor sniveling creature's testimony now is difficult of credence, how much more worthless it should be as a reason —almost the sole remaining reason—for keeping two men in prison for the rest of their natural lives. It is easy to see how Governor Young and the Supreme Court of California may hesitate to credit the conflicting stories that MacDonald offers them. It is difficult to see how they can accept any of his stories, past or present, as testimony.

Yet we are pessimistic enough not to hold out much hope. As long as there is a shred of evidence not completely discredited, Mooney and Billings will stay in jail. Because the sentiment of California is in general against them. Because the State Supreme Court, when in its remarkable decision refusing Billings a pardon it declared the two men to be bad characters who knew who threw the bomb if they did not throw it themselves, voiced the opinion of California as a whole. California does not like what it calls labor agitators; it thinks such men are better out of the way. When it finds itself so fortunate as to have two of these dangerous persons actually behind prison bars, it means to keep them there. It does not matter that the trial judge, eleven of the jury, and every important witness now declare that Mooney and Billings were falsely convicted. In a little more than a fortnight Governor Young will be voted on at the primaries. He will, we venture to assert, find reasons for not rendering a decision on the new aspect of the case until after that time. If he does render a decision, it will be once more against a pardon. We by no means wish to direct Mooney and Billings to give up hope. We do think they will do well to fix their hopes on another governor, on another time, on another temper. Yet they are more alive in San Quentin than most persons out of it. Theirs is a cause célèbre. Which is less heartening than being simply free.

It Seems to Heywood Broun*

WHY is it supposed to be screamingly funny if anybody but a professional politician runs for public office in this country? I used to hear exhortations from prominent men urging the average citizen to take an interest in governmental affairs and participate in elections and at the end of these orations everybody used to applaud and act as if they were in thorough agreement. But the minute I found myself nominated for Congress on the Socialist ticket in the Seventeenth District all my friends, and even comparative strangers, behaved as if it were the joke of the month. I'm perfectly willing to admit the existence of humorous phases. Obviously, I am not superbly equipped by temperament or training to serve as a member of the House of Representatives. But I can learn, and the standard is not distressingly high. And then I have the advantage of not having to unlearn as much as most Democrats and Republicans.

It is well, I believe, for every candidate on whatever ticket to behave as if his election were assured. Concerning my own fate I have found some doubt even in the minds of staunch adherents. Only the other afternoon I happened to remark to my friend Edward J. MacNamara: "I hope it won't be as hot as this in Washington." "Don't worry," he answered; "you'll never notice it at all." If I know the boundaries of my district it is not altogether strategically situated for a Socialist. For instance, I've got Central Park. One party member assures me that out of that section the only vote he got was that of the shepherd, who has since changed his residence. Of course, there's not much hope of doing anything with the sheep or the squirrels. The former are assuredly Republicans from the cradle to the grave while the squirrels can be counted on to split between the Communists and the Democrats.

Another handicap of a Socialist candidate in New York City is that there will be raised up against him that familiar cry "Why throw away your vote?" And in that I think I see an edge of irony. A voter who casts his ballot for a Democrat or a Republican is supposed to get some practical benefit from his effort. And this, it seems to me, is singularly inaccurate. Take, for instance, the case of the jobless. The men and women who voted for Herbert Hoover in the Presidential campaign and for Jimmy Walker in the mayoralty election received precisely the same amount of attention. Mr. Hoover gave them a few proclamations and the Mayor expressed the pious hope that the city might have a blizzard so that the snow fund would go for outdoor relief.

Yet possibly I am being unfair. Washington did one thing more. The government dispatched men to each home to ascertain whether the householders were out of work and how long it had been since the last job. Uncle Sam also inquired solicitously whether each of us owned a radio. I assume that a kindly great white father hoped that even if we did not eat well we still might hear Amos 'n' Andy.

It's a dangerous thing to be dogmatic about unemployment. No person and no party should make any rash promises about curing it forthwith. England's Labor Party, without benefit of a clear majority to be sure, has not succeeded. Nor has the Communist Government of Russia. Yet there are definite things which can be done immediately. Old-age pensions and unemployment insurance would certainly help. And even if a solution for the whole vexed problem does not lie just around the corner it is time that a beginning was made toward amelioration. Mr. Hoover has been one of the most confirmed drifters ever to occupy the Presidency. Certainly he has offered nothing in regard to the unemployment situation except a series of optimistic proclamations saying that everything was all right and that even if it were not it would be in a trice. But that trice has lingered and lingered.

Once in an idle columnar moment I announced that if I ever became a candidate for anything at all I would be not only a wet but a wettest. The Socialist Party seems less moist than that. One can understand the logic of those who say that it is silly to get perturbed over the workingman who can't get a drink when attention might so much better be directed to the one who can't get a loaf of bread. Serious-minded students of economic problems are apt to regard prohibition as the mere dragging of red liquor across the trail of world affairs. But the question cuts deeper than these scholars imagine. The practice of prohibition has done more than any other issue to corrupt the integrity of political thinking. Parties and politicians have been dodgers since the beginning of time but all the records for long-distance straddling have been set in the Volstead era.

This technique having been established, it has been employed by Republicans and Democrats in regard to all the issues. For instance, the policy of keeping mum about unemployment and hoping that in time it will correct itself is of a piece with the prevailing practices in regard to prohibition. And now the tariff is something which we are asked to take for granted and never look in the mouth. It seems to me that progress cannot come from any quarter until there is a gentlemen's agreement on the part of all contenders actually to face issues and take sides. Until we can rid prohibition of hypocrisy we are not likely to be fair and frank about anything else.

Politics is so much a game that even in the case of a novice it is difficult to talk naturally and truthfully. For instance, I would like to confess that I am not easy yet in the practice of my party which sets "comrade" as the form of address to be used in speaking to Socialists. When I am told that "this is comrade Kelly," or "comrade Cohen" I am apt to become embarrassed and fall into the thoroughgoing capitalistic greeting of "Pleased to meet you, Mr. Kelly and Mr. Cohen." But that too can be set down among the number of things which I must learn in making my first campaign for Congress. The dignity of the office I consider highly complimentary for a beginner. Mr. Coolidge's first campaign was for selectman and every morning but Saturday you can see what he worked up to.

HEYWOOD BROUN

* Mr. Broun will be absent on vacation during the coming four weeks. On his return he will take up his new work as dramatic critic for The Nation in the absence of Joseph Wood Krutch. His first article will appear in our issue of September 17.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Our Attitude Toward Russia

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WHAT should be the American attitude toward Russia? Because of the renewed anti-Russian campaign, the amazing and humiliating performances of the Fish committee of the House of Representatives, the embargo upon pulp wood, and the demand of Matthew Woll and his followers that by 1932 all trade with Russia be proscribed, the subject has been in recent weeks the foremost one before the country. It is therefore worth examining dispassionately and at length both as to principles and as to policy, all the more so since I find here and there liberals and idealists who are sincerely worried as to what is the right attitude. They ask whether in the name of humanity and liberty the United States should not make effective its disapproval of both the Russian and the Italian dictatorships to aid in bringing them down in a collapse which would enable the masses of both countries to erect more democratic governments.

To this the answer must be no, so far as any censorship of other governments by our government is concerned. Until the Administration of Woodrow Wilson it had been the usual policy of the United States to recognize every de facto government without inquiry as to whether the hands of its masters were free from blood, how they attained power, or what treatment they were according to their subjects. I recall only one case in Europe, that of the Serbian regicides, in which recognition was withheld by any of the great Powers.

The reasons for this answer are obvious. If each country is going to sit in judgment on the manners, morals, and past record of every other, the world will be in for endless trouble and bloodletting. Practically no country, certainly not the United States, can come into court with clean enough hands to be able honestly to put on the judicial ermine. Finally, in numerous countries—the United States, for instance—any given administration is a political one which cannot be trusted to be unaffected by purely political considerations, such as the voice of organized labor, or of organized big business. The relations between nations are easily disturbed, and when disturbed are pacified only at tremendous costs—often in human lives. It is plain, then, that so far as possible they should be kept out of the hands of political officials, especially of such underlings as our present Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, men not directly charged with responsibility for foreign affairs. That gentleman has backed and filled in such an extraordinary way in the present controversy and has displayed so much personal bias as to make it clear that he is without the judicial quality needed in so complex and and serious a situation.

That public sentiment in the United States has not always been content in the past with a policy of recognition as a matter of course, without reference to conditions in the recognized country, is true. During the Czar's regime, after the revelations of George Kennan concerning the horrors of exile in Siberia and of the prisons in eastern Russia, and later after the frightful pogroms in which so many Jewish men, women, and children were butchered in cold blood, strong representations were made to Washington to sever relations with such a country. There was a time, too, when sympathizers with the dire plight of the Armenians sought to have the United States break off relations with the "Terrible Turk." But not until Woodrow Wilson began playing cat and mouse with Mexico in connection with the Huerta regime, if I remember rightly, did we officially begin to use the procedure of recognition as a means of approval or disapproval—or, as in the case of Mexico, as a weapon actually to overthrow the status quo. Actually we have refused to recognize Russia because we disapprove of her economic system, because of her refusal to pay us moneys she owes us, because of our dislike and distrust of her rulers. It is her manners as well as her words which have been used as the excuse for refusal to recognize what is certainly a well-established and going concern.

But there is indubitably a respectable section of the American people who think that we ought to make Russia feel the lash of our hostile public opinion; that it would serve the reds right to break off all trade with them. I know of one who has lived for years in Russia and seen such horrors in the prison camps there that he would gladly join Mr. Woll, though he would be quick to admit that the horrors in our own prisons as proved by the Columbus, Ohio, prison fire and the recent jail uprisings would justify strong foreign protests. These protestants against Russia would have us forbid any American to enter the land of the Soviets and would sever all trade connections. They are morally outraged when The Nation and other journals speak of the $700,000,000 of American trade with Russia during the past few years as a reason for not breaking off relations. They say that that is a big-business argument unworthy of idealists; that even if it should throw millions of Americans out of employment we must break off all relations so that the Russian people may realize the low position in the world to which their present rulers have brought them. We must not compromise with evil.

To this the answer has already been given: we are not called upon nor are we morally in a position to intervene in Russia's internal life or to pass judgment upon the acts of her rulers. One has only to think of the feeling which would be aroused in Great Britain if we should sever relations with her because of her terrible misgovernment of India—a record established by the testimony of many high-minded English men and women and admitted by Ramsay MacDonald himself in his pre-office demand for India's complete independence. One can imagine the rage in the American press if France or Italy should propose to cut off diplomatic and trade relations with us because of our lynchings—the blackest stain on any nation in the world—and because of our cruelty to the Negroes. I must admit, however, that when Italy did close her legation in Washington for a period of years because of the refusal of the United States and the State of Louisiana to make any reparation for the shocking mob murder of a number of Italian citizens, there was then little protest. Any radical action by the United States against the Soviets would be readily explained to the Russian people as a purely capitalistic move against communism under the hypocritical guise of a moral protest. The result would be that the business which Russia now sends to the United States would go instead to France, Italy, England, and Germany.

It may be a regrettable state of affairs that we cannot bring moral force to bear on a government that seems to us to be clearly in the wrong. But can we be sure that our judgments as to what is right or wrong in other governments are right? That the information we base our decisions upon is correct? Here is Matthew Woll quoted as asserting that he can exclude all Russian goods under Section 307 of the new tariff law because every worker in Russia is an indentured slave to the brutal and cruel oligarchy which enforces its will upon him. I have no desire whatever to minimize the evil side of the Communist rule in Russia, or to excuse in the slightest degree the horrible injustices and wrongs which are daily perpetrated, but Mr. Woll's statement is an absurdity. The New Freeman has just recalled that highly significant story of the visit of some British miners to a Russian mine and their resulting criticisms. The Russian workers answered that their visitors ignored one thing. The British miners were curious. "Our mines belong to us," the Soviet workers answered. There are vast multitudes in Russia who are conscientiously and enthusiastically with the Soviet rulers. It is as near the truth to say of them that they are slaves at forced labor as to assert the same of American labor, which dances to the tune of the capitalist piper, upon whom depends how near to or how far from the line of bare subsistence the worker and his family are compelled to live.

The only safe way to influence other countries which seem to us to be following false gods is by public opinion expressed in the usual way, and not through governmental action. Thus, there are many Americans like myself who feel that the Italian dictatorship is just as odious and just as hostile to our American institutions as the Russian; that the Italian Fascist activities in the United States are far more dangerous and insidious than any Russian Communist activities "in our midst." But we are utterly opposed to the breaking off of diplomatic ties or the cessation of business with Mussolini's subjects. Mussolini and Stalin can no more be overthrown from the outside than can Herbert Hoover be driven out of the White House by foreign pressure.

It is possible that constant foreign criticism may finally influence the policies of both Russia and Italy; indeed, I thought that the recent soft-pedaling of the anti-religious campaign in Russia was plainly due to aroused public opinion in other countries. It is to be hoped that similarly, in time, the rising tide of world-wide resentment against American imperialism in the Caribbean and our cruel, callous, and selfish tariff policy may finally pierce the crust of American self-satisfaction, self-contentment, and conceit.

Meanwhile what should the American policy toward Russia be? First, recognition of the Bolshevist government. It is absurd to do business running into the hundreds of millions with Russia—it will soon be far greater than it is now—and then to deprive our traders of the protection which goes with diplomatic relations. To pretend we are not doing business with the Soviets when we are is certainly unworthy of any decent government.

Secondly, we should court the exchange of visitors from and to Russia in order that Russians may then see for themselves where our institutions are superior to theirs and vice versa; we are without fears that our own securely established institutions will collapse because of the propaganda of such foreign visitors. We should, however, make it perfectly clear to the Russians that in inviting them as guests to this country we expect them to behave as guests and that we shall hold them to that standard. We should point out to them that at home they savagely exile or execute without fair trial anybody whom they suspect of seeking to overthrow their institutions and economic system; that they obviously are without any right to enter our country to interfere with our institutions. This does not mean that Russians should be debarred from making addresses over here or from interpreting their beliefs to us.

Thirdly, we should seek in every way to make the Russians feel that we regard them as members of the human family on equal terms with all others and to include them in every international action. The more we show our confidence in them the better will they react, the quicker will they get over their obsession that we are seeking to combine with other capitalist nations to destroy them. This is of enormous importance because, as long as this situation exists, there exists the threat of war; with it removed I believe that the Russians will prove to be the most pacific of peoples, readier to disarm than any other Continental nation.

Fourthly, as to the so-called menace of "dumping," we have laws upon the statute books aimed to prevent this very procedure (not that I approve of them; the only sound remedy for such an abuse of international trade lies elsewhere). As for the coal and lumber which they are sending to us, they constitute so far only a fraction of 1 per cent of our domestic consumption, and the same is true of the pulp wood that we are now importing. It is not less trade with Russia which we need but more, and as free as it can be made. Especially is this true today when our export trade is in such a parlous condition and Congress and the Administration together seem determined to smash all they can of it. Here, too, the tying of Russia into international trade on the largest possible scale will not only make for peace in the world, but will also tend emphatically to modify the aggressive attitude of these new zealots for communism and to help them to understand and respect the motives and the ideals of other people.

Let us do away with our craven fears of the Communist menace. As I have so often said, if the Bolsheviks can prove that theirs is the best way of life for all mankind, the whole world will accept their doctrines. If they fail to prove this they will probably retrace their steps in a capitalist direction. I suppose it is too much to expect that those like Matthew Woll and Congressman Fish who are so terrified by the Russian menace may see something good in Russia. As a matter of fact, besides the bloody and bad side there is a great deal of fine idealism, and a genuine desire to uplift humanity and to modernize Russia under the Soviets. It behooves us not to ignore this. We are certainly the last people in the world to cast stones indiscriminately, for the sad fact is that of all peoples we are the most feared, disliked, and hated.

Why Stalin Won

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, July 22

THE sixteenth party congress just ended was a complete victory for Stalin. Premier Rykov was unexpectedly retained in the Politburo, and Tomsky and Bukharin, his Right-wing colleagues, were reelected into the Central Committee on Stalin's own wish. They get another trial. They could easily have been eliminated. The congress did Stalin's bidding. What is the secret of Stalin's unquestioned strength? He controls every wheel and screw of the party machine, which is the source of authority and power in the Soviet Union. This is extremely important. For dynamic energy, driving force, and discipline the Russian Communist Party is unique the world over, perhaps even throughout history. But party manipulations are not everything. To explain Stalin's influence by his absolute domination of the party apparatus is to neglect the most decisive psychological and economic factors of the Soviet situation.

Russia today is the strangest combination of brightest white and darkest black. You may spend one evening in a discussion of unprecedented, exciting achievements and the next evening—often among foreigners who suffer the least—listening to distressing tales of hardships. Both are true. Communists, however, are an optimistic, enthusiastic race. They glory in their accomplishments but wave away difficulties. This was the spirit of the delegates who defeated Rykov, Bukharin, and Tomsky and riotously hailed Stalin as their chief.

I encountered some of the delegates. If you mentioned the food shortage they spoke of Dnieperstroi, Kuznetzstroi, Magnitogorsk, and the other huge power, iron, and steel works which will be larger than any in Europe. If you reminded them that people cannot buy shoes and textiles they told you that in three years Russia will be the world's second-largest producer of cast iron, that the Soviet Union is turning out more and more machines, that its industrial output is double the pre-war amount and will soon be doubled again, that collectives and state farms will eliminate the food shortage, that at the end of the Five-Year Plan—in 1933—Russia will be manufacturing more tractors than America, that she will then export grain, grow her own cotton, and have enough live stock to satisfy home demands, and, finally, that the Soviet Union is quickly ceasing to be a backward, semi-Asiatic country.

Men in this optimistic mood, convinced that they are about to "overtake and outstrip" capitalist nations, and themselves responsible for the construction now in progress, do not want it interrupted, will not listen to Cassandra warnings, and will not applaud meek-minded moderates who caution against excessive haste in industrialization and collectivization. The Right-wingers irritate them; Stalin, on the other hand, makes faith in victory a doctrine. This same faith then becomes another factor in that victory. Stalin fires his followers with additional zeal by preaching self-assurance; he increases the construction tasks assigned, introduces a sporting element into their fulfilment, and mows down the doubters. Seers of evil, prophets of disaster have no place in Bolshevik psychology. This is one of the outstanding subjective weaknesses of the Right cause, and one of Stalin's greatest advantages.

The Right platform stands on three pillars: (1) more freedom to the kulak, or rich peasant, (2) less collectivization, and (3) stimulation of light industries which produce goods for immediate consumption. But all these proposals are impracticable. Why? Public recantations do not change the leopard's spots, and Rykov, Tomsky, and especially Bukharin want the upper layer of the peasantry to work with less official interference. It is Bukharin's old summons to the mujik to "get rich," which he retracted under pressure in 1925 but which he obviously still upholds. If the kulak could become rich every sredniak, or middle peasant, would follow in his footsteps, for the sredniak, as Trotzky writes, "is the kulak conveyor." (He feeds the kulak ranks belt-fashion.) And that would spell the end of collectivization. Immersed in private-capitalistic instincts, not wholly prepared psychologically for cooperative cultivation, and not yet completely convinced of the benefits of collective farming, the sredniak submitted to collectivization because the door to individual enrichment was closed by the government's suppression of the kulak. The reversal of this policy would throw the sredniak—40 per cent or so of the peasantry—into the anti-Communist camp, suspend collectivization, and obstruct the socialization of the village. A large class of prosperous individualistic farmers in Russia would mean a liberal, petty-bourgeois Russia with soviets persisting only as an outward form.

The suppression of the kulak class is the corollary of collectivization and vice versa. Collectivization is the cornerstone of Bolshevik agrarian policy. It is inconceivable that the Communists should suspend or weaken collectivization or support any leaders who suggest such a measure. The Right may perform a useful function in drawing attention to uneconomic means of collectivizing and to the need of improving the internal organization of collectives, but it cannot gain a wide party following by condemning collectivization as a system. For without collectivization there can be no socialism and no Bolshevik solution of the peasant problem.

The strength of the Right-wingers lies in the friendly echo their views arouse among the peasant and petty-bourgeois masses. But this is the very cause of their downfall within the party, which sees the danger of tolerating prominent Communists who advocate heterodox policies with a broad appeal. For the same reason, on the other hand, the Right cannot be dealt with so summarily as the Trotzky opposition. The Bukharin opposition has roots. Less is achieved by merely cutting off the plant above the ground. The Right-wingers' peasant policy demands the stimulation of light industry. To induce the peasant to part with his increased yield resulting from greater individual freedom, they say, the city must offer him more goods for immediate consumption. The impulse thus given to light industry will also react to the benefit of the urban population.

Now nobody would object to the alleviation of the "goods famine" if it could be attained without damage to heavy industry. The heavy industries must not suffer. They are the solid foundation which bolshevism is laying for Russia's future development. Without them the country is dependent, incapable of defense in war, and doomed to a low standard of living. Moreover, if agricultural overproduction continues throughout the world, and if the Soviet Union were to remain a predominantly agrarian country, nobody would desire her exports, her foreign trade would shrink, and her growth would be stunted. Industrialization is the historic function of bolshevism and answers the highest national interests. In the end the nation will be grateful to the Soviet regime for its persistence and courage in carrying out a difficult program despite the terrific costs to all inhabitants of the Union. The heavy industrialization base of the new structure is of course not an end in itself but a means whereby light industry may prosper. Ultimately, more coal, cast iron, steel, turbines, chemicals, spindles, locomotives must mean more shoes, shirts, clothing, and more food too. But it is just this "ultimately"—the time element—that is so trying. While the foundation is under construction the people forego many necessities. In two years, in three years at the most, the dividends on the present sacrifice investment will probably be paid. This intervening period is inevitably filled with murmurs, complaints, and sour "anecdotes." The Right wing reflects this displeasure.

A compromise on this issue is not impossible. For whereas surrender on collectivization might be disastrous, a slackening of the pace of heavy industrialization so that textile, leather-wear, clothing, and food industries would receive more money and materials is not precluded. There is at least margin here for maneuvering. Yet I do not think it realistic to expect any very appreciable improvement of light industry in the near future. The state cannot well discontinue the construction of the great metallurgical plants at Magnitogorsk, in the Kuznetz basin in Siberia, and around Dnieperstroi, nor of the two huge additional tractor factories in Cheliabinsk and Kharkov, nor of the Nizhni Novgorod automobile factory, nor of the numerous other heavy industrial "giants" which have been started in the past year or two. The government, as Kuibishev, reporting on industry, told the party congress, must also carry out the program of 15,000,000 tons of cast iron by 1932-33 (compared with 5,500,000 tons this year and 4,200,000 tons in 1913), which requires corresponding increases in kindred heavy industries like coal, oil, electricity, transport. This being the case, little surplus strength or funds will be left for light industry.

These and other Soviet economic problems meet at one focal point—foreign trade. Although the means of production are being manufactured in Russia in mounting quantities, the Bolsheviks must turn to foreign countries for much of the equipment of their big steel and electrical power plants and for technical engineering assistance. This costs money. It must be paid for in foreign currency or gold, which Moscow does not possess in abundance. Further depletion of the solid metal cover of the ruble would induce further inflation with all its initial benefits and all its disastrous after-effects. Moscow must therefore husband its valuta, force exports even at the expense of prime domestic necessities, and cut imports to the bone so as to include little else than the indispensable needs of heavy industry. This is the root of the people's hardships. For instance, Russia must import cotton from the United States. But it prefers to spend its dollars on drills, compressors, and turbines for the Stalingrad tractor works and similar undertakings. Cotton, consequently, reaches the Soviet Union in reduced volume, the country is textile-hungry, and textile factories, some of them new, close down for want of raw material.

The chief hope for an early improvement on the internal market lies in foreign credits, which would make it unnecessary for Russia to export food, tobacco, and other products its own population needs and at the same time allow the government to import more raw materials—in addition, of course, to machinery. Foreign credits, on good terms, would bring a sigh of relief to Moscow. We may therefore see a more liberal Soviet foreign policy under a very influential new commissar. But observers who interpret the first signs of such a policy as the beginnings of a swerve to the Right internally are quite mistaken. The contrary is true, for the principle holds almost invariably that a Left policy which produces the greatest strain inside may well be complemented by a Right strategy to win the most help abroad.

Special difficulties arise this year owing to the fall of world prices. Russia's exports will expand in volume, but oil, lumber, and cereals will fetch relatively less—an estimated 28 per cent less. Considerable grain sales to foreign customers—the Union may export some 2,500,000 tons after the present harvest—should, however, repair this loss. The final solution of the shortages will come, nevertheless, not through outside assistance but from the reorganization of agriculture. Kuibishev said this to the party congress in almost so many words. Only when the state farms and collectives yield vastly more live stock, poultry, bread, dairy products, cotton, tobacco, sugar, vegetables, flax, fats, and fruit will the problem of internal supply be settled satisfactorily. Here again, therefore, everything hinges on collectivization—and on tractors, fertilizer, agricultural machinery, in other words, on heavy industry. Heavy industrialization and collectivization are Siamese twins. Collectivization implies an anti-kulak war.

Since light industries cannot be greatly stimulated, since collectivization must not be undermined, since the kulak will not be amnestied, the Right platform collapses, the Right-wingers suffer defeat, and Stalin wins. I think the Right wing, though convinced of the justice of its negative criticism, fears the possible results of its positive recommendations. To turn back in 1930 might signify a retreat down a decline which offered no opportunities for digging in at halfway stations. In The Nation of April 30, 1930, I suggested that despite the rightward zigzag of March "a large potential of Leftness" remained which would act as a "guaranty against any permanent or far-reaching swing to the Right." This has certainly been borne out by events since that date. And the "potential of Leftness" is far from exhausted. Nothing but a severe economic crisis will force a change of policy under Stalin's leadership.

Psychology and economics are Stalin's favorable winds. He is also the party "boss." But he is, in addition, the Soviet Union's most striking personality. He outranks all other Russian statesmen in courage, will-power, maneuvering talents, political organizing ability, and primitive tenacity. If he lacks the intellectual attainments of a Trotzky or Bukharin his very directness, force, and even crudeness appeal to a party whose membership has changed radically since 1924 and in which the prerevolutionary "highbrow" feels himself slightly out in the cold. Stalin's job, of course, is no bed of roses. But he weathered the mad tempest that raged in the villages during January and February, and even emerged from it strengthened. Now he will do well to look to the mood of the workers. Their real wages must not fall below the present level. Prices should be pegged, and the criminal inefficiency of the cooperatives eradicated.

A good friend might also advise Stalin to put a stop to the orgy of personal glorification of Stalin which has been permitted to sweep the country. This is Stalin's Achilles heel. From being the modest, retiring leader whom few saw or heard—the silent power behind the "throne"—he has in recent months stepped forth into the brightest limelight and seems to enjoy it. He has become the object of thickly smeared praise, fawning adulation, and tasteless obeisance. Bolshevik politicians go out of their way to sing extravagant odes to Stalin's person (Zinoviev is the last to do it). Daily, hundreds of telegrams pour in on him brimming over with Oriental super-compliments: "Thou art the greatest leader . . . the most devoted disciple of Lenin," and the like. Three cities, innumerable villages, collectives, schools, factories, and institutions have been named after him, and now somebody has started a movement to christen the Turksib the "Stalin Railway." I have gone back over the newspapers from 1919 to 1922; Lenin never permitted such antics and he was more popular than Stalin can ever hope to be. It exposes a weak side of Stalin's character which his enemies, who are numerous, are sure to exploit, for it is as un-Bolshevik as it is politically unwise. If Stalin is not responsible for this performance he at least tolerates it. He could stop it by pressing a button.

"When the Senate's Away—"

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, August 2

ACCORDING to my fair-haired colleagues, whom working reporters love to designate as the Boy Scouts of the Rapidan, recent events have disclosed "a new Hoover" in the White House. The newcomer is described as "a strong, self-reliant executive, who purposes to rule without being ruled" and as "a President who is resolved to endure no more heckling from the Senate." Well, well. If memory serves me that is precisely how they described the old Hoover in their dispatches, and hence it is rather difficult to ascertain from their latest reports what change, if any, has occurred. This is regrettable, because the public naturally is curious to know how perfection could be made more perfect. Fortunately, bewilderment is unnecessary. What we actually have is the same old Herbert, operating under changed conditions. It will be observed that his determination not to endure the slings and arrows of the Senate was reached just after the Senate adjourned. His new strength and self-reliance, therefore, are explainable on the simple ground that nobody remains in Washington to challenge them. I am reminded of the old soak who was thrown out of a saloon. After the proprietor had closed up and departed for the night the unwelcome customer returned, thundered bravely at the door, and shouted: "Now come outside and put me out."

* * * * *

IT is significant that one of the first acts of this bigger and braver Hoover was to reveal a secret that he had guarded carefully throughout the sixteen months that Congress was in session: to wit, that he is opposed to government operation of Muscle Shoals and heartily approves the scheme to turn that $160,000,000 public property over to private power companies. The manner in which he intervened in a Republican primary campaign in Tennessee in behalf of Representative Carroll Reece makes it fairly clear that he inspired the action by which Reece blocked a compromise in the last session that would have provided for government operation of the power plant and private operation of the fertilizer plant. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that Reece is a political friend and associate of the lamented Claudius Huston, who finally was squeezed out of the Republican national chairmanship for getting caught at the business of collecting funds for the Muscle Shoals lobby and temporarily depositing them in his stock-trading account. When Mr. Hoover was running for the Presidency he made a speech at Elizabethton, Tennessee, in which he said: "There are local instances where the government must enter the business field as a by-product of some great major purpose, such as improvement of navigation, flood control, scientific research, or national defense, but they do not vitiate the general policy to which we should adhere." Subsequently, replying to newspaper requests that he name local instances which were exceptions to the rule, he said: "You may say that means Muscle Shoals," and still later he added: "There is no question about government ownership of Muscle Shoals, as the government already owns both the power and nitrate plants. The major purposes which were advanced for its construction were navigation, scientific research, and national defense"; in other words, for the identical purposes which he had said warranted the government in "entering the business field." But now, it appears, he is taking advantage of his use of the word "ownership" to deny that he ever favored government "operation." One marvels, then, why he saw fit to discuss the subject in such terms, since everybody knew the government owned the plant, and everybody knows the government is not "entering the field of business" when it leases its property to private operators.

* * * * *

THE truth is that this is a "power administration." That it would be was evident to anyone who had studied Mr. Hoover's record on the power question prior to his Presidential campaign in 1928. For years he had been the darling of the National Electric Light Association, traveling as far as San Francisco to deliver the principal address at one of its sessions. As Secretary of Commerce he trained a number of bright young men who subsequently landed lucrative jobs with various branches of the power trust. During his Presidential campaign he succeeded in dodging the issue by such characteristically worded statements as that quoted above, but once he was elected the mask was allowed to slip. For Secretary of the Interior, an office which carried with it membership on the Federal Power Commission and authority to apportion Boulder Dam power, he named his old schoolmate Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur. For years Wilbur had been engaged in filling the board of trustees of Leland Stanford University with power magnates, some of them connected with the private companies which later applied to him for a large share of Boulder Dam power. For the Republican chairmanship, Hoover selected Huston, who had long busied himself in behalf of the power companies seeking possession of Boulder Dam. When the time came to appoint a chairman of the reorganized power commission, whom did he select but Lieutenant General Edgar Jadwin, who had done his utmost to turn Cove Creek over to the Electric Bond and Share Company? Of course, Mr. Hoover is opposed to government operation of Muscle Shoals. He is opposed to anything that would reveal the extent of the profits now being made by private power companies. That is one of the reasons he was nominated and elected.

* * * * *

THE belated ouster of Huston finally was accomplished, it seems, through the deft manipulation of Postmaster General Walter Brown. Just what sort of fire he succeeded in building under the clammy Claudius does not appear on the record, but the retiring chairman did not hesitate to acknowledge the force that broke his grip. His first reported remark after his resignation was "Enter the Ohio Gang again." This alluded also to the plan to make Simeon D. Fess his immediate successor, and in that respect it was an unkind remark, because all the world knows that Simeon is a godly man, even if he does find it expedient in great emergencies to lie to the White House correspondents about what Presidents say to him. The plan to give Simeon the chairmanship and make Robert H. Lucas chairman of the executive committee contemplates that Fess shall do the talking and Lucas the thinking, although there is a feeling in some quarters that the talking might as well be dispensed with. Brown is expected to aspire eventually to the chairmanship. His failure to become candidate now is explained by friends on the ground of his ambition to wipe out the postal deficit before leaving the job. My own guess is that he will wait until after the Blaine committee has concluded its investigation of fraud and favoritism in connection with post-office leases. It is possible that developments before the committee might tend to impair Mr. Brown's future usefulness to the party. He is wise to wait and see. To have two Republican chairmen forced to resign within six months as the result of Senate investigation would be a calamity too great to bear.

* * * * *

HAM FISH'S "red-herring committee" has terminated its efforts for the summer, after a performance in Chicago in which its conduct was so disgraceful that even the Republican newspapers of that hard-boiled town were provoked to scorn. After listening at length and with obvious pleasure to the testimony of a professional labor-baiter, the committee consented to hear Arthur W. Fisher, an attorney who has made considerable inquiry into repeated instances of police brutality toward local Communists. Fisher was promptly interrupted by Fish and Congressman Nelson of Maine, who questioned him at length in an effort to show that he had been a slacker during the war and that he was benefiting financially from Russian trade with the United States. Perhaps the only reason they did not accuse him outright of bolshevism was because his father was a member of the Cabinet of the late President Taft. After an hour of insult and insinuation, during which they resolutely suppressed his efforts to testify, these Congressional hoodlums climaxed their antics by grabbing their hats and rushing out of the room, leaving the witness on the stand. Aside from giving the committee members a free junket around the country, the aim of this "investigation" is to make political capital for Ham Fish. Ham is consumed by an ambition to get on in politics. Never having possessed any original ideas of his own, he made shift to borrow the worn-out device of saving the Republic from the reds. Ham was a good football player at Princeton, and it seems a pity that sophomores are not required to stay in college until they grow up. If that seems impossible, as in his case, it is all the more reason for keeping them at school.

* * * * *

OUT in Kansas Henry Allen is doing some terrible sweating, not all of which is due to the heat. No man who ever came to the Senate, unless we except the pious George Wharton Pepper, harbored such a desperate desire to return as that which now agitates Henry. To be able to lift his voice in that hallowed chamber, to be described (in his own paper, at least) as "President Hoover's spokesman," to strut before visiting Kansans, and to reside in a city where decent food and drink are still obtainable—all this constitutes for Henry the final consummation of human hopes and ambitions. But circumstances have played him foul. He is torn between his solicitude for the wheat farmers and his desire to continue standing by President Hoover and the Hoover farm policies against which Kansas farmers are in rebellion. For any other man such a problem would be almost insoluble. It may be too much for Henry, but I doubt it. I have observed him at close range on many occasions, public and private, and it is my firm belief that he has a rubber spine and that all his convictions are mounted on ball bearings. If it is possible to survive by taking both sides of a question or neither, in stentorian tones, Henry will be back, or so I fear.

Pigeons Wading

By RUTH LANGLAND HOLBERG

The shadow of the elm is like a pool
  Of rippling purple, and its small pensioners
Are pigeons wading, dipping in the cool
  Crushed-grape with coral feet. If wind stirs,
The edges ebb and flood, the diamond flecks
  Of sun are lifted and scattered over and over
On the dusty road, on the iridescent necks,
  While the pigeons flutter to the wave's dark cover.

Deer Dance in Taos

By MARY HEATON VORSE

IN Taos, just before spring, is held the deer dance. First, as though incidentally, comes the corn dance. Two rows of women in each of whose hands is a cedar branch dance the corn dance. They weave soft patterns with their feet, clad in the high white buckskin moccasins which Taos women wear. Their skirts are wide and are girded with bright woven girdles. About their necks flow chains of silver and turquoise and of white wampum. Their faces are wide and impassive and a rich color stains their cheeks. Between two lines are the Koshare, the fun-makers. They are nearly naked and their headdresses are of corn husks. The fox tails bob as they dance. The corn dance stops. The deer dance is to begin.

Two women in white buckskin go forth from the pueblo. They carry in each hand ceremonial eagle feathers. This dance is different from all other dances. The women go forth and by their magic force the wild creatures of the forest to follow them back to the pueblo. The shy creatures, doe and buck, fawn and fox and hare, follow in close procession the magic of the white-clad women with the ceremonial feathers. Bewitched, enchanted, the creatures of the forest come following the dancing maidens. And from their muzzles come cries—the bellow of a buck in terror, the cry of a fawn. Round and round they go, padding, picking their way—animals under a terrible enchantment, forced by the magic of the maidens to leave the woods and hills, to leave their hiding-places, their burrows. This is a dance like no other. The hoarse cries of the bewitched creatures who follow, follow the slowly dancing maidens. Round and round they go—following, crying aloud their pain and bewilderment.

Hunters with tiny bows attack the deer and mime their fate. Now and then a hunter seizes a creature—fawn, fox, or rabbit—and runs with him. The animal hangs limp as though dead across the shoulders of the hunter. The hunter must get across the bridge which separates the two parts of the Taos pueblo before a spectator intercepts him. Running swiftly with his burden goes the hunter, dodging and feinting. Only twice during the dance is a hunter successful.

There are various stories current as to the meaning of the deer dance. You will find as many, almost, as there are people. But what you have seen is enough. You have witnessed enchantment, something holy and unholy. You have seen the wild creatures bewitched by women who are themselves under a spell, as with unseeing eyes, with their ceremonial eagle feathers in their hands, they weave patterns decreed by the never-ceasing drum.

The spectator is himself bewitched. Only later does he remember the exquisite rhythms of the dancing creatures—the leap and plunge of the hunter, the swiftness of the men running with the animals across their shoulders, the greater swiftness of the pursuer and rescuer. And amidst the by-play of the hunters the maidens dance, dance, dance to the throbbing drum, dance as if in a dream, leading the lowing horde of creatures.

It is over at last. The rows of women in the corn dance face one another again. The Koshare leap about them. Now the spectators are laughing, the women are laughing. The Koshare, naked, fox tails bobbing, dance in the center between the two rows of women. "They dance something else, the Koshare. They will not let the women dance." The Koshare have interjected their own rhythm, they interrupt and confuse with their soft thudding feet. It is as though you should play one tune to interrupt another. But we, who would at another time be enthralled by the corn dance, have been too much moved by this other less stylized dance, this subtle deer dance which leads the mind into allegory and strange thoughts.

The dances are not over. Tonight in the pueblo there is to be a celebration for the new governor. The governors of the tribes have for insignia of office the gold-headed cane presented to them by Abraham Lincoln.

The pueblo dances for the governor and the new officers, who sit in their houses and receive the various groups who perform before them. The governor has ten assistants. The secretary-treasurer of the tribe has ten. Each group of dancers dances twenty-two times. They stop, incidentally, to dance in the houses of relatives and friends. We go to one of these.

We go first to a house at the entrance of the pueblo. Our host may not drive a car. He can be a passenger but he may not drive on Indian ground. The germinating earth has conceived and is now pregnant, so it might disturb her to drive upon her peaceful body at this moment. The Indians walk lightly upon her. There are two very young children, not older than six, rehearsing their dance. They are dressed in full ceremonial costumes of embroidered buckskin. They wear silver and turquoise ornaments. Their heads are crowned with eagle-feather crowns. The crowns flow down their backs in a handsome line. In each hand, also, they hold eagle feathers. They dance solemnly, almost as if hypnotized. They dance a little stiffly, they have not yet the magnificent rhythm of the accomplished dancers. Now a child has not held the eagle feather in the prescribed manner. The father, with a gesture of unconscious tenderness, puts his arm around the little one and corrects the error. From time to time one of the older men corrects an error of the dancing children, gently, gently. They dance many times, the little girl circling in her eagle-feather crown, her full buckskin skirt. There is something quiet and warm in the house, something very quiet and happy, at once quiet and excited.

We cross the open space over the bridge. We are going to Jim's house. He has been newly elected treasurer. From all directions comes the noise of drumming. Figures slide silently through the darkness. A sense of excitement comes from the incessant throbbing drums. The silent, reserved pueblo is gay tonight. In Jim's house, besides Jim, are two brothers and their wives and his aged father, who is a famous medicine man. We sit on rug-covered mattresses. A bright fire shines on the hearth. A little boy with shining eyes sits beside his mother. The men have wide faces the color of mahogany and wine. They are vital and alert.

One of the women is very beautiful. Both women wear full calico dresses, confined with wide woven girdles, and high buckskin moccasins. Their hair is braided. Men and women wear ornaments of turquoise and silver.

Soon the door opens and the dancers appear. Young girls and youths file in. They are dressed in beautiful costumes, the ancient, elaborate chief's costume. With them come their musicians, the drum and singers. They dance solemnly and elaborately. Like the little children they take too great pains. This is an occasion of terrible importance to them. They are dancing a "very old dance" we are told. It is lovely in its solemn pattern. It is briefly over. The young people dance again. Before they go, the woman of the house pours an earthen bowl full of bread into a sack one of the singers carries. They receive in each house a gift of bread.

There is a knock at the door. There are men in masks, high boots, wide hats. "They make to dance like the Navajos." They are Navajo braves out on a spree. They sing and dance. Their music howls. It is marvelous burlesque. Our handful of spectators rocks. Tonight is a night of gaiety, for laughter, for children. Before our eyes passes the burlesque of other tribes. A Mexican tries to dance an Indian dance. How subtle a performance! The earnest Mexican thinks he dances wonderfully but he does everything just a little wrong. Everything is just a little oblique —like a mirror that is not true. He is never in time, yet he dances earnestly, painstakingly.

One gets a new vision of them, seeing them thus at play, seeing their sly jokes—a gay people behind the veil of the dignity with which they treat us. It is rare good fortune to have had this single glimpse behind the scenes.

There is a knock at the door. A single dancer, stained brick red and spotted with blue, naked but for a magnificent fox skin, dashes in. The dance is beautiful and complicated. It has the swiftness of arrows, the intensity of fire. It is punctuated with cries that pierce the heart with some ancient terror. "He is one of the best dancers. It is the old war dance," we are told. Three times come dancers who dance a war dance naked and spotted, the old unforgotten dance that Taos danced when Taos went to war. In this dance the intense burning core of a people shows itself, beautiful, pure, and terrible.

It is over. We go our way. Drums are still throbbing from all parts of the pueblo. We are tired. We have seen too much. The genius of a people has been played before our eyes. For a moment only Taos has opened the severely closed, the jealously guarded book of its culture for us to decipher—if we can.

"You may look at us," they have seemed to say, "at the calm acceptance of our women, at the vivid tranquillity of our youth, at the venerable wisdom of the aged, at the furious intensity of our anger. Look at the beauty of our ceremonial, the weaving of patterns of beauty. Listen to our laughter. Have you anything to give us? The preoccupation of man is the search of mystery and beauty, his gift above the animals is laughter. Can you add, then, to our culture? Then since you have nothing to add, nothing to give us, let us live. Let us alone. Let us cherish our own secret of life in our kivas. Do not try to pull us apart until we shall have become disintegrated and a people without a soul."

In the Driftway

THIS is the story of a dog named Judge. Judge was medium in size. As for color and texture, he was brown and curly. An ordinary dog, with ordinary gifts. Judge lived on the front porch of a rather large house in a Middle Western city. In front of the front porch was a large lawn; in front of the lawn, and running its entire length, was a white picket fence several feet high. In the fence was a gate at the place where a gate ought to be. And anyone could tell that here was a well-regulated establishment not only because the fence was kept painted but more particularly because the gate clicked shut, neatly and quickly, whenever anyone passed through. Judge was proud of his well-kept house and porch and lawn, but he derived his deepest satisfaction from the white fence with its admirable gate.

* * * * *

TO the fence Judge owed both his health and his sense of superiority. Whenever an animal, human or otherwise, passed by, Judge with a growl sprang from his place on the porch, cleared the steps with one fine leap, and ran to the end of the fence from which the sound of footsteps came. And from the time the passer-by reached that end of the fence until he had passed beyond the other end, Judge, on his side of the fence, accompanied him, barking madly, defending his porch, his honor, and his lawn. When the intruder had departed, Judge, full of satisfaction and a pleasant fatigue, retired to his porch to sleep like a hero until the next invasion.

* * * * *

AND so the months and the days passed, and Judge grew full of years and self-confidence. So formidable was he that many women and a few men had been known to cross the street to escape his wrath. The fence was repainted every spring and the gate clicked comfortably shut. It was a day in June, much like any other day in June, when the blow fell. Judge had just had lunch. He had decided to have his second bone on the front porch where he might lie in comfort. There was a light breeze and the gentle sound of swaying branches filled him with exquisite drowsiness. He was almost asleep when he heard the padding of footsteps approaching his domain. Like a flash he leaped from the porch and rushed to the end of the yard. On the other side was a little white nondescript dog. Judge rushed at him and barked loudly through the pickets. The little dog was frightened and increased his speed. And now both of them, each on his side of the fence, were running at full speed, barking wildly. Then, suddenly, they reached the gate—and the gate was open! With one last bark that was almost a sob, Judge toppled over in a dead faint in the center of the place where the gate should have been. Judge's master, emerging from the house at that moment, carried the curly brown body inside. The other dog rushed on.

* * * * *

EVENTUALLY Judge revived, and the gate was mended. But the Drifter does not care to dwell on the painful soul searchings, on the terrible doubts that must have assailed the heart of Judge thereafter when he heard the mocking click of the gate that had betrayed him.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Boycotting the Negro Barber

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Dabney's article regarding the Negro barber in the South was exceedingly timely. Apparently he is unaware of the fact that there is a move from Atlanta to New Orleans, wherever the white union barbers are concerned, to boycott the Negro shops. An officer in the Mobile barbers' union informed me recently that members of other unions are being requested by the white union barbers not to patronize the Negro hair-clipper. Perhaps this movement extends over a much larger territory than between these two large Southern cities.

There never has been a complaint made, as far as I know, against the skill of the Negro barber, the services he gives, his manner, or the sanitary conditions of his shop. When he operates a shop for white patrons, it is exclusively for white men and women. But—the Negro barber generally charges forty cents in place of the fifty cents asked in shops operated by white union shearers.

Can it be that before long Negro bootblacks, cooks, and nurses will be only memories?

Mobile, Ala., July 15 Merlin N. Hanson

A Big Order, Indeed

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: J. Eads How, a scion of the Eads family of St. Louis and known as the "millionaire hobo," died a few days ago. He named me as his executor and trustee. In his will, which I drew, he asks that the fortune he left be used to produce justice and a classless society throughout the world!

Now this seems to me a pretty big order and a real job, and I wonder if some of the Nation readers can give me some idea of how to produce justice and how to usher in a classless society throughout the world. I am interested and want to know.

Cincinnati, July 24 Nicholas Klein

The Legion Does Its Bit

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The American Legion post of this city has taken upon itself the duty of admonishing the board of education not to allow its subordinates to contaminate themselves with Soviet Russian doctrine. It recently adopted a resolution, introduced by E. S. Dobbin, a member of the city council, which runs as follows:

> Resolved, That Arthur L. Peterson Post No. 27 of the American Legion, Department of California, views with alarm the trip of Professor Horridge, head of the vocational-training department of Poly High School, to Soviet Russia this summer at the invitation of the Soviet government and returning to work in Long Beach this coming fall to continue his teaching, with the opportunity of instilling into the minds of his pupils principles of government as given him in Russia which are contrary to the fundamentals of the Constitution of the United States.

Dr. Frederick Horridge is director of vocational training of the Long Beach public schools, and not merely of the Polytechnic High School here. He left this city on June 15 for a trip to England, France, Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, and Russia to study vocational-training systems. He is making the trip at his own expense. The trip to Russia is intended only as a small part of his program.

Other flag-waving organizations of the city promise to follow suit. Members at the meeting who belong to the United Spanish War Veterans and to the Sons of Union Veterans have asked for copies of the resolution to present to their organizations. These last, as well as others who will no doubt follow the leader, are small fry, but the American Legion here is a force that can scarcely be criticized with impunity.

Just what will come of it I cannot tell, but even though the school system here is of more than average virility, the American Legion has a reputation of being able to accomplish what it sets out to do.

Long Beach, Cal., July 16 Thomas W. Patterson

The Farmer and the Tariff

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: What the farmers lack, even more than money or markets, is intelligence. Carl Berg, in your issue of July 23, justifies the latest bandits' tariff by saying that "the average farmer may buy only two sets of machinery during his lifetime, but may raise thirty crops."

The real truth of the matter is that the farmer pays tariff tribute every day of his life. He lives in a house made of protected lumber, uses tools made of protected steel, wears protected clothes, and eats protected food. In short, every time he buys anything he pays tribute. His invisible taxes, paid daily not to the government but to the tariff barons, are many times the taxes of which he complains.

Bradfordwoods, Pa., July 24 William Scott

A Kind Word from Afar

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I should like to indorse from this part of the world all that was said about your paper by Mr. Bernard Rickatson-Hatt in your issue of May 21.

The sane, fair, and illuminating writing about the things of first importance which The Nation brings to me every week here in Africa is a boon for which I feel I must express my gratitude. Yours is the best paper in America.

Chipinga, Southern Rhodesia, June 26 Peter Nielsen

Writings of Clarence Darrow

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: For some time I have been at work on a biography of Clarence Darrow. The book will deal with all of Mr. Darrow's activities, but will dwell with special emphasis upon the man as a writer and philosopher. For this purpose I should like to see copies of small magazines like the old Quill, of Chicago, in which some of his essays first appeared. Copies of his book "Tales from the Courts" and his "Argument in the Wood-Workers' Conspiracy Case" would also be welcomed.

If any of your readers can supply me with these, or with originals of letters or any first-hand material bearing on Darrow's life and activities, I shall be greatly obliged to you and them. Anything sent me will be handled with scrupulous care and returned promptly. Communications should be addressed to me at Box 134, Sterling, Colorado.

Sterling, Colo., June 30 Allen Crandall

Books

The Shadows

By BERT COOKSLEY

So has the olding heartplace come to be
A peaceful house where many shadows are,
Molested never, sleeping quietly,
Cloaking in dusts its patch- and weather-scar.

Shadows grown cool and gray with solitude,
Brothers to silence, friends to weariness;
From porch and room and roof they bar the rude,
The brazen and the loud, and their distress.

The heart has come to love its smoky veil,
The dim and musty comfort shadows bring
As vague as midnight echoes and as frail.
Has grown to love the house where even Spring,

Scattering colors, tiptoes past the gate,
Too bright to enter and too wise to wait.

Heredity or Environment?

The Biological Basis of Human Nature. By H. S. Jennings. W. W. Norton and Company. $4.

NO problem could ultimately be more important in its bearing on the future of mankind than that of the relative roles of heredity and environment, yet its discussion is honeycombed with ignorance, fallacies, and prejudices. Usually we are asked to take our place in one of two camps. We can enlist with the Wiggams, who believe that heredity is everything and environment negligible, or with the Watsons, who stake everything on environment and hold that there are no innate intellectual or emotional differences between one "normal" child and another. Well-heeled conservatives, who like to believe that their position in the world is the result of innate superiority, naturally tend to become hereditarians, or Wiggams. Ardent reformers, on the other hand, believe almost constitutionally that all inferiority is the result of oppression, bad nourishment, or bad training of some kind, and that social regeneration is immediately possible. The Wiggams put their entire dependence on eugenics, the Watsons on education. The problem is thus, as it were, thrown into politics, and becomes the mere football of controversy and rhetoric.

It is from this atmosphere that Professor Jennings, director of the zoological laboratory at Johns Hopkins University, seeks to rescue it. What he finds, broadly speaking, is that both hereditarians and environmentalists are right in what they assert, wrong in what they deny. But the problem is far more involved than the usual discussions indicate. There are first the complications introduced by the fact that human beings are biparental. Heredity, for example, does not mean what it is commonly taken to mean; it does not mean that "like produces like." This is roughly true when speaking of statistical averages: inferior parents will tend to produce inferior offspring, superior parents superior offspring, etc., but there is little assurance regarding what sort of person a particular child will turn out to be. Inferior parents may have a superior child, superior parents a mediocre or inferior child, and so on. Every human being is the product of thousands of pairs of genes, one member of each pair from his father, one from his mother. Each pair plays its part in his final development. Each individual, therefore (unless he is one of a pair of identical twins), begins with an innate constitution that is unique. In turn he gives one gene from each pair of his own genes to his children. In his own constitution may be a defective gene which by itself would produce feeble-mindedness, while the other member of that pair may be a normal gene. As feeble-mindedness is a "recessive" characteristic, the individual will then be himself normal (the good gene doing the work for the defective one), yet he will still be a "carrier" of feeble-mindedness.

It is thus our biparentalism that enormously complicates the problems of eugenics. For it has been calculated that for every actually feeble-minded individual (i. e., one carrying a pair of the defective genes) there are thirty normal individuals carrying one of the defective genes. Only about 11 per cent of the feeble-minded in any generation come from the mating of the feeble-minded of the previous generation; the other 89 per cent come from matings among the carrier group. This means that even if we could prevent every present feeble-minded person from mating, we could get rid of only about 11 per cent of the feeble-minded of the next generation; thereafter there would be very little progress in reducing the number of feeble-minded from one generation to the next.

In the face of this Professor Jennings does not believe we can depend very much on eugenics to solve our immediate problems. He does, however, give the eugenic program a certain qualified support. "Even though it may get rid of but a small proportion of the defective genes, every case saved is a gain, is worth while in itself." The two great problems that confront us here are, first, the technical one of learning how to detect the carriers of defective genes as well as the persons actually revealing defects, and, second, the broader social problem of deciding how far and in what directions it is desirable to attempt to carry the eugenic program. Professor Jennings believes no serious question can be raised about the desirability of eliminating insanity and feeble-mindedness. When we come to physical defects, however, we face a real dilemma. In almost any individual we find undesirable qualities bound up with desirable qualities; and we cannot prevent one without preventing the other. Serious physical defects may be accompanied by high intellectual powers, as in consumptives like Stevenson, De Morgan, and Chopin. Professor Jennings admits that "prevention of the production of all gene combinations bearing even seriously defective genes would beyond question result in the loss of certain men of great value to the world." But he holds that "the value of the eugenic aim can be estimated only from its total results, taken in the long run, as compared with the total results of some other line of action."

When Professor Jennings turns to the question of the relative importance of heredity (or genes) and environment he can give no sweeping answer; he believes, indeed, that the question in this general form is almost meaningless. He regards it as at bottom a statistical question, to be answered only by detailed study of particular cases. "It is as clear biologically that environment affects behavior as that constitution does; and biology furnishes no automatic method of determining the relative role of each." Discussion of the problem has been infested with fallacies, half-fallacies, and quarter-fallacies for which Professor Jennings holds the biologists themselves in no small part responsible. The most common fallacy is the assumption "that if a characteristic is affected by the environment it cannot be hereditary; that if it is hereditary, it cannot be influenced by the environment; in other words, that characteristics fall into two mutually exclusive groups in respect to these matters." This is patently not true. There are already known to be a great number of characteristics that are inherited in typical Mendelian or sex-linked fashion, yet are readily modifiable or improvable by environmental changes. Though a hereditary or genetic basis may exist for a defect or disease, for example, that defect or disease need not actually come into existence. On the negative side, again, environment may produce the most radical influences. Disease may reduce vigor and render accomplishment impossible, bringing the ablest person to the level of the lowest. Far from believing that existing social inequalities are the result of hereditary differences, Professor Jennings is convinced that not until many of these inequalities are eliminated will we truly know heredity's part:

> As a preliminary to the effective work of eugenics other reforms must be carried out, overwork and bad conditions of living done away with, faults of diet, both quantitative and qualitative, corrected; economic ills conquered, grinding poverty abolished. When these things are done, when the human plant is given conditions under which it can unfold its capabilities without stunting, poisoning, and mutilation by the environment, then it will be possible to discover what ills are due primarily to defective genes, and to plan such measures as are possible for their eradication.

That such sweeping social changes are eventually possible even with our present defective innate make-up should be sufficiently indicated by the fact that all great cultural changes, the diversities between the civilization of today and the ancestral barbarism of ten thousand years ago, are, so far as can be judged, the result of changing environment and not of changing genetic constitution.

The present book is the ablest presentation of the great problem of heredity and environment that I have yet encountered. In addition to the fascinating information it contains, and to the intrinsic interest of its subject matter, there is the constant joy of watching an admirable mind at work. Here is a genuine embodiment of the scientific attitude—patient experiment guided by acute reasoning, extreme caution in drawing inferences. Professor Jennings is continually warning against facile generalization: "To generalize will be recognized as the most laborious task in biology, instead of the lightest and simplest."

The one fault I can venture to find with the book is a certain repetitiousness; it insists on some of its points too often and at too great length. But Professor Jennings (whose initials, H. S., one learns from "Who's Who," stand for Herbert Spencer) may have in mind his famous namesake's conviction that "only by varied iteration can alien conceptions be forced on reluctant minds." HENRY HAZLITT

Labor and Religion

Labor Speaks for Itself. A Symposium by Labor Leaders Throughout the World. Edited by Jerome Davis. The Macmillan Company. $2.

IN this book labor leaders ranging from Arthur Henderson to Nicolai Lenin, from William Green to that remarkable Japanese Toyohiko Kagawa say what they think about religion. For the most part they say it interestingly. The first thing that stands out in the symposium is that labor through its leaders says no one thing about religion or even about the church. You have James H. Maurer's whole-souled rebuke of the hypocrisy of the church and Thomas McMahon's dutiful expressions of loyalty to it, the respectful official A. F. of L. statement of friendly relations to the church and the religious atheism of an I. W. W. leader. In general, the writers speak respectfully of Jesus and of Christian ethics. In general, they speak suspiciously of the church. A good many American labor leaders, perhaps subconsciously, recognize that A. F. of L. orthodoxy of creed and practice today is in no position to throw stones at church orthodoxy. And therefore, to their credit be it said, they throw no stones.

The interested reader is likely to draw his own conclusions from these articles. They are valuable as a cross-section of opinion about religion and labor rather than as an adequate philosophy of religion and labor. At least it seems clear that the forces of labor will not and should not be united on any dogmatic opinion about religion. The one thing that labor cannot afford to tolerate is clericalism, whether the clericalism is Catholic or Protestant. NORMAN THOMAS

Western Stuff

The Open Range and Bunk House Philosophy. By Oscar Rush. Privately printed. $1.

The Last Frontier. By Zack T. Sutley. The Macmillan Company. $3.

The Last Rustler. By Lee Sage. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

Six Horses. By Captain William Banning and George Hugh Banning. The Century Company. $4.

HERE, along with a work on stage driving in the West, are three books of rangemen's reminiscences. Next to actors and literary men, pioneers of the West have surely become the most prolific class of autobiographers in America. From that fact one might discourse on the dominance of realism in genuine romance. It is certainly significant of something.

Of the three autobiographers Mr. Oscar Rush, author of "The Open Range and Bunk House Philosophy," alone has perspective and alone conveys an impression of the dewy freshness that was upon the range when antelope played there unmolested by man. Yet his book is a slight thing, paper-backed and privately printed. In it one may see how nature blended with a fair amount of reading forms a point of view that is individual without being arrogant and that plays with serenity and freshness upon airplanes and women as well as upon cowmen and coyotes.

When Zack T. Sutley wrote "The Last Frontier" he was a tired old man. He had roamed far and met all the notabilities of the old West—Jim Bridger, Kit Carson, Charlie Goodnight, Buffalo Bill, Jesse James, Wild Bill, Calamity Jane, Liver-Eating Johnson. But there is no evidence of "a devouring eye and a portraying hand" that might have illumined these personalities. Consequently the book is generally dull.

There has long been a place for the revelation of the character of a horse thief. Perhaps "The Last Rustler" is as good a record of its kind as will be offered, though a good deal of the geography is, either intentionally or blunderingly, so confused that certain "rustling" experiences fail to convince. But the self-questioning of the man, his relation to his father, and his code of ethics reveal psychology in a way that very few unsophisticated writers achieve. The style is nervous and there is something epic about the sweep of hostile land and hostile men that the rider, generally alone, rides athwart.

Root and Connelley's "Overland Stage to California" has long been recognized as the fullest depiction of stage-coach days available. For years, however, the book has been out of print. Moreover, it made no pretense of treating the economic and political aspects of the overland stage routes. "Six Horses," by Captain William Banning and his nephew, George H. Banning, is a rarely happy blend. Captain Banning was a stage driver; the other Banning is an effective writer and a thorough student. While Captain Banning's personal experiences seldom enter the book he is beside the writer all the while to prompt him on the technique of the Yuba Bill tribe.

Some of the most revealing parts of the book show how and why Jefferson Davis, while Secretary of War, selected the impracticable southern route through Texas for the United States government to subsidize and then how the spectacular "pony express"—just as uneconomic—was set up as an advertising agent for the central route. There are vivid pictures of how people slept, ate, and quarreled in stage coaches. The careful history of the Concord coach was something well worth doing. "Six Horses" is a book that will have a permanent demand. As such books should be, it is indexed and it is well illustrated.

J. Frank Dobie

Strindberg

August Strindberg. By V. J. McGill. Brentano's. $4.

CAREFULLY analyzed, the moods of Northern literature may be said to possess a definite range. Its glamor is the flickering light of sentiment which can attach to definite symbols of the hearth and home, of spring wooing and summer mating, and of all growth from the soil a quality that is singularly ecstatic contrasted with its darker tones. The tenderness of this mood is rapt, like an exquisite contemplation of sunset. It is felt in the music of Grieg and in the little tales of Selma Lagerlöf. And since the lyric persuasion in all art is rather a release from heaviness than a definite phase in itself, we can watch its mutations like the brief smile of the April sun between storms.

It is not from an abundant joy in life that writers of the North seek to express themselves, but rather from a yearning toward that joy, which, in a dour land, might seem the simple prerogative of a brighter, more permanent sun. The aspiring mood is consequently both deep and simple; one can best behold the white majesty of the pinnacles from the deep shadow of the valleys; what one touches, seeks, or finds is never perfect; rather perfection lies in the unattainable, and in a vision of things beyond life which is in itself almost a madness.

It was not for nothing that Nietzsche could write to the author of "The Father": "I read your tragedy over twice with deep emotion; it has astonished me beyond all measure to come to a work in which my own conception of love—with war as its means and the deathly hate of the sexes as its fundamental law—is expressed in such a splendid fashion." In all that he loved, hated, and wrote, in all his towering melancholias, his fitful flashes of white sentiment, Strindberg was a product of the North. And as much as with any writer who ever lived, the shadow of his life lies across the pages of over two score plays and half that number of biographical and fictional writings which have become, for the time at least, a part of the world's literary heritage.

Whether he was a tragic figure or not depends on how one regards these things. Dr. McGill, willing to worship his hero, believes that he was. Certainly the furies that drove him were lodged within, but his life was a constant strife with petty things and with a world not altogether to blame for the fact that he was maladjusted to it. The outbursts of scorn, hatred, and disgust that he aroused during his lifetime were as much the result of his delusions of grandeur as they were of the nature of his literary undertakings. His sanity at least survived the effects of four miserable marriages, but his uneasy suspicion and hatred of women were pathological. He left behind him, he believed, in his plays, criticism, and pamphlets, an indictment of the human race. What he really left was the story of his own complicated and furious miseries.

He brought fire and passion to his work where his younger contemporary, Ibsen, brought acumen and a cold appreciation of human motives. Yet Ibsen is played today where Strindberg is almost unknown. His appeal is almost strictly to "those who can stand him" in the sense of sharing his morbid conviction of disaster, for where Ibsen raised an argument he hurled a thunderbolt, and like the figure of legend he was destroyed by what he touched.

Dr. McGill, in his comprehensive and searching biography, has adhered to the best possible method of interpreting the man through his own singularly lucid testaments. In "The Son of a Servant" and "The Confessions of a Fool," Strindberg believed that he had laid himself bare. Whether or not he sought justification in these confessions, the whole of his own life's disasters may be picked from the arguments of his plays. And apart from an almost childish faith in the soundness of the Freudian methods and phraseology, Dr. McGill has piloted his "bedeviled Viking" with considerable skill and conviction.

The greatest mystery of his furious revolts and impassioned denunciations may seem to be that there was no mystery at all. He was to a far greater degree than any other great writer an expression of the North and its violent contrasts. His fury at life was comprehensible and forgivable. But the question of the value of his work is perhaps more of an enigma, and on this Dr. McGill has little light to shed. He was, if we take the contrasts between his tragedies and his dream plays, a very versatile artist. But his preoccupation with a vastly wounded ego led him to miss a whole range in the possibilities of human color and contact. He escaped the fate of two of his contemporaries, Nietzsche and de Maupassant. But his appeal is less than theirs possibly because his bitterness was greater.

Eugene Löhrke

Portrait of an Intellectual

The Confessions of Zeno. By Italo Svevo. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

IN Zeno, delightful madman and incomparable sage, we have a notable addition to the great characters of literature. Only he is intensely modern, he is fatally of the twentieth century. To shape his nature the late Italo Svevo lavished upon him all of the contemporary maladies, caricaturing thereby the intellectual man of our times and primarily the European intellectual.

For every man of action, for every man of steel or breaker of airplane records this century produces apparently its little man of nerves whose inward life blots out the whole horizon. Our more brilliant writers—Marcel Proust, André Gide, Thomas Mann, Paul Valéry—have preferred to paint the man of nerves, and under various colors are creating his interesting record upon earth.

For Zeno too, despite many experiences of pity and terror, the cerebral life is paramount. He is the happy neurotic whose adventures have been given a form and direction by the gospels of Freud, so that he may listen to every splash or vibration of his subconscious mind. He is lazy and enthusiastic, introspective and gentle, fanciful and clairvoyant; he is a great hypochondriac, a great philosopher, and above all a great clown. His "Confessions" are the relation of his whole interior or secret life to a psychoanalyst who has promised to cure him of various ailments we are never permitted to forget. Thus the progress of Zeno—whose mind is as naked as if exposed under glass—in the direction of health, release, or merely in an enchanted passage through this "vale of tears" becomes a matter of the highest comedy. Looking back for many years I can recall no work of such ironic intelligence and bubbling humor as this novel of an Italian philosopher's conscience.

In youth Zeno's first violent struggles with himself were devoted to conquering the habit of nicotine. Soon all the walls of his study were tapestried with innumerable dates, large or small, printed or scrawled, all commemorating "my last cigarette." Zeno loved his father and tried hard to aid him in his last hour. But the old man, who had always returned his son's affection, struck him a blow in the face and made a grimace as he died. This dire incident was never to be forgotten, and of course provided much food for the psychoanalyst. Oedipus complex! He became, at any rate, a man of means, mildly engaged in the inherited business but chiefly occupied with his violin and with long, delicious reveries.

Zeno, in time, fell seriously in love with a beautiful young lady, who was like him a native of Trieste. Her name was Ada, and she had two sisters whose names also began with A. Rejected by Ada, Zeno proposed at once to Alberta, who also rejected him. Finally he related his defeats to Augusta, plainest of the three, and she consented to accept his hand. The whole chapter, called The Story of My Marriage, is a superb travesty on romantic love. Nevertheless, our friend Zeno is happily married.

Like his illustrious namesake of ancient Greece, Zeno has little faith in movement or a life of action, and so he remains the passive partner in the business of his father, free to indulge his taste for siestas, fruitful meditations, and amorous experiment. With so much leisure on his hands he soon acquires a handsome and quite charming mistress. Here is another great struggle with his subconscious. He lusts for his mistress but adores his plain wife. He justifies himself to the first by vowing that he cannot love his wife; he appeases his wife by showering her and his children with the most genuine affection. His days thus become a tissue of lies which he analyzes pitilessly. Oscillating between home and "love-nest" is the occasion for the most ingenious moral problems and for absorbing introspection. Other complexities and digressions, like an accompanying music, are provided by the secretly enduring first love for Ada, causing a "complex" of jealousy for her husband, who is his friend and business partner. All such "complexes," occurring in the orthodox Freudian fashion, Zeno analyzes away; and this keeps him delightfully busied through most of his potent life.

For all his naivete or flights of galimatias Zeno comes to be respected by those who surround him. From certain aspects he even appears heroic. There is an hour when he leaves his premature retirement and, reentering business, stands in the breach to save the family fortunes. Animated and incredible epoch, charged with all the cross-currents of jealousy, inferiority, or mother complex! Toward the end of his long, serene life Zeno has reached a phase of self-knowledge and wisdom which undeceives him about psychoanalysis. "What! I wished to run off with my father's wife!" Psychoanalysis has failed for two reasons: it has not cured the pains in his limbs or in the back of his head which come every time that he tells a lie; it has based itself completely on the false dreams and lies he has narrated to his confessor. In the dark hour of war which falls upon his country in 1915 he has found his health; he feels himself happy and strong among so many lunatic martyrs—since he is beyond the age of military service.

Visions and prophecies surge up for Zeno:

> That melancholy and industrious animal—man—may discover new forces and harness them to his chariot. Some such danger is in the air. The result will be a great abundance—of human beings! Every square yard will be occupied by a man. Who will be able then to cure us of the lack of air and space? The mere thought of it suffocates me. . . . We need something more than psychoanalysis to help us. . . . Perhaps some incredible disaster produced by machines will lead us back to health.

Under the pretext of providing a subject for psychoanalysis "The Confessions of Zeno" differs widely in its procedure from the great rout of novels. There is no "stark realism," no tale of "human-love-and-emotions-that-wrings-the-heart" and holds one in the hammock. The life that fills these puppet-like figures and makes them dance so grotesquely before us is the wisdom and richness of Svevo's mind. His mind approaches his material at a continually surprising tangent. This gives one pause—at a time when the novel as form appears to be in its decline, after the great nineteenth century. Could the novel be revived by becoming even more candidly the personal vehicle of mature and distinctive minds?

Italo Svevo (whose real name was Ettore Schmitz, 1861-1928) was not a professional man of letters. His early writings were unsuccessful. He became silent for a long period of years, like Paul Valéry, while prospering in his career as a merchant of Trieste. There James Joyce met him in 1912 and encouraged him to return to writing. Svevo was by now a man of wide interests and worldly experience; he had a truly mature, philosophical spirit. "The Confessions of Zeno," written during the World War, has beyond its other various beauties the pathos of a last word to life.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

Educating—for What?

The American Road to Culture. By George S. Counts. John Day Company. $2.50.

DR. COUNTS has rendered a real service by giving us this brief picture of the state of education in the United States. He maintains that the following ten basic principles imbedded in the faith and practice of the American people are controlling our educational machine: faith in education itself, governmental responsibility, local initiative, individual success, democracy, national solidarity, social conformity, mechanical efficiency, practical utility, and philosophic uncertainty. A chapter is devoted to each one. Dr. Counts feels this opens the way to an understanding of the actual theory that motivates our education. The treatment is stimulating and provocative and the exposition is clear. To anyone vitally interested, it is far too brief. For instance, some basic characteristic of our social order is stated and its relation to education implied, but no detailed analysis is given nor, except in a few instances, are concrete instances cited to demonstrate the general principle. The book thus suffers from one great fault of American education: it fails to furnish adequate illustrative material and is too general.

In spite of its brevity, the concluding chapter, in which the author asserts the absence of social planning, the bankruptcy of our two political parties, the indoctrination now going on in our schools, the absence of academic freedom, and the absence of any philosophy on the part of our school leaders to give positive guidance to our changing social order, is excellent. Would that it might be read by every teacher in America.

The great weakness in the volume is that nowhere does Dr. Counts clearly show the effect of the dominant business ethic on educational practice. To be sure, he hints at the relationship in many places. For instance, he says that the administrative machinery is patterned after business organization and that it is under control of business leaders, but he does not clearly show the interplay of the social forces and the unconscious subservience of education to our business cult.

It is to be doubted whether the ten principles enunciated necessarily cover the ground. Faith in private property is a cornerstone of our entire economic and political structure and is widely reflected in our educational process. Self-interest is also one of the basic principles of our economic life.

Our dominant philosophy is that business must be run for private and personal profit. The individual is out to make as much as he can for himself and his family. What repercussions the private-property concept has had on the educational structure is not adequately stated, if at all. The teacher who questions current property standards jeopardizes his position. Almost never do our high schools give a fair treatment to alternatives to our economic order, such as communism, socialism, workers' control, or the cooperative movement.

This volume is far in advance of most of the theoretical educational treatises that have appeared in recent years. It is one of the best brief social interpretations now available of education in the United States. Dr. Counts does not attempt to suggest how the educational process can be changed to make it more effective. At one point he does say that numerous organized groups are influencing education today and that rather than deny the validity of such forces we should provide channels through which they might find expression. Just what are these groups? How can they be given increased power of control without forcing our education into the mold of things as they are and still further buttressing private property and materialism? We hope that this book may be but the introduction to a second volume by Dr. Counts in which he carries through his analysis with penetrating and constructive suggestions.

JEROME DAVIS

The Great Liberator

Bolívar, the Passionate Warrior. By T. R. Ybarra. Ives Washburn. $4.

THIS biography depicts one of the greatest figures of Hispanic-American history. It was composed by a fellow-countryman and is naturally sympathetic. It presents a picturesque and glowing account of Simón Bolívar's life, with emphasis on his fascinating personality, political notions, and military achievements. Indeed, to Señor Ybarra the figure of the liberator seems so colossal that this conception occasionally induces faults of perspective. Among minor characters of the story the white-haired General Miranda, the precursor of Spanish-American independence, is most inaccurately portrayed. It would be hard to find among the misleading sketches of Miranda that have found their way into print a worse farrago of fact and fiction than that which is furnished in Señor Ybarra's book. Ybarra mistakenly enrols Miranda as a soldier under Rochambeau in the American Revolution, declares with unseemly chuckles that Miranda's success with the Russian Messalina, Catherine II, "to this day brings malicious satisfaction to Venezuelans," and erroneously asserts that the aged promoter of Spanish-American liberty and the youthful firebrand Bolívar returned to their native land together. The best part of the book describes Bolívar's strenuous campaigns which culminated in the victories over the Spaniards at Boyacá and Carabobo that insured the liberation of modern Colombia and Venezuela—the regions that were temporarily welded into a state that became known as "Great Colombia." The account of Bolívar's dramatic and mysterious interview with General San Martín at Guayaquil does scant justice to the Argentine hero of the emancipatory movement. An appreciative description is, however, given of the military achievements of General Sucre, the chief lieutenant of Bolívar, who decisively defeated the royalists at Ayacucho—Spain's Armageddon on the American continent. In the suggestive narrative of Bolívar's last years hints are given of his liaison with a mistress called Manuela Saenz or Mrs. Thorne, who was the wife of an Englishman.

Apparently no considerable use has been made of the large mass of inedited manuscripts that have never been properly utilized by any biographer of the great liberator. Yet Ybarra often adds piquancy to his story by quotations from printed sources. The book contains a dozen illustrations, some of them poorly executed; the most interesting is a portrait of Bolívar which was presumably painted by an American artist shortly after the battle of Carabobo but which was perhaps merely copied from another picture. A little more than a page is occupied by a faulty list of books used by the biographer which is not at all commensurate with the genuine importance of his theme. The volume lacks an index. Because of its movement, sympathy, and local color this biography appeals to the general reader, while mistakes due to hero worship and imperfect knowledge of the field render it less attractive to students of Hispanic-American history.

WILLIAM SPENCE ROBERTSON

The Fires Die Down

The Story of the Red Man. By Flora Warren Seymour. Longmans, Green and Company. $5.

UNDER an ambitious title Miss Seymour undertakes to give an account of post-Columbian native North America. Even thus limited it is an intricate task for which the author appears to have been inadequately equipped. She is sympathetic, but she lacks the training in historical and anthropological research that might perhaps have insured a really fresh, comprehensive, and sound book instead of merely a chatty one. Hence, although begun brightly enough, the story of the red man becomes ultimately a monotonous and confusing serial of Indian wars and government policies. It moves geographically from northwest to southwest down the continent and coincidentally with North American conquest. The line of march might have been a lucid guide through the different native cultures to be found in North America—an indispensable description if light is to be cast upon the red man's reactions and attitude toward the whites.

Miss Seymour's book has an air of intimacy with Indians, of a story told from the inside, as it were, which is not justified to an ethnologist or to any student of North America who is aware of the significant, fascinating, and even fundamental variations between one Indian group and another. For a story of red men, Miss Seymour mistakenly emphasizes much more the influence of the difference between British and American, and colonial American at that, than the difference between Iroquois and Pueblo, which is far greater. Yet occasionally she penetrates beyond the picturesque exploits of heroes, red and white, to the essential phenomena of conquest and change.

> Perhaps most of all he [the Indian] resented his own growing dependence upon the white man. But this sharing of the country had become a necessity. The red man wanted the gun and the knife, the cloth and the beads, the flour and sugar and whiskey. He wanted fiercely, indeed, his old independence and untrammeled range, but he by no means wished to go back to the Stone Age as the price of the ancient freedom.

Miss Seymour might have gone on to tell, as vividly as she relates careers, of the remarkable change of the Navajos from a hunting to a pastoral people because of the white man's sheep, and of how this change affected their way of living, their behavior, their very kinships; of how, too, the plains tribes shifted and changed even before they saw the whites, and altered many of their ways because of the horse; and of the new religions that have grown up among many North American groups not directly under the influence of missionaries, but as an aboriginal product assimilating the seepage of the white man's beliefs.

BACK FROM ANOTHER WORLD

Out from the enveloping darkness of insanity—across a borderland of vague shapes and shadows—the author vividly traces the progress of her struggle to regain reason.

"The Shutter of Snow" probes into strange things. Mrs. Coleman tells, in sensitive, impressionistic prose, of her extraordinary personal experience in an asylum for the insane.

THE SHUTTER OF SNOW . . . by EMILY HOLMES COLEMAN

Not merely an important case history in abnormal psychology, but a profound description of a human experience. Mrs. Coleman's impressions have been authenticated by leading psychiatrists. $2.50

THE VIKING PRESS
18 EAST 48th STREET -:- -:- NEW YORK

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

Plays to See

‡Flying High—Apollo—W. 42 St.
*Journey's End—Henry Miller—124 W. 43 St.
†Lysistrata—44 St.—44 St., W. of B'way.
†Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45 St.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47 St., W. of B'way.
*The Last Mile—Sam H. Harris—42 St., W. of B'way
‡The New Garrick Gaities—Guild—52 St., W. of B'way.

Films

All Quiet on the Western Front—Central—47 St. and B'way.
Cain and Artem—Fifth Avenue Playhouse—66 Fifth Ave.
Floradora Girl—Beginning Saturday, August 9; With Byrd at the South Pole, Beginning Wednesday, August 13—Little Carnegie—57 St., E. of Seventh Ave.
Holiday—Cameo—42 St. and B'way.
Kriemhild's Revenge—Beginning Friday, August 8—55 St. Playhouse—E. of Seventh Ave.
Liebe Im Ring—Beginning Friday, August 8, Eighth Street Playhouse, 52 W. 8 St.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
With Byrd at the South Pole—Beginning Saturday, August 9; Shadow of the Law, Beginning Wednesday, August 13—The Plaza—58 St., E. of Madison Ave.

Concerts

Goldman Band Concerts, Monday, August 11, Central Park, Russian; Tuesday, August 12, N. Y. U.; Wednesday, August 13, Central Park, Music Memory Contest; Thursday, August 14, N. Y. U., French; Friday, August 15, Central Park, Victor Herbert; Saturday, August 16, N. Y. U.; Sunday, August 17, Central Park. Concerts begin at 8:45 P.M.
Philharmonic Symphony Concerts, Lewisohn Stadium, every evening at 8:30.

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

These are things as interesting to the average reader, very often, as a hero, particularly if there are so many heroes that no one of them sticks in the memory; and as valuable, if not more so, to the students of government policies toward the Indian. Miss Seymour touches upon them casually, fragmentarily, as if unaware of their importance. She employs them a little ornamentally, indeed. Her entire style is casual, and if at first this is pleasing, the same tone and the same angle of focus through 400 pages leave the impression that the book is superficial.

In the last two chapters the author destroys much of the reader's interest and good faith by a too amiable apologia of official government boons granted the Indian. One feels vaguely a propaganda for a policy which, incidentally, is now no longer official and is at all events controversial. Miss Seymour paints a pretty picture of the red man at school, learning English, and of the red man at home, Americanized by having adopted some hygienic practices. She ends with a school children's memorial ceremony to the Indian's past.

ANITA BRENNER

Society and Socialism

Life's Ebb and Flow. By Frances, Countess of Warwick. William Morrow and Company. $5.

THIS entertaining account of "myself," beginning with the time when "myself" was tutored by "darling Miss Blake, who adored King Edward," continuing with glowing description of later social triumphs, and ending with "passionate sympathy for the under-dog," has more reason for being than some of the recent reminiscences of titled ladies. The Countess of Warwick, now a great-grandmother, has been not only a famous beauty and brilliant society leader but also a woman of advanced modern ideas who has commanded the friendship of men like Cecil Rhodes and W. F. Stead as well as of statesmen, crowned heads, artists, authors, and actors. She has devoted the latter part of her life to the social betterment of England.

As a girl she inherited a large fortune and Easton Lodge, the family estate, from her grandfather, Viscount Maynard, which made some of the expectant male heirs so angry that they "threw pats of butter at the Viscount's picture, when the will was read." She married Lord Brooke, eldest son of the Earl of Warwick, at the age of eighteen. Several chapters are filled with descriptions of her clothes, beauty, social successes, and lovers, told with a naive egotism that may perhaps be forgiven in a great-grandmother. She quotes the following about herself:

> Lady Brooke made a great sensation at the second drawing-room of the season. Even those who did not know her were talking of the "lovely lady with the splendid purple-grape-trimmed robes," her pale proud face surmounted by a low coronet of diamonds and a veil of pearls on white falling from the feathers in her hair. She carried the loveliest orchids, apple green, white, and mauve, with purple tips to match her frock.

The many personal letters which are included give amusing sidelights on "high" society.

After a great ball at Warwick Castle Robert Blatchford, the editor of the Clarion, a Socialist paper in London, in a personal interview convinced her of the folly and uselessness of extravagant entertaining combined with patronizing benevolence. She realized that mere personal effort to help the poor was futile and that bigger and more fundamental means were necessary. "To ally myself with political socialism seemed the only practical step to take."

She has learned to detest war and deplores the "horrid cruelty of hunting wild animals." She has been a lover of horses and an expert horsewoman. She established a sanctuary at Easton Lodge for wild birds and animals in memory of W. H. Hudson. Her socialistic enterprises have evidently depleted her income; Warwick Castle is now let to Americans and she offered Easton Lodge to the Labor Party for a Labor college, but the offer was declined because of the cost of upkeep. Her long friendship for Edward VII, whom she greatly admired, is well known. "He was a thwarted man for many years, a practical mind bored by inaction."

The charm of the book lies in the vivacity and human sympathy with which Lady Warwick describes her many and varied experiences and her keen zest for living. Her socialism has been criticized and laughed at by friends and foes, but conditions in England are better as a result of her efforts to improve education, poor-houses, and living conditions among the poor. That the aristocracy of England can no longer devote itself to balls and fox-hunting regardless of the poverty and sufferings of the proletariat is made quite plain in this diverting but earnest narrative. LUCY HUMPHREY SMITH

Books in Brief

Sinners in Summertime. By Sigurd Hoel. Translated from the Norwegian by Elizabeth Sprigge and Claude Napier. Coward-McCann. $1.50.

This story of a group of the younger generation of Norwegian intellectuals is vague, monotonous, and shallow. But it contains some amusing things. It is intended to be a light tale of heavy emotions, but too often it is the tale which tends to grow heavy while the emotions grow silly. Somehow one feels that the Norse don't do this sort of thing very well. Still, Floyd Dell recommends the book with enthusiasm. The story is about a group of very young men and women who go to spend a summer on an island. They know that love affairs will follow. Some have already begun. But they believe that among intelligent and uninhibited young people there need be no occasion for the more violent and unreasonable passions, no jealousy, no suicides, no duels, no heartbreak. It turns out, of course, that they are all too human after all.

Long Hunt. By James Boyd. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

James Boyd, in his historical novels, is not concerned with great figures or events or with any scholarly thesis. He lays his stories in the backwash or on the outskirts of a historical period, where he recreates realistic towns and homely, truthful characters. His latest book deals with the early years of the last century, and is laid chiefly in Tennessee. Its characters are hunters, traders, and Indians, and newcomers among the rapidly increasing hordes of settlers from the East. Mr. Boyd has drawn some extraordinarily fine pictures of pioneer life, and both the pictures and the speech seem true. As a novel this is a carefully worked-out study of a simple and valiant man in relation to an emotional upset against which he has no weapons.

The Unknown Washington. By John Corbin. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.

The title of this book is catchy but misleading. Its subject is not biographical but constitutional. The volume is taken up with an analysis and history of the Constitution of the United States, in the course of which an attempt is made to show that the influence of Washington in the formation of it was far greater than has hitherto been thought—indeed, almost paramount. In order to prove that he is right, the author lays about him with considerable asperity to prove that everyone else has been wrong. There is scarcely a historian of any sort or Understand

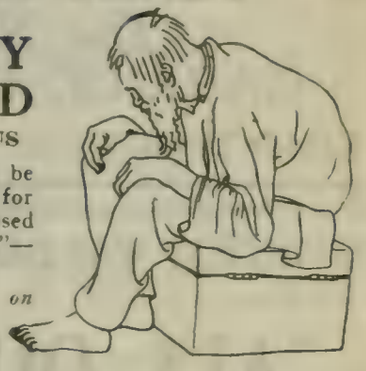
SOVIET RUSSIA



Here is THE book on the New Russia, a book that tells its truths without prejudice and yet with human feeling. To the virtue of his scrupulous fairness Mr. Hindus adds the kind of historical perspective which only a reporter born in Russia could achieve. Highly recommended by the leading thinkers everywhere, it merits your consideration. Ask your friends who have read it.

HUMANITY UPROOTED
by MAURICE HINDUS

"The book appears to be what is falsely claimed for so many others—an unbiased picture of Soviet Russia."—China Weekly Review.

The best selling book on Russia.

5th printing. Illus., $3.50

CONFESSIONS
by ARTHUR SYMONS

In this book, Arthur Symons, critic and translator, charts his own reeling back and forth across the slender line that separates "the sober health of the mind that we call reason" and headlong insanity. A fascinating account of a man's madness and his incarceration. $2.00

"We lose more men while I gain in reputation" . . .

This sentence is typical of the almost brutal frankness which characterizes General Crozier's book. You have read other books about the war. You haven't read one so far that carries the weight and authority that this one does. General Crozier has been accused of throwing mud at the British army. The book speaks for itself; no responsible authority has yet come forward to challenge the statements of fact given on the author's first-hand testimony. $2.50

A BRASS HAT IN NO MAN'S LAND by BRIG.-GEN. F. P. CROZIER

SAILORS DON'T CARE
by EDWIN LANHAM

In this book the strange and isolated existence of the crew of a small freight steamer is told through the young author's actual experience. It shows the sailors engaged in this life as they really are, their cruelty and sentimentality, their fights, passions, and recreations. $2.50

JONATHAN CAPE & HARRISON SMITH
139 East Forty-sixth Street : : New York

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □

"LYSISTRATA"

"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockridge, The Sun

FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre W. of B'way, Eves. 8:30 Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:30

THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS

The NEW GARRICK GAIETIES

GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

"MIGHTIEST WAR DRAMA EVER SEEN"
—N. Y. American.

"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"

A Universal Picture presented by Carl Laemmle
Directed by Lewis Milestone

"A notable achievement, sincere, earnest, vivid and graphic. Better than anything so far done."—Mordaunt Hall, N. Y. Times.

"Enormously compelling talking motion picture. As a show something to get definitely excited about! A very fine motion picture."—Howard Barnes, Herald Tribune.

CENTRAL THEATRE, B'dway and 47th Street Twice Daily: 2:45—8:45. 3 times Sun., 2:45—5:45—8:45

Midnight Show Every Saturday

EMBASSY

THE NEWS REEL THEATRE

B'way and 46th Street — Cooled by Refrigeration — Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight

ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT

Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

"WITH BYRD AT THE SOUTH POLE"

The Complete, Authentic and Immensely Thrilling Film Story of a Great Achievement

PLAZA THEATRE 58th St. E. of Madison Ave. Sat. to Tues., August 9 to 12

LITTLE CARNEGIE 57th St. E. of Seventh Ave. Wed. to Fri., August 13 to 15

THE NATION'S Index to Vol. CXXX
(Jan.-June, 1930)

is now ready. One copy will be sent to each library on the subscription list of The Nation. Other subscribers who wish a copy should send their request to the Subscription Department.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

period who does not find the author's tongue stuck out at him—Henry Adams, Bushnell Hart, Edward Channing, McMaster, Woodrow Wilson, James Truslow Adams, Claude Bowers, J. S. Bassett, Charles Warren, John Fiske, Charles Beard, Vernon Parrington, Walter Bagehot, indeed, everyone who has not seen the light as it has appeared to Mr. Corbin when writing his first historical work. One is tempted to repeat the old admonition: "I beseech thee, by the bowels of Christ, to bethink thee that thou mayest be wrong!" The book, however, though much too diffuse and written with journalistic cocksureness, is interesting and suggestive. The main thesis as indicated by the title and the only really novel part of the text is not proved, and the Q. E. D. is unconvincing. Moreover, it would be much easier to appraise had it not been imbedded in such a mass of general discussion, in which Washington often disappears almost entirely for whole chapters at a time. Mr. Corbin is engaged in two fights—one for his view of the genesis and nature of the Constitution as a whole, and another for his view of Washington as prime thinker. In both he has given expression to points of view that are worth consideration, even if we cannot all be expected to salaam and accept Mr. Corbin as the annunciator of the one final and irrefragable truth. The book is worth a careful reading, and the author's attitude a careful revising.

New Musical Resources. By Henry Cowell. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Some of the principles set forth here have been exemplified by Mr. Cowell with his own compositions on the concert stage for more than a decade. In fact, the first draft of this book was written in 1919, and in the interim other composers have already made use of means, such as dissonant counterpoint, which Mr. Cowell had foreseen as a logical development. The new musical resources that he discusses are all based on the series of overtones. He shows how harmony has grown historically by the successive adoption of overtones, and points out that the future development of music will inevitably proceed still farther along this series. His analysis of rhythm is subtle, and he makes many pregnant suggestions for the use of chords of rhythm and rhythmic counterpoint. The last section of the book explains the tone clusters which are a characteristic of his own music.

America Challenged. By Lewis F. Carr. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

Here is the farm problem put up to the man in Wall Street with the aid of sundry illustrated charts and tables borrowed from the National Industrial Conference Board. Mr. Carr is primarily concerned with "the American family farm . . . the cradle of much that is best in American life." He wants a remedy that will prevent this small unit from disintegrating; he does not want to see farming turned into a capitalistic business. The first part of the book is devoted to proving, by means of an indiscriminate use of the simple arithmetic average, that family farming does not pay. In Conjecture he discusses farm relief. The McNary-Haugen plan is advocated for the staple crops which have an export market, cooperation for dairying and truck gardening, and cooperation plus a method of controlling and disposing of surpluses for potatoes and tobacco. The gist of the program is to raise the prices of farm products in order to cover the farmer's swollen costs. Since industry is protected, it is only fair to protect agriculture also, runs the argument. To bring the two to the same level by reducing or removing tariffs on manufactured goods is not considered at all, for Mr. Carr is writing for the American business man, who surely has no logical reason for refusing to extend a corner of his magic cloak, protection, to his poor relations back on the farm.

The Terror in Western Samoa

THE following article, which we reprint from the English New Leader of July 4, contains serious charges against the New Zealand administration of Western Samoa under a mandate from the League of Nations. The article, which was written by John Paton, is accompanied by the following editorial note concerning the source of information: "We are indebted for the facts on which this article is based to A. W. Page, M.A., of New Zealand, an official of the War Resisters' International."

The record of tyranny, persecution, and callous brutality, culminating in the cold-blooded shooting last December of native chiefs, which stains the New Zealand administration of Western Samoa, is as vile as anything known in the history of modern imperialism. Here is a civilized and cultured population of about 40,000 souls, of fine physical and mental development (and of which, it is stated, less than 1 per cent is illiterate), living in a country readers of R. L. Stevenson know to be an earthly paradise, being hunted and harried like wild beasts by their New Zealand rulers.

The real source of the trouble appears to lie in the fact that the New Zealand administration has been attempting to force on the Samoans ideas of Western "civilization," particularly with regard to the necessity for regular habits of work. An early administrator of Polynesia, Sir John Thurston, has stated: "No Polynesian will ever work according to our ideas of work. He does not consider it the most important thing in life." But the government of New Zealand, in its extreme solicitude for the progress of the Samoans, has decreed that they shall be compelled to work even at the muzzle of the gun! Native traditions, customs, and rights must be trampled underfoot in order to secure for the Samoan the privilege of his white brother—to sweat as a wage slave for his white masters. To secure this, all modern "civilizing" influences, including warships, seaplanes, and armed police, have been pressed into service, with the result that about 38,000 of the population of 40,000 have been driven to a life of outlawry in the bush.

The responsibility for what is happening is shared by the British government for these reasons:

1. The mandate to administer Western Samoa was conferred upon His Britannic Majesty to be exercised on his behalf by the government of New Zealand.

2. A solemn covenant, agreed to by England along with the other Allied Powers, declared that mandated territories are to be administered in accordance with the principle that the well-being and development of their peoples form a sacred trust of civilization.

3. England, along with the United States and Germany, guaranteed the autonomy of Samoa in the Berlin Treaty of 1889, a treaty which no subsequent event has annulled.

The starting-point of the troubles is to be found in the epidemic of pneumonic influenza which swept the island in 1918 and decimated the population, killing 9,000 people—more than a quarter of the entire population. In response to the demands for an investigation, the New Zealand government appointed a commission of inquiry, which reported as follows:

1. The influenza was introduced from New Zealand by the s.s. Talune, which, owing to false statements on the part of the captain and to laxity on the part of the health authorities, was allowed to berth and land passengers stricken with the disease.

2. At Pago Pago, in American Samoa, only ten hours' steam from Apia, there was a nationalized medical service with a large staff and up-to-date equipment. Yet not only was a wireless message from the American governor offering assistance ignored by the New Zealand administrator of Samoa, but all wireless communication with Pago Pago was shut down. Help was finally obtained from Australia, but not till nearly four weeks after the introduction of the disease, when its worst ravages were over.

3. In all, more than 9,000 people, about one-quarter of the entire population, died. In American Samoa alongside, where quarantine regulations were strictly enforced, there was no epidemic.

This is a sufficiently striking commentary on the inefficiency of the administration with which the Samoans have been saddled and for which they are compelled to maintain a bureaucracy which is bleeding the island white.

In 1928 the New Zealand government, at the request of the newly appointed administrator, set up a commission to inquire into the finances and public services of the territory, and in its report it revealed an amazing story of incompetence, extravagance, and actual corruption. Under the German regime the cost of administration was low and easily met by a light tax. Under New Zealand administration, in spite of greatly increased taxation and free grants from New Zealand of £212,000 up to September, 1928, a national debt has been created for the first time (the blessings of our civilization!), amounting to £173,200 in 1928, and imposing an annual burden of £12,500 for sinking fund and interest. Since the average earnings of the Samoan are about £8 a year, this debt charge, together with the other costs of administration, absorbs the total yearly income of about 40 per cent of the entire population.* . . .

The chief method of government is by "ordinance." The administrator "may make laws (to be known as ordinances) for the peace, order, and good government of the territory," and has the same power to levy taxes and tolls. An ordinance passed comes into force at once and does not need the sanction of the New Zealand Parliament. Thus, the Samoans are completely at the mercy of foreign legislators in a foreign country, usually in complete ignorance of the territories for which they are legislating.

All four administrators appointed by New Zealand have been military officers. Since 1924 the policy of banishment and imprisonment of all opponents of the government has been in full swing, and as a consequence the island has been in a state of "constant unrest." As might have been expected, the result of the oppression has been the creation of a powerful Samoan organization to protect native rights, called the Mau, of which practically the entire population are members. It is against this organization that the chief efforts of the administrator are now directed. The tragic killing of Chief Tamasese, a Samoan of royal descent, was preceded by a series of persecutions, by banishments, imprisonments, and fines for offenses against the oppressive ordinances, which are quite typical of the methods of the administration.

On December 28, 1929, armed police attempted to arrest a Samoan for non-payment of taxes. They chose a moment when he was taking part in a procession arranged to welcome back a white man who was returning after two years' banishment imposed on him by the administrator. As might have been foreseen, there was immediate trouble, and a force of armed police intervened. Three Samoan high chiefs, Tamasese, Faumuina, and Tui, rushed to the scene and appealed to their followers to keep the peace. At that moment there was a burst of rifle and machine-gun fire which fatally wounded Tamasese and killed some others. It has been alleged by eyewitnesses that the massacre was the result of an ambush deliberately planned by the police with the knowledge and approval of the administrator.

*The total revenue collected in Western Samoa for the year ended March 31, 1928, was £126,038.—Editor The Nation.

Subsequently the Mau was declared a "seditious body" and its members were proscribed. Nearly the whole population are members of the proscribed organization and have taken to the bush. Fully armed marines, sailors, and military police, with the usual paraphernalia of armed motor lorries, launches, and a war plane, are now engaged in "rounding them up."

These Samoans are not asking for national independence, but merely for a change of governors, and sufficient has been written to show that this is not without reason!

They sent a petition to the King at the end of last year, which prays:

> that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased to accede to the prayer of your petitioners and to allow the government of Western Samoa under the mandate to be transferred from the government of New Zealand to the sole and direct control of Your Majesty under Your Majesty's Colonial Office.

It seems such a reasonable request in the circumstances. Dare we hope that our Labor Government will hearken to it?

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, will soon publish "The Soviets in World Affairs."

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

MARY HEATON VORSE is author of "Men and Steel" and other books.

BERT COOKSLEY contributes verse to various periodicals.

NORMAN THOMAS is executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy.

J. FRANK DOBIE is author of "A Vaquero of the Brush Country."

EUGENE LÖHRKE is editor of "Armageddon: The World War in Literature."

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON is author of "Portrait of the Artist as American."

JEROME DAVIS, educator and sociologist, is professor of practical philanthropy at the Yale Divinity School.

WILLIAM SPENCE ROBERTSON is author of "The Life of Miranda."

ANITA BRENNER is author of "Idols Behind Altars."

SOVIET RUSSIA

An extraordinary combination of low price and tour value for Students. $280 complete. The itinerary is fascinating.

Aug. 16 S.S. Statendam or
Aug. 27 S.S. Berengaria.

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.
175 Fifth Avenue, New York. Algonquin 6656

OPEN SHELF

DO YOU REALLY CARE TWO CENTS WORTH?

A 2c stamp, no more, will carry to you the 16 p. booklet "Causes of Business Depression" by Henry George, American philosopher, economist and humanity lover, whose Progress and Poverty appears in all European languages. Open your mind to a great Truth, and find the cure as well as the preventive of Unemployment, Poverty, Crime. All Georgist books sold without profit. Ask for list.

Robert Schalkenbach Foundation
11 Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

SHOPPERS' CORNER

MARITZA, 172 W. 4th Street, is having a summer clearance sale, which is very worth while. Very special crocheted coats made of hand woven material $24.50. Hand embroidered dresses, voile—$7.95 up, silk—$16.50 up. Palestinian children's—$3.50. Also hats, and crocheted dresses.

SPECIAL DISCOUNTS on Singer Sewing Machine models Nos. 128 and 99, during August only. Other savings from 25% to 50% on standard advertised merchandise. Write or call John 1427. SERVELL SYSTEM, INC., 35 Maiden Lane, New York City.

GRAPHOLOGY

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS is a practical method for taking personal inventory. No personal bias in graphology. Send handwriting. Character or vocational analysis, $1.00. Miss Florence Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

EDUCATIONAL

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN
Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 8 to 9 daily. 13th year.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN GERMAN. Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th year. Also neglected English education.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

RUSSIAN taught by university graduate, instructor in Russian at Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes. VICTOR RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 25 W. 123rd St. Harlem 0487

HELP WANTED

MAN WANTED to rewrite, complete and typewriter M. A. Thesis. State qualifications. Fair remuneration. Box 100, % The Nation.

SERVICES

WILL prepare manuscripts, book or magazine, on any subject—technical or general—for moderate fee—extensive research and publication experience—ghost writer for prominent personalities. Box 102, % The Nation.

FOR SALE

IN Adirondack Mts.—160 acres—5 room log cabin—peeled spruce—built 1865. Perfect condition. Wonderful summer home or hunting camp; cellar, garage. $3,800.00; easy terms. 100 other camps and cabins. Booklet. Earl Woodward, Luzerne, N. Y.

ROOMING HOUSE, $250 net monthly income, 22 rooms, free living quarters. West Side, Seventies, near Broadway. $1500 cash required. Box 101, % The Nation.

POSITIONS WANTED

SECRETARY: Young woman of native intelligence, with incurable taste for things literary, wishes to assist writer, publisher. Is capable executive; has knowledge stenography; excellent editorial background. Should prove valuable for rewrite, proofreading, etc. Box 2499, % The Nation.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:

Mail your classified ads so they reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.

THE NATION 20 VESEY ST., N. Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 20, 1930 No. 3398

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 191
EDITORIALS:
Leadership in Politics 194
The Great Drought 195
Fame and Privacy 195
How We Grow 196
THE PRESS TODAY: X. HUGENBERG AND THE GERMAN DAILIES. By Oswald Garrison Villard 197
MASSACHUSETTS—THREE HUNDRED YEARS. By Henry Raymond Mussey 199
THE JEWS—A NATION TRAPPED. By William Zukerman 200
A FISH OUT OF CONGRESS. By Emanuel Blum 202
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 203
CORRESPONDENCE 204
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 204
BOOKS AND FILMS:
No More This Home. By Genevieve Taggard 205
Below the Babbittry. By Henry Hazlitt 205
A Great American. By Henry Raymond Mussey 206
The Rise of Carl Schurz. By Oswald Garrison Villard 206
Mr. Dobrée's Criticism. By Florence Codman 207
The New Architecture. By Douglas Haskell 208
Books in Brief 208
Films: Ingredients. By Alexander Bakshy 209

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WELL, NOT HAVING HEARD of or from them for some weeks, we were just on the point of advertising in the Washington newspapers for the Hoover Happiness Boys when up bobbed that charming cooptimist, Julius H. Barnes himself. And what do you think? Why, the dear old chap announced that "the world-wide economic depression, with unemployment and stagnant surpluses of commodities, will come to an end upon a manifestation of revived confidence which will release 'idle reserves of capital' awaiting investment the world over." Now we submit that is just the thrilling word that the whole world has been waiting for. It was, perhaps, a little bit of a slip for him to admit that there is unemployment, but waiving that we think that after hearing from Julius, Prosperity will now stick its head right around the corner of the street. Why not? "Unreasoned pessimism is not based on facts," says Julius, "and confidence, patience, and good judgment should be measured against it." Can you deny that? To set the example himself, he insists that Americans abroad should tell the foreigners they meet everywhere that "the first note of renewed business is probably to be expected from the United States." No, not "probably," dear Julius, certainly.

NO ONE WILL, however, hereafter count Claudius H. Huston, lately chairman of the Republican National Committee by grace of Herbert Hoover, as being among the Happiness Boys. Nor will Herbert Hoover himself be tempted to say of his ex-chairman that nothing became him in all his political life like the leaving of it, for Claudius kept everybody in fearful suspense until the final hour struck on the fatal seventh of August. On Wednesday the New York Times reported from Washington that Claudius would fire a bomb at his dear friend, the Great Engineer. On Thursday morning it was sure that he would go out as peacefully as a lamb. But Thursday afternoon Claudius issued a statement which for naive and unconcealed bitterness and anger has rarely been equaled. Every charge made against him had, he declared, been triumphantly answered. Still, some people had insisted that he retire, why he could not understand. But rather than "be accused of imposing any burdens personal to me upon the party during the coming Senatorial and Congressional campaign" he had reached the conclusion that he should tender his resignation. So here is honest virtue triumphant in its hour of retirement to private life. And the Great Engineer? As he reads over this statement and thinks how it was he that urged the noble Claudius out of office, surely there must be remorse in the White House. Indeed, uneasy will rest the head that wears the crown there, we fancy, until the very hour of the election, lest Claudius strike again. However, the future is secure. As long as Simeon Fess, sage of Yellow Springs, Ohio, is chairman of the Republican National Committee its conduct will be safe and sound and stupid beyond words —wholly safe and sound and entirely satisfactory to big business and the Methodist church.

THERE ARE STILL NO SIGNS that we are reaching the end of the current business depression. The only advance in commodity prices has been in cotton, corn, wheat, and other products affected by the recent drought; but a price advance as the result of a crop disaster, though it may relatively benefit individual farmers, can never be welcomed by the country as a whole. It must not be forgotten that a week before the effects of the drought were widely known both wheat and cotton had broken to new low prices for the season, the latter touching a figure reached only on one day since 1921. At the end of July American commodity prices as a whole had fallen 13 or 14 per cent in twelve months; and this fall in commodity prices has been world-wide, reaching 13 to 17 per cent on different calculations, for example, in England. The net operating income of the country's railroads in June fell off 35 per cent compared with June of last year. Department-store sales in July were 9 per cent lower than a year ago. The country's steel output is running at only 54 per cent of capacity compared with 90 per cent a year ago—much the lowest midsummer rate since 1924. A hopeful factor in the situation is that merchants are not carrying huge frozen inventories as they were in 1921, nor are the large employers talking of sharp wage cuts as they were then—though the statistics of the Labor Bureau show a decline in employment of 13 per cent in June from June a year ago, while per capita weekly earnings in manufacturing industries have fallen 5 per cent in the same period.

THE ANTHRACITE-COAL AGREEMENT, the formal signing of which at Scranton, Pennsylvania, took on something of the form of a public celebration, will, it is hoped, insure peace in the anthracite-coal industry for the next five and a half years. The negotiations between representatives of the United Mine Workers and the operators have been going on for several months, and the outcome appears to be a victory for John L. Lewis, international president of the union. The miners do not gain any increase in wages, working conditions are not materially changed, and contract mining has not been abolished. There are to be no wage reductions, however; a modified form of check-off under which the companies will collect union dues for such employees as request it is recognized; and provision is made for the consideration of any controversies under the agreement by a joint committee of six operators and six union men. Mr. Lewis, who of course praised the agreement, reminded the delegates that a capital investment of more than a billion dollars and a pay roll of $300,000,000 annually were involved. In a letter of congratulation read by Secretary of Labor Davis at the celebration, Mr. Hoover praised the "spirit of joint relationship and cooperation between management and men" which the settlement embodied. Washington reports hint that an attempt to stabilize the bituminous-coal industry may be next in order.

THE NOMINATION of Congressman Cordell Hull of Tennessee for United States Senator advances an ardent and sincere advocate of tariff reform. Should he reach the Senate, as there is likelihood that he will, there would be one member of the upper house to be counted on to speak against the abandonment by his party of the historic Democratic policy of opposing protection as protection and favoring it only for purposes of creating revenue. It is, of course, a disappointment to us that John R. Neal, the hero of the Scopes case, was unsuccessful in his effort to win the nomination for the vacant short term in the Senate. Dr. Neal is a man worth watching. He has grown steadily in the estimation of those who know him and it is evident that he is determined to be a leader against the reactionary tendencies which found their expression in the anti-evolution legislation he was so ready to defy. We shall hope that there are political honors still in store for him. Meanwhile we trust that if Mr. Hull reaches the Senate he will make himself the foremost spokesman of those who believe that protection is not only a snare and a delusion, but that it is today inflicting a grievous injury upon our economic life. There is opportunity for such a man.

UNEMPLOYMENT IS WORLD-WIDE. Great Britain reports 2,000,000 persons out of work, Germany 2,757,000, Hungary 400,000, Austria 450,000, Italy 322,000—a total of nearly 6,000,000 in these five countries alone. France, with a paltry 20,000 unemployed, is the envy of her neighbors. Truly enough does Henry Ford say: "The problem challenging us now is how to control industry so that workmen may have steady employment." The motor-car industry, he suggests, may come to a ten-month industrial year. Mr. Ford is looking in the right direction, and we should all do well to look sharp in that same direction. The prevention of unemployment involves the adjustment of production to consumption, the organization and control of industry to that end, and a readiness to take a larger part of the gains of industrial progress in the form of increased leisure, not more goods. In an intelligent society with the resources of modern machinery and power, why should not the worker enjoy the benefits of a long vacation each year instead of being kept at work making surplus goods to throw himself out of a job?

AN IMPORTANT STEP toward freer trade in Europe is the new agricultural exchange agreement between Jugoslavia and Rumania under which frontier barriers and hindrances are to be reduced to a minimum and the food exports of both countries are to be apportioned so that excess crops may be taken care of as quickly and efficiently as possible. But not content with this plan to handle the agriculture of both countries as if they were one, the governments are already in negotiation with Poland, Hungary, and Czecho-Slovakia to enter the association. With this important group lined up, or practically so, French economists are already urging that their country and the other Western European Powers either join this cartel or organize one of their own to work in closest harmony with the one already founded. This is a really remarkable development. If European international cooperation in the exchange of food products can take the place of the usual stupid process of slapping on tariffs to hinder and not help further economic adjustment, Europe will be well started on the road toward freer trade and tariff sanity. If it is possible to handle the crops of Europe as a whole, there will be plenty to ask why its industrial products should not also be marketed without frontier barriers and with some appreciation of general European needs and financial problems. This may lie far in the future. None the less, it is refreshing to see how one happening after another points steadily in the direction of a European customs union. Something worth while is certain to come out of it all.

ITALY DOES NOT FEAR Russia, apparently, for not only has it accorded diplomatic recognition to the Soviet Government, as have most other European states, but it has just concluded a commercial treaty from which both countries expect considerable profit. Under the agreement, it is stated, the Italian government undertakes to guarantee credits on Russian orders to the amount of 75 per cent. Russian purchases in Italy have hitherto been small, but they have increased appreciably during the past year and the new treaty is expected to double them, Italy offering a favorable market for Russian oil, coal, timber, and mineral products. Incidentally, any increase in the exportation of Italian products will help the unemployment situation. The agreement is further interesting because it seems to confirm the impression that Mussolini is particularly bent upon developing Italian relations with Eastern Europe and the countries of the Near East, and because it provides Russia with a trade outlet which may go some way toward offsetting any restrictions which the United States may impose. After a time, perhaps, it may dawn upon the Washington official mind that the trade agreements which European countries are concluding with one another, such as this Italo-Russian treaty and the recent treaty between Great Britain and Rumania, together with the nitrate, automobile, and other cartels that are being formed or projected, are important steps toward the economic independence of Europe which American tariff policy directly encourages, but from which American trade with Europe must ultimately suffer.

A FORMIDABLE STRIKE at Lille, Roubaix, and other textile centers of northern France has been the outcome of the new social-insurance law lately enacted for the benefit of the workers. A similar strike of large proportions has also been in progress at Rouen. In the northern cities workers to the number of 150,000 have quit work, refusing to pay their part of the required contribution under the law and demanding increased wages to meet a sharp advance in the cost of living, particularly in the prices of bread and wine. The employers, on their part, have pleaded foreign competition as a reason for refusing a wage increase, but are themselves accused by the government of taking advantage of the contribution which they are required to make to the insurance fund—at the most about 5 per cent—to raise prices, the increase in some cases reaching to 40 per cent. Most of the workers are Socialists, but a Communist minority, bent, it is said, upon bringing on a general strike, have stirred up a good deal of disorder, and attacks have been made upon Belgian workers who regularly cross the frontier daily by the thousand to work in the mills. The extraordinary rise in the price of food is laid to speculators, and the government has sought to cope with it by increasing from 4 to 10 per cent the amount of foreign flour that may be used in bread.

THE LYNCHING IN MARION, INDIANA, of two Negroes who had confessed to the murder of a white man and an attempted criminal assault upon his fiancée is without the possibility of an excuse. The three miscreants were in jail. They were certain to be convicted and executed because of their confessions, but the mob would not wait. There was the usual feeble resistance by the sheriff, who asserts that he was afraid to fire on the mob lest he shoot some of the women and children who were onlookers, and so the mob battered its way into the jail, taking, however, only two of the criminals. The bodies of these men were not cut down for many hours, but hung in the public square to the disgrace and the demoralization of the town. There was delay even in sending in the troops, which were not ordered to Marion until the governor had received earnest appeals from the Negro community for protection. Undoubtedly the Ku Klux Klan spirit which still survives in Indiana had something to do with the lynching; the original lynching party came, sadly enough, from a nearby Quaker community. The year 1930 is making a bad record for itself for such violations of justice. And in Marion, as elsewhere, it is announced that it will be impossible to prosecute the members of the mob. No wonder that the demand for a federal anti-lynching law continues to grow.

A "CAUCASIAN CRUSADE," with the notorious William Joseph Simmons and Congressman Robert Ramspeck of Georgia among its sponsors and Atlanta as its headquarters, is the latest progeny of Ku Kluxism to be spawned in the sunny South. The invitation to enrol exudes all the old hokum about perpetuating "the white man's distinctive ideals, social supremacy, and economic interest," "courageously and effectively" opposing "the rapidly rising tide of 'racial' and 'alien' political, social, and industrial conquest, activities, and influence in America," and counteracting "the mischievous machinations of the subtle but fast multiplying mongrelizing movements now so active in our midst." The recipient of the invitation, if he can qualify as "a real, red-blooded white American inside and out" (bring on the X-rays and blood tests), is besought to answer and "quietly mail" such questions as "are you a sovereign, upright white man of true blood?" and "are your sympathies and sentiments wholly favorable to the full maintenance of white supremacy in all things?" By way of giving the affair an appearance of respectability, the sucker is also asked if he is a man of "acceptable reputation and lawful occupation." The financial obligation and, of course, the commission for the promoters and officers-to-be are not stated, but the former will doubtless be made known in due time.

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP at its worst! An Associated Press dispatch from Colby, Kansas, reports:

> Colby citizens will have to worry along another year with no municipal taxes to grow indignant over. For the third successive year the City Council voted to let the municipal water plant wash away the city's bills. During two years earnings of the plant have paid administration bills, provided $200,000 for pavements, paid for new equipment, and placed a balance of $45,000 in the city treasury.

We know nothing about this nefarious enterprise except what appears in this dispatch, but it looks like outright bolshevism and ought to be stopped. Cannot the public-relations committees of the esteemed National Electric Light Association protect us against such pernicious propaganda?

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK has again spoken out admirably in regard to war, this time to students in the Columbia summer school, declaring that "an intelligent patriotism must detach itself from the support of war"; that "like mother-love patriotism is devastating when wrongly used"; and that "war is against everything Jesus stood for." Among the many things for which he hates war are "the lies it lives on and propagates, the undying hatreds it arouses, the dictatorships it puts in the place of democracy, and the starvation that stalks after it." Finally, he took as his precept Earl Haig's declaration that "it is the business of the churches to make my business impossible." These are excellent sentiments. Mr. Fosdick has often expressed them and seems to be voicing them with greater and greater earnestness. But they are not enough; the church is not moving fast enough in making the business of the generals and admirals impossible. Recently at the international gathering of Congregationalists in England two clergymen, one of them an American, stressed this point at length, the American declaring that the failure of the church to take an absolutely unequivocal stand against war is more than anything else causing the decay of the Protestant organizations. No matter what the consequences, as long as any church refuses to take the extreme position it is unfaithful to Jesus for the very reason that Mr. Fosdick has given. There can and must be no compromise along this line if the Church of Christ is to justify its name and retain the adherence of any men of intellectual integrity.

Leadership in Politics

THANK God for Senator Norris! Quite irrespective of the outcome in the Nebraska primary that is being held as we go to press, Senator Norris is one of the men who make it possible to have hope for the future of American politics. No finer tribute has been paid to a public man in a long time than that given him by the New York Times, which is opposed to practically all the policies for which he stands. An anti-Norris statement circulated during the primary campaign declared: "Nebraska Senators should be of the kind that can be relied on in every crisis." The Times lightly commented: "Whereas George Norris can be counted on to do exactly what George Norris is convinced that he ought to do in every crisis; and political life is just one series of crises after another." It is a perfect summary of the career of this extraordinary man, a man of rugged honesty and simplicity, of utter fearlessness, of bulldog tenacity, of unfailing and laborious devotion to the public interest. In Washington, as in Nebraska, Senator Norris is an institution. When an inquirer in the capital asks for the real truth about any public situation, the reply is "Go ask George Norris." Through weariness and discouragement and failure and desertion he has never wavered, welcoming allies when they came, but fighting if need be alone, and doing "exactly what George Norris is convinced he ought to do in every crisis." He is a magnificent figure, but in the midst of the present campaign it is worth recalling that he has been also a great popular leader; for present conditions in American politics cry aloud for independent leaders.

Political life concerns itself on the one hand with the promotion of public policies and on the other with the practical control of political machinery and offices. In actual operation, the latter object, instead of being a means to the former, too often becomes an end in itself, an end pursued for the private benefit of the political leader and those who support him, so that "politician," unfortunately, has become a term of reproach, and justifiably so. At the present time the Republican and the Democratic Party alike, in most of the States and in the nation, separated by no fundamental differences of political or economic philosophy, have become organizations for getting and enjoying the perquisites of office, and passing on the benefits of political power to those who pay the bills, like the oil and power interests in the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover regime. Public policies, political and economic principles under such circumstances become little more than a shop-front behind which the real work of buying and selling goes on. Party organization, made powerful by the economic resources thus put at its disposal, holds the power of life and death over the individual politician, the very condition of whose continued political existence is his ability to get reelected. Under such circumstances only a man of extraordinary character and resourcefulness is able to assert even a moderate degree of independence.

This whole question of the responsibility of an elected representative to his constituents and to his party has recently had interesting illustration. For example, a few weeks ago Senators Walsh of Montana and Jones of Washington, both prominent drys, indicated their willingness in respect to the prohibition question to follow the instructions of their constituents as expressed in a referendum, irrespective of their own particular views. On the other hand, in party as in all other matters Senator Norris has asserted to the full the right of individual judgment, going so far as to support the Democratic candidate in the last Presidential election, and in the present Republican primary continuing to oppose President Hoover. It is small wonder that the party regulars have made a tremendous effort to drive him out. How is responsible party government to be maintained if the individual member is to refuse the responsibilities of membership? Who is right in a contest of this character?

We do not believe that there is any universal answer to this question. Just to the extent that parties really stand for definite policies publicly advocated and make their other activities incidental to those legitimate and essential ends, to that extent they may reasonably exact obedience from their members as a means of carrying out their policies. Party loyalty under such conditions is, broadly speaking, a virtue on the part of those who accept the principles of the party. If a leader, then, is unable to carry the party with him, his alternative is to get out unless he is willing to wait for the party to catch up with him. It is discipline of this kind that parties properly maintain when politics deals with real issues. As politics becomes a matter of loaves and fishes, however, the situation changes. Regularity becomes a vice rather than a virtue because it becomes simply a means of getting a share of the loaves and fishes. Leaders sometimes remain without reproach in a party with some of whose alleged principles they may actually be in violent conflict. Such a situation has existed notoriously in the Republican Party for a quarter of a century. As long as a man stays in such an organization his only salvation lies in asserting the right of individual judgment, and as long as we are tied up with a two-party system independent men are bound to make just this choice. The present confusion, however, showing clearly as it does the demoralization of the historic parties, only emphasizes anew the need for an intelligently progressive party to which a leader of character and intelligence can give adhesion without finding it necessary to repudiate entirely the actions of his party associates.

Politics is to be lifted out of the present morass only as people are brought to see that there are real issues on which it is possible to accomplish something by political action. The formulation of those issues is the great task of politics today. For a good many years political campaigns have been simply contests in promising more prosperity of the type that we enjoyed up to 1929. Today people are beginning to realize that we must have something more than a further hasty and undirected rush to turn out more goods. Our social and economic program must contemplate an intelligent organization of production and a sane distribution of the product, joined with the protection of the body of the people against the accidents of industrial fluctuation, for which they are not responsible. The present task of political leadership is to formulate such a program, not to win this fall's elections.

The Great Drought

THE spectacle of politicians and representatives of farmers' organizations hurrying to Washington to beg Mr. Hoover to do something about the drought may at first sight appear a bit amusing. It suggests the naive faith of a primitive people in a Great Father in whose hands are the times, the seasons, and the fate of men. Yet it was obviously a perfectly natural and sensible thing to do. Mr. Hoover, of course, is not responsible for the drought, and rain-making is not one of his constitutional functions. The responsibility cannot be laid at the door of Mr. Legge and his Farm Board, nor piled upon the farmers who sowed or planted too much wheat or corn and have seen it wither before their eyes. The drought is one of those unpredictable and inescapable visitations which the law, with a curious mixture of superstition and disrespect, speaks of as an act of God, and its weight falls without discrimination upon Republicans and Democrats, saints and sinners, the wise, the foolish, and the people who just are. But a drought which affects a dozen States and a million families is a national calamity, and one turns naturally to Washington to learn how great the calamity is and what may best be done about it.

So much has been said about the drought and such dire predictions have been made of its disastrous consequences that it is not easy for either the immediate sufferers or people at a distance to see the situation clearly and as a whole. Mr. Hoover is not a man to be stampeded by a national disaster, and his attitude toward the present crisis seems to us to have been eminently sensible. The first thing to do was to ascertain the facts. The extent and severity of the drought, the actual or probable loss, the available resources of States, counties, and federal agencies for the mobilization of relief, the attitude of the banks, the railways, and commercial or industrial organizations—all these are factors for the federal government to consider in determining what policy to pursue. Mr. Hoover has done a wise thing in calling for the fullest and most detailed information that can be had, and in summoning into conference the governors of the States particularly affected. If the federal government is to take the lead, as apparently it must, it is evidently Mr. Hoover's intention that it shall lead in cooperation and not play a lone hand.

A reading of the report which the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Hyde, submitted to Mr. Hoover on August 8 and of the statement which Mr. Hoover issued the same day might suggest that the extent and seriousness of the drought have been overestimated. It is a relief to know that there is no danger of a shortage of food for human beings, that only about 12 per cent of the domestic animals in the country are in the areas where the drought is most acute, and that not all farmers who have suffered loss have suffered equally. A really grave danger, on the other hand, lies in the injury to corn, wheat, and forage crops, the consequent shortage of feed for cattle and domestic animals, and the likelihood that great numbers of cattle and hogs will be thrown upon the market because of the impossibility of feeding them. There is also danger that the effects of the drought may carry over into next year through the loss of new seedings of grass and clover in pastures, and a rise in the price of dairy products seems inevitable. As Mr. Hyde said on August 9, "The farmer will feel the first and direct effects of the drought, but every man, woman, and child in America will suffer the indirect consequences in some degree."

What can be done will depend upon the information which Mr. Hoover receives and the extent and kind of State and local cooperation upon which he can count. The Farm Board has still some millions of dollars available for loans through cooperative societies, and bank loans can be had wherever reasonable security can be offered. An elaborate machinery of federal land banks, joint-stock land banks, and intermediate credit banks, specially designed to aid agriculture, has been set up in recent years and should be able to afford substantial help. Western railways have already been authorized to lower their rates on grain, live stock, and other commodities, and the American Red Cross stands ready to lend a hand if its special services are needed. Altogether, while the situation is, as Mr. Hoover declared, "one to cause a great deal of concern," it is not one over which the country should become panicky. The task of coping with the disaster is doubtless formidable, but so also are the resources of the United States, and there need be no fear that those resources will not be promptly and effectively used.

Fame and Privacy

MARLEN PEW, the editor of Editor and Publisher, has printed in his journal the substance of a remarkable talk he recently had with Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh in regard to the treatment of the latter at the hands of the press. We must say that the Colonel's views as quoted by Mr. Pew raise him still higher in our respect and admiration, something that we had hardly felt possible in view of his great modesty, his dignity, and his refusal to let himself be ruined by the unparalleled publicity and popularity which have been his.

The reason for the talk was that Colonel Lindbergh has refused to have anything more to do with five New York newspapers—not named in this interview—which have so outrageously invaded the privacy of himself and his wife that he can no longer with self-respect "cooperate with them." He called their practices "contemptible," reports Mr. Pew, "and thought them to be a 'social drag,' 'nonconstructive,' and 'a waste of time.'" Being a normal and sensible human being, the Colonel "minced no words in condemning newspapers which in his view cater to morbid curiosity and are concerned with private gossip to the exclusion of matters in the realm of 'things, ideas, and ideals.'" Some of the insults and annoyances to which this young man and his wife have been subjected he related to Mr. Pew; they are gross and scandalous enough to justify the Colonel's resort to any measures of self-protection. For example, he told of reporters who followed him and Mrs. Lindbergh on their honeymoon and "for eight straight hours circled about our boat at anchor in a New England harbor, in a noisy motor boat, and occasionally called across the water to us that if we would pose for one picture they would go away." He can certainly not be charged with overstatement when he declared this procedure "particularly mean and unworthy." He resented, too, being obliged to keep a guard constantly on duty at his wife's home, and related an incident in which a reporter had offered a servant $2,000 to "betray the secrets of the household." Naturally he resented most deeply the publication last winter of the fact that his wife was an expectant mother; this was harped upon without let-up until their child was born.

Throughout his article Mr. Pew leans over backward in defense of the journalists. No one, he thinks, could extenuate certain of the incidents which Colonel Lindbergh cited, but on the other hand his chief conclusion is that his fellow-newspapermen should see in the Colonel "less of the showman and more of the scientist." With all respect to Mr. Pew, we cannot understand the absence of a single ringing phrase of indignation at the hounding of Colonel Lindbergh. The Colonel stated that he made the complaint and took his stand against the five New York newspapers not because of any personal hurt but as a matter of principle, and that his position is that "of a citizen complaining in the general public interest." That is a very fine stand, but the Colonel is so far from being misunderstood by the public that he could safely have placed his complaint on personal grounds, had he so desired. It was right and manly of him to speak out, and it is a disgrace to the newspaper profession that it has not risen to protect him against a harassment which would make many another man deliberately quit his native land to seek asylum in some journalistically more civilized country. However much Mr. Pew may seek to deprecate the force of Colonel Lindbergh's indictment by stressing the fact that he is a national hero, and that the public curiosity about him is not mere idle curiosity but a genuinely affectionate desire on the part of plain people to share in the life and progress of one whom they consider peculiarly their own, it still remains true that in no other country on earth would the representatives of the press dare to stoop to such infamous practices.

Once more, as we so often have done, we should like to ask the American Society of Newspaper Editors what justification it has for existing when in the face of this monstrous persecution of Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh no voice has yet been raised by it or any of its members in any of its sessions against this degrading of their profession. The society has adopted a code one article of which reads: "A newspaper should not invade private rights or feelings without sure warrant of public right as distinguished from public curiosity." If the men who run our great dailies were merely good sportsmen they would have agreed long ago to join together to insure to Colonel Lindbergh his constitutional right to liberty and the pursuit of happiness unmolested by camera men or reporters so devoid of self-respect and breeding as to do the things they are guilty of. It is idle to talk of covering this case by law. We should be the last to advocate another statute to control the profession to which we belong. But we cannot see why the decent men in it, especially the newspaper owners, who so often rank as our great captains of industry, as philanthropists, and are so often distinguished by our universities with degrees of honor, cannot see that here is the clearest case they could possibly have to strike a blow for the integrity of their business. Nothing could raise it more quickly in popular regard than an agreement to respect the private lives of prominent men and women.

How We Grow

THE official preliminary census figures place our present population at slightly less than 123,000,000—17,000,000 more than in 1920. That this is the largest numerical increase in our population in any decade was only to be expected. More interesting is the percentage of increase (16.1), which, with the exception of the 14.9 per cent increase in the decade from 1910 to 1920, is the smallest in our census history. Our rate of population growth, indeed, continues to decline steadily. In the decade ending in 1880 it was 30.1 per cent; in that of 1890, 25.5 per cent; in that of 1900, 20.7 per cent.

Perhaps of more immediate significance than these figures are those showing the way in which our added population is distributing itself. California, with an increase of 64.6 per cent in the last decade, shows the largest percentage gain of any State, followed by Florida, which gained 51.4 per cent. No doubt this great growth in our two leading "playground" States reflects the rise of a leisure class able to retire and build Spanish houses in the sections famous for their climate and scenic beauty. But most of the people of these States are still compelled to earn their living, and a large part of the California gain is the result of the growth in the single city of Los Angeles, which has more than twice the population it had ten years ago.

Once more the detailed figures reveal the drift of population from the farms to the cities, from agriculture to industry. The third-largest gain of any State was made by Michigan, whose increase of 31.3 per cent is mainly to be attributed to the growth of the automobile center, Detroit. But the picture is more striking from the agricultural side. As the population growth for the nation as a whole is 16.1 per cent, any State with less than that increase is showing a relative loss. A great agricultural State like Kansas shows only a 6.4 per cent increase; Iowa but 2.7 per cent; Indiana and Wisconsin no more than 10 per cent; Minnesota 7.2 per cent; Missouri 6.3 per cent; Idaho 1.3 per cent; while Montana shows an actual loss of 2.8 per cent.

All this, of course, is no more than the continuance of a tendency that has been effective since the beginning of our life as a nation. In 1840 more than 90 per cent of our population was still rural. Even by 1880, though industrialization was advancing rapidly, only a third of our people lived in cities and towns of more than 2,500 population. By 1920 the urban population was already greater than the rural, reaching 51.4 per cent, and it is now estimated to be in excess of 57 per cent. But the industrial dominance is much greater than even these figures imply. The actual farm population has been estimated by Dr. C. J. Galpin of the Department of Agriculture to be about 27,000,000, or only a little more than a fifth of our national population.

With the growth and enormous opportunities of modern industry, this drift from the farms would have been inevitable in any case, but its pace has been accelerated by our high-tariff policy. Whatever justification the "protection-for-infant-industry" slogan may once have had has long ceased. It is agriculture that is the infant now, industry the giant.

The Press Today

X. Hugenberg and the German Dailies*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

HOW far have the currents which in the American press have produced such profound changes in the last two decades been reflected abroad? Is the control of the press and of public opinion beyond seas coming into the hands of a few persons? Is there elsewhere a tendency toward consolidation of dailies and a decrease in their total number? Is the profession abroad being metamorphosed into a business and becoming more and more allied with other great capitalistic enterprises?

If one studies conditions in Great Britain the answer is unqualifiedly yes. The tremendous power exercised by the rich and conservative Rothermere, Beaverbrook, and Berry Brothers groups of dailies is well known; they are at times really a menace to government. More and more dailies gradually fall into the hands of two of these groups. It is here that the parallel with developments in the United States is closest. It goes far to prove that the transformation we are witnessing in the United States is likely to be found wherever, under similar conditions, modern capitalism piles up greater and greater aggregations of corporate wealth and the owners thereof see greater and greater need for safeguarding and defending their vast stakes in the existing order of society.

In Germany the tendency is not so clear. Certain developments seem to point in the same direction, notably the rise of the Hugenberg press. But as yet the trends are not so marked as in the Anglo-Saxon countries. It is still possible to found political journals and to keep them alive indefinitely. The day of individual ownership is not yet really waning. Indeed, the total number of journals in Germany has lately increased. This is due in a measure to the large number of political parties and their need of organs to propagate their views. In a greater degree, however, the increase is attributable to a natural recovery from a heavy mortality in the inflation period. In 1885, at the height of Bismarck's power, there were all told in Germany 3,069 news or political journals of all descriptions. By 1906 this figure had risen to 4,183; the outbreak of the World War eight years later found only 40 more papers to chronicle the dread news of the various declarations of hostilities. Eleven years later, in 1925, there were left but 3,152. Of those that had disappeared 87 had been published in Alsace-Lorraine and more than 200 in the lost portions of eastern Germany. Inflation and war impoverishment accounted for the rest. Then, however, the tide clearly turned. A year later there were 3,257 news journals, and in 1928, the last year for which I have official figures, 3,356.

Of these 3,356, 2,139 were dailies appearing six days in the week, the others being newspapers published on Mondays (when the regular dailies do not appear) or other journals of a special character. It is interesting to note that this figure of 2,139 dailies for approximately 60,000,000 Germans is larger than the number of dailies in the United States today. There is one newspaper to every 18,219 inhabitants. In Berlin alone the total printing is 3,750,000 copies on each regular press day, or one copy for every inhabitant of that capital who is capable of reading the news of the day. There are 1,894 German communities in which dailies are published; three-quarters of all the newspapers appear in rural communities or small towns whose population is not above 20,000 persons. In only 94 cities are there as many as 3 papers, while only 88 possess 4 or more publications of this type. Berlin leads, of course, with 148 newspapers, of which no less than 93 were published six times a week in 1928. Of the 3,257 newspapers 78 were owned by stock companies and 389 by limited-liability companies; 2,481 belonged to individuals or families, and the ownership of the remainder is credited to cooperative associations, societies, foundations, the government, and other types of owners.

Politically, it is interesting to note that whereas in 1898 24.1 per cent of the German dailies represented the extreme political Right, that figure had risen to 30.3 per cent in 1928. It is still more significant of recent political happenings that the liberal press has decreased during the same period from 19.5 per cent to 4.35 per cent—it is gradually being ground to pieces between the upper millstone of reactionary conservatism and the lower one of radicalism. The Catholic, or Center, newspapers in the same period have risen from 9.5 to 11.3 per cent, the Social-Democratic from 1.6 to 5.1. The remainder are Communist, or representative of minor parties, or call themselves independent of party affiliations. The Social-Democratic press, which counted 94 newspapers in 1914, boasted of 184 in 1927, but it is to be noted that the once powerful Social-Democratic Vorwärts has shown a very heavy loss in circulation. There are four Communist dailies in Berlin. Details of their growth and circulation do not seem to be obtainable, but it is generally felt that they are not of great importance as yet. All four have been established since 1918. Finally, it is worth adding as showing the intense intellectual life of Berlin that there were in 1928 no fewer than 2,385 magazines published there, of which 50 were in foreign languages—including 17 in Russian, 13 in Spanish, 10 in English, and 5 in the French language. The number of these magazines almost doubled between 1923 and 1928.

When we come to the concentration of ownership the outstanding figure is of course Alfred Hugenberg, business man and politician, who during the war was chairman of the board of directors of the Krupp works. He entered journalism because the great industrial magnates of the country had become alarmed at the growing power of the Socialist and Democratic press. He now owns the leading news service, the leading moving-picture company, one of the leading advertising agencies, and a long string of newspapers. He supplies no fewer than 1,600 journals with telegraphic news and even with editorial matter, which is purchased by some of the smaller papers that were so crippled during the war as to be unable to have adequate editorial staffs of their own. As The Nation has already pointed out, in ten years Hugenberg has achieved a most alarming influence in five different fields—the movies, advertising and propaganda, national and international telegraphic service, the press of the capital, and that of the provinces. His indirect control of many of the newspapers he supplies with advertising and news cannot be questioned. Some have had to mortgage their plants to him. Others buy supplies from him. All hope for advertising from Haasenstein and Vogler, Daube and Company, and the "A. L. A."—the Allgemeine-Anzeigen Company—his three advertising companies.

* This is the concluding article in the series on The Press Today.—Editor The Nation.

Hugenberg's Berlin journals are four in number—the Lokal-Anzeiger, with a circulation of 225,000, Der Tag (80,000), Der Montag (130,000), and the Berliner Nachtausgabe, an illustrated boulevard paper which prints two or three editions each evening and sells about 170,000 copies. In addition the Hugenberg Trust owns nine weeklies and monthlies and six trade journals, of which one, Die Exportwoche, appears also in English, Spanish, French, Portuguese, and Italian editions. Moreover, it publishes many important directories and trade lists and a general line of books. The Hugenberg Telegraphen Union, or news service, feeds, as already stated, 1,600 papers. It has 90 editors, between 500 and 600 other employees, and 2,000 correspondents.

When it comes to stating facts as to Hugenberg's control of the provincial press, the task is immensely difficult because there are Hugenberg companies and companies, all more or less involved. Thus, in 1917 (that is, during the war) there was founded the "Vera" publication house, with a capital of 4,000,000 marks, for the purpose of giving advice and technical aid to newspaper owners in all departments of newspaper management. In 1922 another step was taken —the creation of a loan company (Mutuum Darlehns A. G.) for the purpose of making loans to newspapers and participating in their ownership. These two companies are united through mutual officers and by contracts. A majority of the shares of each company is owned by the "Dachgesellschaft" of the Hugenberg Trust. Curiously enough, anybody who wishes to contribute to the support of any paper but also desires to conceal his connection with the transaction can pay in to the "Mutuum" the sum he offers and have it applied to the uses of the daily by way of both "Mutuum" and "Vera." He can become a stockholder in the "Vera" or make a regular contract with it covering the use of the sums paid in. A year ago "Mutuum" had made loans to fourteen dailies in Munich, Stuttgart, and other cities.

I know of no other similar device to make it easy for malefactors of great wealth to get their talons into distressed dailies and yet conceal their activities. How clumsy and puerile in contrast with this appears the open and callous purchasing of newspaper shares or the loaning of money by our American International Paper and Pulp Company, which had so hastily to regurgitate when the spotlight of publicity fell upon these transactions! Finally be it noted that there is still another company, the "Alterum," which renders the same service as the "Mutuum" to non-political publishers or publishing houses. On top of everything else is the Hugenberg Trust itself, an organization of twelve persons in a non-profit-making or public-welfare corporation which controls all the Hugenberg concerns. Their joint property is used by the trust and the surplus profits are plowed back into the several businesses in order to expand them further. No individual or juristic person can claim the property of this trust (Wirtschaftsvereinigung) or demand a share of its profits. All of which would seem to call for the wits of a Philadelphia lawyer to understand and to operate.

Two other large Berlin publishers compete with the Hugenberg interests. The Ullstein publishing house, founded in 1877, owns five dailies—the Vossische Zeitung (70,960 circulation), long familiarly known as "Tante [Aunt] Voss"; the Morgenpost, with 615,730 readers; B. Z. am Mittag (192,130), the Allgemeine Zeitung (51,980), and the new Tempo, which rejoiced in 100,940 purchasers in 1929. There is also an Ullstein Monday paper, the Montagspost, and two weeklies, the Gruene Post, with a circulation of 985,150, and the Berliner Illustrierte with no less than 1,883,000 purchasers. Ullstein has its own news agency comprising 46 chief correspondents in Germany and 36 abroad, with 152 subcorrespondents in the republic.

Next comes the Verlag Rudolf Mosse, which owns the Morgenzeitung, the Volkszeitung, and the famous Berliner Tageblatt, whose distinguished editor is Theodor Wolff. The circulation of the Tageblatt has gone as high as 200,000. The Mosse Verlag has not gone in for trade journals or for weeklies and monthlies, but it publishes books and the highly important national address book. Its advertising agency was formerly the most influential in Germany; it frequently leased the advertising rights of a number of magazines and dailies, paying their proprietors a lump sum and making its profits by what it could clear above the royalties. The Tageblatt has suffered somewhat by the hardships of the past sixteen years; but its prestige as a great news daily with admirable special correspondence from all over the world is undimmed. The Frankfurter Zeitung, the greatest daily in South Germany, has also paid a price; it suffers because, unlike the big and more serious Berlin dailies, it is without a popular satellite (as the Tageblatt has its Volkszeitung), and because of the loss of Alsace-Lorraine, in which it had a rich field of influence. It is still distinctive in that it is without an editor-in-chief; it is conducted cooperatively by its board of editors, under which form of management it has long been one of the foremost and most erudite journals in the entire world, especially noted for its financial news and comments. The "Frankfurter" is not, however, one of the oldest dailies. Nine of these date back to the seventeenth century, the eldest, the Augsburger Abendzeitung, having been founded in 1609, eleven years before the voyage of the Mayflower.

Time will speedily show whether the evolution of German capitalism into great cartels or trusts or monopolies closely akin to the government trusts in Russia, which is being rapidly furthered by the economic situation and especially by the reparations burdens, will not similarly drive the dailies into greater and greater combinations. It is reassuring that despite the enormous influence exerted by Hugenberg through his newspapers, his 170 movie houses, his news reels, and his news and editorial services, he has made no headway politically but has indeed lost ground.

Massachusetts—Three Hundred Years

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

MASSACHUSETTS has been observing its tercentenary. All through the hot days of the summer the old Bay State, with all the paraphernalia of drums and banners and processions and pageants, with music and resounding oratory and civic rejoicing, has been celebrating the completion on this continent of three hundred years of ordered civil liberty under the law. It is an impressive spectacle, and the hearts of Massachusetts men and women swell with justifiable pride as they realize that they are inheritors of a noble tradition and are part of a great civic experiment still in process.

On August 22 Massachusetts observes another anniversary. Three years ago the Commonwealth, acting through all the agencies by law established, put to death two Italian workingmen, Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. The anniversary falls strangely in this tercentenary year. No one who lived through the dreadful days of August, 1927, in even indirect contact with that tragedy can ever forget the ghastly horror of it all. But the passions of those days have cooled. It is no longer a time either for shrill denunciation or for impassioned defense of the men who sent those two humble Italians to their death. Rather is it a time for thoughtful question. What does civil liberty actually mean today in Massachusetts, its classic American home? Who enjoys it, and under what conditions? Can it or can it not be extended in fact to all the people? If so, how can this condition be brought about? Questions like these call imperatively for answer in this tercentenary year when our whole democratic theory is being flatly challenged by communism and fascism. There is nothing sacrosanct about American institutions, despite the Constitution-worship that has been so sedulously cultivated among the unthinking in recent years. If our democracy cannot show its faith by its works, then that faith will die, and will deserve to die. But most of us believe that it merits a better fate.

Ideally, civil liberty means the guaranty to every citizen of the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—the right to be secure in person against violence and lawlessness, private or official, the right to possess and enjoy property. What did it actually mean to the good shoemaker and the poor fish-peddler? In practice nothing, if we are right who believe that they were unjustly deprived of the most fundamental of all rights, the right to life itself. What is the ground of our conviction?

It is not that they were deprived of any of the forms of law. Let it be granted that their trial was fair, that Judge Thayer, the jurymen, the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court, President Lowell, President Stratton, Judge Grant, and Governor Fuller himself all did their best to divest themselves of prejudice and to judge the case as a trial for murder and nothing else. Few of those who believe that Sacco and Vanzetti went to their death innocent of the crime with which they were charged will perhaps concede so much, but let it be granted for the sake of argument. Even so, did they enjoy the substance as opposed to the forms of civil liberty? Thoughtful men by the thousand answer the question with a flat no.

Those of us who answer thus believe that it would have been impossible for any alien radical to get a fair trial on a murder charge in Massachusetts in 1920, not because courts and juries had any wish to be unfair, but because aliens and radicals stood outside the charmed circle of understood persons and because courts and juries were afraid. Sacco and Vanzetti were foreigners, men with dark skins and black eyes and a strange tongue, men who had been little in school, who worked with their hands, who had ways odd and uncouth, and who, in addition, held ideas unfamiliar and subversive, gained God knows where. Not only so, but their friends and acquaintances were men of the same sort. Can we wonder that their testimony carried little weight with Massachusetts judges and jurymen and university presidents suffering in the beginning from the fear of a violent social upheaval and later from a belief that the case of these men had become somehow identified with an attack on the very institutions of the Commonwealth?

During three centuries rulership in Massachusetts, despite the tradition of democracy, has rested in the hands of a relatively small governing class embracing chiefly the brains and wealth of the community. It derives from the clergy and property-holders of the seventeenth century, and descends to the financial and industrial rulers of today, with the professional classes who largely do their thinking for them, and the great body of employees and substantial citizens of small property who take their ideas uncritically from their "betters." It is because the law in Massachusetts is made and administered by and for this traditionally "American" group, great numbers of us believe, and not because they killed Berardi, that Sacco and Vanzetti are in their graves today.

If we are right, then the alien, the radical, the dissentient, the outlandish man of whatever sort who lacks economic and social standing is extremely likely under the forms of law to be practically deprived of those advantages whose supposedly universal enjoyment Massachusetts celebrates this year. He is deprived of them, not because the ruling group wish to deprive him, but because they lack the understanding, the sympathy, the imagination to bring him effectively within their group, to whom alone the guaranties and immunities of citizenship practically extend. Unable to include him, they fear and distrust him, and pass over quickly to repression.

This lack of understanding and toleration is no new thing, though it may take new forms. But from the days of Anne Hutchinson and the Quakers, down through the revolutionary years when it was unsafe not to be a patriot, continuing during the times when Boston was mobbing William Lloyd Garrison, building at night a two-noose scaffold before his house, and threatening to hang Wendell Phillips, and so on to the bitter August days when they were putting Sacco and Vanzetti to death—through three hundred years the rulers of Massachusetts have been sternly intolerant of fundamental dissent. Hospitable to non-essential heresies, they have often furnished interested audiences for the wildest religious, social, and even economic vagaries. Serious dissent from their social, political, and economic system, however, they have stamped out with a heel of iron. Along with plain disturbers of the peace, accordingly, they have stoned their prophets and crucified their saviors. Massachusetts may well reflect that the executions of August 22, 1927, were but one incident of three centuries of fundamental intolerance.

That intolerance in our day has sent its roots deep down into our existing property system, and woe to him who would shake or even amend that system. For generations the ruling group have been its beneficiaries, and by means of the political and social system into which it is built and by which it is supported they control the life of the Commonwealth. To some extent their power has been shared with the later comers, notably the Irish, with their political genius, but by and large the economic and social newcomers are the hewers of wood and drawers of water. They tend the looms and weed the onion beds, and the rulers of Massachusetts look on them with concern as possible elements of danger in a scheme of life that, for the sake of all concerned, ought not to be disturbed. It was this fear and distrust, so it seems to many of us, that were responsible for the Sacco-Vanzetti execution. If we are right, then the charge that Massachusetts is a class state is in so far true, and her tercentenary in so far is the celebration of a fiction.

Must Massachusetts, then, must the United States accept the Communist thesis that our democratic state is necessarily the property of the rich and powerful, with the corollary that the only hope for the unprivileged is the overthrow of that state and the substitution of a workers' state? If the prevailing temper of Massachusetts, as it was evidenced by the Sacco-Vanzetti case, is to continue dominant in American life, then I at least can see no escape from some such conclusion. The very lack of understanding, the distrust and fear, and the resulting repression that necessarily characterizes such a government are in themselves the best evidence of the truth of the criticism. Along that road lies no peace, but only ceaseless struggle ending in cataclysm. It is that possibility that the people of Massachusetts should contemplate in this tercentenary year.

If they choose the other path, then they must realize that it means deep-going change, and no social change is ever accomplished without difficulty. Massachusetts cannot be just to all her people without disturbing the privileges that some of them now enjoy. Will she be great enough and bold enough to make that choice? To make it will require courage and vision and faith, faith in men of all sorts and kinds as against men simply of our own kind. Massachusetts has great advantages in her wealth, her educated citizenry, her tradition of ordered civil liberty. Can she become possessed of a consuming passion for justice and for opportunity for the least of her citizens and move bravely forward in the new courses called for by the new conditions? Shall her mills and her shops and her counting-houses be the gods of Massachusetts or shall her dreams be increasingly fixed on her rich treasures of human life? On the answer hangs much for the future of democracy in America.

The Jews—A Nation Trapped

By WILLIAM ZUKERMAN

THE Jewish world is stirred to its depths. From the Baltic to the Pacific it reverberates with protests and resounds with denunciations. In Warsaw and in New York, in Bucharest and in Paris, in Tel-Aviv and in London men assemble at big meetings, demonstrate in the streets, or express their indignation by a stoppage of work. In hundreds of towns in Poland and the Americas, in the Balkans and in South Africa, in the Baltic states and in Australia, wherever Jews live, the air is filled with cries of anger and resentment mingled with despair. The whole of that unique, invisible empire of people without any one country, yet scattered over every land upon the face of the earth is in upheaval.

What is the cause of this commotion? Nominally, the protest is against the action of the British government in suspending Jewish immigration into Palestine and the blow which this action has dealt the entire project of the establishment of a Jewish national home. But anyone who is more than superficially acquainted with Jewish life as a whole, and not alone with some single manifestation of it, knows that this does not tell the complete story. No action of such a kind could arouse a people inured to suffering and accustomed to disappointment. The Jewish national aspirations in Palestine are not by any means universally shared by the Jewish people. Something more real and fundamental than a blow to the establishment of the Jewish national home was necessary to arouse the Jewish world, something vital, going to the very roots of the economic existence of the people.

The war broke up the huge Czarist empire into a number of small states, each with a large Jewish population. These, if they are not now being made openly the objects of pogroms or political discrimination, are being economically exterminated in the literal sense of the word. Most of these new states are at present experiencing a severe economic crisis. Even if they have lived in these countries for more than a thousand years the Jews are still considered aliens there, and when food is scarce it is given first to the native sons. The governments are doing what they can to relieve their "own people." The "alien" Jews are left to perish. Only the "ungodly" and "immoral" Soviet Government has recognized that these people are a part of the state and is making an effort to relieve their suffering by settling them on the land and inducting them into industry. The rest of the highly moral, Christian governments consider that it is enough if the Jews are no longer subjected to the massacre and pillage which marked the first years of the existence of their states.

The situation of the Jews in these countries can hardly be visualized in Western lands. Here is a people finding the economic ground cut from under its feet. Jews are eliminated from middle-class occupations and at the same time are deprived of the right of being workingmen. State cooperatives ruthlessly eliminate the small Jewish shopkeeper and artisan, and government monopolies eject Jewish workingmen from shops and factories where they have worked for generations. Industries built up by Jewish work and effort are not infrequently cleared of Jews, and even in cases where the Jews retain ownership they are sometimes not allowed to engage Jewish workingmen. Jews are, of course, also barred from municipal and government positions and their membership in the professions is limited by the restrictions placed on university admissions. Small Jewish business men are refused credits by government banks and the bigger men in many cases are being ruined by the heavy burden of taxation levied on the urban Jewish population in order to relieve the native peasantry. The result is terrible to contemplate. Entire villages subsist on the slender relief funds sent from overseas. But for the staggering effort of Jewish philanthropy in the United States, East European Jewry would have gone through horrors similar to those of the Volga famine, and even with that aid the conditions are those of slow starvation and physical deterioration. If a real League of Nations existed the plight of these seven million Jews of Eastern Europe would constitute one of its main problems.

There is only one way out from this frightful situation. The Jews must leave Eastern Europe for less thickly populated and more civilized countries where economic opportunities are greater and national prejudices are not so overpowering. If the free and unrestricted immigration of pre-war days had prevailed after the war the world would have heard very little of Zionism and of the Jewish problem as a whole. But among the greater blessings of the post-war period restriction or complete stoppage of immigration, visas, and quotas occupy prominent positions. Only the very fortunate can ever hope now to enter the United States or Canada. Australia and South Africa have altogether barred their doors. The South American republics follow the example of the northern continent. The New World, like the Old, has little welcome for the Jew.

Palestine was one of the few countries left which still afforded an outlet for a small percentage of the millions of Jews struggling for very life in Eastern Europe. Palestine has yet another attraction for the Jewish immigrant, offered him by no other country except the Soviet Union—the prospect of agricultural colonization. The country is not all shipshape and ready for the immigrant. It has still to be reclaimed from the wilderness, and it is just this fact that makes so powerful an appeal to modern Jewish youth imbued with the great social ideals of labor and productive work. Jewish youth wishes to abandon the age-old, sterile occupations into which Jews were forced by centuries of persecution and oppression. There is in many cases a pathetic longing for the soil which is finding expression in the powerful back-to-the-land movement among the Jews of Eastern Europe; there is a tremendous urge to do pioneer work of every description. Nowhere in the world, outside Soviet Russia perhaps, will one meet with greater contempt for the petty middle-class occupations than one finds now among the Jewish youth. Shopkeeping, small business, peddling, buying and selling are by no one despised more intensely than by the young Jews of today. The truly remarkable Jewish "pioneer" movement which is responsible for the great Jewish achievements in Palestine is really not a Zionist institution at all. It became affiliated with modern Zionism because Palestine is the only country apart from Russia where the ideals of productive and pioneer work for Jews stand a chance now of realization. It is a product of Eastern Europe, not of Palestine. It is the organized, social expression of the hope of the Jewish youth deprived of work, condemned to idleness and sterility in Eastern Europe, and striving for honest, healthy labor. Throughout Poland, Galicia, the Baltic states, Rumania, Bessarabia, Hungary, Austria, and even Germany, thousands of Jewish youths are waiting expectant for the call to reclaim a land from the desert.

And suddenly this suspension order of the British Labor Government cuts off one of the very few remaining outlets for emigration. The only opportunity that was left for productive pioneer work is gone. What wonder that a cry so pitiful and heartrending is raised? It is not because of Zionism, the failure of the national home, or the blow to the idea of the Jewish state. Would that the Labor Government had revoked the Balfour Declaration and left immigration and colonization free! That would not have raised a fraction of the storm which has been raised by its present action. Jewish immigration into Palestine means both less and infinitely more than the revival of a Jewish state. It means the freedom, hope, and self-respect of a nation. Post-war Zionism is not a national problem alone. It is merely the Jewish aspect of the greatest general problem of our age, the problem of the shifting of the world population. It is economics through and through, and whatever spiritual aspect it presents is more social and humanitarian than national.

The greatest error one can make about present-day Zionism is to look at it from the point of view of Palestine alone, for the question does not begin and end with Palestine. It has as much to do with Poland, Rumania, and the rest of Eastern Europe, nay, with the whole world, as with Palestine. It affects every country with a Jewish population. Jews in the post-war period go to Palestine not because it is a luxury or because of some sentimental ideal of establishing a Jewish national home, but because they are driven from most places and barred from others. They run to Palestine for the same reason that any escaped prisoner runs for freedom.

The world must realize that it cannot have it both ways with the Jews. It cannot bait and hunt them in Europe, bar them from America, Africa, and Australia, and then on top of it all cut off their last avenue of escape in Asia. They must have a place somewhere. Even in a world brutalized as ours is today a nation of millions of people cannot be trapped like a wild animal. If Poland exterminates her Jews, Rumania exposes them to pogroms, Hungary discriminates against them, Germany baits them, the United States imposes quotas on them, South Africa bars her gates against them, surely the problem cannot be solved by suspending their immigration into Palestine as well. This is the true reason for the present Jewish outburst. It is not directed against Great Britain alone, nor is it an uprising of the Jews in defense of their national home. It is a protest against the entire world.

A Fish Out of Congress

By EMANUEL BLUM

THE Fish committee was examining witnesses: Grover Whalen, at his best when about to be photographed, uttered rich laughter, that bright cheerio so characteristic of the man. The camera man gave a signal. A flash! Thank you, gentlemen.

Commissioner Whalen would like to read a statement to the committee. Why certainly, Commissioner; of course, Commissioner; anything you say, Commissioner. He reads his statement. A few questions.

"Did you carry on the investigation establishing the authenticity of the documents yourself?" "No, I did not. It was done by Inspector Lyons of the Bomb Squad and by his undercover men." Whalen, having nothing to hide, would be glad to have these men subpoenaed before the committee. He would ask only one thing—that they be allowed to appear before the committee in secret executive session.

"Why in secret session?" asks a committee member. Whalen begins to say something. It wouldn't be safe, did he say? His policemen wouldn't be safe? "You mean," asks Representative Bachman of Virginia naively, "their lives wouldn't be safe if they testified what they knew before this committee? They would jeopardize their personal safety?" Whalen seemed to breathe more easily. He could now say, "Not only they, but also their wives and children; the safety of their families would be placed in jeopardy."

Mr. Bachman asks another question: "Now about this printer, Max Wagner, who is supposed to have printed these documents . . . what did you do to investigate him and the reports that he forged these papers?" Whalen moved uncomfortably in his chair. Curiously enough, Wagner had not been mentioned in the report.

"Why, this man Wagner," said Mr. Whalen, "he got thirty days for being in possession of dirty pictures. He got mixed up with a girl. A man like that can't be believed. Too unreliable." "Well, did you question him?" "No, we didn't think it worth while to question a man with a record like that." The economic relations between two countries were involved, yet they didn't think it worth while to question the man who admitted printing the incriminating documents! And why? Because the man had possessed dirty photographs and had been mixed up with a girl. Did the committee bully and cross-examine Mr. Whalen? They did not. With other witnesses they had proved themselves quite capable of doing so, but they were very kind to Mr. Whalen.

Their treatment next day of Peter A. Bogdanov, chairman of the board of the Amtorg Trading Company, was very different. He testified through an interpreter—a fact which was regarded with great suspicion by Mr. Fish, who at one point asked impatiently whether it was the habit of the Russian government to send over men who spoke Russian and not English. Sometimes the questioners stopped the witness in the middle of his Russian speeches. It seemed too long. Are there no words for "yes" and "no" in Russian?

An example of Fish's cross-examining technique and the pertinence of his inquiries was his questioning of Mr. Bogdanov concerning political prisoners in Siberia at the present time. He asked how many there were. "I don't know," said Bogdanov. "Well, are there more than there were under the Czar?" persisted Fish. "I don't know."

"How many political prisoners were there in Siberia under the Czar?" "I don't know." "Weren't you a prisoner under the Czar?" a little belligerently. "Yes, I was."

"What! You were a prisoner under the Czar and you don't know how many political prisoners there were in Siberia?" Bogdanov catches the outraged expression as he listens to the translations. His face beams as he replies in Russian. Ohsol, his interpreter, chuckles and translates: "He says that the Czar didn't send him to Siberia to count the number of prisoners."

But Fish is indefatigable; he is out to get the truth. He repeats the question. "You mean to tell this committee that you were a prisoner under the Czar and don't know how many prisoners there were?" Bogdanov answers: "I was an expert at sitting in prison, not on prison statistics." And so they played medicine ball with a man who is in charge of trade worth about $100,000,000 a year to the United States.

The questioning goes on. "Who is Comrade Liza?" and "Do you know the employees of your company?" "I know some of them." There follows a scolding by Fish because Mr. Bogdanov does not know more of them, because he does not know how many photostat rooms there are at the Amtorg. What kind of a president of Amtorg is he anyway, not to know anything? Does he know the average wage of a coal miner in Russia? No, he doesn't. "Well," says Fish, "that's your field. You ought to know that." Does he know the average wage of a textile worker in Russia? He doesn't know that either. "You ought to know that," Fish hammers home, "that's economics, that's your field."

"Do the Communists believe in the overthrow of capitalist governments?" asks Fish. "I'm not an expert on political questions," pleads Bogdanov. He explains that anything he would offer would be mere hearsay. Fish insists. "I think," says Bogdanov, "that I read something to that effect in Bukharin, but I'm not sure." There is another question about Comrade Liza. Bogdanov, wishing to be helpful, says, "Maybe you could give me the lady's family name?"

When he is questioned concerning some detail in the production of the documents he says simply, "I don't know because I did not make them."

Representative Nelson of Maine takes a hand. "Do you think it's a good thing for this country to have you dump 100,000 tons of coal here every year?" he asked. "Yes," answered Bogdanov, "we offer you a very fine quality of coal that you have not got here. We do not undersell you. We simply sell a finer grade of coal that is of great advantage to you in your industries." "Well," said Nelson, rising to go to lunch, "that's a fine advertisement for your coal."

The most competent witness before the committee, from a heroic-dramatic standpoint, was Spivak, reporter for the evening Graphic. He kept jumping over the traps set for him by the preliminary questions of the committee. In particular, they were after him about a reference to Secretary Stimson which appeared in the Graphic. He admitted the statement was inaccurate, but he said that it was not his, that he had telephoned the story in and the rewrite man had embellished it a bit.

"I should like to read my statement concerning the Whalen documents, proving them to be forgeries," said Spivak. "I don't want to hear it," thundered Nelson. He was mad as hops. But, after all, he had to explain. "A man of your intelligence oughtn't to have to read his statement. Tell us about it." "May I use my written statement as notes?" "Yes."

He proceeded. He told how he and his editor did not wish to spring their story on Whalen without letting him in on it, because they did not wish to "make a fool of Mr. Whalen" in Washington. "Why didn't you wish to make a fool of Mr. Whalen?" Fish wanted to know. "Not I," replied Spivak, "it was my editor who didn't."

He and his editor tried to see Whalen; they stayed up all night outside his hotel. "But he wouldn't see us," said Spivak. Finally, word came down that they should wait for him; he would see them at about six. But Mr. Whalen didn't show up. Spivak, according to his own story, saw Whalen going off to the station in a taxi. There was nothing left to do, presumably, but to make a fool of Whalen.

Perhaps we had better pass over the tedious metaphysical discussions between Duns Scotus Fish and Peter Bogdanov on the definition of "control of government" and the relationship between the Communist Party and the Soviet state. We will give only one excerpt.

"Perhaps if you would tell me what you mean by 'control', I could explain better," said Bogdanov after being hounded about the Communist Party and the Soviet state. "Control!" bawled Fish, "I mean control. Control of the government!"

It took about an hour to swear Bogdanov in because he wished to "affirm" that he would tell the truth. It took less time on the last day to swear in a young Negro, probably because it was almost six and everybody wanted to go home.

"You must give a reason why you wish to affirm and not swear," said the Grand Inquisitor.

"Because," came the answer, "there's no sense in swearing to a God who doesn't exist."

The Representative from Mississippi, who had not peeped during the whole investigation, looked electrified. But Fish was master of the situation, as always. That was no reason, he said. The committee couldn't regard that as a reason, could it? No, it couldn't.

It was late, so they helped him out. "You mean you have conscientious scruples?" "Yes." Now, there was a reason.

"Do you swear to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?"

"I'll tell the truth, and nothing but the truth," said the young Negro. "As to the whole truth, that depends upon whether the committee cares to hear it."

In the Driftway

WHEN the Drifter occasionally comes to visit his friends of the Nation staff in their offices on Vesey Street he never fails to pause for a moment in St. Paul's churchyard, upon which the editorial offices front. It is not only that here stands a noble church in which Washington worshiped when he was President and was residing in the then fashionable Wall Street section. It is not merely that here is an oasis in a wilderness of skyscrapers reaching ever nearer to the stars. Nor does the Drifter yield to the conventional thought that paths of financial glory also lead but to the grave. What fascinates him is the historical aspect of it all—that here is a precious bit of New York which still is about as Washington once saw it, about as it was when they brought the ill-fated but gallant General Montgomery's body back from Quebec and placed the memorial to him on the front of the church, past which pace daily at least twice one hundred thousand feet.

* * * * *

THERE is one grave before which the Drifter always stops. The inscription reads thus:

> Here Lyes the Body of > James Davis Late Smith to > the Royal Artillery Who > Departed this Life 17th Day of > December 1769 Aged 39 yrs.
>
> Behold And See As you Pass By
> As You Are Now So Once Was I

Here is a direct link with the days when New York was still a colony; when the red coats, of whom James Davis was one, still paraded the streets in all their carmine glory—even wearing their heavy woolen regimentals with the thermometer at just such heights as it has been standing at of late. The Drifter knows of nothing else in the metropolis that so recalls the days before the upstart George Washington had begun to undermine his King and forget his loyalty to the Crown. But the Drifter trembles every time he reads the headstone of James Davis who was once even as he, for it shows more and more the ravages of time. Many other sandstone headstones in this churchyard are falling apart—a portion of the inscription of that next to the smith of the Royal Artillery has split off. Others are illegible. Why does not the rich Trinity Corporation which only last summer spent many thousands of dollars in restoring exquisitely and authentically the church itself cover these historic monuments by panes of glass? Trinity has its millions; the cost would not exceed one or two hundred dollars. Yet the corporation remains cold and indifferent. Plainly it feels no responsibility for the upkeep of any of the graves. That is for the families of the dead. And when there is no longer a family? Why, then there is nothing to be done. The Drifter is sure that if the money is the stumbling-block it would be forthcoming at once in public gifts; the difficulty lies elsewhere. Perhaps these lines may help to preserve the stone of the red-coated smith. The Drifter's colleagues hope so. Meanwhile it is their jest that as they look and write they see beyond the grave. Sometimes they do—or so thinks

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Judge Manton's Decision

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your editorial Aliens and Citizenship in the issue of July 16 was a great relief because it criticized Judge Manton's illiberal distinction between objectors to war on religious and on purely humane, conscientious grounds. Your analysis of the similarity of the Schwimmer, Macintosh, and Bland cases is the more gratifying because a statement of the Civil Liberties Union on these cases acclaimed Judge Manton's decision.

It seems impossible to hail as liberal a court which grants citizenship to religious objectors to war and at the same time approves of the denial of citizenship to Mme Schwimmer because her objection to bearing arms was not supported by any religious belief. Judge Manton's decision is decidedly illiberal and against the best American standards and ideals, which are based on the broadest tolerance in the matter of religious beliefs or unbeliefs.

New York, July 20 Elizabeth Black

The Philadelphia Record

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A propos of Oswald Garrison Villard's recognition, in his articles on the American press, of the unique service the Philadelphia Record is rendering to liberal causes in the Quaker City, a recent instance seems to me noteworthy. Social experiments in the industrial field have difficulty in making the front page in competition with racier experiments and the lure of sensational crimes. But on July 12 the Record gave front-page double-column space to a news story from Indianapolis with the headlines: Hapgood Workers Given Stock Control of Rich but Bossless Factory; Employees Receive 51 Per Cent of Concern's Holdings with Right to Run Things; Wages Based on Actual Needs. Then in 350 words followed the story of Norman Hapgood, who with his two brothers, William P. and Hutchins, inherited the Columbia Conserve Company in 1917. The company made a contract with its 150 employees as a group by which, out of accumulated profits, stock of the company was bought and given outright to them. Eventually, says the story, they will own all the stock. They have a weekly council at which business plans are adopted. A married worker receives 50 per cent more wages than one single and $2 a week for each child up to three children. There are no bosses, but leaders instead. They now have the power to discharge the president, William P. Hapgood, whose son Powers is not unknown in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts for his insistence upon the rights of the individual.

In recognizing that this was first-page news the Record stamped itself a truly liberal paper, cognizant of the vital economic problems with which our day must grapple. Though not in accord with all its policies, I feel it merits the attention of all forward-looking Pennsylvanians, especially since the Record, independent and wet, has espoused from the first the cause of Gifford Pinchot, Republican and dry, against the extraordinary attempt of the Philadelphia machine to steal from him the Republican nomination for Governor on the mere technicality that perforation of ballots ordered by the court of Luzerne County to prevent fraud are a mutilation of the ballot.

Philadelphia, July 16 Charles T. Sempers

Sacco-Vanzetti Memorials In New York

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Sacco-Vanzetti National League will hold a memorial meeting on Friday evening, August 22, at 8:30, at the Town Hall, 123 West Forty-third Street.

Heywood Broun, W. E. B. Du Bois, editor of the Crisis, and Henry T. Hunt, former mayor of Cincinnati and chairman of the National Mooney-Billings Committee, will speak. A film of the funeral procession will be shown for the first time. Robert Morss Lovett, chairman of the Sacco-Vanzetti National League, will preside.

This is an open meeting and all those who wish to honor and to keep alive the memory of "the good shoemaker and the poor fish-peddler" are invited to attend.

New York, August 9 Margaret Steer Huntley

In Boston

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: On Friday, August 22, at 8:30 p.m. there will be a Sacco-Vanzetti memorial meeting at the Old South Meeting House, Boston. The speakers will be Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Edna St. Vincent Millay, Leonard Abbott, of the staff of the "Encyclopedia of Social Sciences," Alice Stone Blackwell, of Boston, to whom Vanzetti wrote many of his most thoughtful letters while in prison, Paul U. Kellogg, editor of the Survey, chairman, and Gardner Jackson of the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee.

Lewis Mumford and others who see in the tragedy of Sacco and Vanzetti a symbol of high potential value in our thinking and actions in the search for justice have expressed the hope that they also will be able to be present to participate.

The meeting, which will be held within the walls of a building made sacred by the events that took place in it during the American Revolution, has an added significance this year because it comes in the midst of the tercentenary celebration of the founding of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. We invite all persons interested in the course of American justice to attend.

The Memorial Committee arranging the meeting consists of Dr. Alice Hamilton, Professor Samuel Eliot Morison, Mrs. Gertrude L. Winslow, Catharine S. Huntington, Creighton J. Hill, Reuben L. Lurie, Aldino Felicani, and myself.

Boston, August 7 Gardner Jackson

Contributors to This Issue

William Zukerman is a London journalist and manager of the European bureau of a New York Jewish daily.

Emanuel Blum has taught in various modern schools. At present he is a teacher at the Walden School, New York City.

Genevieve Taggard is the author of "The Life and Mind of Emily Dickinson."

Douglas Haskell is associate editor of the Architectural Record.

Books and Films

No More This Home

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

Weep, weep, and fasten the gate.
The moon is a laggard,—the straight
Lines from the stars, the star-threads
Streak the elms, the bowed leaf-heads.

I wait, and my love, he is late,
Broken apart with some grief,
Walking the mold of the leaf,
Treading as the stricken treads.

No more this home . . . nor these doors
To open, to startle, to shut,
Announcing our anger—to cut
The air back and forth like our wills.

Seal the door-sills.

Below the Babbittry

Youth Dares All. Anonymous. The Macaulay Company. $2.

THE anonymous author of "Youth Dares All" has produced the most brilliantly humorous picaresque novel of American life that has come this way in a long time. Its hero, Eddie Law, is at once a living character, finely realized, and a walking embodiment of a huge slice of our national mores. Just as Babbitt is a caricature of the middle-class American, so Eddie Law is a broader caricature of the lower-class American (if such a being may be admitted to exist in this great democracy). Objectively considered, this Eddie Law is a small-town loafer, a sharper, a lecher, a coward, and a cad; but this is (ostensibly) an autobiographical narrative; Eddie Law tells it himself, with his own grandiloquent illiteracy, and to himself he is always the glamorous adventurer, honest, ambitious, industrious, and pure, and his career a romantic saga.

The reader, then, finds himself really following two stories—the first, that of Eddie Law as seen by himself, and the second, that of Eddie Law as he really is. Eddie sings the melody while the (by no means harmonizing) accompaniment is easily heard between the lines. Thus, the two notes—the subjective treble and the simultaneous objective bass—are struck most distinctly and obviously on the first page:

> Not that I was a rogue or anything like that; say—nothing of the kind; I want to spike that rumor here and now; but a fellow like me, always drifting from job to job, is bound to run into mischief sometimes; generally just for the fun of it, as, for instance, only recently, when I was accused of joy-riding in a car intrusted to my care, which I stoutly denied while the other party insisted on it; which merely came down to a matter of opinion before the law.

Or, a little later:

> Then I left him, and I guess he's rotting in jail now if he isn't dead (for Evil never pays). But I managed, before departing, to catch his horse, and I sold it in the village for five dollars.

Here the anonymous author lays his strokes on pretty broadly, but this obviousness at the beginning makes it possible for him to convey his double story with increasing subtlety once the reader knows his Eddie Law. We come in time to guess rather shrewdly when Eddie is merely distorting and when he is resorting to downright fabrication. The narrative is admirably managed and absorbing; it is full of delicious episodes and characters—the bootlegger Bunny Holden, and that travesty on the "unprohibited" woman, Mary Hatteras. But perhaps the major part of the humor springs from the constant contrast between each incident as it appears to Eddie and the reader's perception of what it must really have been. Eddie sees every situation through a thick sentimental haze of self-justification, moral platitudes, stereotyped phrases, advertising cant, and scraps of movie subtitles. His bullet-proof vanity finally turns him into an intolerable hypocrite and prig. And I have a suspicion that he is far more typical of the American hobo (though he never once thinks of himself as one) than the knowingly hard-boiled or radical Jim Tullys and Harry Kemps.

We first meet him when he stays one night at the village of Gardiner, and falls in love with the boarding-house keeper's daughter, Elsie Hubbard. He decides that she shall be his "guiding star," so he asks her to wait two years for him to make his mark and return to marry her. He drifts from town to town, job to job, mines, farms, lumber camps, Alaska (maybe), New York, in despair of getting anything suitable to his "character." For, as he reminds the reader constantly, "I couldn't afford to lose weight in manual labor—not while I had brains." He is often reduced, however, to this degradation, as when he works for the Dutch farmer Hammerschlager, seduces his daughter, and is sent to jail, "an everlasting blot on the scales of Blind Justice." But his most glamorous adventures come when he gets into the employ of the gentleman-farmer John Sumner, and becomes the pal of Bunny Holden, "who had sufficient pull and grit to get on in this world without a stroke of work . . . all of which I admired with the deepest respect: he had succeeded, where so many, so many failed." It is in Sumner's library, too, that he is inspired by coming upon the autobiography of Harry Bok, a man who "had been a great comedian in his day and had come to be an important man of affairs in the Republic." This remarkable book made "even the straight roads seem glamorous." Eddie occasionally sins after that, it is true, but after each sin he learns again that "vice never pays, which one can't learn too often."

Finally, after seven years, he achieves a sort of success selling swamp lands, and he is ready to come back (though the reader is unable to see why he couldn't have done so a dozen times before) to his "guiding star," Elsie of Gardiner. Elsie is still waiting for him at her home, and after a few days of making love to her in the woods and fields he is ready to marry her. But to clear her conscience she confesses to her Eddie that she has sinned once or twice in those seven years of waiting; later she confides to him that she will soon be bearing his child:

> Then, suddenly, a light broke on me, and I saw everything clearly: I thought I no longer had a right to trespass on the hospitality of these good people unless I intended to marry the lovely girl who was bearing my child. . . .
>
> Early in the fresh dawn, like the Arab, I stole secretly downstairs and opened the back door—and went outside. And behind me I left nobody surprised, nobody disturbed, nobody pained! nobody even awakened! I alone bore the brunt of it all, as I hurried toward the road out of town, instinctively taking to the road again.

HENRY HAZLITT

A Great American

Eugene V. Debs. By McAlister Coleman. Greenberg. $3.50.
That Man Debs and His Life Work. By Floy Ruth Painter, Ph.D. Bloomington: Indiana University. $2.19.

"A MAN unafraid"—it is thus that McAlister Coleman truly represents Eugene V. Debs in this interesting book. It is no "impartial" study, no cool, documented, scientific biography; rather, a sympathetic, enthusiastic account of a great American whose extraordinary courage was the outgrowth of an unfailing humanness. I saw him only once, in Washington early on Christmas morning of 1921, the day after the prison gates of Atlanta had swung open to release him. Characteristically enough, his very first movement was to pat the head of the eleven-year-old boy at my side, in a gesture that brought tears to one's eyes and conveyed to one's heart a swift impression of another who blessed little children. He turned to Mary La Follette with a message of gratitude to the father who had kept faith during the war, and whose task during that time, he said simply, was so much harder than his own because Senator La Follette had to bear amid a storm of obloquy the heavy responsibilities of public office, while he himself had only to stay quietly in jail. By that time the newspapermen were arriving, and his whole attention turned to explaining to them how it happened that the boys got shut up in Atlanta, and what must be done if Atlanta was to help make them better, not worse, men.

It is just this utterly human Debs that McAlister Coleman has pictured in his book, a Debs whose heart was big enough to embrace all men everywhere, a Debs who hated sham and greed and cruelty of every kind, a Debs whose generosity and sympathy for the under-dog were matched only by his courage in fighting every human oppressor. In Mr. Coleman's book we get a vivid picture of the unusual, freethinking Middle Western home into which Debs was born on November 5, 1855; of the boy's early experiences in the Vandalia paintshop at Terre Haute, and in the cab of the freight engine running down to Indianapolis; of his work as a grocery clerk and, for a brief time, as a member of the State legislature; of his early activities in organizing the firemen, his rapid rise in their organization, and his characteristic resignation when he found himself opposed to their conservative policies. There is a swift-moving story of the historic Great Northern strike in which Debs, by sheer power of personality and organizing ability, actually whipped the redoubtable Jim Hill. There is an understanding account of this remarkable agitator's part in the great Chicago railroad strike of 1894, the "Debs rebellion" that made such notable labor history and landed its leader in Woodstock jail. We know today how well justified was the revolt in which Debs was obliged to play the leading role, we know how dangerous is the injunction power that he so calmly defied, we know how completely Governor Altgeld was right and President Cleveland was wrong—but the strike was broken.

When Judge Grosscup sent Eugene Debs to Woodstock jail he finished the process of making him a Socialist, for he gave him time to read and think. The latter half of Mr. Coleman's book is taken up with the record of Debs's life and work as a Socialist, in the course of which he carried on four active campaigns as Presidential candidate, in addition to the spectacular race of 1920 from behind the bars in Atlanta. His work is well known by students of radical movements in this country, and Mr. Coleman has told the story with spirit and appreciation. Debs's calm, unterrified opposition to the war and his cheerful acceptance of the penalty of such opposition will forever remain as one of the great features of American participation in that struggle. His was a spirit too noble to be overwhelmed by hatred, too penetrating to be deceived by lies. He was an "agitator" with a great heart—and McAlister Coleman has told his story with unfailing sympathy and appreciation.

Dr. Painter's book is unusually awful, even for a doctor's thesis. It contains a good deal of information about Debs and a bibliography.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

The Rise of Carl Schurz

The Americanization of Carl Schurz. By Chester Verne Easum. University of Chicago Press. $3.50.

MR. EASUM has done a thoughtful and careful study of the career of Carl Schurz from the time of his arrival in the United States until his commissioning as a major general. He has thrown considerable light on the phenomenal rise in Wisconsin of the German-born American who scaled greater heights in our political and military life than any other foreign-born citizen save Alexander Hamilton. Prefacing his study with a concise sketch of Schurz's career in Germany as a student and revolutionist, Mr. Easum has devoted most of his attention to the Carl Schurz of Watertown, Wisconsin, and the amazing speed with which he became a State and national figure—a speed so great that he was nearly elected State Senator more than a year before he could become a naturalized citizen and was barely defeated for the lieutenant-governorship a year later, just before he received his final naturalization papers. Mr. Easum has made free use of the rich Schurz manuscript collections in the Library of Congress and the Wisconsin Historical Society, which have, however, by no means been exhausted. Indeed, Schurz's expressed wish, that his personal family letters be not quoted extensively, is still holding off students from publishing a treasure trove of extraordinarily rich and interesting material—a ban that ought to be lifted now that the General's immediate family is, tragically enough, entirely extinct.

On one point of great interest to the student of the life of Schurz Mr. Easum has unfortunately not been able to find any authentic information, and that is how Schurz lived during the first five years of his stay in this country. He had no means when he arrived here and no knowledge of English. It was some years before he became available as a lecturer. Yet though he had only been a poorly paid teacher of languages in England during his brief stay in that country, he was able to marry and to leave. He brought his wife over to America with him, spent at least three years in traveling around the country and studying it, bought a farm, moved his father and mother and sisters here, and made several trips to Europe. It is true that his wife belonged to a family of considerable means. It is also possible that he came here as a paid agent of the German revolutionary group which had various impossible aims in America, such as the founding of an entirely German state, the influencing of the United States government to act in some way against the German despotism of that day, and similarly fantastic schemes. Schurz was himself interested in the formation of a secret society (without, however, the usual regalia and absurdities of such an organization) for the purpose of influencing the politicians of Washington, whom he speedily came to know and size up with extraordinary accuracy. Still there is no adequate explanation of where his means came from during the first five years of his life here.

It is altogether an amazing story—the rapidity of the transformation of Schurz, the German revolutionary who did not know exactly what he wanted or whither he was aiming when he arrived here, into one of the most loyal of Americans.

Yet the title of the book is distinctly misleading in a sense. It does not seem to me that the melting-pot deserves credit for the rise of Schurz. He was naturally intended to be an American, and his talents, character, and cast of mind were such that he really needed little or no Americanization, as we generally use that term. Very few men rise to distinction so easily and quickly. Still fewer achieve fame when they are transferred to foreign soil at the age of twenty-three. Less than nine years later Schurz was the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, and ten years from the date of his arrival he was a successful brigadier general of volunteers in the Army of the Potomac. The truth is that he was so endowed by nature that he must have risen to distinction wherever fate might have placed him. It was Lincoln who on hearing him in Springfield, Illinois, where he made first a German speech and immediately thereafter an English one, exclaimed: "You're an awful fellow and I understand your power now." That power made him a great national force and a great American.

The later period of Schurz's life has been pretty well covered; his reminiscences remain still the best source for any study of his career. But Mr. Easum has brought out a good many details of Schurz's work in Watertown, Wisconsin, which are not so well known. It is interesting to note, for instance, how he began at the bottom politically, serving as commissioner of public improvements, notary public—a position of considerably more importance then than now—a member of the common council, alderman, and supervisor. Mr. Easum has also made a most useful study of the relations of the Forty-eighters to the other German immigrants. There was considerable friction between the two groups. The men of the elder immigration often bitterly resented the arrival of the intellectuals, especially as many, like Schurz, became radical on the slavery issue and went into the newfangled Republican Party. All in all this is a useful and well-worth-while study, especially as Mr. Easum has judged Schurz both judicially and critically.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Mr. Dobrée's Criticism

The Lamp and the Lute. By Bonamy Dobrée. Oxford University Press. $2.

BY interest and method Mr. Dobrée belongs to that group of metaphysical critics of which Herbert Read and T. S. Eliot are the most prominent members, but here the association ends. Mr. Dobrée, while endeavoring to denote and consider a writer's theory of life—a purely metaphysical endeavor—refuses to be caught in the marsh of philosophical systems and religio-political dogmas; refuses, in fact, to become a philosopher.

> Because [he writes] a sick man desires health, and sees the necessity for it, it does not follow that he can attain it. Many, myself included, are in the position of the sick man (though not too unhappy about it, and by no means bedridden), and, moreover, are not prepared to pay the price our cure would require.

Applied to literature this statement, so far as "The Lamp and the Lute" is concerned, causes criticism to cease with analysis, to stop before evaluation. The attempt to divorce this method from its background and to use it as an instrument only makes Mr. Dobrée's very indefinite results doubly disappointing.

The essay on Ibsen is the finest study in the book, and ably shows that literary criticism may be written without turning the critic into either a metaphysicist or an impressionist. It is highly discerning, and in its inspection of Ibsen's intuitions and realism it is original. Unfortunately, this originality gradually disappears in the following five essays, until the comments on D. H. Lawrence and T. S. Eliot are nothing but restatements of opinions already familiar to any general reader. The retreat of Mr. Dobrée's originality helps, of course, to stress the contention of both Mr. Read and Mr. Eliot that responsible criticism depends on preestablished values. On the other hand, Mr. Dobrée's success with Ibsen would seem to refute this argument, and to demonstrate that where a critic has some new distinction to offer, estimates or classifications are not necessary.

The chief reason to lament Mr. Dobrée's failure is his lost opportunity to deal convincingly with present-day writers. The metaphysical critics have so conspicuously refused to attend to their contemporaries that to have one of their associates try and fail only adds to the distance between them and what many believe to be the truly representative currents of thought of the time.

FLORENCE CODMAN

The New Architecture

Modern Architecture. By Henry-Russell Hitchcock, Jr. Brewer and Warren. $5.

WHAT century ever produced a worse average of architecture than the nineteenth? And what century could possibly be of greater interest to us in the twentieth? Mr. Hitchcock's book is the first in English to give account, and satisfactory account, of the great romantic confusion which reduced architecture to "the least of the visual arts," and then of the steady upward climb which today brings it "nearer to being the most important."

The story begins with the "ruins" and "fabricks" of the romantics, their literary revivals of the antique, and their almost total loss of craftsmanship and structural engineering (which, after all, had yielded no great innovations for two centuries). It continues through the beginnings of a new rationality (awkwardly termed the "new tradition"), the age of the American Richardson, the Dutch Cuijpers, the Austrian Wagner, when the confusion of antique and remote tongues was smelted together again into something like an architectural language, the various borrowed features being freely applied side by side in modified form, with orderly and craftsman-like effects, on a rational plan. At this period architecture and engineering ran once more hand in hand. The book ends on the "new pioneers" (again an absurd term), with the reintegration strict and fully organized, with engineering (that is, building) and architecture one, a new beginning, the forms deriving from more complicated functions and from the suggestions thrown out by steamers, airplanes, and—also important—the experiments of modern abstract painting.

This is a very rough summary of a far more intricate book. In confining himself strictly to architecture as a "visual art," Mr. Hitchcock performs a needed service for the newest men, in whose psychology, indeed, he himself is soaked. They are not engaged, as is too often charged, in reducing an art to the level of "utilitarian" machinery, but rather of glorifying the "technical" idea, of raising technology, if you please, to an art. The psychological problems involved in designing a "machine for living in" are new, complex, and exciting; and since he is in sympathy Mr. Hitchcock analyzes them acutely.

Nevertheless, the machine "aesthetic" is based on a more-than-visual machine fact. How did the building itself become so nearly mechanical as to crystallize that way? We need a supplementary history which does not take so for granted the sudden, almost overwhelming growth (beginning concurrently with romanticism, about 1750) of engineering, industrialism, and even democracy. Then we might come to different conclusions as to the prospect that the present manner may last a century. It might seem rather to be the aesthetic equivalent of mechanistic physics and philosophy, occurring belatedly owing to the drag between different sciences and arts which Whitehead has pointed out. But even the atom is now considered less a mechanism than the thing a machine is always striving to become—an organism. And in architecture the "organic" ideal has already been finely laid down, in theory and practice, by the American Frank Lloyd Wright, who seems to cause Mr. Hitchcock excessive annoyance and difficulty because he does not fit the "new-tradition" box in which he has been placed. I venture the suggestion that Europe still has much to learn here, and that meanwhile we need not be too hasty about knuckling down.

However, these are things the reader may prefer to decide for himself. The book will give or lead to all the materials. It is encyclopedic, often acute, thorough. It is our first noteworthy volume on contemporary architecture since Mr. Mumford's "Sticks and Stones." The reader will be greatly helped if he will take the author's advice and study the text in conjunction with the proper Propyläen Verlag volumes with their fine collection of plates. DOUGLAS HASKELL

Books in Brief

American Girl. By John R. Tunis. Brewer and Warren. $2.

A vigorous novelistic exposé by a well-known feature sports writer of the shameful professionalism current in amateur tennis circles. "American Girl" is the serio-comic story of Florence Farley, who, beginning as a child prodigy with a "natural stroke," develops into the greatest woman tennis player the world has ever seen—but sacrifices both love and honesty to retain her dubiously triumphant title of world champion. In her climb to fame and glory the redoubtable Florence learns the financial significance of ghost-written articles, cosmetic indorsements, movie contracts, prepaid hotel bills, spurious interviews, and a baccalaureate degree granted in absentia without the irritation of final examinations; in fact, all of the political chicanery that is rapidly making tennis one of America's leading industries. Mr. Tunis describes the inner workings of our tennis tournaments in a series of excellent satiric pictures.

The Autocracy of Mr. Parham. By H. G. Wells. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.

Graced with few of the qualities of the unforgettable Mr. Polly save a sense of continuous bewilderment, Mr. Parham is not content with being "tolerant, broad-minded, and deliberately quite modern." He is also a stubbornly reactionary Anglophile determined to maintain the staid historical forms against the subversive inroads of skepticism, nihilism, and the incoherent enterprise of contemporary society. His most weighty remarks are generally addressed to the mirror. But when he attends a metapsychical seance and becomes imbued with the Master Spirit, the usually meek Mr. Parham begins to put some of his ideas into action, with ruinous results. He plunges humanity into a second world war, he rearranges destiny, he advocates rationality as a universal specific, and he makes valiant efforts to eradicate the malignant innovations of this age of unrest. The book is a feebly farcical political satire. Even the expected Wellsian doses of pleasant erudition, incisive portraiture, occasional brilliancies, and ironic analyses do not rescue it from the shoals of dulness. Protracted, jerky, and premeditatedly clever, "The Autocracy of Mr. Parham" exhumes a cruelly mangled Mr. Polly only to bury him again with indecent haste.

The Metropolis of Tomorrow. By Hugh Ferriss. Ives Washburn. $7.50.

Hugh Ferriss can draw skyscrapers like mountains. He has compiled a book of them called "The Metropolis of Tomorrow." While he has at least learned that between mountains there must be plains, his procedure of pictures first is wrong end to; and the buttery text always becomes vague and evasive at the precise point where the author might be held responsible. The tall building remains a first-rate American invention; for studies of its proper use we need not always go abroad to such as Le Corbusier; but at home instead of Hugh Ferriss one might consult Henry Wright. See for example his exact, humane, and infinitely more imaginative article in the March Architectural Record on The Place of the Apartment in the Modern Community.

Decorative Art, 1930. Edited by C. Geoffrey Holme and S. B. Wainwright. Albert and Charles Boni. $3.

The yearbook of the Studio is still the finest compilation of contemporary applied art. Its volumes are invaluable to the historian. The material is catholic and extensive. The only defect is an introduction in the current volume by Le Corbusier, which is tiresome. He prescribes his pillar system, flat roofs, etc., as nostrums; and in current European building they are becoming silly clichés. Five years ago he seemed to promise to be a great leader; now——.

The Makers of the Unwritten Constitution. By William Bennett Munro. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Professor Munro's book comprises four lectures delivered at Lafayette College last year on the Fred Morgan Kirby Foundation, and a thirty-two-page introduction sketching the growth of the unwritten development of the Constitution. The lectures treat the work of Alexander Hamilton in establishing the economic supremacy of the federal government, of John Marshall in cementing the achievement of nationalism, of Andrew Jackson in democratizing the Constitution, and of Woodrow Wilson in accentuating Presidential leadership. One does not look for novelty or profundity in lectures prepared for popular audiences, but what Professor Munro has to say is, as always, sound, balanced, and well put. The characterization of Wilson as one who "gave new significance to executive leadership, virtually dictated the laws of the land, became the idol of oppressed nationalities everywhere, and showed the world that the President of the United States is 'at liberty to be as big a man as he can'" is not necessarily, of course, unstinted praise.

Fourteen Years of European Investments, 1914-1928. By S. Stern. The Bankers' Publishing Company. $5.

Under the form of an inquiry into the probable fortunes of a hypothetical American who in January, 1914, had invested $25,000 in selected stocks and bonds of thirteen important European countries and an equal total amount in Canadian and United States securities, and who had left the investment untouched irrespective of events until April, 1928, the vice-president of the former Equitable Trust Company of New York has here brought together a vast amount of statistical and other data regarding American foreign trade and the part which American capital plays or may play in the development of foreign countries and in international finance generally. The detailed results of the inquiry will, of course, appeal chiefly to the specialist, but what Mr. Stern has to say about the relation of American foreign loans to foreign debt payments to the United States, the desirability of a reserve in the form of American investments abroad to facilitate the settlement of our own foreign accounts and protect the gold reserve, and the necessity of foreign borrowing to pay debts if merchandise exports cannot be increased has value for the layman as well as for the financier.

Films

Ingredients

EXCITING physical action, suspense and surprise in the plot, and characters that look "different"—these ingredients of a good Hollywood movie are most efficient when they are served together in a well-balanced mixture. Thus the three films under review, "The Dawn Patrol" (Winter Garden), "Manslaughter" (Rivoli), and "Grumpy" (Paramount), would probably be vastly more entertaining if the qualities they severally represent were joined in a single picture. As they are, they provide excellent illustration of the inadequacy of one-sided growth.

"The Dawn Patrol," for instance, is based mainly on the physical thrill of aerial warfare. Although following in the trail of several other pictures, it succeeds in contriving a number of scenes of aerial bombardment and fighting that are undeniably exciting. But it must have been clear to the producers that this was not enough, for a considerable part of the picture is used in building up a situation that is supposed to invest the fighting episodes with dramatic significance. We are introduced to the life of a group of flying officers on a section of the British front where the daily flying operations were inevitably accompanied by the loss of a few men. Resentment against this seemingly deliberate slaughter would flare up now and again, and bitter words would be exchanged between those issuing the orders and those obliged to carry them out. But the war went on, and so did the daily sacrifice of the fliers.

One notices the similarity of the theme to that of "Journey's End," as well as a few resemblances in the minor episodes in the two pictures. The similarity in itself need not be counted as a sin in "The Dawn Patrol"—although the Cockney orderly is becoming something of a bore. A far more important defect is that the film never succeeds in shaping its plot—the little that it has—into anything psychologically convincing. The conflicts among the officers seem to be forced and deliberate; nor is the lack of motivation compensated for by any arresting character portraiture. On the contrary, most of the characters are utterly colorless, as is also the acting, with the notable exception of the minor part of Phipps, which is played by Edmund Breon with great subtlety.

In "Manslaughter" there is little physical action; nor is any attempt made in it to suggest a more profound reading of character than is to be found in the archness of a society girl or the zeal for rectitude of an honest lawyer. On the other hand, although its "dramatic struggle of beauty and wealth against the law" is no more exciting than it reads, it is handled by Mr. George Abbott, who directed the picture, with such suave deftness that one almost accepts the story at its face value. At all events, it has a visual swing about it that makes watching it a pleasure for the eye. The attempt to superimpose sounds and to externalize the auditory sensations of the heroine deserves notice, although, as in "Blackmail," it fails of effect owing to the abrupt change of the style.

Characterization as practically the sole ingredient of the film to the exclusion of physical movement and any serious plot is exemplified by "Grumpy," in which Mr. Cyril Maude recreates for the screen his famous portrait of a freakish old gentleman turned Sherlock Holmes. In spite of its pronounced theatrical quality this is a delightful and highly entertaining performance. But apart from Mr. Maude the picture is rather poor. The developments of its very slight plot are treated with a heavy hand, and the supporting cast is mediocre. But Mr. Maude is real good fun. ALEXANDER BAKSHY

□ SHOPPERS' CORNER □

MARITZA, 172 W. 4th Street,
is having a summer clearance sale, which is very worth while. Very special crocheted coats made of hand woven material $24.50. Hand embroidered dresses, voile—$7.95 up, silk—$16.50 up. Palestinian children's—$3.50. Also hats, and crocheted dresses.

VACATION DISCOUNTS on Remington Portable Typewriters and Waterman Fountain Pens during August only. For other savings on standard advertised merchandise call John 1427, or write: SERVWELL SYSTEM, INC., 35 Maiden Lane, N. Y. C.

GRAPHOLOGY

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS is a practical method for taking personal inventory. No personal bias in graphology. Send handwriting. Character or vocational analysis, $1.00. Miss Florence Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

POSITIONS WANTED

SECRETARY and editorial assistant, free beginning September 8th for long or short temporary position. Well recommended. Box 104, % The Nation.

COLLEGE graduate seeks the impossible—work in which to completely lose himself—in which he can use real initiative and creative ability. No routine. Perfectly unattached. 2 years retail merchandise experience. Box 103, % The Nation.

YOUNG woman, Vassar, A.B., with four years' experience in research, writing, and editing—personnel, economic, historical, and scientific fields—desires position. Spring 0526 or Box 105, % The Nation.

SECRETARY-STENOGRAPHER, expert, newspaper experience, knowledge foreign languages, desires afternoon position. Box 106, % The Nation or phone Rector 2164.

□ EDUCATIONAL □

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN
Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 18th year.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN
GERMAN. Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th year. Also neglected English education.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

THE PHILIPS TUTORING SCHOOL
for boys, offers individual instruction by experienced tutors, for college preparation or for advanced standing in preparatory schools. Makes up deficiencies and lost time due to illness or travel. A very limited number received in ideal home conditions. Ideal home for convalescent boy unable to do full time work. No cases of mental disability received.
Jesse Evans Philips, A.M. West Chester, Pa.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:
Mail your classified ads so they will reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.
THE NATION
20 Vesey St. N. Y.

□ FOR RENT □

HOUSE IN FRANCE

GRASSE, A. M., FRANCE (near). Sept.-June. Attractive heated screened house with good studio, bath, suitable 3 adults, 1 child; garage. $100 month including wages good cook. E. S. C. % Pratt, Bridgewater, Ct.

APARTMENT—FURNISHED OR UNFURNISHED

49TH ST. 10 Mitchell Pl. Apt. 9 D. Architect's studio apartment, 2 rooms, kitchen and bath, 5 closets, woodburning fireplace. Furnished or unfurnished. Long or short lease. Owner will show August 18 and 20, from 3 to 7 P.M.

ROOM—FURNISHED

LARGE attractive room, cheerfully furnished, double or single, adjoining bath, in modern elevator apartment with small family. Private and homelike. Reasonable. 528 W. 111th St. (Apt. 84), Cathedral 2362.

□ FOR SALE □

Acres on lake property
50 miles from City. Choice acres for sale.
Reasonable terms.
Jessor, Walton Lake Camp Corp., Monroe, N. Y.

□ □ TWEEDS □ □

REAL HARRIS TWEED Direct from the Makers. Suit-lengths by Mail. Postage Paid. Sample free on stating shades desired, and if for Gents or Ladies wear. NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland

SUMMER SUMMER

MILFORD

KENT, Connecticut

'The Camp for YOUth!'

JUST BRING A BUNDLE OF SPIRIT!

A beautiful summering place for intelligent young folks and folks who stay young; informal, athletic, carefree; sheltered tent accommodations and log cabins; excellent meals.

"Mickey" Michaels is especially desirous of greeting Nation readers.

Rates Moderate.

Camp 'phone Kent 1-8

In New York : 1440 Broadway

PENnsylvania 7842

SEA GATE RENDEZ-VOUS

Where food is the best

A VACATION is a necessity; a change of surroundings greatly beneficial; wholesome food an elixir. You will enjoy all this at the Sea Gate Rendez-vous, where food is the best, where comfort, coziness and simplicity, aided by the sea air, and the health-giving rays of the sun, combines to restore poise, harmony and well being to the vacationist. Arrangements by week, day, or as long as your vacation lasts Write 8918 Laurel Ave., Sea Gate, N. Y. Harbor or Telephone Mayflower 8655.

CAMP TOPSTONE—For Adults

A Jewish Camp with a fine American spirit

All land and water sports, with free instruction. Splendid social activities. Excellent strictly Kosher meals.

Write for illustrated booklet

SHAPIRO BROS. Branchville, Conn.

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 122-F-3

Most beautiful estate, surrounded by brooks, lakes, woods and flowers. Absolutely private; Boating, Fishing, Tennis and other sports on premises. Golf and Saddle horses nearby. Limited accommodations, select following. Excellent Jewish Cuisine.

1½ hours on Erie ($2.60 round trip) or Route 17

PERMANENT accommodations offered refined persons in English home in lovely country 50 miles from New York. Young society; central heating; 3 baths; water sports near; auction bridge; badminton; commuting possible. $21 weekly, including board. Mrs. Morse, P. O. Box 547, Monroe, N. Y.

HIDDEN IN THE CONNECTICUT HILLS

Swimming Tennis

Boating Handball

Horseback Basketball

165 Acres of Rustic Beauty
Delicious food from our own farm
RATES, AUGUST $28
SEPTEMBER $25
Reservations limited to 65
Bungalows for two, three or more.
Write or Phone Direct

UNCAS LODGE, Uncasville, Conn.

Norwich 1858, Ring 5

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

WARRENSBURG, N. Y.

A Camp for Adults in the Adirondacks

Most modern facilities for comfort and sports including golf

Booklet on request

City phone Lex. 8879

HAMBURGER'S EVERGREEN (Health) FARM

Tel. Farmingdale 40 F 31—
near Asbury Park, Farmingdale, N. J.

VEGETARIAN HOUSE

A farm resort in a delightful rural setting 1¼ hr. from New York. Plenty of ground to play about, sun baths, showers, bathing, games and sport. Natural delicious health foods. Write or telephone for information.

RIVERSIDE INN, Derby Conn.

on Housatonic River, swimming, bathing, boating. Modern improvements, tennis. Vegetarians accommodated. Rates $23 per week. Also furnished bungalows.

Tel. Derby 231-2. P. O. Seymour, Conn.

Surprised and Delighted

"My apartment advertised in THE NATION was rented the day the magazine appeared on the stands. I must tell you that I am surprised and delighted with the response I have had. The number of applicants far outnumbers any response I have had from the daily papers in which I have advertised my apartment, and the people who respond are of the very highest and most responsive type. . . ."

If you have an apartment or house to lease, tell those readers of THE NATION who are house or apartment hunting, what you have to offer.

Rates: $3.08 for one-half inch (30 words) minimum. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Please accompany order with remittance

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., N. Y. Fitz Roy 9074

In the Heart of the Adirondacks

A SUMMER CAMP for Grown-Ups

A camp devoted to assuring its guests a good wholesome vacation. Every known sport; bathing, boating, riding, golf and tennis. Expert Social staff. Dietary laws observed. Rates $35. per week

Write for illustrated booklet C

New York City Office

PIONEER LODGE

145 West 41st St. Tel. WISconsin 8151

FOR YOUR SUMMER VACATION

IN THE CONNECTICUT HILLS

Complete rest and rebuilding, in delightful country. Invigorating outdoor life. Saddle horses. Swimming. Ideal for week-ends. Only 1½ hours from New York.

TOPSTONE FARM

Write: R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn.

Telephone: Ridgefield 548

THE CRYSTAL VILLA

WOODCLIFF LAKE, N. J.

A rare combination of Country Pleasures with City Comforts. All modern improvements. Beautiful surroundings. Altitude 864. Free of Mosquitoes. Excellent Meals. Delightful Bathing and Fishing. 22 Miles from New York City. Very Easy Commutation. Write for Booklet. Telephone Park Ridge 404.

FOR relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship; tennis. Phone to

THE HIL-BERT HOUSE,
Lake Mahopac, N. Y.

HIL FRIEDBERG, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 358

BAILIN'S MAPLEDALE HOTEL

"The Hotel with the Camp Spirit"

Roscoe (Sullivan Co.) N. Y. Tel. Roscoe 3Y2

For the Modern and Moody

Conveniences • River • Sports • Casino • Recreation • Social Activities • Supreme Jewish Cuisine

Special rates for September

City address: 570 7th Av., Suite 1002, N.Y.

Phones: Pennsylvania 1777 I. B. Bailin
Coney Island 1750 Eva Bailin

ABERDEEN INN

West Park on the Hudson, N. Y.

Colonial house—36 acres river front. Lawns, woods, beach; center Catskill and Berkshire motoring. Accessible to West Shore, N. Y. C. via Poughkeepsie, Day Line. For people who want quiet vacation in beautiful place. Rates moderate. Write Manager, Aberdeen Inn, West Park, N. Y.

THE RIEBER COTTAGE

Rooms and Board

166 Beach 123d St., Rockaway Park, L. I. Excellent 2 rooms and bath with private porch or one room and semi-private bath.

Telephone Belle Harbor 0000

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 27, 1930 No. 3399

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 211
EDITORIALS:
The "New Tammany" Again 214
Is It Another War? 215
Tom Thumb Golf 215
The Poor Old Theater 216
COMMUNISM IN CHINA. By Maxwell S. Stewart 217
ORCHARD. By Glenn Ward Dresbach 218
THE PACKERS' PLEA. By Robert V. Begley 219
HOMICIDE ON WHEELS. By Carl Dreher 221
THE PROFITS OF WAR. By Forrest Revere Black 222
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 223
CORRESPONDENCE 224
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 224
BOOKS:
Now Must the Mind Write. By Eda Lou Walton 225
The Classical Canons. By Henry Hazlitt 225
Bloodless Biography. By Eugene Löhrke 226
Mr. Masters on a Spree. By Horace Gregory 226
The New Criminology. By William Seagle 227
Histories of the Jews. By Isidor Schneider 228
Books in Brief 228

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

DROUGHT RELIEF goes on apace, as far at least as organization is concerned. The governors who met in conference with Mr. Hoover have approved an elaborate scheme of State and county committees, with a federal committee to coordinate the work of the government and the States. The Red Cross, in addition to being represented on all of these committees, is to have a committee of its own in every county where its help is needed, and $5,000,000 has been allotted as its preliminary contribution to relief. The railways have been authorized to reduce their rates on food, feed, and live stock, although it does not appear that the government intends to reimburse them for what is virtually an enforced contribution. Further to relieve the unemployment or loss of income due to failure of crops, federal road funds to the amount of $121,875,000 have been apportioned to the States in advance of corresponding appropriations required by law from the States themselves. Mr. Hoover has also announced his intention to get after the food profiteers. Now that rains have fallen in the drought areas, it appears that the extent of the disaster may have been somewhat exaggerated, but the need of relief is still great.

OUR FOREIGN TRADE during July fell to the lowest point in nearly ten years. Exports amounted to only $269,000,000, and imports to $219,000,000, a decline in each case of about 30 per cent from 1929. There was an outflow of $42,500,000 in gold during the month, against an inflow of nearly $35,000,000 in July of last year. The seven months ending with July, however, have seen an increase of nearly $202,000,000 in our gold stock. The finance specialist of the Commerce Department ascribes the present large gold exports to increased American lending abroad. The steadily shrinking totals of foreign trade reflect the world-wide business depression, and are not limited to the United States. In part they are due to the decline of prices, but in part to a fall in the actual volume of goods handled. It is accordingly unfair to attribute the lessening of our trade chiefly to the new tariff, as some of its partisan critics have done; but nothing could illustrate more clearly than these figures the folly of hobbling trade further at a time when everything possible should be done to stimulate business.

SENATOR NORRIS won handsomely in the Nebraska Republican primary, despite the fierce opposition of the power interests and the supporters of President Hoover. He will be opposed in November by the fairly conservative and regular ex-Senator Hitchcock, and the campaign is likely to see much breaking of party lines. There is every reason to expect, however, that when the Muscle Shoals spoilers again rush to the attack in December, not only will they find Horatius Norris standing as usual at the bridge, but they will find him under orders from the people of Nebraska to stand there six years more, if necessary. The Kansas Republicans have nominated Senator Allen, now holding office by appointment, on a platform of Hoover regularity, over the opposition of organized labor, which was against him as the author of the Kansas industrial-court law, and that of the Negroes, who opposed him because of his support of Judge Parker. Negro leaders opposed to Senator Allen express themselves, however, as well satisfied with the results they obtained among the voters of their race.

IT IS A PITY that the unemployment census has been handled in a way to invite destructive criticism of its findings. During past months we have had frequent occasion to criticize the unemployment figures given out by the Department of Labor, and we shared the hope that the census count might throw a clearer light on the situation. Unhappily, the public handling of the results obtained by the Census Bureau, like the earlier outgivings of the Department of Labor, has disclosed a tendency to minimize the facts of unemployment. The latest critic of the census findings is Professor Charles E. Persons, a well-known economist engaged in the unemployment census from November to April, when, as he says, "I quit the service when I found that efforts were being made to reduce the number of unemployed to the number of jobless workers." (The unemployed include not only workers entirely without jobs, but also those who are at present laid off and are expecting reemployment.) Professor Persons holds that the actual number of jobless is nearer 3,000,000 than 2,000,000, the approximate number announced by Secretary Lamont on June 26, and his own guess at the total number unemployed is approximately 5,000,000. (This figure, of course, would include the 3,000,000 jobless.) The unhappy fact is that the Census Bureau has done little to answer satisfactorily the question we are all asking, namely, how many people are out of work. Such an answer we shall not get until we have a nation-wide system of reporting.

AFTER A LONG DELAY, Governor Roosevelt of New York has appointed the commission provided by the legislation of last winter to prepare a plan "for the development and operation of the water-power resources of the State on the St. Lawrence by trustees." The commissioners, it will be recalled, are to follow the plan of public development unless they conclude that it is not feasible or practical, and it is pointed out in the press that three members of the commission, Representative Frederick M. Davenport, Mr. Julius Henry Cohen, and ex-Lieutenant Governor Thomas F. Conway, are already committed in principle to the Smith-Roosevelt plan. Professor Robert M. Haig, of Columbia University, the chairman of the commission, enjoys an enviable reputation as an able and fair-minded student of public affairs, and Mr. Samuel Fuller brings valuable banking experience to the commission, while Mr. Cohen has been one of the chief advisers of Governor Smith and Governor Roosevelt in water-power matters. Altogether, it appears to be a working commission, and friends of public ownership and operation certainly cannot complain that their ideas will not receive friendly consideration.

THE FINING and sentencing to prison for three months of two young women, Ailene Holmes and Mabel Husa, directors of the International Workers' Relief Camp at Van Etten, New York, for "insulting the American flag" is the direct result of the baiting of that camp by members of the American Legion and the Patriotic Order of America. The offense was that when a member of the Legion and Mrs. Daisy Felt of the Patriotic Order offered to present to the camp an American flag, the offer > . . . was spurned and that the defendants had led the seventy children at the International Workers' Relief Camp in cheers against the flag and had hoisted a red flag over the American national emblem when it was raised on a pole across the road from the camp.

This wickedness the defendants denied; their denial availed them not in a community which had been aroused to the point of a mob attack upon the children and their teachers, compelling their defense by the police. This is a genuine triumph for the Fish committee, whose visits to other such camps unquestionably drew public attention to this one. How incredible it all seems! Does any sane and loyal American really believe that our great American flag can be harmed by such acts as those attributed to the Communists—assuming that the charges are true? If we are asked which of the two acts at Van Etten is more dangerous and humiliating, we submit that it is the persecution of the Communists by these self-appointed censors and not the childish bad manners of the Communists.

HAITI ONCE MORE brings disturbing news. The Cabinet of President Roy resigned on August 14 in protest against the proposed appointment of Carl Colvin as director of the Service Technique, announced from Washington by the State Department in July. Feeling in Haiti is very strong against the expensive Service Technique, with its American personnel, and it was the ill-advised action of its former head, Dr. Freeman, it will be recalled, that gave rise to the disorders of last December leading up to the appointment of the Forbes Commission. The Department of State attributes the present crisis to internal Haitian political agitation and bluntly insists on the Colvin appointment, but it is impossible to disguise the seriousness of a situation in which friction between the Haitian government and the Occupation has reached a point causing the resignation of the Cabinet. The appointment of Mr. Dana C. Munro, of the Latin-American division of the State Department, as Minister to Haiti, cannot be said to offer great promise for a more understanding treatment of the questions constantly arising, and the return of General Russell to Haiti in September to supervise the coming election is almost certain to increase anti-American feeling yet farther, while the disbanding of the Forbes Commission, which has been bowed out with thanks, suggests that the Haitians may hope for no further official help from that quarter. The problems of withdrawal following our blundering fifteen-year adventure in Haiti are difficult enough, but why fritter away the good-will evoked by the Forbes Commission?

NO TAX ON FOOD has long been a slogan of British housewives, and as most British women now have a vote they may be expected to resent at the polls any attempt to give the tax-gatherer access to their kitchens. The question is not so easy, however, now that protection sentiment is running strongly among the Conservatives and spreading dissension in the Labor Party, and the Government has lately added a further complication. A recent commercial treaty with Rumania provides for the admission into Rumania of British manufactures of all kinds at the lowest rates of the present or any future tariff, as long as Rumanian raw foodstuffs are admitted into the United Kingdom free of duty. On the other hand, the committee which is arranging the program of the Imperial Conference has before it a proposal, emanating from its economic advisory staff, for a general tariff of 10 per cent on British imports, nominally for "revenue purposes" and for a limited period, with rebates on imports from the dominions. As the Rumanian concession would end if duties were imposed upon food, the treaty and the proposed tariff would seem to be a good deal at odds. The dominions would like to see the food supply of the United Kingdom drawn wholly from the Empire, and the United Kingdom would like to have the dominions buy heavily of British manufactured goods, but Canada and Australia are also bent upon protecting their own manufactures and raw materials, and neither they nor the other dominions are willing to grant free trade in food among themselves.

THE POLITICS OF OIL have long had many and intricate ramifications. The Turks, who for some time have been absorbed with the political and social reorganization of their new state, have lately found themselves obliged to repel a serious inroad of the half-civilized Kurds, and in order to get at the Kurds in the mountainous region which they occupy have threatened, so it is reported, to cross Persian territory whether Persia consents or not. Persia, naturally, is much exercised over this affront to its sovereignty, and there is talk of bringing the matter before the League of Nations, of which body, thanks to the spirit of brotherly love which prevails at Geneva, Turkey is not a member. The Turkish government, on the other hand, has intimated that there is more to the Kurdish affair than appears on the surface, and that a certain European Power which it has not named is back of the outbreak, with the control of Mosul oil as the principal objective. As Great Britain, thanks to the stalwart aid of the League, has the chief grip on the Mosul oil deposits, one cannot help wondering if the Turkish intimation squints in the direction of Downing Street and the British Foreign Office. Turkey, it will be remembered, kicked out of doors the Sèvres treaty which the Allies tried to impose upon it, and refused to have anything to do with the Lausanne treaty until that treaty was framed to suit it. If the Turks really have any documents about Mosul oil they ought to publish them and let the world know whose game the Kurds are playing.

Nationalism under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi in India is not the struggle of a people for liberty and political unity, generally termed nationalism, but a contest between reactionary Hinduism and modern Western ideas as exemplified by British rule.

THUS LORD MESTON, former British representative of India in the Imperial War Cabinet, and from 1912 to 1918 governor of the provinces of Agra and Oudh, speaking before the Institute of Politics at Williamstown. He brushed aside the "mottoes about freedom being the birthright of men" (in the land which counts the Declaration of Independence as the charter of its liberties) and "many of the other passports of ordinary democracy." These he cynically described as "useful texts for fervent oratory to impress an outer world," only to explain that behind it all was "the insurmountable aversion of an ancient theocracy from our modern ideals of liberty and equality." This defense is coupled with regret that Hindu propaganda in the United States should so completely blanket the British presentation of its side of the case. There we must disagree with the noble lord of Dunottar. It is the British propaganda which blinds people here. But it assuredly will not be helped by his avowal that democracy and liberty are words applying only to Anglo-Saxons, nor by his assertion that Gandhi is "the foe of real progress" in India. Meanwhile, Gandhi stands fast. Nothing definite has come of the prison conferences there, and in a remarkable uncensored article, published August 18, Webb Miller, of the United Press, reports that "British trade in India is being slowly strangled to death," and is "suffering progressive paralyzation. Mills are closing, ships are lying idle, large orders are being canceled, huge stocks are encumbering warehouses, profits are evaporating."

THE FAMINE IN CHINA has already killed 5,000,000 people, according to Mr. Grover Clark, former editor of the Peking Leader, and at least another 2,000,000 will be dead before the next crops come in. Yet American business interests have been unwilling to set up a Chinese credit for the purchase of food supplies, and last September the central committee of the American Red Cross decided against entering upon famine relief in China, largely on the grounds that the famine is not a natural calamity but the result of internal political dissensions, and that the existing political disorder renders relief from the outside impracticable. In regard to the first contention, the fact is that for three consecutive seasons very small crops or no crops at all have been harvested in China's vast northwest owing to the scarcity of rainfall. As for the second, the China International Famine Relief Commission stated last November that "in its actual administration of relief the . . . commission has received the cooperation of the Chinese authorities to the fullest extent." Relief will be urgently needed until the fall harvest, and later if the drought should continue. And, for the future, prevention is possible in the shape of projects that would harness the rivers in time of flood and permit irrigation in time of drought. The China International Famine Relief Commission has the plans and personnel for such a program, and past experience indicates that the Chinese would redouble their efforts if the initial funds were provided. Contributions should be sent to: China Famine Relief, 205 East Forty-second St., New York.

JOHN S. SUMNER is making trouble again. This time he has seized upon the republication by Simon and Schuster of Arthur Schnitzler's "Casanova's Homecoming." He has filed a complaint and carried off nearly 500 copies of the book. Now, "Casanova's Homecoming" was published several years ago without any successful interference, a city magistrate having held it to be "a distinct contribution to the literature of the present day." Already it ranks as a classic and it was republished largely because the original edition was exhausted. We cannot imagine a book less open to the usual charges of obscenity than this nor one more calculated to fill the reader with loathing for the life that Casanova led. Even at the moment of his triumph over the woman he persecuted, the author represents Casanova as a base and horrible old man revolting in his personality and his acts. In no other country, we believe, would such a prosecution be permitted, but then in no other country would a society like Mr. Sumner's be given a quasi-official status—or one that appears to officials to smack of authority. That so reputable a firm should be compelled to go to the expense and bother of defending itself against so baseless a charge is the height of injustice. At least the legislature should see to it that whenever one of Mr. Sumner's prosecutions fail, as this one surely will, he and his society could be held for damages.

WHERE, OH WHERE is the sea serpent? All through the hot, dry days of July and August we have looked in vain for his appearance, and have finally been rewarded by nothing better than a giant octopus snatching a bathing slipper off the foot of an American girl swimming alone in the Sea of Marmora, and a 6,000-pound baby finback whale towing a fifty-foot boat about for four hours off Montauk Point. Now a giant Turkish octopus is all right in his way, though we submit that he will find an American girl's bathing slipper a wholly unsatisfactory and inadequate meal, and we have no objection to a three-months-old three-ton baby whale as such; but the two of them together constitute no substitute for the sea serpents that always used to appear off our coasts in the good old summertime. Now that the tariff is out of the way and the drought is relieved, can we not have a commission for the preservation and promotion of sea serpents?

The "New Tammany" Again

NEW YORK has been treated this spring and summer to a series of scandals remarkable only for the fact that those chiefly discredited this time are judicial officials. One magistrate has just been sentenced to seven years in jail for misuse of the mails in a stock swindle. Another, Magistrate Ewald, has barely escaped indictment for a transaction which pointed toward his purchase of his judicial office. Still another has been driven out of public life. Others are suspect. Curiously enough, in the case of Magistrate Ewald, a Tammany district attorney cited the ex-boss of Tammany Hall, Mr. Olvany, and no less a person than Mayor Walker himself for cross-questioning as to whether Mr. Ewald had paid for his office. After putting some questions—not too searching, or too rough or unkind or inquisitive—the district attorney turned the case over to the grand jury, which refused to indict. Public protest, however, against the grand jury's failure to act has now compelled the district attorney to recede and the governor to look into the case.

Now while it may be novel to have a Tammany district attorney cross-examining a Tammany mayor as to whether or not one of his appointees purchased his judicial office, it is not surprising that there has been a suspicion that the charge was true, for this very practice has been common enough in the past. Investigations undertaken by the legislature have again and again revealed this very thing. It was hardly surprising therefore that when it appeared that the wife of the magistrate in question had loaned $10,000 through a Tammany henchman to a Tammany district leader, in order to aid the latter to buy a summer residence, just when the judge became a judge, suspicious and unkind persons of long memories should have recalled the case of one police inspector, long the czar of the "Tenderloin" district in New York, who developed a penchant for buying lots in Japan out of his slender salary. These busybodies remembered, too, that a certain judge, later a well-known ambassador, admitted to an investigating committee that he had put $50,000 into a Tammany campaign fund about the time he got his judgeship; subsequently he put $13,000 into his party's national war chest and drew out the plum of a first-class embassy.

Scandals are endemic in any organization which is held together by the cohesive power of public plunder. It is certainly not without precedent that the versatile mayor of the metropolis has had to summon the heads and chief officials of two of his departments and give them a vigorous berating—a good stage play to put himself in right with the community if it accomplishes nothing else. The truth is, of course, that Tammany is and remains Tammany. All the talk about there being a "new Tammany," purged of its sins by a noble Al Smith, was bosh and nothing else. We said at the time, and we repeat it now, that if there is any difference between the new and the old Tammany it is that the present organization is out for bigger victims and larger spoils. It no longer looks to the prostitute, the petty gambler, and the saloon-keeper for its revenue. It finds easier and better ways. So we have the huge sewer scandals in the Borough of Queens and the amazingly interesting appearance of a simple and modest veterinarian, Dr. W. F. Doyle, whose expert knowledge of animal diseases gave him such great influence over the Board of Standards and Appeals that everyone who wished buildings exempted from the zoning laws or some other burdensome regulation ran at once to the doughty "vet" for aid. Help was never denied—provided the retaining fee was big enough. It usually was. Indeed, on one day alone, witnesses who had through his kind offices been relieved of zoning restrictions or fire orders and obtained garages or filling stations in forbidden territory testified that they had paid him no less than $77,145. For the years 1927, 1928, and 1929 he received considerably more than $364,062 in fees, which is, of course, much more worth while than treating spavins or distemper.

While revelations like these are almost as regular as the movement of the planets, the question again suggests itself as to what New York is going to do about it. The city has made marvelous progress in many ways, such as in the development of its parks and its social services. It is infinitely more farsighted than it used to be; it plans decades ahead for future wants. Still the waste and extravagance, the graft and corruption go on. The city grows more and more beautiful; inwardly its very heart is being corroded, while the taxes wrung from the city's inhabitants are very far indeed from producing a hundred cents of value for the dollar. And still there is no determined effort on the part of the citizenry to bring about a scientific administration of the second-greatest city in the world, an administration free from the everlasting curse of politics. Other cities, like Cincinnati and Cleveland, may have their city managers; the former has just done itself the honor to call Dr. Clarence A. Dykstra from Los Angeles to direct the affairs of that city with a completely free hand. But no one in New York advocates a similar development—not the Bar Association, nor the Chamber of Commerce, nor the Board of Trade, nor the Merchants' Association.

We are aware, of course, that there will be those to say that any such change would carry with it the terrible admission that democracy is a failure. Yet Cincinnati, for example, still has a mayor who presides over the common council and duly receives the suffrages of his fellow-citizens. The point, after all, is that city administration has reached such complexity and, as in the case of New York, such vastness that it should always be the business of trained experts. At the Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia last week Mr. Will Durant brought up anew the suggestion that public officials should attend schools of administration before becoming eligible for office. That may or may not be a practical suggestion. Certainly the hour more than ever calls for the establishment of the principle that civic administration should be as much a career in the United States as it is, for example, in Germany. We cannot despair of New York or any other American city when so many municipalities have turned to the city manager, and with success. We hope that despite corrupt politicians and business men the largest cities will follow suit.

Is It Another War?

NO intelligent person has a right to feel surprised at the prediction made the other day by an English speaker at the Williamstown Institute of Politics that another big war is to be looked for between 1935 and 1940. Ever since the Allies forced upon Germany and the other defeated Powers the hateful peace terms of 1919, it has been clear to everybody who cared to see that unless the wrongs then inflicted were redressed and the forces of vengeance which the treaties let loose and magnified were destroyed, it was only a question of time when the world would again be at war. Professor C. Delisle Burns may or may not be right in indicating a date; the precise date does not matter. The important thing is to realize that another war is preparing, and that nothing short of herculean effort by the friends of peace can prevent its arrival.

What, in substance, are the conditions that are breeding war? The essence of the political situation in Europe today is the existence, as the direct result of the peace treaties, of territorial and political arrangements which can be maintained only by force. The most obvious evidences of this fact are the offensive and defensive alliances which France has industriously built up with the new states of Eastern Europe, and the Little Entente which certain of those states have formed among themselves. Only by standing together can France and the succession states hope to retain the political control over Germany and Austria which they wrested from the Peace Conference. How unnatural is their position and how great their fear that they may lose it appear clearly enough in the extreme irritation occasioned in France by the recent intimation by Italy and Germany that the peace treaties must be revised, and the heated resentment of France and Poland over some indiscreet remarks of a German minister, Herr Treviranus.

Hence the extraordinary spectacle of loud or fervent professions of peace balanced by systematic preparations for war. In spite of the League of Nations, in spite of Locarno and the Paris anti-war pact, the nations that fought Germany in 1914-18, or that profited by the defeat of Germany and Austria in those years, are getting ready to fight again. Armies and navies, air forces, land and seacoast defenses, chemical warfare, the organization of industry for the production of war materials, the formulation of plans of campaign—all these familiar incidents of "preparedness" are being more sedulously attended to today than at any time since the World War armies were demobilized, especially in the United States. It is idle to protest that this intense activity and huge financial outlay are designed only to meet the needs of national or international police or the aggression of some nation that may lose its head and run amuck. What is going on is deliberate preparation for war, and for a war whose justification will be found in the necessity of maintaining by force a treaty arrangement which could not otherwise last a year.

What, if anything, can be done to fend off the catastrophe? There is little to be hoped for in declarations of good intentions. No more solemn renunciation of war has been or can be made than that contained in the Kellogg-Briand anti-war pact, yet that pact is being openly flouted by every important nation that subscribed to it. Nothing is to be gained by affecting to see a dawning millennium in the conclusion of treaties whose underlying purpose, once they are scrutinized, is only to make an unholy peace more secure. Of all the agencies ever set up for the cultivation of international good-will the League of Nations has proved itself one of the feeblest, and the World Court can only sanctify what the Paris negotiators decreed.

The possibility of averting another war lies in other directions. Much may be done by unsparing exposure of the forces, especially the political forces, that are working for war. A generation ago the ambitions of imperial Germany were the greatest single menace to world peace. Today that role is played by France and its allies, and by Italy with its plans for combating France in Eastern Europe. There must be unyielding resistance to every legislative or executive action that looks toward an increase of armaments or industrial organization for war. There must be insistence, wherever and whenever a plea for justice can be heard, that the peace treaties shall, as soon as possible, be revised. Not all the wrongs of the peace can now be righted, but many of them can, and until they are the world will try in vain to build a stable peace on injustice or to make vengeance and plunder, if they are well stuck to, comport with international fellowship. It will be no light task to accomplish any of these things; nothing but concerted effort can make an effective impression upon any of them; but unless they are accomplished we cannot hope to escape another war.

Tom Thumb Golf

THE rise of Tom Thumb golf, the latest device for taking the American mind off its troubles, took place imperceptibly and with great rapidity. It originated, no doubt, in the country club, where members from time immemorial have practiced their drives or their putting in that long pre-dinner hour when the sun is not quite gone but is too low to permit of an eighteen-hole or even a nine-hole round. As Tom Thumb golf, the game is said to have started in Los Angeles, where it immediately and inevitably contracted elephantiasis americana. Reports have it that there are now nearly a thousand miniature courses in operation or under construction in and about Los Angeles—though, incidentally, it should be remembered that the vacant lots of Los Angeles may lie anywhere between San Francisco on the north and San Diego on the south, the realtors of Los Angeles being men of vision if nothing else.

From Los Angeles miniature golf jumped to Florida, and came north this spring with the polo ponies and other regalia of fashion. But it has long since spread down to the lower regions of society, and the golf ball, formerly protected from hoi polloi by tight wrappings of exclusive country clubs and expensive paraphernalia, hobnobs familiarly with green-and-white sport shoes from Fourteenth Street as with the highest-priced golf leathers from Oxford Street.

In New York, where vacant lots are scarce, miniature golf has gone indoors and it is rumored that a movie theater is shortly to be transformed into a course. It is further reported that the little game has already been groomed into a big racket by certain enterprising elements. Just what form of protection a racketeer could sell to a Tom Thumb proprietor is hard to imagine, though with time and trouble one might put dynamite into the golf balls. In Denver and in one of the New Jersey towns multiplication of Tom Thumb courses has been somewhat slowed up by the infliction of a yearly license fee of $50. In another Jersey town a minister attempted to prevent by law the laying out of a course near his church, pleading that he did not wish profanity, which he considered as much a part of the game as the putter, within hearing of his pulpit. Whether he succeeded we have not yet heard. We suspect that he failed.

There are others who view with alarm the spread of miniature golf. The devotees of baseball see in it another threat to the popularity of what was once the national sport. They say that the small-town American boy, the raw material from which big-league stars are fashioned, is no longer catching flies and breaking the neighbors' windows; that what corner lots have not been given over to bunkers and artificial-grass production boast no third base, while tall weeds grow where once the outfield stood. The boys are caddying on the local links and picking up the virus of golf. This miniature epidemic will finish baseball and establish golf as the new national sport.

Be that as it may, we suspect that spectator attendance at the country's ball parks has fallen off this summer in favor of the Tom Thumb course around the corner. For there one may not only be a fence watcher for nothing and without blame, but may even play oneself at not much expense. Besides, the sport goes on from early morning until late at night. And when the pseudo-Klieg lights are playing full upon the humble householder from Hackensack, he may not only experience that comfortable country-club feeling superinduced by drooping plus fours and prehistoric posture; he may also be able to capture the illusion that he is John Barrymore at work.

One school of thought calls the miniature game a fad; still another holds that it is a step back toward Victorianism and croquet, both of which have already been taken into the side yard by some of the intelligentsia. If this is true, may we look forward to that long-wished-for depopulation of the city, not for the reason that one must cultivate one's garden, but because one must have one's nine holes before breakfast?

The reasons projected for the rise of Tom Thumb golf are many and varied. The search for superiority is one. Golf is a gentleman's game—and who does not crave at least the accouterments of gentlemanliness? But golf links require many acres of rolling turf, and rolling turf is very scarce and beyond hope expensive. Aside from the expense of country-club dues there is the matter of the size of the American city. In Westchester County, for instance, there are fifty-eight private and public golf courses. But in the metropolitan area there are almost nine and a half million people.

Whatever the reason, the little golf links are with us, heart-shaped numbers, hazardous papier mache rocks, composition grass, and all. Whether they will constitute only a temporary form of farm relief or a permanent addition to our world of sport remains to be seen. In conclusion we pass on the tale of a traveler lately returned from Long Island who says that he saw a Tom Thumb "gardener" with real hose and real water sprinkling the false grass!

The Poor Old Theater

THE talkies and the stage are now so nearly alike in their requirements that actors and actresses move rapidly in both directions. Former screen favorites planning to act on the stage this fall are Mary Pickford, Colleen Moore, Lya de Putti, Vilma Banky, and Rod La Rocque. As salaries in the talkies are so much higher, it is safe to assume that most of those returning to the legitimate drama have been obliged to take the step because of waning screen popularity. A few are foreign actors and actresses imported during the era of the silent pictures, and now suddenly obliged to try to cure themselves of their foreign accent.

Perhaps this emphasizes the element of truth in George Bernard Shaw's recent lament that "the poor old theater is done for" and may survive only "as a place where people are taught to act." That the poor old theater is completely done for we cannot believe; the reports of its death have been exaggerated too often. But it is at least clear by now that the threat of the talkies is both a real and a growing one. A year or more ago those critics who maintained that the talking pictures were even more puerile on the average than their silent predecessors could show a good deal of plausible evidence to support their contention, but since that time there has been remarkable improvement both in technical resources and in the use of those resources by directors. It is true that the stage still has advantages (that of the direct contact of the actor with his audience is one which the talkies will never capture), but the talkies, on their side, already have great technical superiorities over the stage. They have, to begin with, nearly every advantage the silent pictures had—of unlimited outdoor action, real galloping horses, speeding locomotives, automobiles, airplanes, ships, mob and battle scenes, natural scenery instantaneously shiftable, unusual "angles," enlargement and selection of physical detail—plus not only the voice and natural sounds as on the stage, but the free manipulation of sounds—to portray, for example, the mental state of a character. As the public can see the talkies for approximately one-fifth of what it pays for orchestra seats on Broadway, the future of the ordinary commercial theater does not seem particularly bright.

Two factors, it is true, seriously limit the competition of the talkies with the stage, as they limited that of the silent screen. The first of these is the commercial need to reach the lowest common intellectual denominator of a great mass audience; the second is a drastic and stupid censorship. Yet the recent appearance of "All Quiet," "Journey's End," "The Love Parade," "The Man from Blankley's," and "Holiday" shows that it is possible for intelligent or sophisticated pictures to emerge even under these conditions. And the intellectual level of the average stage play, it should not be forgotten, is not distressingly high. If the legitimate stage is to survive (as we think it will), it will have to appeal to a more intelligent audience than the talkies and it will have to take much greater commercial risks. In brief, it will have to become "experimental," to bear much the same relation to the talkies as such an institution as the Theater Guild was originally intended to bear to the ordinary commercial theater on Broadway.

Communism in China

By MAXWELL S. STEWART

Shanghai, July 15

THERE is now in China, as the outside world knows, a widespread, well-organized revolt against the military dictatorship of Chiang Kai-shek. This is being conducted under the combined leadership of General Yen Hsi-shan, who has been for eighteen years governor of the "model province" of Shansi; Marshal Feng Yu-hsiang, the so-called Christian general; and General Chang Fa-kwei, who is commander of the famous "iron army" and who is himself allied with the "Kwangsi clique" who have been trying desperately to gain control of Canton during the past year.

But in the midst of the intrigue and struggle between rival military cliques there has been under way among the people a far more significant movement, which has virtually escaped the attention of writers both here and abroad. Communism, which was apparently dealt its deathblow three years ago, has reappeared greatly strengthened by the internal discord of the war lords, and today no less than one-twentieth of the people of China rule themselves through local organizations resembling soviets. This revolution has consisted primarily of local peasant revolts in isolated sections of the country, but today there is a strong red army, which is said to number 100,000 men, well intrenched throughout the regions of the middle Yangtze in the very heart of China. This new movement, unlike the revolution of 1927, appears to be indigenous in character, for although the tactics are much the same as those used in the Russian Revolution, there has been apparently no active Russian aid in the present effort. The absence of Russian aid is to be ascribed probably not to lack of interest but to the fact that during the recent Sino-Soviet difficulties all Russian citizens were either withdrawn from the country or requested to leave. It may be that the forced withdrawal of the Soviet advisers has done more than anything else to strengthen the movement, for the Chinese are notably suspicious of foreigners in politics.

These peasant revolts are by no means a new phenomenon in China. It has been said that every revolution in China's three thousand years has been an agrarian revolution. The peasants were the backbone of the Nationalist upheaval in 1927, and it was only after they had been disarmed and scattered that Chiang Kai-shek was able to stage the coup d'etat by which he wrested control of the central government from the civilian groups which were in power at Hankow. Later in 1927 a number of violent agrarian outbreaks, which were put down with great bloodshed, occurred throughout South China. However, in isolated cases the revolutionists were able to organize, even at that time, relatively stable local soviets, which in some few cases have persisted down to the present time. These peasant revolts have been breaking out with increasing frequency throughout the country. Gradually the isolated sections in which they have occurred, particularly in South and Central China, have been brought under a semblance of centralized control, until today a large part of eight provinces has fallen under soviet rule.

The Chinese farmer is probably the most law-abiding man on earth, but he has definitely fixed ideas as to how much taxation and how much looting he ought to put up with before banding together with his fellows against his enemies. The Communists have been quick to utilize the seething discontent of the peasants and have transformed disorganized upheavals into organized revolts of a definitely revolutionary character.

So well, indeed, has the organization progressed that the first All-China Soviet Congress was held in Shanghai on May 1, 1930. It was attended by fifty-four delegates from the soviet districts and from Communist organizations throughout the country. There were eleven representatives from district soviets which are actively functioning in sections of Kwangsi, Kwantung, West Fukien, East Hupeh, West Hupeh, North Fukien, Southwest Kiangsi, South Anwei, also in a district where the three provinces of Hunan, Hupeh, and Kiangsi join, and a district along the border of Hupeh and Honan. There were likewise seven representatives from districts which were planning to rise in the provinces of Kiangsu, Anwei, Honan, Chekiang, and Kiangsi. There were eighteen representatives from the more militant trade unions, and seven from the red army—one delegate from each of seven of the nine army corps. The others were divided among such revolutionary organizations as the League of Communist Youth, the Chinese League of Left-Wing Writers, and the Anti-Imperialist League. It is significant that one of the delegates was only sixteen years of age; the oldest one was only forty-eight.

The congress discussed such practical issues as what should be the task of these soviet districts in view of the present political situation in China. It passed a temporary land law. An ad interim code of labor laws was drawn up and regulations were passed for the guidance of all soviet organizations. The task and tactics of the red army were formally debated and decided upon. A political platform was drawn up embodying ten points, including the following: overthrow of imperialism and the socialization of all banks, factories, and railways; destruction of militarism in China; seizure of land from the landlords without compensation and the introduction of collective farming; abolition of all taxation except a single tax on land; freedom of press and speech and the full right of assembly; the right of self-determination for the minor nationalities included within the Republic of China.

The strength of the Communist movement does not lie entirely with the peasants. There is the red army referred to above, numbering approximately 100,000 men, which is reputed to be a reasonably effective body. There are said to be 5,000,000 workers in the red trade unions which are dominated by Communist leadership. In the city of Shanghai alone I could name no less than nineteen proletarian magazines and periodicals which are published regularly by left-wing organizations.

The strength of the Communists in the cities has been greatly enhanced by the fact that the price of rice has risen to the unheard of figure of $23 a picul—almost twice the normal price. Wages have not gone up proportionately. Moreover, China has probably been hit harder by the phenomenal fall in the value of the silver dollar than she has by all the civil wars and revolutions she has passed through. Within the short period of one year the silver dollar, the national currency of China, has depreciated to little more than half its former value in terms of the currencies on a gold basis. In addition to the suffering resulting from high prices and depreciation of the currency, taxes have been further increased and customs rates have been raised in order to pay for the civil warfare.

As a result of the civil strife the government has seemed to lose its grip, and although formerly thousands were executed upon even the slightest suspicion of Communist sympathies, today the radicals seem to be working more or less openly with impunity. Just today the Anti-Imperialist League, a strong proletarian organization, held a big demonstration on Nanking Road, Shanghai, on the very site of the famous massacre of May 30, 1925. The writer happened to be on the street when two large groups of students, both girls and boys, suddenly appeared shouting slogans at the top of their voices and distributing handbills. No sooner had they put in their appearance than they were charged by a group of armed policemen twice their number, who dispersed them after arresting several of the participants. For a few minutes, however, it looked almost like a repetition of the incident of five years ago, on which occasion the police fired into the mob and killed several students, thereby igniting the Nationalist revolution.

According to the press reports, agitators staged simultaneous demonstrations in two other places on Nanking Road, and altogether twenty-four of them were arrested by the police, while several hundred participated in the demonstration. Indirectly this affair is the outgrowth of the profound labor unrest which has gripped Shanghai as the result of the increasing cost of living coupled with the fact that a number of the largest cotton mills have been compelled to work on a half-time basis only. However, it is significant that today's agitation was directed chiefly against the rival Chinese war lords rather than against the foreign mill-owners. The following is a free translation of a typical example of the leaflets distributed:

> Workers, strike! Peasants, rise in revolt! Soldiers, mutiny! Down with the Militarists! Oppose the second World War! Down with the imperialistic Kuomintang! Down with the northern "Reorganizationists!" Support Soviet Russia!

Another reads:

> Revolt! Organize Soviets! Take over the land from the landlords! Organize a "Ready-to-Die" Corps among the youth! Oppose rent and loans! Distribute food equally! Join the Red Army!

The Communist movement which I have described has as yet enlisted the support of only a small minority of the Chinese people—it could be suppressed in a very brief time if the various militarists would stop quarreling among themselves long enough to attend to the matter. And yet there seems to be no other promise of unity. There has been a progressive disintegration in China ever since the 1927 revolution. The Kuomintang, the Nationalist Party, seems to have very little power today, and the left wing of that party under the revolutionary leader Wang Ching-wei has failed to find any support which would enable it to return to power. The civilian leaders of the Nationalist revolution, Eugene Chen, Madame Sun Yat-sen, and Wang Ching-wei, are not only out of power, but are scattered over the earth.

Paradoxically enough, the gloom which has hung over the country since the failure of the 1927 revolution seems to be lifting now, and there is a widespread feeling that out of the chaos there will yet come some sort of stability. Throughout the twenty years of anarchy which have followed the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty there has been a steady change in the social and economic basis of Chinese society. A modernization of outlook and habits has taken place among millions in the great cities and points of cultural contact. This process of growth and development has been hindered but not greatly retarded by political chaos, and there is every reason for feeling that sooner or later political stability also will be achieved. How or when that will come it is impossible to say, but in view of the lack of alternatives, the significance of the gradually spreading soviet movement must not be overlooked. The very fact that twenty million peasants have held the rule in their own hands, even temporarily, is bound to influence greatly the future development of China—whether for better or for worse only time can tell.

Much will depend upon the attitude of the foreign Powers. One hears the not unlikely rumor that the Powers are not unfavorable to Nanking's suggestion of joint military action against the soviet armies. In fact, the French have already cooperated with the Chinese government in suppressing an agrarian outbreak near the Indo-China border. American and British gunboats have exchanged fire with the red armies on the upper Yangtze 700 miles in the interior of China. But the outcome of such an intervention is questionable. There is no doubt that in a straight military engagement the Powers could crush any army the Communists could muster, but it is very unlikely that the reds would allow themselves to be brought into an open encounter. Instead, their tactics to date have been those of guerilla warfare coupled with the judicious use of the strike and boycott. Moreover, the writer is inclined to believe that even though the Powers were invited by Nanking, intervention would be followed by such intense anti-foreign feeling that the results might be directly opposite to those desired.

Orchard

By GLENN WARD DRESBACH

Earth could not hold all richness that was there—
Although the cheeks of hiding apples flushed
Deep down in billowed grasses. On the air
The warm spiced breath of fruit and juices crushed
From mint by secret weight had joined the gold
Late sunlight dusted through the glow of trees . . .
His baskets were so full some apples rolled
Back to the taverns of convivial bees.

The drifting milkweed floss had tried to stay
A little longer—on the thorns it clung.
And cobwebs brushed him as he turned away
To jestful smoke of apple wood that hung
Above his chimney and the crimson leaves
That fell where swallows darted from his eaves.

The Packers' Plea

By ROBERT V. BEGLEY

THE petitions of Swift and Company and Armour and Company which are now pending in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, asking for modification of a decree which they consented to in 1920 are a matter of large public importance. This decree virtually required the packers to confine their activities to the meat-packing business; it required them to dispose of their interests in the public stockyards, stockyards terminal railways, and newspapers, and to keep out of the retail meat and grocery fields.

In the ten years which have elapsed since the decree was filed, practically nothing has been done toward carrying out its provisions. During the first four years of its existence some efforts were made in that direction. In 1924 the packers instituted proceedings to have the decree vacated. This litigation was ended in March, 1928, when the Supreme Court of the United States held the decree to be in all respects valid and binding.

The petitions for modification emphasize the fact that the packers are enjoined from engaging in a perfectly legitimate business and are thus deprived of rights which all other citizens possess. It is inferred that this is discrimination. As an inducement for removing the restrictions, it is suggested that no abuse can result from the packers' ownership of the stockyards and stockyards terminal railways because of the "complete and efficacious supervision and control" now exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture under the Packers and Stockyards Act. It is also asserted that the packers cannot survive, and that posterity will be deprived of the many delectable delicacies they dispense, unless they are permitted to compete with the chain stores in the retail meat and grocery fields. As a final inducement, it is urged that both producers and consumers will benefit if the packers are permitted to operate retail meat markets.

The present proceeding is decidedly anomalous. It presents a curious blending of public and private interest. Although it is addressed to the judicial power, there is nothing to litigate and nothing to adjudicate. In so far as private-property rights of the petitioners are involved, it might be regarded as an appeal for executive clemency. To the extent that public interests are concerned, it might be regarded as an appeal for judicial legislation. Unless there has been a signal miscarriage of justice the protection of the public interests should be the paramount consideration.

In fairness to the packers, it cannot be said that they are in the position of the ordinary criminal who has entered a plea of guilty. A consent decree is analogous to a plea of guilty in a criminal proceeding, but applied to the packers the analogy is rather severe. They were charged with the offense of conspiring to monopolize a large portion of the food supplies of the nation, and under the federal statutes this is merely a misdemeanor. Furthermore, it was expressly stipulated that the packers were inspired to consent to the decree because of a desire to avoid any appearance of antagonism to the government and that their consent was not to be regarded as an admission of guilt. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the glamor of patriotism which enveloped the original proceeding was thoroughly dissipated by the packers' subsequent openly antagonistic attitude toward the government. And it must also be remembered that the decree operated to forestall impending legislation and that it was not nearly so drastic as the Federal Trade Commission recommended.

The Packers and Stockyards Act which was enacted in 1921 was originally regarded as a very fine piece of legislation. It survived the usual test of constitutionality, although the strain on the commerce clause of the Constitution was rather severe. Shortly after its enactment its limitations were disclosed in an opinion by Attorney General Daugherty holding that it did not embrace private stockyards. Since that time the number of hogs purchased by the packers in private yards has increased tremendously, and Congress, although memorialized by the legislatures of at least four States, has not extended the act to include these private stockyards.

The act operated to transfer the packers from the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission to that of the Secretary of Agriculture. As the commission had been accused of possessing pink tendencies, the packers undoubtedly found the change a welcome one. The act in no way affected the packers' ownership of the principal stockyards. This ownership, the Federal Trade Commission held, was not only a source of great profit but also afforded a fundamental business advantage. At a later date the commission expressed the opinion that no matter how efficiently the law might be enforced, uniformity of opportunity could not be attained so long as the most powerful and dominating of the various competitors retained possession. Subsequent to the enactment of the law the Minnesota Supreme Court held that the stockyards owners had a discretion of management in the control of the yards not lightly to be interfered with by the judiciary. The federal Circuit Court of Appeals held that the Secretary of Agriculture is not empowered by the act to examine and copy a packer's books and records. Subject to these limitations, the law undoubtedly provides some measure of control. Whether it may properly be regarded as "complete and efficacious" is at least debatable.

The packers have appended to their petitions the resolutions of twenty-seven farm organizations favoring modification of the decree. It must be assumed that these organizations concur in the packers' claim that the control exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture is complete and efficacious. Apparently they have also been convinced that entry of the packers into the retail fields will mean higher prices for their live stock. Whether they really believe that it will mean lower prices to the consumer is problematical. For the interests of the army of retailers whom Swift and Armour propose to force out of business the farmers seem to have no concern.

The attitude of the farmers is surprising. The consent decree offered them an opportunity far surpassing the benefits of the Packers and Stockyards Act. It offered them an opportunity to acquire the stockyards. Controlling interests might have been purchased from owners who were forced to sell, who had no substantial investment involved, and who had voluntarily depreciated the value of the properties by impairing business conditions therein. Acquisition of the yards by the farmers would have been directly in line with the program of the Farmers' Union, which asserts that the farmers can have no voice in fixing the prices of their products until they control the marketing instrumentalities. The organizations which have rallied to the support of the packers apparently prefer to rely upon a vague promise of benefits to be effected by exterminating the present retailers, which benefits are to be shared, presumably, in some measure with the consumers.

It is alleged in the petitions that the great development of the chain stores in recent years has placed the packers in a serious position. The trouble seems to lie in the fact that the chain stores are sufficiently powerful to have a voice in fixing the prices they will pay for the packers' products. In fact, this is expressly admitted. The Armour petition states with reference to the Kroger Company:

> Such concern is intrenched in a position where within the next few years it may very easily eliminate a great number of competitor retail meat markets which are the customers of these defendants, and at the same time be in a position to capitalize their large purchasing power and dictate as to the prices which they will pay for the defendants' products.

Obviously, the packers wish to avoid the unhappy plight of the farmers who must sell their live stock to purchasers who can and do dictate prices.

It is difficult to credit the assertions that Armour and Swift cannot survive unless permitted to enter the retail fields. Wilson and Company and the Cudahy Packing Company are two former members of the Big Five who are subject to the decree but are not seeking modification. It would seem that if Swift and Armour are as badly situated as they claim to be, the two smaller packers must be in a much worse situation. It appears on the contrary, however, that neither Cudahy nor Wilson is concerned about the future. Both of these firms definitely opposed previous proposals for modification and neither of them is party to the present proceedings. Thomas Creigh, general attorney for the Cudahy Company, is quoted as saying that reinstatement of the decree will have no appreciable effect upon the business or assets of his company.

Neither do the affairs of Swift and Armour appear to be in a serious condition. It appears that Swift and Company earned $8.72 per share for the year ended November 2, 1929, and $9.88 per share for the fiscal year ended November 3, 1928. It is true, however, that Mr. Swift was not satisfied. He said: "We are not going to be satisfied in the future with similar financial returns. We shall not be satisfied unless we earn a substantial margin over our dividends of $8 per share annually." The stockholders of Swift and Company, at the annual meeting on January 9, 1930, voted to split up the capital stock of the company from 1,500,000 shares at $100 par into 6,000,000 shares at $25 par. The new shares have a book value of $37.50. This change was made so that a wider distribution of the shares might be attained. Presumably the new stockholders would look with favor upon modification of the decree.

President White, head of Armour and Company, has been publicly quoted in the Boston News Bureau as saying: "Company has attained an enviable position as regards assets, liabilities, and working capital." The Wall Street Journal within the year has announced that the Pittsburgh Provision and Packing Company at Hirr's Island, the largest independent meat-packing plant in western Pennsylvania, has been acquired by Armour and Company.

Assuming there is no immediate danger of the Big Two passing from the business world, the public may safely consider the other aspects of the case. There is the fate of the present retailers to be decided. And, infinitely more important, there is the fate of the consumers if the packers are permitted to engage in a struggle for supremacy with the chain stores—a contest which will inevitably result in a compromise.

According to the Swift petition, the chain stores now do in excess of 35 per cent of all retail grocery business for the entire country and 19 per cent of the retail meat business. If these figures are correct, it follows that the great bulk of the business is still in the hands of independent merchants. These are the men who marketed Swift and Armour products in the past and who made it possible for the packers to acquire wealth and power. As a class they are honest, respectable, law-abiding citizens, influential leaders in their own communities, and they typify the spirit of rugged individualism eulogized by President Hoover.

It seems they have outlived their usefulness. "The individual retailer is passing," says Armour. "The chain store," says Swift, "is now but an infant in swaddling clothes and will in the near future acquire control of 90 per cent or even all of the retail business of the country." The advent of Swift and Armour into the retail field would, of course, hasten the end of the individual retailer. Apparently, in the estimation of the packers and the farmers, this would be of no consequence.

If the future of the two big packers were the only question presented, the problem would not be simple. With the fate of thousands of individual merchants also involved, it becomes increasingly difficult. When it is based upon the assumption that the food supplies of the nation must inevitably be concentrated in the hands of a few large interests, the problem becomes tremendous.

The responsibility appears to rest upon the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. These men are asked, in effect, to legislate. To decree that the packers should for economic reasons be relieved of penalties authorized by the law of the land, and to the imposition of which they consented, is to legislate. To restore to the packers the weapons of monopoly of which they have been judicially deprived and to authorize them to inaugurate a trade war is to legislate.

The three departments of the government have already acted. The Congress enacted the anti-trust law. The Executive Department conducted an investigation and invoked the judicial power. The Supreme Court of the United States placed its stamp of approval upon the result. The action of the packers seems to imply that an equity court should be recognized as a fourth department, which may exercise the prerogative of a sovereign and adjust the conclusions of the other departments to conform with its own ideas of equity.

Homicide on Wheels

By CARL DREHER

THE automobile has ruined the temper and manners of the people who use the highways. In the good old somnolent days people got around in carriages and buggies at an average speed of eight or ten miles an hour. When a fast team came up behind a slower one on a rural highway and the vehicle ahead gave way, the passing driver customarily tipped his hat in acknowledgment of the other man's courtesy in letting him by. When as a boy in up-state New York I was taught to drive, it was impressed on me that ordinary politeness required this gesture. Moreover, when a driver wanted to pass he did not make a noise about it; he simply followed close behind the other team until the man ahead became aware that passage was desired, whereupon he would generally turn out as soon as possible.

Contrast this procedure with the barbarities of present-day motoring and you will realize what the automobile has done to highway manners. Once a driver has gained facility, his manner of operating an automobile is an expression of his personality, like his style of making love, dictating to a stenographer, or asking his boss for a raise, and, unfortunately, too many motorists are barbarians. The go-getter fights for the right of way at unguarded crossings, slides past signals when he thinks he can get away with it, passes every car on the road, honks his horn at every opportunity, and abuses anyone who disputes his right to these enjoyments. The timid man, by lagging and hesitating in search of that perfect safety which is not to be found on this side of the grave, gets into trouble because of his very cowardice. The stolid, obstinate road hog, indignant at the notion that anyone should be allowed to do something he does not want to do, holds the center of the highway at twenty miles an hour, and yields grudgingly, if at all, to the driver who, perhaps with the utmost justification, wants to go forty. The sane, moderate, good-willed individual, the "forgotten man" of Professor Sumner, drives also according to his nature, but the automobile has made him rarer than ever, and he is at the mercy of every Yahoo that can get behind a steering wheel.

Examine a few of the ordinary practices on the road.

> Upon approaching a boulevard or through highway [reads the automobile duello] you must first come to a complete stop. Upon entering the boulevard you must yield or give the right of way to other vehicles within the intersection or approaching so closely to your left as to constitute an immediate hazard or danger should you proceed. After having so yielded, you may then proceed across the boulevard, and all other vehicles approaching you from either the left or right must then yield to you.

This is pure theory, like the rules of civilized warfare. In practice you may, indeed, stop at the curb line of the boulevard, but what happens after that is on the lap of the gods. You wait for an opening in the line of cars, which pass across the intersection haughtily at a speed ten miles an hour above whatever rate the police of the town prescribe. Another driver comes up behind you and immediately begins to honk his horn to force you to proceed. He is taking no risk himself and is entirely willing to see you killed so that he may not have to wait a quarter of a minute. You finally nose in, and the cars on your left come to a stop with varying uncertainty and squeaking of brakes. You are now in the middle of the highway and the oncoming cars on your right are legally bound to allow you to get across the rest of the way. Generally they will—when you make them. The unpleasant part about making them is that you have no bumpers on the sides of your car. The average driver on an express highway would not stop to let the Holy Trinity cross if he could help it.

Or you desire to execute a left turn on a well-traveled street. A block ahead of the place where you want to turn you have your hand out, making the prescribed signal, whereupon a string of fast drivers, honking frantically, dash past you in the middle or on the wrong side of the street, determined to get by before you can make the turn. Another amenity of he-man motoring consists in dashing into a signal-protected but officerless intersection at forty miles an hour and squeezing out cars already turning left and entitled to the right of way. The oncoming hog knows that few people will maintain this right with the possibility of a disastrous collision coming up, and he acts accordingly.

This is not merely a question of etiquette, however. Aside from all considerations of traffic density and other mechanical factors, the principal cause of automobile accidents is exactly this desuetude of decent manners on the part of a considerable section of the public. During 1929, in the United States alone, 33,000 persons were killed by automobiles and about 1,000,000 injured; and the fatalities are increasing at the rate of 13 per cent a year. These figures might be expected to result in something more than trade-paper lamentations, but the fact is that nobody cares much. The regulatory experts of the nation are occupied with the noble experiment and other moral crusades. "The motoring public (at least a considerable portion of it)," one editorial writer observes, "does not yet desire safety on the highways sufficiently to achieve it." And since the fundamental trouble lies with the people who drive, mechanistic remedies can only be partially effective.

Education can do something. In Southern California, where reckless driving is cultivated as a fine art, a sharp reduction in fatalities among children has been brought about by intensive safety campaigns in the schools. The Automobile Club of Southern California, which does a certain amount of damage to the cause of safety by getting its members off as conveniently as possible for moderate infractions of the code, including speeding, has not been derelict in organized efforts to make the highways safe in spite of Mr. Ford. The club editorializes valiantly and meets the rising accident rate with a barrage of slogans, safety-engineering surveys, reports, highway patrols, press releases, vigilance committees, and appeals to humanity. Having found, for example, that 70 per cent of the graver accidents occur at intersections, they exhort the gasoline Hotspurs of the vicinity to "Waste a minute—save a life!" while the few pedestrians left on the country roads are advised, "Walk left—drive right." They even print accident diagnoses on the backs of their letterheads. These efforts should not be sneered at, for there is evidence that they are effective palliatives. Were it not for such measures it is likely that the Californians would do worse than kill 2,000 people annually, injure 60,000, and suffer $70,000,000 property damage, as a result of which their 1930 public-liability insurance rates rose 18 per cent on private automobiles and 12 per cent on commercial vehicles.

A genuine remedy at the source would be to set up more exacting conditions in the granting of operating licenses. The right to drive an automobile is not inalienable and many persons are totally unfit to exercise it. Almost anyone can learn to operate an automobile after a fashion, but it requires a sense of decency and a certain degree of judgment, as well as rapid reflexes, to operate one without becoming a menace to society. The sense of decency cannot be tested by examination, but the other traits can, and drivers' tests should cover these essential points. There are people, otherwise normal and socially valuable, whose reaction time is so high that to allow them to get behind the steering wheel of a car is equivalent to putting a loaded shotgun into the hands of a chimpanzee. An automobile driver need not have the temperamental and physical fitness of an airplane pilot, but some of the tests which airmen have to undergo, if honestly applied to automobile drivers, would lower traffic accidents to a decent level. Unfortunately, such a course would arouse the united opposition of the automobile fetishists, the high-pressure salesmen, the business boomers, and all the big and little fellows in the automobile industry, from the bankers behind the motor-manufacturing companies to the apprentices who screw on the bolts. As long as they can sell 5,000,000 cars a year, all is well for them in the best of all possible worlds.

Not that they are without plans to make it even better. These devout believers in the uncontrolled proliferation of machinery are about to sell the country on radio sets in automobiles. Several corporations, including one with a capitalization of $10,000,000, have been formed to exploit the automobile-radio field. When every Sunday motorist adds a radio outfit to his equipment, then indeed the machine millennium will be upon us. Of course some slight aggravation of the slaughter on the highways may be expected. Margins of safety, already reduced by inattention, will vanish entirely when a continuous stream of jazz, canned ballads, and success talks takes the driver's mind off the road. The chauffeur who can now hear through the window on his left the motor of an overtaking car which is already out of the field of his rear-view mirror will then be unable to hear anything but the radio set—unless he should veer to the left, when the crash of his car against the other will momentarily drown out the broadcasting. All good hundred-per-centers will be glad to pay such a small price for the blessings of prosperity.

Of course there are always pessimists and croakers who oppose the march of progress. Among these is the State Commissioner of Motor Vehicles of New Hampshire, who announces incontinently:

> New Hampshire is against automobiles equipped with radio which can be operated while the car is in motion. This department is satisfied that the greater percentage of accidents is due to inattention of drivers, and where a radio is being operated while the car is in motion it certainly would tend to divert the attention of the operator.

Such expressions of aberrant common sense cannot stop the billion-horse-power onrush of America Motorial, which, its arteries filled with red blood and its ears with the blare of loud speakers, will never pause so long as one hospital bed remains unoccupied or one ambulance stays in its garage of a Sunday.

The Profits of War

By FORREST REVERE BLACK

NOW that the London treaty has been duly ratified by the Senate and signed by President Hoover, the time is ripe for an examination of the so-called "preparedness program" of the Department of War of the United States. Through the courtesy of Major Mars of the United States Army the writer was given the opportunity of examining an official memorandum bearing the dates of March 5, 13, and 18, 1924, and relating to a little-known agreement under which the War Department for some years has been making contracts with manufacturers for supplies to be used in the next war. This agreement is called the War Department Adjustable Price Contract (for war or other national emergency) and its chief stipulations are as follows: The government assures the munition-maker capacity production; prices are to be determined at the time the goods are delivered on the basis of cost plus a "normal" profit; the contract is to become operative upon the declaration of war.

The aim of the War Department is to contract in advance for thousands of articles either directly or indirectly useful in case of war. No outsider can say how many signed contracts in pursuance of this aim are now filed in the vaults of the War Department at Washington. It is known that the whole country has been districted and that contracts have been made to furnish the seven supply branches of the army. And although the War Department has not seen fit to take either Congress or the American people into its confidence, Major Mars informs us that in the parceling out of valuable concessions to prospective purveyors of the nation for the next war the War Department has acted upon the advice of big business men and of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Three questions present themselves: (1) Are the contracts as drawn favorable to the government? (2) Is there any legal authority for the program? (3) Can the plan be justified as a preparedness measure against war?

We are assured in the memorandum that the contracts as drawn are favorable to the government. But what right has anyone to assume that the paper guaranty of a "normal" rate of profit will be effective? On this point the following considerations are significant. Why is big business willing to bind itself by this particular form of contract? If the War Department desired fully to protect the interests of the American people, why did it specifically provide "it is not contemplated that these proposals will necessarily be of a competitive nature"? One will examine the memorandum in vain to find any regulation or control in the parceling out of these concessions. Is it possible to conceive of a scheme more favorable to the development of monopolistic control of the vital necessities of the nation in the next war? The favored groups having the contract right to supply will take advantage of the war hysteria. Does anyone suppose that their patriotism will be of such an exalted nature that they will not act in concert and charge what the traffic will bear? Will not the government, under the circumstances, accept the big-business conception of a "normal" rate of profit?

There is no specific legal authority for this program of the War Department. The National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended June 4, 1920, confers upon the Assistant Secretary of War the duties of business manager of the army. But Congress has delegated no power to the War Department to make contracts with prospective purveyors of war supplies assuring them capacity production at a price to be determined after hostilities have commenced and under non-competitive conditions. The War Department is obviously operating on the theory that, whether legal or not, the materials stipulated for in the contracts will be accepted by the government if war is declared and that Congress will pass the necessary validating legislation.

Can the plan be justified as a preparedness measure against war? The War Department blandly assures us that such is its sole aim and purpose. As a matter of fact, instead of being a form of insurance against war, the plan merely adds another powerful incentive for war as far as vested interests are concerned.

What is more, this "patriotic" arrangement is directly opposed to the movement which has been gaining ground ever since the World War and which has for its object the "taking of profit out of war." Suppose that a constitutional amendment providing for the conscription of wealth should be adopted. It would not be self-executing. Congress alone could give it vitality by the passing of appropriate legislation. What effect will the preparedness program of the War Department have on the Congress of the United States when it considers the enactment of legislation to carry out the policy of the amendment? The phrase "conscription of wealth" is ambiguous. Is the phrase synonymous with confiscation? The business interests who have bound themselves by War Department contracts are going to have a good case, especially in a time of war hysteria, when they plead in Congress that they should be protected by the guaranty of a "normal" rate of profit. When that plea is made, the fact that the War Department had no specific legal authority when it made the contract will not be germane. Big business is not in the habit of being gouged by a legal technicality. Thus, the so-called preparedness plan of our War Department not only affords free depression insurance; it also constitutes an admirable weapon which hard-headed business men will not be slow to use to prevent any real conscription of wealth in the next war.

Since the American army returned from the trans-Atlantic crusade, we have heard much about open diplomacy and the democratization of our war-making machinery. If the American people really desire to prevent a repetition of 1917-18 they ought to demand full information about this War Department alliance with business interests; for experience has proved over and over the dangers to peace that lurk in the profits of war.

In the Driftway

THERE has recently been discovered in southern Syria what is believed to be the oldest dictionary in the world. The seacoast city of Zapouna between 3000 and 2000 B.C. was an important commercial center peopled by prosperous merchants whose ships sailed many seas. It was ruled, so the researches indicate, by a princely family who lived in a palace befitting their state. In this palace was found a great library where apparently a school of scribes labored. Six languages were spoken in the busy city of Zapouna and it was the task of the scribes to inter-translate these languages, in order, presumably, that a business man of Zapouna, speaking the native dialect, should not be hindered by linguistic difficulties in striking a good bargain with one of the numerous merchants from Asia Minor who had settled in the city and spoke only Hittite, or with a ship's master fresh from Egypt in command of a desirable cargo. It was in this library that the archaeologists discovered the dictionary, along with other relics of an ancient chapter in the endless and compulsory devotion of mankind to words and the meaning of words. The Syrian "dictionary" consists of great tables of baked earth on which columns of words were traced. In a second column appear translations. On one tablet was found a list of synonyms opposite the words. Scribes in those days as in these struggled to avoid repetition.

* * * * *

THIS news from Syria excites the Drifter, for he is one of those who think that, next to the Bible, a dictionary would be the most desirable companion for that hypothetical exile on a desert island. The dictionary is one vast compilation of the adventurous wanderings of words. And words, since they are the children of the human brain, wherever they go and whatever they do, carry the weight and warmth of human experience, known or unknown. Consider that sturdy and beautiful plant which is named lilac, and which stands so naturally against the green shutters and the white clapboards of New England that the Drifter had half taken for granted that it was indigenous. The color of its blossoms, to be sure, is the same as that which decks the voluptuous orchid—and the Drifter suspects that no self-respecting Puritan would have allowed an orchid in his house. But the lilac, for all its purple, has a sweet dignity and hardy circumspection that kept it from offending the sternest of the Pilgrim Fathers. It is suitable alike for youth in spring and little old ladies in black.

* * * * *

YET the lilac, as any dictionary will show, has an Oriental past. It is a species of the olive tree, a native of Asia. Its original name, in Sanskrit, is nila, or indigo plant. From Persia and Arabia the trail of the nila leads into Turkey and Poland, into Bohemia and Bulgaria, and finally into the heart of Europe. Somewhere in the long journey the n became l, and a c or a k or a q was added as nations took the beautiful shrub into their dooryards and the name into their language. Who first admired the nila in its native place and carried it home with him, the dictionary does not divulge. Moreover, no account of the journey of the Mayflower to Plymouth, so far as the Drifter knows, mentions a slip of lilac as part of the cargo. But the Drifter would wager that the lilac was on board, treasured by a Pilgrim Father's wife who wanted something from home to plant near the strange new doorstep and never dreamed that her precious reminder was a native of Persia.

THE DRIFTER

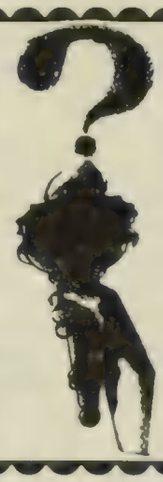
Correspondence

An Anglo-Indian Speaks

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One cardinal blunder vitiates Mr. Gregg's otherwise fair and admirable survey of the Simon report in your issue of July 9. He apparently assumes that the voice of Sir John Simon and his colleagues is the voice of the Viceroy and his counselors. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Among many Anglo-Indians there is a conviction that the appointment of the Simon Commission was a very great mistake. It was badly stage-managed, and it showed a total misunderstanding of Indian psychology. The Government of India knew that the report would have a hostile reception. It was boycotted; it was useless. It represented neither the attitude of the Indian people nor yet the attitude of the Anglo-Indian community. We in India know that friendly relations between Englishmen and Indians are imperative, and we are determined not to lose them for the sake of governmental bludgeoning. With this attitude Lord Irwin is personally associated. That was why he went to London. That was why he, a Conservative, cooperated fully with Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. Wedgwood Benn, secured a definite statement that the goal of Government was dominion status, and invited leaders of all parties to come to London and state their claims. It was a perfectly fair offer. We Englishmen were frankly disappointed when Mr. Gandhi turned it down. From the extremists we should, perhaps, have expected nothing. But greater help might have come from the moderates. If they will not cooperate, at least they might tell us what government they will put in place of the British raj. Pandit Motilal Nehru and his friends made the attempt. Alas, within a month of its appearance the Nehru report was condemned by practically every section of the Indian community.

The Simon report died even before it was born. In one respect, however, Mr. Gregg is more optimistic than its supporters. He says: "Except for Indian opposition, Parliament would be inclined, I think, to accept the governmental scheme proposed in the report almost without change . . ." We wish it were true. For there is a section of opinion in England that perpetually clamors for "firm government in India," for a sort of Prussianized India. Its chief advocates are two newspapers whose circulation figures considerably exceed the number of intelligent men and women in Great Britain. They savagely attacked Mr. Stanley Baldwin, who, realizing that our Indian policy needed to be "pulled out of the rut," identified himself with Lord Irwin and Mr. MacDonald. And these newspapers are almost powerful enough to win elections. The occasion demands a statesman with vision and not dilatory reporters. Mr. MacDonald, who knows India well, might rise to the occasion. But he has not an assured majority in the House of Commons. He may have to call a general election before the year comes to an end. No wonder Indians are suspicious of English goodwill. Englishmen at home are alternately apathetic or mischievously informed.



The Government of India is not an evil institution. Only according to the highest of Gandhian standards is it "Satanic." But it is curiously unimaginative. It does not understand the uses of propaganda; and malicious reports against it circulate through Europe and North America entirely unchallenged. It is time that it presented its case and showed that it is allied no more to the reactionaries than to those who, against their leader's orders, use murder and rapine for the propagation of the gospel of non-violence. Perhaps the All-India Conference in London will give the Government of India the opportunity it requires.

Montreal, July 30 J. R. GLORNEY BOLTON

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES

presents the case for American liberty! Here, in cold facts, you may see for yourself the examples of interference with free speech, intolerance to foreigners, police lawlessness, shackled education, an ever-increasing flood of prohibitions, intimidations and censorships. A ruthless exposure of the way American liberties are being lopped off one by one.

THIS LAND OF LIBERTY

$3.00 HARPER

Harry Elmer Barnes says:

"If there ever was a book which intellectual liberals should conspire to give the widest possible circulation it is this one. If there was ever a book which Fundamentalists and traditionalists should endeavor to suppress this is the volume."

MAN and his Universe by John Langdon-Davies

Illustrated, $5.00 HARPER & BROTHERS, New York

Contributors to This Issue

MAXWELL S. STEWART has been for four years instructor in the department of sociology at Yenching University, Peiping, China.

GLENN WARD DRESBACH is the author of a book of verse, "The Wind in the Cedars."

ROBERT V. BEGLEY, formerly connected with the Union Stockyards Company, is a lawyer who has given special attention to the legal and economic problems involved in the packers' case.

CARL DREHER is connected with the motion-picture industry at Los Angeles.

FORREST REVERE BLACK is professor of law at the University of Kentucky.

EUGENE LÖHRKE is editor of "Armageddon: The World War in Literature."

HORACE GREGORY will publish this fall "Chelsea Rooming House," a book of verse.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is the author of "Cato, or the Future of Censorship."

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

Books

Now Must the Mind Write

By EDA LOU WALTON

Now must the mind write
Words desired,
For the hand is too tired,
The lips too tired tonight.
Silently must the mind write
Words and never speak.
Hand slips over hair,
Fair lips are laid to cheek,
To the mind's brow;
How can the mind speak now?
Yet the mind must somehow write,
There are many words to be written,
Though the brow be smitten with light,
And lips with lips,
Though hand slips into hand
Forever tonight,
The mind must write!
O culpable hair
Mind-rooted and betrayed
Strayed to the breast,
Even tonight
In delight
In despair
Must the mind write.

The Classical Canons

The Course of English Classicism. By Sherard Vines. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.25.

IN his twenty years' war to discredit romanticism, Mr. Irving Babbitt (if I may be forgiven so belated a reference) must have found that his most effective rhetorical device has been that of a calm historical statement of the excesses and absurdities of the extreme romanticists. But the weapon can be applied quite as effectively by the enemy. If Mr. Babbitt's citations drive you into the ranks of the classicists, then you might try reading this history of English classicism by Mr. Sherard Vines, and be frightened back to where you came from.

Not that Mr. Vines has written his volume with any such purpose. He is a classicist himself, of, so far as I can make out, the extreme right wing. After setting down some of the innumerable stupid judgments that the classical rules have caused otherwise intelligent men to make—such as Addison's cool dismissal of the Gothic cathedrals as "mean," and the Augustan Age's rejection of Shakespeare as barbarous—Mr. Vines is capable of judgments quite as hopeless. He holds it to be a perverse age that extols "Hamlet" and ignores Addison's "Cato"; and in praising Pope's "Essay on Criticism," he writes (as if to elevate one author it were necessary to kick a few others) that "it is poetry to anyone who is not deafened with a century of uncouth and agonized cries, whether from Shelleys, Brownings, Masefields, or Mews." He goes on to remark in praise of Pope that he is "not merely a 'great poet'; he is unfailingly efficient; he forgets, unlike Homer, Shakespeare, Shelley, or Browning, to nod." The truth of which would seem to me to depend a great deal upon one's definition of nodding. But perhaps Mr. Vines is thinking of form and not of content, and prefers a polished platitude to a slightly awkward line, however fresh or penetrating.

There is at least no reason to believe that Mr. Vines has his tongue in his cheek when he makes these judgments. They are, of course, only a natural result of a rigid adherence to the classical canons. For the typical classical virtues—correctness, order, good sense, good taste, dignity, adherence to the rules—are within the grasp of writers of ordinary talent. It follows that if we apply these classic standards (and many of them are sound enough as far as they go) we must never forget that they are always at bottom secondary. The first question the critic must ask of any writer is what qualities he has that make him worth discussing at all—what it is that makes him arresting or unique—what is his peculiar genius, originality, or force. There will be plenty of time to discuss his correctness and good taste when these primary questions have been answered. Yet the failure to recognize this fundamental distinction between genius and propriety is responsible for mountains of critical rubbish, from which Mr. Vines has diligently collected a representative heap.

The truth is that the age-long controversy between romanticists and classicists has been infinitely tedious, and we are perhaps indebted to Mr. Vines for unintentionally making that fact so clear. What an endless battle of threadbare labels and faded meanings! It seems to me that the sensible critic today will merely pronounce a plague on both houses, and try to approach the subject afresh. He is likely to find, as the biologists are now finding in the ancient controversy over heredity and environment, that both sides are right in what they assert and wrong in what they deny. The existing categories and separations are unreal. One of the traditional differences, for example, between classicists and romanticists is that the first emphasize the function of the intellect and the second that of the emotions. But it should be obvious by now that in practice neither can exist without the other, that every intellectual process has its emotional color and every emotion its intellectual concomitant. Again, classicism is usually allied to tradition and romanticism to experiment. But in a recent symposium it occurred to one or two of the more astute contributors that any great work of art must be both rooted in tradition and experimental. As Emerson has put it: "Poetry must be as new as foam and as old as the rock." That is why it is impossible to classify any first-rate writer, like Shakespeare or Goethe, as either classic or romantic: he has so many elements in his make-up that he cannot be squeezed into such arbitrary categories.

The present book, I regret to add, is depressing not only because of its subject but on its own account. Mr. Vines is a British college professor, and his work has all the typical professorial merits and defects. It has scholarship, it has a few skittish attempts at humor, and it has pedantry and dulness. It swarms with the names of forgotten worthies, whom the author pigeonholes most carefully under classic, gothic, baroque, romantic. He writes wretchedly, and seldom manages to get down a straightforward sentence; the references of his pronouns are so hazy that half the time one cannot tell whom he is talking about. Here is a typical sentence:

> Dufresnoy influenced many after Dryden; and the importance and duration of his principles in precept, and practice such as Sir Joshua Reynolds's, is a sign that Schasler's view (cited by Bosanquet) that British aesthetic forsook Platonism in the eighteenth century, is wide of the mark.

Finally, like a true professor, Mr. Vines makes no reference to the winds of doctrine that blow today, but ends with Macaulay.

HENRY HAZLITT

Bloodless Biography

Joseph Fouché. By Stefan Zweig. The Viking Press. $2.50.

AS a biographer Stefan Zweig is peculiarly bloodless, but as an essayist he is discriminating, and if he is often unable to see the forest because of the trees this is the result less of a preoccupation with facts than with didactic oratory.

His long series of literary biographies seems to have been written with the pen in one hand and the birch rod in the other, and his faith in his own logic and lucidity is a form of fanaticism which all may not share alike. But his literary program, at least, is impressive, and his success among discriminating readers on the Continent is less to be wondered at than his apparent failure to reach an audience here. In spirit he is a medievalist; like Romain Rolland a deep believer in the sources of his own prophetic inspiration. His appeal to the modern mind is vague and inconstant.

No doubt, as his publishers have it, Stefan Zweig is "sure of his philosophy." This is a valuable asset for a creative writer providing the horizons are wide enough. But with an even more positive scale of values Hilaire Belloc has recaptured figures from an identical past and given them vitality to the present. Mr. Zweig's peculiar method is to cut his cloth first before measuring his men. The result is nebulous when it is not logically discordant.

In the cases of Casanova, Stendhal, and Tolstoy, Mr. Zweig wished to reveal "adepts in self-portraiture," overlooking the truism that every serious writer is largely preoccupied with himself. One might have inserted Katherine Mansfield, or Havelock Ellis, or D. H. Lawrence in the category without in the least disturbing any logical equilibrium but that of Mr. Zweig. It is beside the point to inquire whether such obscurantism is conscious or not. Common sense plays its part in literature as in life, and the absurdity of any parallel between Stendhal and Tolstoy aside from the commonplace human one does not diminish in the atmosphere of Mr. Zweig's airy dogmatism.

In "Joseph Fouché" we have the portrait of a politician. We have, again, a neatly stylized essay and a frame arranged in advance so that a portrait may fit into it. What does actually emerge from a perusal of this book is the fact that Joseph Fouché, on the human side at least, is worthy of a more full-blooded biographer than the modern monk of the Kapuzinerberg. There is no questioning Mr. Zweig's scholarship. He has his facts delicately at his finger tips. He is able to raise the curtain on a scene and drop it at the proper interval. He can describe, narrate, and draw a wash over his bleak outlines which has some resemblance, at least, to color. But his creation of Fouché, like his creations of Dickens and Dostoevski, speaks to us only after he has pulled the wires. Once again we have, instead of the dance of life, a ghost dance to the tune of a fleshless didacticism. We have, again, manikins, arranged on a stage somewhat below the level of the Kapuzinerberg where the master writes. And once again we perceive that Mr. Zweig's historical creations cannot come to life because he has no life to breath into them, but merely tags to label them by.

We see that Joseph Fouché emerged from the obscurity of provincial Nantes and played traitor to every cause he enlisted to support during the flame and fever of the Terror. If we did not know that it was his hand which arranged the downfall of Robespierre, Mr. Zweig proves this step by step. We know that he was by turn Jacobin, Bonapartist, Royalist, betraying every trust in turn until he extinguished his own light in a final stupid attempt to dazzle the world. We can share Napoleon's opinion that he was "the one really perfect traitor" where we cannot share Mr. Zweig's conviction that he was the world's most consummate politician. He was, rather, a clever card sharper in an age of desperate gambling for supremely high stakes. Then he was the Duke of Otranto, as pitiful a spectacle as Casanova in his old age, dying like a miser with the hoard of scandal he had collected and consigning it to the flames.

A singular and—from the biographer's point of view—a superb figure, that of lean Joseph Fouché, ex-oratorian and minister of police. But the business of biography as we understand it today is to create and not to evaluate. Mr. Zweig's half-tones do not blend with the flame and passion of Fouché's times. They are lost in it, until only the author's pronouncements remain—in their turn to be questioned and evaluated.

EUGENE LÖHRKE

Mr. Masters on a Spree

Gettysburg, Manila, Acoma. By Edgar Lee Masters. Horace Liveright. $10.

SURELY no poet of the older generation has deserved the prestige of a wide reputation more than Edgar Lee Masters. He was among the first to be recognized in the "new-poetry" movement that was in full swing during the war, and yet even today, after a period of rapid transition, his "Spoon River Anthology" and "The Domesday Book" can be reread and enjoyed with honest enthusiasm. The full-bodied vitality that we associate with these two books of poetry has not worn thin. The doctor-lawyer-small-town-atheist personality of Edgar Lee Masters is still very much alive, and still an important contribution to American literature.

Masters is always at his best when he is driven by the necessity of telling a story, usually in a Middle Western setting where he is thoroughly familiar with realistic detail. Both "Spoon River" and "The Domesday Book" illustrate his talent working at full power. It is only when he is forced to rely upon himself as a conscious artist that his talent fails and his lack of self-criticism becomes painfully evident. He has written much downright bad poetry. Like William Ellery Leonard, a poet of equally dramatic personality, he is afflicted with a "grand manner" that is often out of keeping with his subject matter.

His latest volume, containing three dramatic poems—Gettysburg, Manila, and Acoma—is an example of Masters at his worst. The book is likely to embarrass any admirer of Masters's poetry, though here, as often before in his earlier work, Masters shows us that his heart and a fair section of his mental activity are in the right place. He is still the inverted American patriot, bitter, ironic, disillusioned. All this, however, does not justify two long tragic poems, the first dealing with Booth about to shoot Lincoln and the second concerning the American invasion of the Philippines, written in thundering, pseudo-Shakespearean blank verse.

What makes the situation even more embarrassing is that we are quite willing to agree with the general trend of Masters's opinions concerning the destructive influences of American imperialism, the central theme of all three poems. Two quotations, one from Gettysburg, the other from Manila, will serve to show what Masters has done with his material:

SOLDIERS' CHORUS

For Lincoln won, ha, ha;
And Davis lost, ho, ho;
Now double-quick, for my girl is waiting,
And I am bound to go.
Ha, ha, ha,
Ho, ho, ho;
And I am bound to go.

DEWEY'S SAILORS

Boom! Boom! The Raleigh's cannon roar;
Boom! Boom! Reply the Boston, Baltimore . . .

These are lyrical interludes, by no means as painful as some of the blank verse. We can simply assume that Masters is on one of his barnstorming tours in which Booth becomes a maudlin hero and McKinley a pale, pot-bellied, top-hatted villain. This, however, is no indication that Masters has completed his career as an important figure in American letters; he is merely off on another of his periodic sprees. Just as a hopeless drunkard irresistibly reaches out for a bottle of post-war redenatured alcohol, so Masters takes his vacation by diving headlong into the worst of possible poetry.

HORACE GREGORY

The New Criminology

500 Criminal Careers. By Sheldon Glueck and Eleanor T. Glueck. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

FOR all I know, the chances are that this study by the Gluecks will become one of the "classics" of the new criminology. It is the most painstaking and thorough investigation of the grist of a great penological institution that has ever been made. It resulted from the encouragement of Dr. Richard C. Cabot, of Harvard, and an appropriation of $11,000 by the Harvard Milton Fund, and it took three years to complete. The hard, unshakable fact which the investigation establishes is that 80 per cent of the 510 men who were discharged from the Massachusetts Reformatory from 1911 to 1922 were not reformed from five to fifteen years later but were continuing in their careers of crime. The exact contrary used to be asserted: to wit, that 80 per cent of those graduated from reformatories proved successes. This conclusion was based upon the study of offenders during a short parole period. The Gluecks have upset it by tracing their group thoroughly for a post-parole period of five years. Since the Massachusetts Reformatory is among the best in the country, the finding of the Gluecks is a terrific indictment of the reformatory system in general, and since the reformatory deals with the youthful and less hardened offenders for whom the greatest hopes of reformation are to be entertained, it is also a cause for despair of our penal institutions in general. The recent outbreak of prison riots must strengthen this feeling.

What remedies are there for this situation? Is humanity to remain forever baffled by crime? The Gluecks are not only concerned to establish their central fact of the failure of the reformatory, but undertake an elaborate examination of the criminal history of their cases with a view to establishing a general method for dealing with offenders. It is a very curious and significant fact that the Gluecks, despite the impact of the discouraging facts they have studied, constantly reveal an optimistic spirit looking toward improvement and reform, while Dr. Richard C. Cabot, who stands sponsor for the book and introduces it to the reader, has only very despairing comments to make. It seems to me that this tacit disagreement may be taken as the basis for some doubts about the method and purposes of the study.

Those doubts do not relate to the typicality of the findings. On the contrary, they proceed directly from it. I think that the central fact of the failure of the reformatory system was worth establishing. But I cannot refrain from regretting that so much time of two intelligent investigators should have been necessary to dispose with finality of the fatuous beliefs of some misguided criminologists. No one who knows anything about the nature of our society and who has had the briefest acquaintance with the actual working of one reformatory institution should have had cause for any optimism. Certainly it must have been obvious to such an experienced criminologist as Dr. Sheldon Glueck that most of the graduates of the reformatory would be found to be continuing in their careers of crime, as soon as he had ascertained the way the reformatory was administered and examined the record cards of the 510 inmates. Only a third of them could in any sense be called mentally normal and a fifth of them were positively feeble-minded. They came from poverty-stricken and degraded homes. Before their sentences to the reformatory the 510 boys had been arrested 1,944 times! Their subsequent careers might readily have been guessed without the tremendous efforts of three years to trace their present whereabouts. Without wishing to detract from the ingenuity and enterprise shown by the Gluecks in accomplishing this, it may well be said that the very fact that they were successful in finding 90 per cent of the men five years after their parole period is an indication of their continuing criminality. Had they all been leading law-abiding and successful lives it would have been far more difficult to follow their tracks, since they would not have been known to social agencies and police identification bureaus.

If this phase of the study fills me merely with doubts, there are others which leave me with a positive impatience. They exemplify for me that passion for research for research's sake which has resulted from the striving of the social sciences to achieve the exactness of the physical sciences. Doubtless many problems are proper for exact research, but it seems to me that criminology is a discipline too much ridden by human values to be capable of development by statistical method. There are no less than 116 tables printed in this study analyzing the criminal history of the 510 men. They are treated like so many guinea-pigs. After the various factors in their lives are tabulated separately, they are tabulated in combinations to show various coefficients of contingency of their continuing criminality. The possibility of establishing such actuarial tables is taken as the basis of a hope for certainty and predictability in criminal justice. A judge in sentencing a criminal will simply have to consult his coefficients of contingency, and they will never betray him any more than logarithmic tables. Presumably the coefficients of contingency are to be constantly adjusted to improvements in penology which may throw them off by a few points. May I be old-fashioned enough to say that I prefer to these coefficients of contingency the "human-interest" stories of some of the individual offenders printed in a chapter called A Sheaf of Lives, and their personal comments presented in another chapter called The Point of View of the Ex-Prisoner?

The whole of Chapters 6 and 7, which are devoted to the criminogenesis of the Glueck criminals, represents a type of criminological investigation which should have no place in a new criminology. The possible causes of crime are not obscure; it is the complexity of their combination that causes all the trouble. Hence all attempts at cataloguing the "causes" of crime which one finds neatly done in textbooks of criminology are to be regarded as futile. Such statistical information is valuable only as material for shocking our consciences, as propaganda for the social revolution, but it is useless as far as the individual criminal is concerned. The emphasis must always be upon him rather than on the causes of crime. It is true that the present economic organization of society is a tremendous factor in criminal causation (yet curiously few criminologists ever use their tables of the causes of crime to preach the social revolution), but mental deficiencies are no less potent. On the other hand, neither factor, obviously, necessarily results in crime. Not all the poor are law-breakers, nor are all the feeble-minded in jail. In dealing with crime we are confronted by too many imponderables of criminal causation, too many of the dark mysteries of the human soul.

A social revolution may result in bringing actual penal institutions closer to the possibilities of modern criminology (in no other field has there significantly been such a tremendous institutional lag behind knowledge), but a social revolution will not itself, of course, abolish crime. Alas, life is the cause of crime. Long after economic classes are abolished mental classes must persist, for it is obvious that we shall never have true social revolution if humanity is to wait until it is cured of all its psychoses and superstitions.

Where disagreement is bound to exist for such a long time, it seems to me that the "scientific" method of the Gluecks is not very helpful. I should say rather that good judgment, sense, and faith are required. It seems to me the basic cry of criminologists for "individualization" in the treatment of the criminal is sound. We need an intramural system of classification and segregation which will become more and more effective as psychology and psychiatry advance, and we need certainly a more adequate and honest system of parole. I realize that I make these assertions without research. But has man lost his glorious power to affirm? Why even the Gluecks themselves in the end, however inconsistently, cast discretion to the winds and affirm conclusions about our system of criminal justice for which they offer no proof at all, either by coefficients of contingency or any other means. WILLIAM SEAGLE

Histories of the Jews

A History of the Jews. By Abram Leon Sachar. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

The Jews in the Christian Era. By Laurie Magnus. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

BOTH of these volumes are helpful. Dr. Magnus's work, indeed, ranks very high both as historical thinking and as historical writing. But neither his in its restricted field nor Dr. Sachar's in its comprehensive survey satisfies the particular and peculiar needs of a history of the Jews.

To write the history of the Jews requires an unprecedented scholarship, a fine literary talent to organize the vast and confused materials into a readable progression, and a new historical viewpoint. Of necessity a history of the Jews must be a world history; and the greater part of it must be written not as a political record, for which alone there is a historical tradition, but as a cultural history, for which a satisfactory technique has hardly as yet been devised.

The historian is on familiar political ground only for short and relatively unimportant periods. As a self-governing and pettily imperial nation the career of the Jews was brief and inglorious. The kingdoms of Judea and of the Ten Tribes, of the Hasmoneans and of Herod are more to be mourned for their existence than for their end. They were typical of the brutal, terrified, ephemeral smaller monarchies of the Near East. The Judaism that contributed to civilization is the Judaism of the Exile, the nationhood that out of its necessity devised other than political forms for its functioning. When the history of this effort comes to be written its publication will be a great event.

Dr. Magnus comes close to it. His book, however, through its essay form and its presupposition of a detailed acquaintance with the events and personalities of Jewish history, is taken out of the range of the general reader. It is in effect a study of the Jewish contributions to European civilization. It gives, moreover, only a vague sense of the milieu (vague because it is built of formulated, if interesting, generalization rather than fact) from which the contributors emerged and, indeed, drew their contributions. Within its limits, however, the book is excellent, and it is distinguished by an admirable style.

In his preface Dr. Sachar shows that he understands the special problems of writing Jewish history, but in his text he reveals himself incapable of coping with them. His book becomes, in spite of the resistance of the subject matter, the traditional political history. Where it attempts first-hand work, as in its treatment of American Jewry, it succeeds in no more than a naming of names by "Who's Who" standards.

In style Dr. Sachar attempts a brightness that he has not enough electric to sustain. His models are perhaps worthier, but his own writing resembles most the tedious and fussy scintillations of the converted professors in the American Mercury. However, it is true that there is no better one-volume history of the Jews available. ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

Books in Brief

Seed. By Charles G. Norris. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

Charles Norris's latest work is more a disquisition than a novel, a patently didactic discussion of that time-worn question: whether or not birth-control is a frustration of God's design in nature. In this drama of the misfortune of a young novelist and his wife whose marriage is temporarily wrecked owing to the misunderstandings and poverty arising from unwelcome children, Mr. Norris is more teacher than writer. A benign priest on one hand and an emancipated physician on the other represent the two divergent points of view in lengthy and unimaginative conversations. "Seed" does not escape the pitfall of monotony which awaits most treatise fiction. Stodgily argumentative, the author supports his theme by a tedious citation of numerous horrible examples whose misery is ascribed to uncontrolled procreation. We become too involved in unraveling the interrelationships of the family clan and too irritatingly aware of the underscored moral to sympathize with the difficulties of the main characters. As a sincere plea for the sane dissemination of contraceptive information and as a competent analysis of passion, love, and parenthood, this work is eminently satisfying; but as a novel it remains lethargic and overlong.

Strangers May Kiss. By Ursula Parrott. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

One suspects that Miss Parrott's second novel will rival the popularity of its predecessor, "Ex-Wife," because there is still a public avid for intimate description of illicit relations, obstetrics, disillusion, drunken or sober, and true love not quite conquering all. This does not imply that "Strangers May Kiss" has been written with an eye to possible sales; the book is honest and sincere. The author develops her theme—that two may love but the man rides on—in the narration of the brief meetings and long separations of her two main characters. Her people are real. One meets them in New York—restless, distorted, shoddy. But just as one avoids them in real life, one's instinct is also to keep clear of them in fiction.

Shepherds in Sackcloth. By Sheila Kaye-Smith. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

In her latest novel the author of "Joanna Godden" tells another fine, quiet tale of Sussex and its people. Mr. Bennet, rector of Delmonden, and his little magpie wife have ministered for twenty-five years to a village perversely more interested in tapioca pudding than in the Bread of Life. Never too clerical to be blind to the human problems about them, the Bennets become involved in the difficult love affair between a stormy young member of the gentry and a farmer evangelist. The piteous end of the struggle costs the Bennets much, in sympathy, grief, and disillusion, and it opens the rector's disastrous warfare with his bishop, who can think of souls only in thousand lots.

The New Encyclopedia of Music and Musicians. Edited by Waldo Selden Pratt. The Macmillan Company. $3.

No one is too ignorant or too learned to read a dictionary, and if Théophile Gautier and Anatole France never lived to see the day when they could not prowl with profit through dictionaries, who are we that we should disdain such exercise? Mr. Pratt's new encyclopedia is a happy hunting ground for lovers of music. Having begun life as a one-volume abridgment of Sir George Grove's monumental work, it branched off on a career of its own and has become something quite distinctive. The material is divided into three parts, the first being definitions, the second biographies, and the third an entertaining excursion (one of the first of its kind) into musical geography. The cities and towns where music flourishes in any part of the world are listed alphabetically and their musical associations and institutions are itemized. Instead of abridging Grove, Mr. Pratt's volume supplements it indispensably.

Peace. By Arne Garborg. Translated from the Norwegian by Phillips Dean Carleton. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

Perhaps in no other novel in literature has the phenomenon of religious monomania that shrivels and poisons everything it touches been described so pitilessly yet understandingly. From the sordidness of the crouching and canting peasant life and the unrelieved bleakness of the moors and rocks of southwest Norway—both his own childhood environment—the great Norwegian novelist has wrung beauty and majesty as background for the tragedy of the fanatical peasant Enok.

General Conference
OF THE FELLOWSHIP of RECONCILIATION
Unity House, Forest Park, Pa.
(In the Poconos)
SEPTEMBER 11-14, 1930
Topic:—Overcoming Violence in my Community
A. J. MUSTE, Chairman
Leaders of discussion:—Louis Francis Budenz, Paul H. Douglas, Mrs. Martha P. Falconer, F. Ernest Johnson, Kirby Page, Mordecai W. Johnson and the Secretaries of the Fellowship.
The Conference is open to all who are interested. Rates, $3.50 per day. Registration fee, $2.00. Reservations should be made at once.
The Fellowship of Reconciliation
383 Bible House, Astor Place New York City

SOVIET RUSSIA
An extraordinary combination of low price and tour value for Students. $280 complete. The itinerary is fascinating.
Aug. 27 S.S. Berengaria.
Sept. 17 S.S. Berengaria.
WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.
175 Fifth Avenue, New York Algonquin 0050

POSITIONS WANTED

SECRETARY and editorial assistant, free beginning September 8th for long or short temporary position. Well recommended. Box 104, % The Nation.

SECRETARY-STENOGRAPHER, expert, newspaper experience, knowledge foreign languages, desires afternoon position. Box 106, % The Nation or phone Rector 1264.

NEWSPAPER EDITORS: A-1 editor wants correspondent's job with daily seeking to strengthen its New York service. Young, experienced, news and features. Box 108, % The Nation.

CULTURED German girl, 35 years, graduate nurse, good housekeeper with highest references wishes position. Box 109, % The Nation.

SECRETARY, stenographer, extensive experience with prominent writers, part-time only. Manuscripts typed, careful accurate work. German translations. Highest references. Riverside 8966, or Box 2336, % The Nation.

WOMAN attorney desires position with firm (legal, commercial) organization, where training will be beneficially applied. Box No. 110, % The Nation.

PUBLICITY and newspaper woman, experienced also in field work, lobbying, etc., seeks connection. Box No. 111, % The Nation.

YOUNG man, Ph.D., ten years' experience teaching, organizing and directing progressive schools and camps, desires teaching position or other suitable work. Valuable to any group of people interested in the promotion of a progressive educational enterprise, or in social service. Box No. 112, % The Nation.

CHILD CARE

TWO mothers, unusually successful in raising their own children, will care for several more between three and six years. Delightful home, large, protected grounds in White Plains. Out program: wholesome food, outdoor play, development individual talents. Moderate fee. Write Mrs. Stuart, 333 Main Street, White Plains, or call Regent 4229, N. Y.

EDUCATIONAL

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN
Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 13th year.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN
GERMAN. Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th year. Also neglected English education.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

Teacher Director
A SMALL progressive day school in picturesque liberal community in Northern Westchester needs teacher leader. One inspiring and creative, who responds to accomplishment rather than salary will enjoy work here. Call Murray Hill 8540 or write Box 107, % The Nation.

OPEN SHELF

DO YOU REALLY CARE TWO CENTS WORTH?
A 2c stamp, no more, will carry to you the 16 p. booklet "Causes of Business Depression" by Henry George, American philosopher, economist and humanity lover, whose Progress and Poverty appears in all European languages. Open your mind to a great Truth, and find the cure as well as the preventive of Unemployment, Poverty, Crime. All Georgist books sold without profit. Ask for list.
Robert Schalkenbach Foundation
13 Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

FOR SALE

Acres on lake property
50 miles from City. Choice acres for sale.
Reasonable terms.
Jessor, Walton Lake Camp Corp., Monroe, N. Y.

COOPERATIVE Apartments for Sale. 6 year old successful Rochdale cooperative. Lowest operating charges in N. Y. C. Consumers Cooperative Housing Association, Inc. Phone or write J. D. Steblins, Mgr., 64 Barrow St., Greenwich Village. Walker 7394.

FOR week-ends right now, little old house with old fireplace in living room. Attractively clean, but no conveniences. Large, old timbered barn. High land, trees. Garden. On little used road. 42 miles from 59th St., N. Y. C. $8,500. Mrs. W. H. Rogers, Stamford, Conn. Box 889. Tel. Stamford, Minor 78 Ring 2.

ROOM—FURNISHED

SPLENDID large well-furnished room. Separate entrance. Private family. Home privileges. Breakfast optional. Excellent location near drive. $35 if permanent. Business woman preferred. 614 W. 148th St. Tel. Edgecomb 7819 early evenings.

SHOPPERS' CORNER

MARITZA, 172 W. 4th Street,
is having a summer clearance sale, which is very worth while. Very special crocheted coats made of hand woven material $24.50. Hand embroidered dresses, voile—$7.95 up, silk—$16.50 up. Palestinian children's—$3.50. Also hats, and crocheted dresses.

VACATION DISCOUNTS on Remington Portable Typewriters and Waterman Fountain Pens during August only. For other savings on standard advertised merchandise call John 1427, or write: SERVWELL SYSTEM, INC., 35 Maiden Lane, N. Y. C.

SUMMER SUMMER

MILFORD

KENT, Connecticut

'The Camp for YOUth!'

A beautiful summering place for intelligent young folks and folks who stay young; informal, athletic, carefree; sheltered tent accommodations and log cabins; excellent meals.

"Mickey" Michaels is especially desirous of greeting Nation readers.

JUST BRING A BUNDLE OF SPIRIT!

Rates Moderate.

Camp 'phone Kent 1-8

In New York : 1440 Broadway

PENnsylvania 7842

Spend Your Vacation on the shores of the Queen of Mountain Lakes

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women

ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

Superb location at "America's first summer resort." All the most desirable camp features. The Wunnishaunta Booklet, sent free, includes pictures of camp activities, auto routes, train and airplane information.

MRS. SADIE BRICKMAN, Hostess

WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

INDIAN HEAD

an ideal camp for adults

Echo Lake, Warrensburg, N. Y.

Dancing
Swimming
Fishing
Rowing
Canoeing

Tennis
Golf
Baseball
Basket Ball
Horseback riding

All social and sport activities.
Only five miles from Lake George.

Rate: $32.50 per week.

Take Albany Night boat on any Saturday night and meet our bus at the Albany Pier on Sunday morning which will transport you to camp without any extra charge.

Write or phone for illustrated booklet.

N. Y. Office:
170 E. 149th St. Phone Mott Haven 4703

SCOPUS

P.O. Lake George, N. Y.

An Adult Camp of Distinction in the Adirondacks

Spend a real vacation on beautiful Trout Lake! All land and water sports—unusual social activities. Dietary Laws observed. Camp open all September, at Special Rates.

N.Y. Office: 11 W. 42nd St. LONgacre 0105

HIDDEN IN THE CONNECTICUT HILLS

Swimming
Boating
Horseback

Tennis
Handball
Basketball

165 Acres of Rustic Beauty
Delicious food from our own farm
RATES, AUGUST $28
SEPTEMBER $25
Reservations limited to 65
Bungalows for two, three or more.
Write or Phone Direct
UNCAS LODGE, Uncasville, Conn.
Norwich 1858, Ring 5

In the Heart of the Adirondacks

A Summer Camp

For Grown-Ups

A camp devoted to assuring its guests a good wholesome vacation. Every known sport; bathing, boating, riding, golf and tennis. Excellent Social Staff. Dietary laws observed.

Rates $35 per wk.

SPECIAL LABOR DAY WEEK-END

FOUR DAYS, ALL EXPENSES $37.50

Write for Literature

New York City Office
PIONEER LODGE
145 W. 41st St. Tel. WIsconsin 3151

BAILIN'S MAPLEDALE HOTEL

"The Hotel with the Camp Spirit"

Roscoe (Sullivan Co.) N. Y. Tel. Roscoe 8Y2

For the Modern and Moody

Conveniences • River • Sports • Casino • Recreation • Social Activities • Supreme Jewish Cuisine

Special rates for September

City address: 570 7th Av., Suite 1002, N.Y.

Phones: Pennsylvania 1777 I. B. Bailin
Coney Island 1750 Eva Bailin

CAMP TOPSTONE—For Adults

A Jewish Camp with a fine American spirit

All land and water sports, with free instruction. Splendid social activities. Excellent strictly Kosher meals.

Write for illustrated booklet

SHAPIRO BROS. Branchville, Conn.

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

WARRENSBURG, N. Y.

A Camp for Adults in the Adirondacks

Most modern facilities for comfort and sports including golf

Booklet on request

City phone Lex. 8879

FOR relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship; tennis. Phone to
THE HIL-BERT HOUSE,
Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
HIL FRIEDBERG, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 852

AUTUMN ON CAPE COD

SEPTEMBER and October are delightful months in Provincetown. Bright blue days. Swimming one block (bay). Charming rooms. Good food. Fall rates $25.00 weekly.
ANN WASHINGTON CRATON, 22 Pearl St.
Provincetown, Mass.

SEA GATE RENDEZ-VOUS

Where food is the best

A VACATION is a necessity; a change of surroundings greatly beneficial; wholesome food an elixir. You will enjoy all this at the Sea Gate Rendez-vous, where food is the best, where comfort, coziness and simplicity, aided by the sea air, and the health-giving rays of the sun, combines to restore poise, harmony and well being to the vacationist. Arrangements by week, day, or as long as your vacation lasts. Write 3913 Laurel Ave., Sea Gate, N. Y. Harbor, or Telephone Mayflower 8655.

THE CRYSTAL VILLA

WOODCLIFF LAKE, N. J.

A rare combination of Country Pleasures with City Comforts. All modern improvements. Beautiful surroundings. Altitude 864. Free of Mosquitoes. Excellent Meals. Delightful Bathing and Fishing. 28 Miles from New York City. Very Easy Commutation. Write for Booklet. Telephone Park Ridge 404.

SONAQUA CLUB

Lake Mohegan, N. Y.

The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only 45 miles from New York.

Sports
Tennis, Boating
Swimming, Dancing

For reservations call Peekskill 1276

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1930 No. 3400

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 231
EDITORIALS:
Mr. Churchill Runs Amuck 234
Hail, Sixty-four! 235
The Uses of Adversity 235
Intellectuals in Politics 236
GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS. By Oswald Garrison Villard 237
NORTH CAROLINA KEEPS FAITH. By Edgar W. Knight 240
NEW ECONOMIC BLOCS IN EUROPE. By Friedrich Scheu 241
CANTALOUPES AND COMMUNISTS. By Conrad Seiler 243
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 245
CORRESPONDENCE 245
BOOKS AND FILMS:
A Schoolmaster Dies in Italy. By Horace Gregory 248
Americans Do Not Read. By Henry Hazlitt 248
Reversion to Childhood. By Clifton P. Fadiman 249
Beyond His Horizons. By Eugene Löhrke 249
A World Infecund? By J. J. Spengler 250
A Monumental Undertaking. By Richard McKeon 250
The Art of Max Weber. By Louis Lozowick 251
Hindenburg. By William MacDonald 251
Books in Brief 252
Films: "Hell's Angels." By Alexander Bakshy 254
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Fascism in Finland 255
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 256

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE STINGING REPORT of the League of Nations Mandates Commission upon British responsibility for the Palestine riots of 1929 has drawn an almost equally sharp reply from Arthur Henderson as British Foreign Secretary. Mr. Henderson concedes the inadequacy of the protective force that was established by his government, but in a tu quoque he vigorously defends his country from the charge that it could have foreseen the troubles: Why did not the Mandates Commission also foresee it? Mr. Henderson scores, too, when he points out that the Mandates Commission rejected many of the findings of the Shaw Commission in favor of unverified ex parte statements. But most mortifying for the British to answer is the charge that England failed in her mandatory capacity to advance adequately the social and economic welfare of Palestine and thus to improve the relations between Arabs and Jews—a charge it deeply resents, and naturally. A stiff dose that, especially in view of the fact that the report of the Mandates Commission bears the approving signature of the British member of the commission, Lord Lugard!

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS statesmen will have plenty to talk about at their forthcoming meeting notwithstanding that the meeting of the Council, which precedes that of the Assembly, was postponed for a few days in the hope that more items might be placed on the agenda. The Briand scheme of a European union is expected to figure prominently in the discussions—directly if Great Britain succeeds in enforcing its request for consideration of the matter by the Assembly, indirectly if M. Briand is able to hold to his original purpose of having the plan considered in an informal meeting of League delegates. Then there is the question of treaty revision and Franco-German relations generally, regarding which French political opinion is reported to be much worked up. It seems more than doubtful, however, whether anything practical will come out of the parleys. It is hardly likely that Germany, which thus far has only the inferential support of Italy in calling for a revision of the peace treaties, will attempt to steal a march on France by bringing up the question unexpectedly, although France fears that something of the kind may happen; while as for a European union, the latest reports from Paris are that the French Cabinet has intimated to M. Briand that it will be well, under the circumstances, not to press that issue too hard. If Germany really intends to agitate openly for treaty revision, discussion of a European union of which Germany must be a member would probably seem to the French rather inopportune.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE which is to meet at London at the end of September promises to be almost exclusively an economic conclave. With the exception of a rather perfunctory reference to imperial defense, and a mention of certain constitutional questions such as the operation of dominion legislation and the settlement of inter-imperial disputes, nearly all of the subjects listed in the preliminary agenda which Mr. MacDonald has given out are of an economic character. Prominent in the list are imperial capital investments and the establishment of branch industries, "the effect of successive tariff changes and the extent and effect of inter-imperial tariff preferences," trade cartels, overseas settlement, and transport and communication. Interest in the tariff issue has been greatly stimulated, since the publication of the agenda, by the intimation that a 10 per cent tariff on imports into the United Kingdom may be proposed "for revenue purposes," and by the recent action of New Zealand in ending the preferential duties on Canadian automobiles, engines, and tires in retaliation for Canada's increase in the duty on New Zealand butter to four cents a pound. The one disturbing political issue is the demand of Premier Hertzog of South Africa for a formal declaration by the conference of the right of a dominion to secede. There seems no reason to believe, as yet at least, that Mr. Hertzog is planning to lead South Africa out of the empire, but he is determined to extract from the conference, if he can, an affirmation of the constitutional right to withdraw. The mere suggestion is well calculated to give British imperialism a jolt.

DOOR TEAMWORK at Washington again! On August 21, just at the outset of the Congressional campaign, certain misguided Treasury officials let it be known that, in view of the falling off in revenues, hope of continuing the 1 per cent cut in the income tax voted last December had been practically abandoned. For some strange reason the President was reported as being disturbed at the publication of such "premature" predictions, and after a series of conferences on the following day he gave out a statement saying that "there is no ground now for the predictions in the press this morning," while Secretary Mellon valiantly proclaimed "a very real hope" that the tax cut would stay. We pointed out last December that, whatever might be said for the tax reduction on political or "psychological" grounds, it had no fiscal justification. During the fiscal year up to August 15 treasury revenues were $54,000,000 below last year's figures, partly owing to decline in customs receipts, and there is already unpleasant talk of financing the Farm Board by loans and using the interest payments of foreign governments for current expenses instead of debt reduction. It is to be hoped that the Treasury in hard times will stand stiffly for sound policies, a thing easy enough to do in prosperous days; but the greatest secretary since Alexander Hamilton has heretofore shown himself not wholly immune to political considerations.

THE SELECTION of Henry P. Fletcher to be chairman of the new Tariff Commission indicates that the President intends at least to put a respectable front on that body. Under his predecessors it reached a depth of degradation unusual even in the sordid history of tariff exaction, and it will be pleasant if the entire personnel of the reorganized body is such as to command a reasonable measure of public confidence. The appointment of Mr. Fletcher is reported as encouraging hope in Europe, but nobody acquainted with tariff history is likely to imagine that the board will be allowed to do anything important in attacking either the iniquities or the imbecilities of the Smoot-Hawley act; and both the absurd theory of the present flexible provision and the treatment of the commission itself during the past ten years are calculated to scare off competent students from accepting membership if the President should happen to offer it to such. The appointment of Mr. Fletcher is, indeed, interpreted as meaning that the President intends to have a commission "like-minded" with himself in order to keep administration of the flexible provision in his own hands. Where then is the separation of the legislative and the executive power? With inquiries into more than a hundred rates ordered by Congress and with the commission already initiating twenty-seven such investigations, the outlook is poor for that perfect business peace which the tariff was to bring.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF grows more pressing. The Census Bureau officially announces its finding of 2,508,151 persons out of a job, able to work, and looking for a job in April—a figure which, of course, does not pretend to represent the total unemployment. In New York a municipal employment bureau, tardily established, was stormed in its first days of operation by 15,000 workless men and women, of whom it could find places for only 685. Under such conditions, Washington still makes no attempt to rouse the country to organized effort. Indeed, Secretary Davis, in announcing the personnel of the President's commission on unemployment statistics, which will meet in October, had the temerity to say he believed a study of statistics would reveal a steady decrease of unemployment. Canada affords a pleasing contrast. Mr. Robertson, Minister of Labor in the new Bennett Government, immediately called for reports from provincial ministries and city authorities estimating the amount of unemployment and the prospects for the winter, in order to get at least some idea of the actual extent of the problem, summoned a meeting of the national Employment Service Council in order to get its advice, and on this basis proposes to formulate a relief program for submission to a special session of Parliament. The possibilities of immediate public action outside the field of actual charitable relief, in a critical unemployment situation like the present one, are unfortunately limited, but the possibilities of public education for better action in future are enormous.

THE SUPREME COURT of Pennsylvania has rendered the only possible decision in the partisan effort to steal from Gifford Pinchot the votes cast for him in Luzerne County during the Republican primary. Because the ballots were all perforated by a machine—as they had been before—the Francis Shunk Brown organization undertook to have them cast out as illegally marked. An unfavorable decision would have robbed Mr. Pinchot of the regular nomination. This verdict makes him indisputably the legal party standard bearer in the battle for the governorship with only a wet Democrat opposing him. That, however, will only increase the efforts to defeat him. The machine's trustiest boys are to be allowed to slip over into the Democratic camp and the wets in the Republican camp are determined to beat him, too. In this year of that great revolt against the Eighteenth Amendment it would never do to have a dry chosen Governor of Pennsylvania for the second time. Yet we have the faith to believe that he will win; some good news must come out of the Keystone State once in a while, and when we look at the Republican candidate for Senator, we are assured that Providence could not possibly seat him and defeat Mr. Pinchot at one and the same time.

THE GASTONIA CONVICTIONS of seven men, some of them Communists, whom a lower court found guilty of second-degree murder, have been sustained on appeal by the North Carolina Supreme Court. Of the more than one hundred exceptions taken by the defense to the rulings of the trial judge, M. V. Barnhill, special interest attached to those which had to do with the political opinions and religious beliefs of some of the accused strikers. The Supreme Court affirmed the propriety of cross-examining Fred E. Beal, Southern organizer of the National Textile Workers' Union, regarding the Communist principles of the strike leaders, and of Mrs. Clarence Miller, wife of another defendant, regarding her own religious beliefs, the cross-examination disclosing that Mrs. Miller was an atheist. If the decision of the State Supreme Court is good law, there would seem to be no limit beyond which a court may not go in examining an accused person or his family, relatives, and friends where public opinion demands a conviction. The sentences imposed by the lower court carry imprisonment for from five to twenty years. The International Labor Defense has asked for a stay of execution of the sentences until October and a new hearing before the North Carolina Supreme Court, and an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is also planned.

BIRTH CONTROL has received a weighty indorsement, albeit a carefully guarded and limited one, from the Lambeth Conference, and Anglican circles in England are busily debating the good or evil that the pronouncement may bring on. The conservative bishops could hardly have been expected to avoid saying, as they did, that birth control must be practiced in accordance with Christian principles, that "motives of selfishness, luxury, or mere convenience" are to be strongly condemned, and that the institution of the family must be scrupulously preserved; but since a good many Christians appear already to have decided that it is quite right not to have children unless they are wanted, neither Anglicans nor Nonconformists are likely to have much difficulty in interpreting the Lambeth pronouncement as conveying all the spiritual approbation they need. The Anglo-Catholics of the Establishment, who are much nearer to Rome than they are to even an episcopal Protestantism, are of course up in arms, and it is reported that their leader, the Rt. Rev. Charles Gore, former Bishop of Oxford and an irreconcilable opponent of birth control, may come out with a formal protest. On other matters the conference does not appear to have registered much progress, and church unity, save for unimportant mergers of sects here or there, seems as remote as ever from practical realization.

NOT SINCE WORD CAME that in the unutterably desolate wastes of the Lena Delta Chief Engineer George W. Melville had found the bodies of Commander DeLong and his lost associates of the Jeannette has as pathetic and stirring a report come out of the Arctic as the news of the finding of Salomon-Auguste Andrée and his two associates. Their balloon voyage was an effort to adapt an imperfectly developed instrument of exploration a full generation ahead of the proper time. As we now know from a letter of Fridtjof Nansen, republished by the New York Times, Andrée realized that his quest of the North Pole by balloon was hopeless. He had the courage, he told Nansen, to admit his defeat once; he lacked it to return a second time with nothing accomplished—death was preferable. And so he and his two fellow-voyagers have lain in their Arctic tombs of ice these thirty-three years. The world has moved on; a World War has been fought and lost by all concerned; a new machine of the air has conquered the North Pole, and then the South. Andrée and his men have slept on undisturbed until now. Who knows? May not some new explorer yet reveal the fate of Sir John Franklin and the one hundred and forty-six who sought the Northwest Passage? Even as we write, word comes of two Canadian fliers taking off from Fort Hearne for King William's Land, where these Arctic pioneers are supposed to have perished.

FATE HAS PLAYED no stranger trick of late than that of letting Van Lear Black, the chief owner of the Baltimore Suns, fall to his death from the deck of his yacht after he had flown safely more thousands of miles than any other American aviation enthusiast who was not a professional. With little ostentation Mr. Black has flown repeatedly over Europe, Africa, and the Near East. In 1927, for example, he cruised by air from London to Batavia in the Dutch East Indies in fifteen days. In less than six weeks he was back again, having made the round trip of 20,000 miles in 183½ flying hours. In this very year he flew from London to Tokio and then took ship to San Francisco. From there he flew to Baltimore. Once one of his planes was destroyed in Calcutta in a storm. But it is not merely because of his extraordinary and helpful devotion to aviation that Mr. Black deserves commemoration. As we have said before, he was quite the foremost of the group of enlightened men who made possible the Baltimore Sun and Evening Sun. By no means always in sympathy with the editorial policy of those papers, himself very rich and closely affiliated with the greatest business enterprises in Baltimore and elsewhere, Mr. Black none the less gave a free hand to the editors of his papers, with the result, as we have frequently stated, that they stand in the very forefront of American journalism for intelligence, independence, ability, dignity, honesty, and high journalistic standards. Such papers are so rare in America today that the profession and the public owe a debt of lasting gratitude to Mr. Black and all his associates.

THE UNTIMELY DEATH of Henry Rogers Seager in Kiev on August 23 is a heavy loss to American scholarship and American citizenship. A scholar of catholic tastes, of open mind, of fine scientific temper, and of extraordinarily sound judgment, a teacher of unflagging enthusiasm, a wise counselor and a helpful colleague in all kinds of undertakings both private and public, Professor Seager gave to Columbia University, to New York City, and to the United States a lifetime all too short of devoted and self-forgetting service. Honored by his professional colleagues with the presidency of the American Economic Association, he was constantly called on for advice and aid in important affairs of city, state, and nation. The breadth and depth of his intellectual and practical interests were matched only by the simplicity and friendliness of his character, and thousands of men and women in every part of the country will mourn his death as a distinct personal loss. It was characteristic of the man that his last activity should have been the taking of a party of economists to Russia to make a careful study of the working of the five-year plan. Always he sought the truth, wherever it was to be found, whithersoever it led.

MASS MUSIC PRODUCTION was the dominant note, not to say the leitmotif, of the finale of the recent Chicago Music Festival, sponsored by the Chicago Tribune and thirty-eight newspapers of five surrounding States. Elimination contests resulted in the selection of musical champions of every kind, from soprano soloists to saxophone sextets, and on the final evening a nation-wide radio hookup carried to the remotest parts of the country the music of a band of 1,100 pieces, made up of units from all five States, and the strains of the Hallelujah Chorus sung by a massed chorus of 5,000 voices. A Negro chorus of 1,000 voices sang spirituals; a great band played the Anvil Chorus to the accompaniment of forty electrically charged anvils giving off red, white, and blue sparks; field artillery fired salvos over Lake Michigan as part of the 1812 overture; and finally all the bands and the choruses and the audience in the Soldiers Field Stadium, estimated at 100,000 persons, joined in the national anthem (mercifully America and not the Star Spangled Banner). Next morning there was silence.

Mr. Churchill Runs Amuck

AT its annual gathering at Zurich last week the Second (Socialist) International (not to be confused with the Communist Third) voted its protest against "mad-dog speeches." Well might it, for a few days before, on August 20, Winston Churchill had given voice to one of the worst mad-dog utterances of which we have record. Speaking at the home of the late Lord Curzon at Kent, he declared it certain that Mahatma Gandhi and "a handful of disloyal Indian politicians" would not obtain dominion status in their lifetime, and that the next House of Commons would be less favorable to dominion self-government for India than the present. "It is wiser and safer," said he, "to be blunt and plain, and wrong to encourage false hopes in the minds of the Indian political classes." He added his conviction that the result of a round-table conference would be to make the present confusion worse confounded—"I hope, indeed, it won't be disastrous." After characterizing the leadership of MacDonald as "defeatism in high places which is so rapidly throwing India into chaos," he then accused the MacDonald Government of "trying to breed civil war in Egypt, as one might breed serpents in a zoo."

It would be hard to imagine a speech likely to do more damage. It is the spirit of Lord North and of George III. It embodies the contemptuous self-satisfaction of Lord Cornwallis and Sir Henry Clinton. It is as surely the policy of defeatism as was that of those distinguished generals in North America, and it underestimates the conditions in India as much as the leaders of the British government underestimated the powers of endurance and determination of the American colonies. More than this, this speech explains why it is that while Winston Churchill is admitted even by his bitterest political enemies to be the ablest debater and perhaps the most powerful figure in the House of Commons, no one believes that he can reach the office of Prime Minister, unless there should be complete absence of any other leadership. Certainly his coming to the headship of Great Britain would be a tremendous misfortune for the British people and a menace to the peace of the world. If the policy of blood and iron for India which he advocates in the words we have quoted should prevail, it means that innumerable thousands would perish, and that the British would find themselves shooting down multitudes merely because they refuse to accept the overlordship of the British government at the same value that the Winston Churchill type of Englishman puts upon it.

It is just such an utterance as this, we suppose, that makes Ramsay MacDonald justify himself for withholding as Prime Minister that definite promise of freedom for India which he repeatedly gave prior to his taking office. We can almost hear him say: "You see, if we had taken the extreme position we should have opened the door wide to the Churchills, to the policy of force without stint." To this we should reply that the menace of Churchill is not to be met by compromise and refusal to stand by one's own beliefs and promises, but by clear-cut insistence that right and justice shall prevail in England and likewise in India. If then the British electors should decide that they wished the government to embark on as mad a policy as Churchill suggests, the responsibility would not be upon the Labor Party. Nor would the outcome be uncertain. We have passed that stage of human history when one nation may tyrannize over another merely to obtain some advantage for the nation's pocket. Adam Smith knew the truth about that, for he wrote that "to found a great empire for the sole purpose of raising up a people of customers" is "a project altogether unfit for a nation of shopkeepers, but extremely fit for a nation whose government is influenced by shopkeepers"—or, he might have added, a government influenced by Tories of the Churchill type. Indeed, we have before us the letter of a distinguished British journalist which has just come to hand from London, in which he writes: "We ought to have said to the Indian leaders: 'The political victory is yours. India is to be free; how will you take it?' The quibbling over dominion status, with Lloyd-George and Reading queering Irwin's pitch, has been fatal."

For the battle is lost, and the undeniable fact is that the great government of England in India has gone hat in hand to the silent prisoner in the jail at Poona to ask what he will, and whether through him shall come peace. Only through him can it come. They have isolated him from the world; he may receive no letters and send none. No journalist may go to him, no friend or sympathizer. But his influence upon his people is unshaken. Every bit of unprejudiced evidence that comes out of India shows that British rule is shaken to its very foundations. The Indian cities are even withdrawing their deposits from the British banks. The picketing of cloth shops and drink shops goes on without abatement despite the brutality of the police. British industry totters. Meanwhile on the Peshawar frontier blood flows steadily. No man, outside of a few officials, knows how great is the loss of life, or how many villages have been bombed and destroyed. Even this show of the iron hand does not satisfy Winston Churchill, who feels that the Minister of India, Wedgwood Benn, is "a small man" who, as the problem of India "looms larger and larger, grows smaller and smaller."

What even the Labor leaders do not realize is that if they are not careful they may awake some day to find that, thanks to the Churchills and their fellow-diehards, the hour even for dominion self-government has passed. There was a time during the War of the Revolution when a conciliatory attitude and the readiness to make generous concessions would have saved to England her North American empire. If the Indians are provoked too far they may indeed refuse anything but complete independence. The complete loss of India would be a dreadful blow to England! The blow to her prestige and the effect that that blow would have on her problems in other countries, need not be dwelt upon. That, however, is precisely what the Churchills are courting, and only by a broad and generous attitude and the readiness to make a radical concession can England's prestige in India be saved. Rifles and airplanes will not and cannot do it. The idea that India can hereafter be compelled to be "loyal" to a foreign government is as absurd as it is wicked.

Hail, Sixty-Four!

SIXTY-FOUR men, we learned one day last week (the day before, it was fifty-nine), rule the United States "by virtue of their ability." The preceding day, we and our British brethren learned something else. Let Great Britain only put a Beaverbrook tariff ring fence around the Empire and "give the forty men [that was the number that day] who rule the United States ten years for the development of this industrial empire and no country on this earth could approach it in per capita wealth." Now, our British friends seem too polite to say it in so many words, but we are not; so we will simply observe concerning Mr. James W. Gerard, to whom we owe all this remarkable information, that his lack of understanding of British economic conditions seems to be matched only by his forwardness in rushing in to tell the British people what tariff policy to adopt. Mr. Gerard's divagations as tail of the Beaverbrook kite, however, will have far less interest for the people of this country than will his list of the rulers of the United States.

On that subject Mr. Gerard mixes truth with abundant error, and the truth needs to be sifted out of the error. He compiles a list of financial and industrial leaders, with a few luckless newspaper proprietors and a couple of trade-union politicians thrown in, and declares that they rule us by virtue of their ability. Now, by and large, and making many necessary qualifications, it is doubtless true that Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Mellon and Mr. Morgan and Mr. Baker and the rest of the sixty-four do rule us. It is no less true because Communists and Socialists insist on it, and persist in drawing certain unpleasant conclusions from it. Money talks, and politicians act by orders or on sufferance of financial and industrial rulers, even though the process be not nearly so simple as the critics imagine. But from the days of Aristotle down, the political scientists have pointed out as a fact that the distribution of political power everywhere and always is intimately dependent on the control of property. No competent observer denies it, and certainly Mr. Gerard, with his rich experience in "practical politics," could not help seeing it. If his sixty-four men rule us, as they do despite all disclaimers, then they do it because they control the property of the United States, which is something quite different from what Mr. Gerard says.

What then? How are we to attain liberty in that case? Overthrow the property system, say the Communists, and you destroy the power of the sixty-four, and the people will be free. But this does not follow at all. At present we have a concentration of power, due to the control of property in the hands of the sixty-four, offset to some extent by the conflict of other property interests (those of the farmers, for example) and the other minor forces that make themselves felt in politics. What is the fresh guaranty of liberty involved in concentrating property in the hands of the state, and the power of property, consequently, in the hands of state officials? It may be argued, perhaps, that economic necessity is going to drive us to some such centralized ownership and management of the great industrial machine, but if so, we are simply faced with a new and more difficult problem in the endless war for freedom. At present, the practical problem is how to use the political power of the state to insure the blessings of liberty, if possible, to men without property, as against the economic power of property owners; under communism, it would be how to insure liberty to all citizens as against a state wielding both political and economic power. Our present political task, then, concerns the relation of the state to the men who hold in their hands the economic power of life and death.

But the sixty-four rule, we are told, because of "ability." That ability, however, is of a special, albeit a practical and important kind—the ability to get and manage property. If we are ruled by such ability, it is because we consent to be ruled; and we consent because we value highly the things that it provides us. The sixty-four do not tyrannize over an unwilling people. Whether we shall continue their rule depends ultimately on what we want. Of course it is ridiculously untrue to say that even now sixty-four or sixty-four thousand business leaders absolutely rule us. Ability of other kinds counts. It is eminently desirable for it to play a much larger part, and the present moment, when we have ceased to be besotted with prosperity, is a good time to think soberly just what business rule has and has not given us. Such thought is bound to lead to a decreased emphasis on the importance of more material goods, with a greater attention to rational distribution and to proper conditions of work and leisure, and beyond that to greater consideration of the possibilities of life and happiness that arise out of normal human relations and not out of the getting of wealth at all. To the extent that we make that choice we free ourselves from the present domination of our business leaders. Such a distant consummation is the proper goal of American education and politics.

The Uses of Adversity

FROM the beginning of time the poets and prophets have pointed to the uses of adversity. "In the day of prosperity be joyful" says the author of Ecclesiastes, "but in the day of adversity consider." Bacon reminds us that "prosperity does best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue." And Shakespeare, of course:

> Sweet are the uses of adversity;
> Which like the toad, ugly and venomous,
> Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.

Our modern sages rediscover the ancient truth. Mr. Henry Ford, in fact, not only discovers that adversity has its compensations, but seems to regard it as being better than prosperity—or at all events, better than last year's prosperity. "Recovery from any kind of sickness is always a good thing," he is quoted as remarking, "even though it is accompanied with considerable pain and inconvenience. But everybody is mistaking the recovery for the sickness. The country is far better off today than it was a year ago when the people were fairly crazy with stock speculation fever." And Mr. Calvin Coolidge finds that "the increase of 1½ per cent in the sales of life insurance for the first seven months of the year is wonderfully encouraging."

Mr. Coolidge's statement of fact is correct, even if the conclusions he draws from it are somewhat too comfortable. He might have supplemented his encouraging fact from the reports of savings banks. For the six months ended June last the country's mutual savings banks reported a gain in deposits of $274,000,000, compared with a loss of $83,000,000 in the last six months of 1929, when savings were being drawn upon to protect stock-market margins. At the end of June the total deposits of the mutual savings banks reached $9,146,000,000, the highest on record. This year, for the first time in six years, the savings banks of New York State reported a net gain in deposits in July. Deposits in July were actually $4,000,000 less than in July a year ago; it was the fact that withdrawals were $44,000,000 less than July last year that converted a net loss in deposits of $28,000,000 then into a net gain of $12,000,000 in July this year.

Thus adversity discourages gambling and reckless spending and forces us back to the homely virtue of thrift, and it does this not only for individuals but for the great corporations as well. When profits are high, wasteful methods of business tend to set in; but narrow profits or heavy deficits compel the study of economies and more efficient productive methods, which continue in force when prosperity returns again. Thus the railroads during the trying times beginning in 1920 and 1921 initiated large-scale economies which brought down the ratio of operating costs to revenues from 77¾ per cent in 1923 to 72⅜ per cent in 1927. Current discussion in railroad circles indicates that somewhat the same process may be under way at the present time, and there is little doubt that when we come out of the present depression, not only the railroads, but all the major industries will be operating with a degree of economy and efficiency that was unnecessary in the piping times of 1929. The several million unfortunates thrown out of employment may be forgiven if they do not quite understand Mr. Ford's meaning, but there is truth even in his assertion that one of the advantages of the present depression is that we have been "compelled to take a dose of that old-fashioned medicine, real work."

It is a gain, too, that economic romanticism has been succeeded by economic realism. At the peak of last year's stock market there was no longer any intelligible relation between the actual earnings of a company and the price of its stock. In the main, two emotional slogans had taken the place of cold arithmetic. One of these held that "You can't be a bear on the U. S. A." and the other that we had entered a "new era" where the old economic rules no longer applied. However sound the first may have been as a long-run principle, it proved costly to those who felt they could apply it to any stock at any price; and it has since been discovered that new eras can show distressing similarities to old eras.

Present conditions, however, provide something else than an opportunity for facile moralizing. Perhaps the greatest value of the present depression may prove to be the fact that it will force us as a nation to confront the problem of unemployment more seriously. Unemployment does not appear merely in periods of general depression; there are always special industries that are slowly dying and dropping men, and there are always industries throwing men suddenly out of work when new labor-saving devices are introduced. In ordinary times legislators and public officials remain callously indifferent to the fate of these men; we have not yet learned to accept public responsibility for them. If existing conditions should lead to the adoption of well-thought-out plans of unemployment insurance perhaps they will have been worth their heavy cost.

Intellectuals in Politics

THE scholar in politics has been a good deal under suspicion since Henry Cabot Lodge, historian and biographer, turned out to be as much of a machine politician as any of his Senatorial colleagues, and most people have concluded that neither President Roosevelt nor President Wilson did much credit to American intellectuals. Ever since the World War cast a blight over free thought and free speech, the intellectuals have avoided politics about as they would the plague, denouncing it from time to time as dirty business but giving no help in making it better. Only here or there has a scholar, or writer, or teacher, or thinker been willing to stand for an elective office, and most of them have had their trouble for their pains.

The consequences have been mad for the state and bad for the intellectuals. The practical work of government has been left to men who, for the most part, had at best only a nodding acquaintance with culture and at worst an open contempt for everything that culture means. In most other countries public service, and the political activities which go with it, have seemed to the intellectuals worth while. The rosters of the English House of Commons or the French Chamber of Deputies contain the names of a fair number of scholars or writers whom the intellectual world regards as important, and virtually every German Minister is likely to be a Ph.D. In the United States, a surprising number of men who are entitled to be called professor seem nervously anxious to keep the fact dark, and doctors of philosophy or writers of books are as scarce in the Senate or House of Representatives as are millionaires in Grub Street.

That is why the appearance of Heywood Broun as a Socialist candidate for Congress in a hardboiled conservative district in New York City is an event of national significance. Mr. Broun is not a scholar as the technicalities go, and he would be like a bull in a china shop if he were placed in a professor's chair. He is a man of letters, a writer of force and charm, and an independent and constructive thinker. His daily columns in the New York Telegram and his weekly articles in The Nation have been read and admired by tens of thousands for their humor, their shrewd observations regarding people and events, and their unsparing exposure of shams. If a head needs hitting, Mr. Broun is rather likely to hit it, and an immense audience recognizes the deftness and vigor of the blow.

Mr. Broun's irruption into politics ought to make American intellectuals sit up and take notice. It does not matter so much, for the moment at least, whether he is elected or not; we fancy that he himself will not change his gait or go to bed an hour earlier either way. What matters a great deal is that he has gone into the fight because the fight needed him, and because an intellectual assault on the Park Avenue mind is the best possible way to wake up other intellectuals and set them at work. We hope he may win, not because he is a Socialist, or a columnist, or an all-round good fellow, nor because Washington needs a dash of color against its walls of drab, but because he is an intellectual. If Heywood Broun can go to Congress, so can other intellectuals. That would bring a day of saving grace.

Government and Business*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THAT there is a distinct infelicity between business and government must be perfectly obvious. If there were a great domestic-relations court to deal with them these two unhappy parties would appear before it on endless occasions, in endless roles. Day by day new problems and new difficulties arise. The hurly-burly increases; it never dies down. At bottom, it is all, of course, a struggle between government and the selfish motive of private profit which actuates so many of our citizens. That profit motive is deemed in capitalist states as an indispensable wellspring of ambition if mankind is to advance, the Russian Communists being ridiculed for daring to assert that they can change human nature, substitute interest in the general welfare for interest in private profit, and still expect industry, ambition, and the determination to rise to manifest themselves among the masses of the people. Between the two extremes there is every variation, but this paper is concerned only with recording certain of the contradictory phases of the struggle in this country.

In the first place, let it be established that the relationship of our government to business becomes steadily closer and closer; that where there is one example of our government retiring from a business into which it has entered, such as its steady withdrawal from its war-time mercantile-shipping enterprise, there are a dozen others in which it recognizes its moral responsibility to curb the appetites and control the ambitions of those whose business daring leads them into new fields, like the radio, or into combinations of larger and larger units.

Thus we find government policies changing with extraordinary speed, and the opinions of the public and the business world as well. What could be more remarkable, for example, than our government's change of front on the proposed merger of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific railroads? Mr. Roosevelt's successful attack, in 1904, upon the Northern Securities Company, formed to merge these two roads, was thought by many to be the high point of his administration. Today, only twenty-six years later, we find the government not only approving the merger of these two roads, but through the Interstate Commerce Commission actually planning the combination. Even more remarkable is the fact that not until months after this was proposed did any opposition manifest itself among the farmers, who have not even yet asked that the $10,000,000 the railroads plan to save by this merger be shared with them in the form of lower rates. Is the change due to a wiser afterthought or to altered economic conditions?

Again, when war came it seemed natural and wise for the government to take over and operate the railroads, shipping, and coal mines, to supervise our agriculture and many industrial enterprises. Everybody acquiesced and nobody questioned. The government was urged to take over forests, factories, plants of every kind, to build docks, shipyards, railroads, whole villages and towns. Nobody declared that this was socialistic or communistic. It was just necessary, in order to coordinate all the forces of the nation, to forge the thunderbolts needed to destroy the German military power.

When the war ended, the government made haste to restore the property it had taken and operated and give it back to our wasteful, uncoordinated, inefficient, individualistic, competitive industrial system. Business was insistent that it should do so—even though the coal mines, for example, reverted to conditions notoriously bad, which in many cases made the earning of adequate profits impossible. Plainly, we have here a very great difference between peace and war. What is good for us when we are all trying to murder a lot of other human beings across the seas is bad for us when we are devoting ourselves to the homespun duties of caring for wives and children in obedience to the private-profit motive.

Occasionally, however, we do slip back. The newly established Federal Farm Board, for example, is an effort to deal with agriculture as a whole. This new deal was brought about, not by the national emergency of war, but by the emergency of bad times. I had expected that cries of socialism would be raised against it by an outraged business world, but business, suddenly acutely conscious of a falling-off in the farmers' buying power, did not make serious opposition. So the government supplied $200,000,000 to a board to coordinate the entire industry, to teach it to buy and sell cooperatively. But the board went far beyond that, undertaking the suicidal policy of attempting from Washington to peg the prices of world commodities, with the result that its losses to date are variously estimated at between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000. Surely the government never went into business more deeply or more disastrously.

This brings us to one of the most striking facts in this whole tangled field of industrial and government relations, and that is that government regulation, or operation, or ownership is never socialistic, or in any way reprehensible, when the business it regulates or takes over is in straits or bankrupt. Of this the classic example is the Cape Cod Canal. This waterway was dug by private capital under a license granted by the State of Massachusetts. When it was urged that the canal should be built and operated by the government, the immediate reply was that such an undertaking would interfere unduly in private business. The projectors, all prominent financiers in Boston and New York, were sure that they had a gold mine. Unfortunately for them, their prognostications were entirely at fault. They could not so much as pay interest on the mortgage, or even adequately repair their works. Then a miracle happened. It suddenly became clear to all involved that the government should own this canal because of its great value in war time as a short cut on the route from New York to Boston. From that moment everybody forgot about the wickedness of the government's intervening in private business. After years of intense lobbying in Washington, the Congress was induced to pay some $10,000,000 for a bankrupt concern whose waterway was not even being adequately dredged.

* An address at the Institute of Public Affairs, University of Virginia, August 12, 1930.

Can anyone doubt that if conditions should arise in this country making it impossible for the railroads to finance themselves adequately and easily, the movement for government ownership of them would increase tremendously? Again, consider the recent public declaration of Owen Young, chairman of the Radio Corporation of America, that if the government did not permit a union of the two telegraph companies, the radio company, and other transmission concerns in the international communication field, he would favor government ownership and operation for all of them. In other words, if he could not amalgamate these companies and run them just as he wished, he favored unloading the whole business upon Washington without asking whether that would be socialism or communism or anything else. If he could not bring about amalgamation, he wanted to get out from under, because the enterprises involved could not, he said, compete with foreign rivals.

Let us turn to the tariff. Most persons think of it merely as a means of choking off foreign competition, and they welcome it as such despite the fact that they have been brought up to believe that competition is the life of trade. The public does not realize that when the government grants a tariff to a given industry, because that industry is not satisfied with the profits it can make without the tariff, it is becoming a partner in the business, and is far from being a sleeping or silent partner. In many cases, government cooperation in choking the normal processes of trade between nations is declared to be the one thing that keeps a particular business alive. For instance, the cane growers of Louisiana have succeeded in convincing the government, particularly by means of political persuasion, that cane growing in Louisiana is so vital to the future of the country as to make it just and right to tax everybody else to keep the cane growers in a business which they say could not stand on its own legs for two minutes without this government aid. Here again we find that the government's mixing into private business in this manner, joining with it to regulate its profits, is a highly beneficent action, of such far-reaching value as to lead a great many people to attribute to this policy the great industrial development of the United States. The very captains of industry who protested against the establishment of a Federal Trade Commission and other regulatory bodies on the ground that they were bringing government more and more into the field of private business eagerly urge the government to participate in the development of manufacturing industry by means of a tariff.

Let us enter one more field—that of the railroads. When peace was declared, the public was no longer entitled to the benefits which accrued to the country from the operation of the railroads as a whole. The government, therefore, turned the roads back to private operation, yet decided that a certain amount of consolidation and cooperation was desirable. It was a difficult task for the Interstate Commerce Commission to decide just how much cooperation is justifiable in peace times as contrasted with war times, but it finally decided that in place of one group there should be seventeen groups. Into each of these groups it put some strong, prosperous railroads, but also some weak and comparatively inefficient ones. Despite the putting together of such competitive lines as the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern, it has been maintained that this regrouping of the railroads upholds the sacred principle of competition. The commission has cut out the competitive waste and duplication of effort to just the degree that it considers best for us, and left sufficient waste and duplication to make us feel at home in the new situation. Though the railroads are generally dissatisfied, business is convinced that by this action the specter of government operation and ownership has again been laid. Business is very careful never to remind the public that the United States government now owns and operates two railroad lines, one of which is nearly a thousand miles long, and operates them apparently with complete satisfaction to the public; the one is in Alaska, the other parallels the Panama Canal.

Next let us consider how far the government's anti-trust policy has affected the development of business. There is no doubt that the anti-trust laws still have some deterrent effect. If it were not for fear of the law, I believe that every single steel and iron company would be under one management today. That has actually almost come to pass in Germany, where last fall there was created a cartel embracing almost every steel plant in Germany. Precisely as in Russia, the German steel and iron industry has thus become an organic whole. In Germany, however, the vast power thus created is controlled by a group of private individuals, whereas in Russia the similar trust is managed by that most wicked of persons, a Bolshevik official. Let our government return to a laissez faire policy for the railroads, and a J. P. Morgan, a modern Harriman, or another James J. Hill would within the space of a very few years bring the railroads of the country under one control.

The successful demand for a powerful commission in Washington to control all power companies is due to the belief that unless something is done there will soon be one company controlling not only all the power plants and public utilities in the United States, but also all between the Rio Grande and the Straits of Magellan. Four years ago five companies controlled 47 per cent of the nation's power output, the next eight in size controlled another 23 per cent, and the next seven 14 per cent. These first twenty produced more than 50,000,000,000 kilowatt hours of the total of 61,000,000,000 generated, or about 83 per cent. During the past four years this concentration has gone on apace. In the public-utility field 402 companies disappeared in 1925, 1,029 in 1926, 911 in 1927, and 892 in 1928. Of the mergers in 1927, 54 were of holding companies taken over by other holding companies. As this address is being written comes the news that the Mellon interests have purchased a substantial share in the $1,200,000,000 Electric Power Corporation, formed last year by the American Founders-United Founders group.

In the field of banking the trend is the same. From 1922 to 1925 the number of mergers hovered between 120 and 125 per year, rising to 154 in 1926 and 259 in 1927. Eighty per cent of the capitalization of all the banks of the country is now said to be in the hands of twelve financial concerns and, as John Dewey has just written, "it is evident that virtual control of the other 20 per cent, except for negligible institutions having only local importance, automatically ensues." If the financial power of the country as centered in our banks should fall into the hands of two or three groups, would not the government have to insist on a much closer control than the present one? If we turn to other American industries we find the same trend. There is nothing more striking than the mergers and amalgamations in the newspaper field and the sudden rise of newspaper chains under a single management. In the automobile field 75 per cent of the annual sales are in the hands of two companies, and it is believed that some of the weaker companies will be compelled to amalgamate before 1930 ends. In the moving-picture industry 5,000 of the 20,000 theaters are in the hands of the large producers and distributors of films.

In the field of oil production we have perhaps the most bizarre situation of all. Last year the private-profit method of exploiting natural resources had finally brought us to the point where we were producing at the rate of 485,000,000 barrels of oil a year more than we needed. The petroleum producers became alarmed and petitioned the government to limit the 1929 production in the country to the 1928 level—another case of industry throwing itself into the arms of that dreadful person the government because its profits were beginning to fall to a dangerous degree. But the naughty Attorney General ruled that the proposed restrictive arrangement was price fixing and therefore illegal—a blow at the Hoover policy of intertrade agreements, whereupon the oil men made plans to limit production anyhow and take a chance in the courts. This year finds the oil companies in still greater distress, with several new fields opened up, and so we have the comical situation that the companies want limitation, most people want it, and the government wants it, but nobody dares practice it because of our theory of government called rugged individualism and a statute called the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Surely the demonstration is complete as to where the private-profit motive is leading us, and where it would lead us if our government were to take its hands off.

In view of the fact that President Hoover is reported to be in favor of repealing the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, and has encouraged the coming together of manufacturers in all lines of enterprise to formulate intertrade agreements in order to cut out waste, duplication, and the creation of unnecessary articles, the question is sometimes raised whether we are not coming to the Communist ideal from another point of approach. May we not see within a few years here the duplication of the German iron and steel cartel in every line of industry? Certainly fewer and fewer people believe that the private-profit motive when left alone to exploit the riches of the earth is harmless, or even beneficial in the absence of monopoly. More and more people are beginning to see that uncontrolled exploitation of natural resources means waste, high cost, ruin of the small producers, and, finally, grave overproduction endangering all concerned. No thoughtful person can watch this spectacle without realizing that a new way of living must be found. They recall that when we wanted to win a war and were told that oil and steel and rubber meant human lives we immediately threw our whole existing system overboard, and authorized the social control, not only of natural resources, but of key industries. Should this policy be carried out to its logical conclusion—something that I beg you to believe I am not today advocating—we should find ourselves with every business organized into a trust, controlled by a small group of men, and strictly regulated by a government commission.

No man is wise enough today to say just where the final answer lies, but one thing we may lay down as axiomatic. Our own problem can be paralleled in every other highly industrialized country. Any final solution must establish free trade among all the peoples, must abolish cutthroat and wasteful economic competition, and, most important of all, must abolish war between nations.

As immediate steps in this country I would recommend government ownership of railroads, pipe lines, and coal mines, and their operation by the government. I note with great interest that Mr. Frank Haas, a prominent mining engineer of Philadelphia, in speaking before the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, has just advocated government ownership of coal lands with private operation, because "the average coal operator is losing money, notwithstanding a firm conviction on the part of the consumer that he pays too much for his coal." Mr. C. E. Bockus, president of the National Coal Association, on the same occasion declared that the industry is suffering from "uneconomic, unreasonable, and unfair competition," and from an overproduction that has driven the average of prices "below the cost of production with any fair recompense for the capital expended in the industry." What we should strive for, of course, is the control of all our natural resources that have not yet gone into the hands of private owners for private profit. In the water-power field quick action is of enormous importance. If we retain the fee simple, we may grant licenses for operation under strict conditions insuring rates based on bona fide capital investment and not upon items such as huge and unreasonable fees to bankers, payments to lobbyists and other more than dubious items which have often been charged as part of the original investment.

In cases where government operation seems necessary, I commend the story of the Inland Waterways Corporation (as described at length in The Nation of June 18, 1930), an agency of the War Department for developing inland waterways, which under the headship of Major General T. Q. Ashburn has made a complete success of a barge line upon the Mississippi River where private capital facing private competition failed. Between 1920 and 1924 the government, operating the waterways directly, lost one million dollars. Today the corporation is paying a profit of $125,000 a year into the United States Treasury. In passing, it is interesting to note that General Ashburn has testified that in the five years during which he has been head of the company he has never been approached for political purposes or for patronage by any member of Congress or any politician.

To many, I presume, these suggestions will seem radical and dangerous, socialistic, perhaps even communistic. Let us not be afraid of adjectives. The Interstate Commerce Commission was denounced at its inception as highly dangerous and highly socialistic. No railroad president today would think of recommending its abolition, of returning to the previous state of affairs. That the times are changing, the facts I have set down prove. If we are to do anything else but drift we must recognize the fact that the competitive system has failed at many points, must begin to do at once what has been done abroad—formulate far-reaching economic and political programs to deal with the new situation. Sooner or later this will have to be done. We too are part of a world current; it is sweeping us onward. Shall we drift through the rapids without thought as to what may happen to us, or shall we set ourselves a course and hold it true? That is the question which confronts us all.

North Carolina Keeps Faith

By EDGAR W. KNIGHT

THE recent election of Frank Graham, over his protest, to the presidency of the University of North Carolina, to succeed Dr. Harry W. Chase, who goes to the presidency of the University of Illinois, is viewed generally as an event of immense educational significance for the South. And if the wide editorial comment is representative of real opinion, this forty-four-year-old, many-sided, popular scholar, teacher, and bachelor becomes head of his Alma Mater with wider approval than could have been given any other man.

Graham is favorably known in every nook and corner of North Carolina. He calls by their first names more people than any other man in the State and is addressed by more people in the same intimate manner. For twenty-five years, since he entered the University of North Carolina as a freshman in 1905, he has been closely identified with the life of the institution and its students and alumni. Although his qualities are not those which commend men to the favor of political bosses, it is probable that Frank Graham could have any office in the gift of the citizens of North Carolina, but he is not political-minded, nor has he personal ambition. His ambition is for the institution in which he has invested his life for a quarter of a century.

Only five feet six and weighing but 130 pounds, he combines in his "astounding personality," as the Baltimore Evening Sun characterizes it, high intellectual ability, convictions that are firm but free from intolerance, an unbounded patience, limitless energy, an enthusiasm almost apostolic in its fervor, an extraordinary capacity and natural felicity for finding a direct way into personal and public confidence, and, above all, a quiet willingness to be forgotten. Sometimes he seems to throw himself into life about him with the naive imprudence of a child, whether he is going about his routine college duties, planning the program for a social-service conference, organizing college men and women in some public enterprise, making a high-school commencement talk, addressing a Rotary Club, counseling in a faculty committee or in a meeting of the State Library Commission, or protesting in a public statement against bigotry or social injustice in the commonwealth. Forthright in all that he does and says, he sees and cries out against the faults and absurdities of men and manners, but always with fairness and a sympathetic tenderness for the underprivileged. No Southerner of this generation is more fully aware than Graham of the weaknesses of his fellow-Southerners and his section of the country.

Graham's sympathetic and broad understanding of the functions of a university in a modern State heartens his colleagues and the other friends of education. He believes in teaching, in research, in extension, and all of these he has helped to encourage. An inspiring and effective teacher —last year the senior class voted him one of the best teachers in the university—his energies have gone largely into the work of the classroom, but he sees his students outside as well. He goes to a mass-meeting of students to "pep" them up on the eve of a football game with Carolina's ancient rival, Virginia, gives a Phi Beta Kappa address, attends a meeting of the local post of the American Legion, a civic club, or the board of trustees of the children's library, or deliberates with the president's advisory committee, with the same energy and eagerness.

His interest, notwithstanding his training in history, is not in remote and obscure phases of the human record but in the present scene. Largely through his inspiration and leadership a bond issue of $20,000,000 was provided by the legislature in 1921 for the educational and charitable institutions of the State. He was the leader in a recent movement to lift North Carolina from the humiliating last place in the American Union in public-library facilities. "We mean to hew to the line and cut through ignorance, indifference, inertia, and inequality until every person has equal public access to books in every county in North Carolina," proclaimed Graham.

Five years ago, when shock troops of the fundamentalists sought the committee rooms and the floors of the legislature of North Carolina in a frenzied effort to restrict freedom of teaching in the schools of the State, Graham was studying in Europe. He promptly sent to the press of the State a carefully prepared statement on "Evolution, the University, and the People" in which he appealed to the people of the State to fight against the "false fear of truth and the foes of freedom" and to hold "the first-line trench against bigotry and this ancient tyranny in its latest form. Freedom to think, freedom to speak, and freedom to print are the texture of our university standard, on which Lux—Libertas is inscribed. . . . Legislative appropriations may come down for a time, but Lux—Libertas never!" The effort failed that year, but was revived two years later. Graham, now returned to his history classroom on Chapel Hill, went boldly into the heart of the fundamentalist province and helped to stop the movement dead in its tracks.

Graham's keen sense of social justice has been conspicuously illustrated in connection with the recent industrial conflicts in North Carolina. He has lectured and written and talked with leaders as a flaming apostle of a better social order in a State that now has new problems to face. He has worked as probably no other private individual has done to have North Carolina adjust itself to the changes produced by industrialization without the tragic cost entailed in industrial revolution elsewhere. This was Graham's theme a year ago when, as president of the North Carolina Conference for Social Service, he pleaded for a commonwealth > . . . where individualism will not mean the freedom of any individual to impair the lives of other men but will mean such social control as will guarantee the freedom of every individual to make the most of his personality; where machines shall not, through the long watches of a sixty-hour week, tyrannize over the bodies and spirits of men; where children in factories shall become children in school; where there shall be no industrial night work for women.

Last winter, after months of disorders in Gastonia and Marion, Graham drew up and addressed to the people of North Carolina a statement of principles, which in substance asked that the constitutional and legal rights of person and property and lawful freedom of speech and assembly be guaranteed equally to all persons in North Carolina without regard to birthplace, race, ownership, or labor status, unionism or non-unionism, religion, politics, or economic views; that these rights are the essentials of Americanism and "without faithless violation, can stand against the fallacies, fanaticism, and violence of communism, fascism, and anarchism, with the due processes of light, liberty, and law"; and that if these ideals of American freedom are preserved, "the fair and open resources of American democracy will prevail over class hatreds and dictatorships, economic unreason and social injustice." The statement also declared for the "equal right of the investors of capital and management and the investors of human life and labor to bargain collectively"; and called for a nation-wide, nonpartisan economic and social survey and analysis of the textile industry in America. More than four hundred men and women signed the statement, which was published in the press of the State and was, of course, denounced as communistic and dangerous, although it was in large part only an indorsement of the Bill of Rights.

If there were those who looked upon Graham as radical in his social views, however, their opinions had no weight with the trustees of the State university, who appear to be determined to keep it the liberal and progressive institution it has always been. Under his leadership the group at Chapel Hill will lose none of its militant aggressiveness, and that will be fortunate for the South. He brings to his new responsibility a larger respect and confidence of the student body, the faculty, the trustees, and the people of the State at large than is enjoyed by any other individual in North Carolina. His selection, in view of the record of the past ten years, is of happy augury for university leadership in progressive movements.

Graham is a native of the State and comes of a family of teachers. His father, Dr. Alexander Graham, superintendent emeritus of the Charlotte public schools, is known as the father of the graded-school system of North Carolina. His cousin, the late Dr. Edward Kidder Graham, was the brilliant president of the University of North Carolina from 1914 to 1918, and gave to the institution its greatest impetus since the Civil War. President Graham was educated in the public schools and the University of North Carolina, at Columbia University, at the University of Chicago, and in Europe. He has taught in North Carolina high schools, and for sixteen years has served the university as instructor and professor of history. He is not, however, an approved product of the graduate school, and scholastically he is unconventional; but he has broad culture, high standards, intellectual honesty, capacity as a speaker, progressive spirit, and freedom from provincial limitations. He is not essentially a fiscal agent or a bookkeeper, and it remains to be seen how well he can administer a university budget and keep sweet while handling the hideous details that crowd upon a university executive. But if any crafty North Carolina politician indulges the conceit that he can deceive the new president of the university, he is headed for disappointment; and if that institution does not go forward under the leadership of Graham then we may as well adjourn higher education in North Carolina.

New Economic Blocs in Europe

By FRIEDRICH SCHEU

Vienna, August 10

THE recent agrarian conferences in Southeastern Europe (at Bucharest between Rumania, Jugoslavia, and Hungary, and later at Sinaia between Rumania and Jugoslavia) have created quite a stir in European political circles. They are symptoms of the growing strength of the regional movement, as opposed to the international and national movements. At present limited to the economic field, this development may become politically important.

The conference at Bucharest was a first-class political paradox; for the hatred between the Little Entente—Czecho-Slovakia, Jugoslavia, and Rumania—on the one hand and Hungary on the other has been generally regarded as one of the few permanent facts in the varying political alignments of Europe. And yet, here were Rumania and Jugoslavia amicably discussing a customs union and an "agrarian bloc" with their ancient foe, Hungary, while their political ally, Czecho-Slokavia, was left conspicuously outside.

The reasons for the political antagonism between Hungary and its neighbors are, of course, well known. Since the peace treaty of the Trianon Hungary has carried on at home and abroad a continuous agitation for the return of its lost provinces. It has also clearly expressed its intention to recall to the throne at the first convenient moment the Hapsburg family, which has never given up its claims to the territories it ruled before the war, including Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, and large parts of what is now Rumania, Jugoslavia, and Poland. These points of conflict remain. Nevertheless, the symptoms of a better understanding deserve the attention which they are attracting, for they indicate a new tendency in Europe.

The new movement tends toward the formation of regional blocs in Europe. Its first manifestation occurred in Rumania, where the economic policy of the Rumanian Peasants' Party, which is in power there, strikes a new note in the politics of Southeastern Europe. Premier Maniu and his party were carried to power two years ago by the small peasantry. Their predecessors had given the banks and the industrialists everything and the peasants nothing. The present administration has reversed the order. The agrarian crisis has become the government's first consideration, even at the sacrifice of the development of Rumanian industry.

Rumanian agriculture, since it depends upon exports, is suffering heavily because of international tariff walls. The aim of the present government is to find markets abroad. The method is to accord easier conditions of import into Rumania to those industrial countries which are willing in exchange to buy Rumanian wheat and maize. Dr. Madgearu, the economic intellect of the Rumanian Peasants' Party, formerly Finance Minister and now Minister of Commerce, has formulated his economic program in a booklet, "Rumania's New Economic Policy," from which is taken the following characteristic quotation:

> A first corollary of the agrarian orientation in economic policy is the substitution of the principle of economic interdependence for the illusion of economic self-sufficiency. Consequently, our foreign economic policy is directed toward the ideal of international economic cooperation. . . . The new tariff adopted by the Rumanian Parliament last July is inspired by the recommendations and the spirit of Geneva. It is the first customs tariff drawn up since the Geneva conference which represents a lowering of the general tariff level.

The policy of the Rumanian government, which Madgearu calls "agrarianist" in opposition to the "industrialist" policy of other countries, must overcome two difficulties: competition from other agricultural countries and the existing tariffs of the industrial countries. Rumania could, of course, carry on negotiations with its customer countries single-handed, but its position would clearly be far more advantageous if it were not hampered by cutthroat competition from its agricultural neighbors. Rumania, therefore, opened negotiations with Jugoslavia and Hungary looking toward a conference on international agrarian cooperation. The moment was especially favorable, for the return of Prince Carol to Rumania had greatly strengthened the domestic position of the Peasants' Party. Moreover, economic necessities overshadowed political loyalties. The inclusion of Hungary, the traditional enemy, and the exclusion of Czecho-Slovakia on the ground that it is a half-industrial country roused no public protest.

Rumania's invitation to Jugoslavia and Hungary was a surprise to the public; the readiness with which the reactionary Hungarian government and the Jugoslav dictatorship accepted a plan so strongly tinged with progressivism was a greater surprise still. Apparently, neither of them wanted to risk the wrath of their own suffering peasant populations by refusing an advantageous offer. The conferences were preceded, accompanied, and followed by diplomatic moves and counter-moves. Czecho-Slokavian opinion had to be soothed by repeated declarations on the part of Rumania and Jugoslavia that the creation of an economic Little Entente was all the time at the back of their minds though they were actually negotiating an agrarian bloc with Hungary. Poland attempted to wreck the conference by proposing an agrarian bloc to include all Eastern Europe—a scheme so large as to be obviously doomed from the start. Jugoslavia and Rumania, while evading the Polish suggestions, tried to do so in a way that made evasion look like acceptance. Moreover, by issuing ambiguous and contradictory reports the participants managed to keep the actual results of the two agrarian conferences from the knowledge of the world. At the moment the public is not even certain whether the two-party conference at Sinaia was a continuation of the three-party conference at Bucharest, or whether it was a new step undertaken because the results of the first conference were not satisfactory. It is therefore only possible at present to survey the possibilities which were discussed.

It was suggested that agricultural cooperation, whether between two or between three agrarian countries, might either take the form of a common "agricultural-export syndicate" or go farther and lead to a customs union. Export syndicates would probably be built on the model of the Canadian and Australian wheat pools, an export syndicate in each country controlling the buying, storing, and marketing of the agricultural surplus. For the purpose of finding suitable markets and bargaining with industrial countries the three export syndicates would combine. A customs union, going much farther, would create a very strong economic unit in Southeastern Europe, well fitted for bargaining with the European industrial countries. By creating a large unified market for industrial goods, it would be able to obtain from industrial countries conditions favorable to the marketing of Southeastern European agricultural products.

While simple agrarian cooperation was the main theme of the three-nations conference at Bucharest, a customs union was announced as the purpose of the later conference between Rumania and Jugoslavia. Neither of these schemes has as yet been worked out in detail, and to what extent agrarian cooperation will be put into practice during the next few months is uncertain, but other similar movements are already making themselves felt. Poland is calling the agrarian countries of Eastern Europe to a conference at Warsaw at the end of August. It remains to be seen whether this conference has any purpose other than to offer competition against the Southeastern agrarian plan. Greece, Turkey, and Bulgaria are reported to be negotiating a possible "tobacco bloc" on the model of the agrarian bloc. Formation of an economic bloc of the Central European industrial countries in answer to the agrarian bloc is being discussed in Germany, Austria, and Czecho-Slovakia.

An important obstacle in the way of all such attempts is the fact that existing commercial treaties usually contain the most-favored-nation clause. If regional systems, bound together by preferential tariffs, are created, then the existing commercial treaties will have to be renounced unless some technical way is found of evading the most-favored-nation clause. State monopolies of foreign trade would provide such a technical solution.

It remains to speak of the political effects of the new regionalism. It has been customary for a European country to be at loggerheads with its immediate neighbor and at the same time to be politically allied to the country which lies just beyond its neighbor. The relations of France, Germany, and Poland, of France, Italy, and Jugoslavia, and of Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary, and Rumania offer obvious examples. The countries which are now being drawn toward economic union by the force of necessity immediately adjoin each other. Hungary, Rumania, Jugoslavia, organized into an economic bloc, would constitute a unit to be reckoned with politically, as would also a German-Austrian-Czecho-Slovakian bloc, a Turkish-Bulgarian-Greek bloc, or a bloc of the Baltic or Scandinavian states.

Ten years ago internationally minded people all over the world were hoping for a world-wide organization, both political and economic, in which all countries would be included. This hope has been disappointed. Russia, to begin with, could not be included in such a system. America and Europe cannot be expected to form an effective union together. Great Britain more and more draws away from Continental Europe, while the movement for bringing the component parts of the British Empire nearer together grows in force. The Conservatives are advocating Empire free trade; the Labor Party, while rejecting direct protection, is steadily moving in the direction of "bulk purchase and import boards"; and the declarations of the Trade Union Congress, as well as the recent decisions of the Independent Labor Party, leave no doubt that a system of bulk-purchase agreements with the dominions will form an important part of the Labor economic program during the next session.

It would therefore seem that the solution of the European problem lies in an organization of the Continental European countries along the lines of Count Coudenhove-Kalergi's pan-Europe plans or Briand's proposed United States of Europe. But recent experience has shown that even the plan of an organization embracing the Continental countries is beyond present possibilities. Europe is divided into two camps: France and its allies stand against Italy and its allies; Germany is looking on, at present, as a neutral third.

But whereas France and Italy seem at present to be able to stand in splendid isolation from each other, their Eastern allies are being forced by the economic crisis to forget their differences and come together. It is for this reason that the regional movement has greater force at present than any attempts to organize the whole of Europe. For this reason, also, the movement has begun in the Southeast.

The new tendency promises to lead toward a reduction in the number of tariff barriers and more rational economic organization. It is a welcome sign in international affairs.

Cantaloupes and Communists

By CONRAD SEILER

CALIFORNIA'S law against criminal syndicalism, inoperative since the post-war hysteria of 1924, has recently claimed nine more victims.* On June 16 nine young leaders of the newly organized Agricultural Workers' Industrial League, affiliated with the Trade Union Unity League, were found guilty of conspiracy to interfere with the harvesting of the melon crop in Imperial Valley, thus disrupting constituted government and advocating criminal syndicalism. Lawrence Emory, Clark Sklar, J. C. Miller, Tetsuji Hariuchi, and Frank Spector were sentenced to from three to forty-two years in the State penitentiary; Danny Roxas, to from two to twenty-eight years; Emilio Alonzo will be deported to Mexico; the other two prisoners have applied for probation and are still waiting for the court's final decision.

Imperial Valley, the scene of the events leading up to these convictions, is situated in the desert, approximately two hundred miles southeast of Los Angeles. The southern extremity of this territory touches the Mexican border. The aggregate population of the three largest towns in the vicinity—El Centro, Brawley, and Calexico—is about 23,000. There are some 48,000 acres under cultivation. Melons, tomatoes, lettuce, and other crops are raised, but the principal vegetable crop is cantaloupes. During the busy season 8,000 or more laborers—Mexicans, Filipinos, Americans, and Hindus—are used to harvest the crops, which are then shipped to the Pacific Coast cities and also to the East.

The conditions under which these seasonal workers labor are always debasing and at times intolerable. Most of the work is done by contract, whereby 25 per cent of the laborer's wages is deducted by the middleman, or contractor, who is hired by the grower or the growers' association to provide so many "hands." There are many cases on record of unscrupulous contractors who toward the end of the season quietly appropriated the laborer's entire salary for several weeks and then left for parts unknown. Mr. Louis Bloch, statistician for the State Department of Industrial Relations, after his investigation of labor conditions in Imperial Valley in 1928, reported that the El Centro office of the Division of Labor Statistics and Law Enforcement was "replete with cases of defaulting contractors." By working through contractors the growers avoid all responsibility toward the laborers and cannot legally be held either for wage payments or for any accidents under the Workmen's Compensation Act of the State. These hopeless conditions have not improved since 1928; on the contrary, owing to the general economic depression, they have become steadily worse. In instances where growers have been unable to meet their obligations to the contractors, the laborer has got little or nothing.

The picking of the cantaloupe crop is organized upon a piece-work basis. The usual rate is 13 cents a crate. Most of the other vegetable pickers work at the rate of 35 cents an hour. The working day is long and arduous—from nine to sixteen hours, often with the thermometer registering 120 degrees in the shade. The work is strictly seasonal, and it is unusual for a laborer to be employed six months in the year. During the time he has work he seldom earns more than $550. Many of the laborers have families dependent upon their earnings. The sanitary arrangements in the fields are filthy beyond description. Frequently there is not a sufficient supply of drinking water; laborers are sometimes forced to resort to the open irrigation ditches to assuage their thirst.

Although the American Federation of Labor, with its somewhat contemptuous attitude toward the unskilled, has remained coldly aloof, since 1922 there have been sporadic attempts among the workers themselves to organize and to ameliorate their condition. Every attempt, however, has been put down ruthlessly by the growers and the pliant authorities; the leaders have been intimidated or jailed. A brief outline of these struggles during the past two years makes edifying reading.

* Criminal syndicalism is described by the California law as being "any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning wilful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change." Anyone advocating such a doctrine, or publishing or printing it, or belonging to any organization advocating it, is guilty of criminal syndicalism and can be sent to the penitentiary for from one to fourteen years. If guilt is proved on all counts (there are five altogether), the punishment may be imprisonment for from five to seventy years—the prison terms running consecutively.

On April 22, 1928, the first union was actually formed among the Mexican workers—La Unión de Trabajadores del Valle Imperial. Later the name was changed to the more innocuous Mexican Mutual Aid Society. A short time after its inception it had about 1,200 members. It then considered itself powerful enough to take action. In May of that year a committee appointed by the workers sent a pathetic appeal to the local chamber of commerce, describing the deplorable working conditions—which were well known—and respectfully petitioning that austere and representative body to use its "valuable moral and material influence" with the growers so that the lives of the workers might become more bearable. The communication was politely ignored. Next, a series of very moderate demands, which did not even include the abolition of the contract system, were sent to the growers, who by this time were considerably nettled by the impudence of their hitherto docile employees in attempting to organize. These demands were not ignored. Sheriff Charles L. Gillett, who has proved his worth by holding his position for eight years, appointed fifty men as deputies to help him control the ominous situation. Sheriff Gillett's impartiality was nothing short of magnificent. He made deputies of as many of the growers' superintendents, field inspectors, and foremen as he could find. These gallant defenders were duly armed for emergency. Within a short time, scores of bewildered laborers were arrested. The charge? Vagrancy or disturbing the peace. They were browbeaten and threatened with deportation. Bail ranged from $250 to $1,000, which few could provide.

Sheriff Gillett became more and more ardent. He even went so far as to arrest a delegation of workers whom District Attorney Elmer Heald had invited to his office. They were released only after the district attorney had expressed astonishment that the delegation had not arrived.

A great deal of bitterness was engendered among the Mexicans. Mr. Bloch, in his report to the director of the Department of Industrial Relations, refers to an article in a Mexican paper published in Mexicali:

> The article suggests in part [says the report] that if the Mexicans in the United States are threatened with deportation for "their peaceful demand . . . to have their salaries raised one cent . . . the North American oil men who have made such strenuous efforts in Mexico for the reformation of our oil legislation will find it much more practical to leave Mexico."

In different sections of the valley a partially effective strike occurred. This action was altogether spontaneous, and was not even sanctioned by what remained of the Mexican Mutual Aid Society. The growers and the local officials continued their method of intimidation and wholesale arrests. Men were arrested because they looked suspicious, because they were not working, because they refused to tell others to work, because they were Mexicans, or for no reason whatsoever. And the Mutual Aid Society gave one feeble kick and was no more. Melons continued to ripen in the sun, and there were plenty of men to pick them.

The year 1929 passed quietly. But at the beginning of 1930 a new organization, the Agricultural Workers' Industrial League, began its activities. It was not so complacent as its immediate predecessor, and all workers, irrespective of race and former affiliations, were urged to join. For several months the work of organization continued undisturbed, save for an occasional arrest. Then the Growers' and Shippers' Association, remembering certain past events, began to evince great interest in the new organization—an interest which was shared by Sheriff Gillett and the local chamber of commerce. There were portentous rumors of an impending strike, of melons rotting in the fields for lack of labor, rumors of communism, the red flag, and Moscow. Action was imperative; only cowards would hesitate. Sheriff Gillett began to make arrests again. On one occasion Clinton J. Taft, head of the Southern California branch of the Civil Liberties Union, protested to the sheriff that the arrested men were innocent of any wrongdoing. The officer hotly resented this implication and struck Mr. Taft, who thereupon swore out assault charges as a result of which Sheriff Gillett was fined $150.

On the night of April 14 the storm broke. A meeting of the Agricultural League in the town of Brawley, attended by a few hundred Mexicans and Filipinos, with a scattering of Americanos, was suddenly surrounded and broken up by a mob of deputies headed by the ubiquitous Sheriff Gillett. The deputies were fully armed and meant business. More than one hundred workers were chained together and taken in trucks to the jail at El Centro in which they could be confined until such time as the next steps should be taken in action against them. After a week's incarceration in the terrific heat of the jail, most of the men were released with no charges lodged against them. Thirty-two were accused of criminal syndicalism, and $40,000 bail for each was deemed equitable by the court. Later the thirty-two accused were further decreased to nine—most of them leaders of the Agricultural League, the Communist Party, and the International Labor Defense. After urgent protest by the defense lawyer provided by the Civil Liberties Union and the International Labor Defense, the bail was reduced to $15,000 for each prisoner.

During the trial in El Centro, before Presiding Judge V. N. Johnson of the Superior Court, representatives of the most prominent patriotic organizations, as well as Lieutenant W. F. Hynes of the Red Squad of the Los Angeles police, were present and added very much to the impressiveness of the occasion. Three employees of the J. H. Boling Detective Agency were the principal witnesses for the prosecution. They testified that they had become members of the subversive organization in order to find incriminating evidence. No overt acts of violence were proved, but the three detectives asserted that the defendants had at various times advocated violence, threatened to destroy cantaloupes, and spoken disrespectfully of the flag. The defendants denied this. The district attorney affirmed that the Agricultural Workers' Industrial League was directly affiliated with the red International and the Communist Party of Moscow. Exhibits included I. W. W. pamphlets, printed before the criminal-syndicalism law was passed, and papers and other publications of the Communist press. The fact was stressed that two of the defendants had admitted membership in the Communist Party.

The nine defendants were convicted and received the sentences described above. They are appealing their case, but powerful interests are grimly determined that all shall remain quiet on the labor front in the sovereign State of California.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has long been devoted to Negro spirituals. They seem to him not only the only original American music, aside from that of the Indians, but also the finest medium for interpreting to the whites some of the best qualities of the Negroes—their faith, their earnestness, their humor, their simplicity, and their marvelous gift for musical expression. But the spiritual, as the Drifter has found in his wide wanderings over this country, is not always well sung. It has been caught up by all sorts of itinerant Negro quartets and choruses, by no means all of which are gifted or well trained, and there has been a genuine danger of the spirituals being overdone and cheapened. So it was with some trepidation that the Drifter went the other evening to that most admirable New York institution, the open-air concerts of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in the Lewisohn Stadium, to hear not only the orchestra but the Hall Johnson Negro Choir, even though he knew that it is this choir which has made so great a contribution to the success of "The Green Pastures," Marc Connelly's moving and touching Negro play.

* * * * *

THE Drifter's slight anxieties were absolutely needless. Never has he heard spirituals more beautifully rendered, or better Negro voices, or a finer ensemble, or more amazing leadership than Mr. Johnson's—it was worth the trip just to see his marvelous hands directing, without baton, the flow of the melody. More than that, to the Drifter's delight, Mr. Johnson's rearrangement of some of those songs not only left untouched their beauty and their profundity, but even added much brilliancy and richness, notably in his setting of Burleigh's "Deep River." Extraordinarily elevated and moving was also the chorus interpretation of Mr. Johnson's transcription of "The City Called Heaven," as noble a piece of inspirational music as one could wish to hear in any temple, whether canopied by the stars or encompassed by a Gothic arch. So here was a fresh revelation of the genius of this race, a fresh demonstration that the depths of the spirituals have not been plumbed nor their beauty entirely exposed. It was all profoundly impressive—not the least the ladies of the choir in their voluminous red gowns.

* * * * *

BUT Mr. Johnson's extraordinary choir is not the only one which has been stirring the music world of late. Here is what the London Spectator has had to say about the Hampton Choir, which, like the New York Philharmonic Symphony and the Chicago Symphony, has made a triumphant tour of Europe this spring:

> These Negro choristers stand in four grave rows, the women in white with their hands folded before them, the men in black with hands behind their backs. And they sing, simply. There is no visible effort, no heaving of chests; pure voice rises with miraculous unity from the choir as a whole. If a soloist takes part, it is very unobtrusively to the eye. Their attack is faultless, their precision remarkable, and the degree of polish the choir as a whole attains deserves the highest praise for their conductor, Dr. Dett. If London does not hasten to hear them on Sunday at the Albert Hall, it will lose a rare pleasure.

Robert Nathaniel Dett, who has achieved such remarkable results with the Hampton Choir, like Hall Johnson has studied at a number of American colleges and conservatories of music, something which the Drifter finds extremely encouraging, for he has always feared that if sophisticated white teachers of music laid their hands upon such as these they would spoil them, making them good interpreters neither of classic music nor of their own. But here are two men to rank high in any group of musicians. Like Roland Hayes they are helping to break down the senseless color line that prejudice and ignorance and cant try so hard to keep intact. There was no color line at the stadium the other night. Nor did the white orchestra receive so much applause as did the double rows of men in black and women in red. Which was another reason why the evening was a memorable one for

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Schools for Marriage

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The personal narrative called Martyrs to Marriage in a recent issue is of interest, particularly to those of us whose domestic histories could be written almost in the same words.

This woman, whom I shall call Anonymous, says that if life has taught her anything it is that divorce is preferable to unhappy marriage, and so far as that goes most of us would agree. But on my part if there is anything I have learned it is that divorce does not solve the problems on which unhappy marriages are founded. Divorced or not divorced, such parents as Anonymous describes can always contrive to make themselves and their offspring miserable.

Her father and mother lived together and she thinks they should have separated; my parents got a divorce and my brothers and sisters think to this day that they should have stuck it out together for their children's sakes.

Where divorce is resorted to it does not necessarily mean a clean break with a new chance for everybody. This may be true in some cases, but where the custody of the children is divided or where there are financial arrangements to be made between the parents there are ties a plenty to keep the old sores active. We spent some of the time with each parent, and the warfare which had gone on between the elders became a series of guerrilla engagements with the children used as snipers. The person who has never had a like experience cannot imagine the confusion and misery of such a life. While other children were playing Indian we were putting ice caps on mother's head or explaining to father why an extra day was spent with the other branch of the family. And after such racking episodes there was always failure in the lessons next day at school. Certainly, disorganization of a child's personality, ill health, and all the rest can follow just as surely where divorce has taken place as where it has not.

My parents had everything in their favor when they married—health, brains, and sufficient means. But father thought patience was a weakness and not a virtue, and to mother a wild, free spirit was just made to break. Their personal preferences were their gods. Such people are really phenomenal. Charming and gracious outside the home, inside it they engage in Gargantuan warfare over Liliputian objectives. It has been said that the offspring of unhappy marriages do not often succeed. Small wonder, for such children must spend all their forces simply keeping on an even keel.

The so-called divorce question is not a legal matter; it is social and educational. Knowledge should be available to teach people something of their own natures and how to make them function; to teach them how to live with themselves and with their fellows, especially their husbands and wives; to teach them that forbearance is only common sense and selfishness cruel folly. Surely, living harmoniously with a life partner is a gentle art, and the more it is studied the more we learn. Such an art should be capable of being taught in all its branches, physical, mental, and emotional. I am for marriage schools.

Washington, July 10 L. F. W.

Crime Is Crime

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: After reading the article Newspaper Criminals in Chicago in The Nation for July 23, an observation has suggested itself to me which seems particularly pertinent to the crime situation in the United States.

One of the first things which strikes the attention of foreign observers and those of us who, for educational or other reasons, are residing abroad is the sophistical attitude of the press and public toward crime. The Lingle murder is illustrative. The question asked has been: For what good reasons was Lingle shot?—not, By whom was the murder committed? The first duty of the state in cases of murder is to apprehend the murderer; the first duty of the public, to be satisfied that abstract justice has been done. The question was not how good Mr. Lingle was, or was not, before his death, but that a murder having been committed, and the highest law of the state having ipso facto been broken, how most speedily to satisfy the letter of the law.

There never has been a time in the history of civilized governments when the press and people could satisfy themselves, where murder has been concerned, with the conviction that a violent fate had overtaken an alleged evil character. Where such an attitude is adopted a community practicing private law may exist, but there can be no public law. This seems to be the plight of the community of Chicago.

Until the murder of what the American press chooses to call a "racketeer" calls forth public and legal indignation as great as would be called forth by the murder of an honorable citizen, there can be no real safety in our commonwealth. Crime is crime, whoever may be the agent or the victim.

Munich, July 29 Randolph William White

We Don't Doubt It

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Both the original write-up by the Federated Press of John E. Edgerton's appearance before the summer conference of the Methodist Federation for Social Service and your editorial article Work and Pray on the same subject in the issue of July 9 leave the impression that such "pious stuff" got across with the preachers and laymen present.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Edgerton probably never experienced such an hour of spear-pointed questions and saber-bladed rebuttal in all his life. I am inclined to think that the speaker would rather have faced a group of Communists than the crowd of young preachers who clearly indicated that they are past the stage of being satisfied with any kind of palliative paternalism and will stop at nothing short of the creation of a new industrial system.

Denver, Colo., July 15 A. A. Heist

Japan and the Quota

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the issue of The Nation of July 9, page 29, in the editorial paragraph on immigration, occur two sentences which are somewhat misleading. Since the same error is made quite widely, I am taking the liberty of calling your attention to the matter. The sentences in question are these:

> Under the Japanese exclusion act of 1924 Japan is allowed 100 visas a year (the minimum quota for any country), whereas if the national-origins quota plan were applied the Japanese quota would be about 200. For six years the United States has bitterly offended the Japanese by this discrimination, and yet in 1929-30 only 16 of the possible 100 Japanese visas were applied for.

The quota of 100 for Japan is not intended for Japanese as such, but only for persons born in Japan who belong to races eligible to citizenship in the United States. The Japanese are altogether excluded, except for certain professional classes; the quota is not for Japanese, who are excluded from citizenship in the United States and are therefore altogether excluded under the quotas. The offense is all the greater.

San Diego, Cal., July 12 Constantine Panunzio

Bryan on Public Ownership

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have just read the criticism by C. Hartley Grattan of the biography of George Harvey, "A Passionate Patriot," by Willis Fletcher. In the last paragraph Mr. Grattan says:

> One or two interesting points about Bryan are also brought out. The most important is that Bryan deliberately inserted the word "ultimately" in his famous Madison Square Garden speech, in 1906, dealing with government ownership of railways ("I have already reached the conclusion that railways . . . must ultimately become public property").

The railroad question was uppermost in the public mind when Bryan returned from Europe and made his speech at Madison Square Garden. Before it was made he was urged by Senator Culberson of Texas, Democratic leader in the Senate, and by Representative John Sharp Williams, minority leader in the House, to ignore any reference to the railroad question in his speech. Bryan insisted that as the leader of his party he must take cognizance of it. The writer sat a few feet away from him on the platform at the Garden and heard every word he said. What he said was this: "If the railroad managers do not run the railroads in the interest of the public rather than in the interest of the stockholders ultimately there will be government ownership."

Which is very different from advocating government ownership. Later Bryan was compelled to take cognizance of the matter by the deliberate misrepresentation of his position by the New York Times and World. In looking over my scrapbook I find this clipping from the Bulletin of this city, of which I was the owner and editor. In an open letter to the World printed in the Commoner Mr. Bryan said:

> The difference between the "immediate" and the "ultimate" in politics is so clear that even the editor of the World could see it if he would. Jefferson believed in emancipation as an ultimate solution of the slavery question, but he did not insist upon immediate emancipation. Lincoln also opposed slavery as a system but he did not expressly favor immediate emancipation. It is the part of wisdom to look ahead but it is not the part of wisdom to insist upon doing anything before the people are ready for it.

The Bulletin repeatedly printed his exact words in answer to his enemies, who persistently misrepresented his position on this question. It takes a long time for the truth to overtake falsehood in cases of this kind.

Washington, July 30 W. J. Dwyer

Model for a War Memorial

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: F. Luis Mora, well known for his murals and his portraits of children, has turned to modeling and is showing at the annual exhibition of the Art Association of Kent, Connecticut, a model for a war memorial that sets a new high-water mark for such things. There is nothing bombastic about the composition Mr. Mora has evolved to symbolize a community's grief for its fallen sons; here are no martial trappings, no uniforms, no trumpets, no banners, no sabers, no bayonets, no guns. Rather is there a simple group consisting of the Cross, the figure of Christ, which sits before it, the face rich with compassion, and on either side a shrouded form. A helmet resting on one of these forms gives the only suggestion of war; and by implication it represents war, not as a glorious undertaking, but as a grim thief of treasure, of hope, of life itself.

The idea conveyed is of peace binding up the scars of war, of futile sacrifice being sorrowfully atoned for. Even the wreath on the back of the cross symbolizes mourning no less than victory. Where is the first community that will commission Mr. Mora to execute in heroic bronze this group of statuary now being exhibited in miniature in Kent? It is an opportunity worth seizing.

Waterbury, Conn., August 23 Allen B. MacMurphy

Correction

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In my review of "Lobagola, an African Savage" in your issue of July 23, one sentence, which was miscopied when the review was typed, reads as follows: "Is it not curious that the kings of Gezo and Glelele, who are said to have instituted the battalion of 'amazons' which, if real, must be unique in West Africa, should have had the same names as Dahomean kings?"

The original read: "Is it not curious that the kings of 'amazons' which, if real, must be unique in West Africa outside of Dahomey, should have had the same names as Dahomean kings?"

Madison, Wis., July 30 Melville J. Herskovits

For Readers in New Rochelle

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I should like to organize a local group of the League for Independent Political Action in Westchester County. Nation readers who are interested may communicate with me, 10 Hemingway Avenue, New Rochelle, N. Y., Telephone, Hamilton 4312.

New Rochelle, N. Y., July 31 Albert Hirst

Hemingway Bibliography

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am preparing a bibliography of Ernest Hemingway, to include books he has written as well as material that has been published in anthologies and periodicals. If any of your readers possess special data regarding Hemingway I shall be pleased to have the opportunity of examining them.

Chittenden, Vt., July 26 Vrest Orton

Letters of Romer Wilson

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is proposed to publish a memoir of the late Romer Wilson and to issue a selection of her letters. I shall be grateful if her correspondents will send me, Villa Pauliska, Muralto-Locarno, Switzerland, any letters which they may possess. They will be faithfully copied and returned promptly.

Muralto-Locarno, July 16 Edward J. O'Brien

Letters of Lucretia Mott

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am working on a biography of Lucretia Mott. I should be grateful for copies of letters from her that any of your readers may have or for accounts of personal contacts.

Duvall, Wash., July 30 Jennie P. Burgess

The UNIVERSAL DESIGN
An International Journal of Applied Metaphysics

This publication presents a new point of view in Science and Religion. It interprets important current events from a metaphysical basis and presents, from a new standpoint, practical solutions for vital human problems, both individual and collective.

Subscription Price $3.00 per year
A sample copy free upon request

475 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK OR VICTORIA HOUSE, LONDON, W.C. 1

□ TRAVEL □

Books and Films

A Schoolmaster Dies in Italy

In Memoriam M. S. S., Obit 1923

By HORACE GREGORY

Here, in this room, built in the core of Rome, sparrows are singing against the fall of rain,
even in December, through the pain of my last naked month. These years and days shall die within my body and the convolutions of my brain shall fly into the west wind Zephyrus, spent as the sterile gold of Croesus Maximus, gone where none shall recall them, nor myself, not even I.

Look at my superscription, see my name
a footnote written on the back doors of time.
I am the past; what I discern, my own:
See the warm August plains of broad Wisconsin ripen, turn to snow.
O race horse Alcazar and Jersey Lily Langtry glowing white in bright victorias
careering down
the Strand, Fifth Avenue, Michigan Boulevard to rest, an urn of ashes in an old man's mind.

Was I immortal long ago; did I know Lesbia, question Cicero,
but mortal now?
Split the skull of death. I enter him while sparrows rise from ancient trees sprung from the gardens of the late Valerius Catullus—sparrows sing out music from the Vergil-mad Aegean seas.

Americans Do Not Read

Books: Their Place in a Democracy. By R. L. Duffus. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THE American public, Mr. Duffus tells us, buys 200,000,000 books a year. The average American, in other words, buys just two. Mr. Duffus generously adds those he may borrow or rent, and thinks he may read a possible total of seven books a year. What we actually spend for "general" books, however, is a grand total of not more than $150,000,000 a year. Mr. Duffus goes on to show that the American people, every three or four weeks, spend as much on motion-picture admissions as they spend on books, directly and indirectly, in an entire twelve months. Their annual expenditure on automobile pleasure touring is twenty times that for recreational reading. And so on. He might have added that the American smokes six hundred cigarettes for every book he buys.

Mr. Duffus is very calm about it. "I do not present such figures as an indictment of American taste. It is as foolish to indict a nation for having bad or perverted taste as to indict a region for being too flat." Just why it is foolish to indict a nation for having bad taste is not clear to me. It is not even clear to me why it is foolish to indict a region for being too flat. People are constantly indicting such regions, just as they are constantly indicting the weather. True, they may not be able to do anything about either, but that is no reason why they should pretend to like what they obviously cannot like. People point out, quite justly, that certain weather is abominable. They made such comments even in deeply religious times, when their complaint could only be construed as a direct reflection on the Lord God Jehovah, and I admire their spunk. There is no reason why man should accept even the inevitable.

I do not see why Mr. Duffus, unless he assumes that anything a sufficiently large majority does is self-justified, should have less courage in dealing with a nation's cultural tastes. This is doubly true since, with due respect to his comparison, at least something can be done about this taste. Mr. Duffus should be the first to admit this, for otherwise his present book would have no reason for existence.

The whole purpose of his study, undertaken for the Carnegie Corporation, was to see what could be done to enlarge the reading of "serious, non-technical books." Mr. Duffus's book is informative, it is attractively written and well put together, and within its chosen field rather thorough. But more than one of its conclusions is vitiated by the author's democratic complacency. Mr. Duffus reaches the conclusion, for example, that the relative unimportance of books in American life is "due less to the apathy of the public than to the failure of those who distribute books to devise systems for reaching large numbers of people." I am willing to agree that the publishing business is one of the most inefficient in the country, and that if the publishers as a whole showed more enterprise and acumen a vastly greater number of books could be sold. But it still seems obvious to me that the far more important factor is the public apathy toward literature.

When Mr. Duffus remarks, at one point, that "except for the bare necessities of life, few commodities, under present-day conditions, are bought; on the contrary, they are sold" he is probably telling the truth but he is also making a damaging admission. He is saying that the average American buys what he buys, not in proportion to the merit of the product, or its value to him, but in proportion to the skill of the advertising or the sales pressure behind it. I go so far with Mr. Duffus as to agree that the publishers should take advantage of this fact to sell as many books as they can. But Mr. Duffus is not satisfied with this. He wants the product itself changed:

> Studies of consumers' interests are being constantly made, at great expense, by advertisers and advertising agencies, and sometimes by magazines and newspapers. Authors and publishers must do the same. It becomes more and more obvious that, except in the case of creative literature, the book must be adjusted to its probable readers, and adjusted on a surer basis of knowledge about those readers than now exists. I am not even sure that creative literature need be excepted. Art is a means of communication as well as of self-expression. Nobody writes books in Chinese for an English-reading public. And if the literary artist takes pains to find out what language his intended audience speaks, he might take pains to find out a few other things about them.

If Mr. Duffus had confined his conclusion to the writing of children's books, textbooks, unpretentious popularizations, and frankly commercial work, one could take no exception to it; but it is only fair to point out to him that first-rate literature is never written by the method he suggests. It is true that art is a means of communication, but it is not true that it is a means of communication with people who are not quite bright. Mr. Duffus can hardly pretend that he wrote his book in English, and not in Chinese, because he "took pains to find out" what language his intended audience spoke. He wrote in English because that was his language. It never occurred to him to write in Chinese.

Whether Mr. Duffus knows it or not, his plea is essentially one for diluting and debasing literature. No artist can produce great work if he tries to adapt it to the ignorances and prejudices of an inferior audience. Commercial writers do not need such advice, and creative writers will ignore it. The man who consciously "writes down" nearly always writes badly. His work not only lacks profundity, but what is worse, and what even his intended audience can sense, it lacks sincerity. Clever fellows who attempt to write best-sellers with their tongues in their cheeks sadly learn this. Mr. Harold Bell Wright reaches his millions of readers, not because he consciously adapts himself to the quaint mores of those millions, but because he shares those mores. "I am always made uneasy," wrote Emerson in his journal, "when the conversation turns in my presence upon popular ignorance and the duty of adapting our writings to the mind of the people. . . . I observe that all those who use this cant most are such as do not rise above mediocrity of understanding."

HENRY HAZLITT

Reversion to Childhood

The Aloe. By Katherine Mansfield. With an Introduction by J. Middleton Murry. Limited Edition. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

"THE greater part of 'The Aloe,'" writes Mr. Murry in his introduction, "after much reshaping and rewriting, was incorporated into Prelude a year later, in 1917. But 'The Aloe' contains much material that was not used in this way, as readers familiar with Prelude will quickly discover."

Whether viewed as finished writing (and I, for one, consider them not at all inferior to Prelude or At the Bay) or as tentative material, these four sketches of the Burnell family are moving and delightful. For the glimpse of Linda's father and her courting in Australia by Stanley Burnell we cannot be too grateful; as also for the fresh encounter with Katherine Mansfield's prose, as inescapably feminine as Colette's, but how much softer, more tender, hovering—a butterfly style which hardly brushes with its wings the flowers of sentimentality, a style whose breathiness, whose rhythms of light excitement seem to catch something of the quality of schoolgirl conversation, a style so innocent-artful in its nostalgia that it evokes always the vague enchantment of one's own childhood.

"The Aloe" reinforces the impression, derived also from her "Letters," of Katherine Mansfield's continuous striving to reenter, whether by the simple gateway of retrospection or the devious paths of creative writing, the sheltered garden of her childhood. Its most clearly conceived characters (and the ones our hearts remember longest) are the children—Kezia, Lottie, Isabel, Pip, and Rags—but particularly Kezia, the dream-portrait of the little girl Katherine Mansfield never had. Indeed, without pushing the fancy too far, it is possible to view the entire Burnell family either as grown-up children or as adults who, like Katherine herself, spend their lives in a vague escapist drift back into the Utopia of their early years. Stanley Burnell, the energetic, rather Babbitty, athletic young father with his broad streak of sentimental tenderness for Linda—is he much different from the boy Rags? Is he not really an overgrown boy, with all the physical vanity and core of softness peculiar to the adolescent? And Linda herself, sad, sweet, smiling, secretive Linda, whose mind reverts continually from the sharp-edged reality of married life to the gentle contours of her childhood; and her two sisters—Beryl, the bright, vain, dreamy young girl, a little frightened at the imminence of maturity, and Dora, romantic, melancholy, her imagination stuffy with the pink and purple fantasies of girlhood: all exemplify variant forms of child reversion.

The almost ineffable charm of some of her most memorable characters—not merely the Burnell family, but Jonathan Trout and the daughters of the late colonel and Hammond in The Stranger—lies in the fact that they have retained into maturity a quality of childlikeness, one might almost say of "cuteness." The shades of the prison-house have not quite closed about them. And their tragedy—it was the tragedy of their creator—is that their frustrations are out of proportion to their temperaments. These demi-children, whose eyes are disturbed by the harsh light of adult existence, are forced to face adult situations into which they have bewilderedly strayed. It is this confrontation which gives the stories of Katherine Mansfield their stabbingly painful quality. She repeats the theme again and again: she cannot bear to see the young girl emerge into the young lady (recollect Leila in Her First Ball and the pathetic seventeen-year-old in The Young Girl); and it is the symbolic loss of the child Lennie that is really the heart of the unbearable tragedy of Ma Parker.

Critics have speculated much as to the direction Katherine Mansfield's talents might have taken had she lived. Toward the end (if The Fly is to be taken as proof) she was inclining toward a Swiftian bitterness that seemed to indicate a maturer view of the world; but I believe this mood was mainly a function of the development of her illness. If she had recovered and if her sordid economic and domestic worries had lightened, I think she would have retreated gratefully into the world of her youthful recollections, and given us perhaps the most beautiful, idealized pictures of childhood to be found in English. Her letters and her journal are full of nostalgia for her early home; and though she was increasingly conscious of the need to deflect her gifts in the direction of the "serious novel," she never really felt at home among such plans. Always her pen strays back in time; and always, no matter what she writes, it is with children that she is most magically successful.

A word as to this edition of "The Aloe"; it is so chaste and attractive in every other way that one regrets the sickening Victorian flower illustration at the head of each page. The spirits of Katherine Mansfield and of Godey's Lady's Book hardly harmonize.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Beyond His Horizons

Seven Horizons. By Charles J. Finger. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

UNDOUBTEDLY, from Mayfair to Patagonia is a very far cry, but even if Mr. Finger's adventures were, by and large, exotic, the inferences he draws from them are commonplace, and the seventh horizon seems to be limited indeed.

> To achieve order in my immediate vicinity [he tells us]: that comes first. To resist invasion: that is second and tremendously important. And last: to assume such obligations as shall inure to the physical and intellectual welfare of my children, to the end that they may become happy warriors fit to engage in the battle of life.

That is Mr. Finger's conclusion, just as it is the primary assumption of every honest commuter who takes the train from the outskirts of Jamaica to the heart of New York and back again twice every day that he may fulfil a destiny not necessarily required of him by the higher urges of his nature. One is therefore privileged to inquire why Mr. Finger has made of his extensive wanderings a spiritual quest. All roads, of course, do not lead to Zion. But if platitudes are the end, the means need not be extraordinary after all, and New Jersey and Patagonia may be only reverse sides of the same coin.

Any life may be extraordinary and any life may be commonplace, and Mr. Finger himself forewarns the reader in his preface against assuming that all hobos are Jack Londons under the skin. The chief structural fault of this book is after all not a matter of writing. There is sufficient zest in the telling of these many unusual tales. The fault is the lack of an eighth horizon to which one might give the name perspective. There is a curious disproportion between what Mr. Finger tells and the way he tells it, like nothing so much as a landscape seen through the wrong end of a telescope.

The reader is therefore advised to approach this book with some, if not with considerable, forethought. There are vivid vistas here and there throughout this very curious work. They are smothered, flattened out now and then under the heavy weight of platitudes. It is one thing to be a plain and simple person. It is another thing to trumpet it out as a challenge to the fates.

EUGENE LÖHRKE

A World Infecund?

Population. By Corrado Gini, Shiroshi Nasu, Robert R. Kuczynski, Oliver E. Baker. University of Chicago Press. $3.

IF present-day interest in population growth does not exceed Malthus's most optimistic hopes in quantity, it surely does in variety. So at least one is inclined to conclude from the present volume of Harris Foundation lectures, delivered in 1929 by an Italian sociologist, a Japanese economist, a German statistician, and an American economic geographer.

The Italian Gini demonstrates statistically that in most of the European countries and in the English-speaking world population is practically stationary or in a state of incipient decline. By inference, the Malthusian specter stalks only in Asia and possibly in Italy, Spain, and Slavic Europe. Kuczynski shows that if mankind ever doubles, it will require at least 150 years, and thus proves E. A. Ross's conclusions in "Standing Room Only" to be mere hyperbole.

Gini's main argument, however, is interesting rather than convincing. He believes that the reproductive powers of the populations of the world follow a cyclical movement more or less analogous to that of individuals; that populations, as Spengler has averred of cultures, describe a morphological growth from youth through adulthood to senility; finally, apparently, that biology steers the course of history. "The different rate of increase of the different categories of the population" determines the evolution of nations. This differential birth-rate is the result of a differential cessation of "the urge of genetic instincts" rather than of increased birth control. Temporarily gaps in the sterile classes are filled by recruits from the fecund groups. Gradually the sterile classes become proportionally more numerous, the birth-rate declines, and demographic decay sets in. Political, cultural, economic, and military decay is likewise the result of this change in biological composition. Occasionally such a decline may be checked biologically by the crossbreeding of different racial and subracial stocks. As proof Gini cites the meteoric rise of Japan and alleged current revivals in Italy and Spain.

The implications of this argument are important. If demographic decline is fundamentally biological, it is futile to try to encourage fecundity artificially in the upper classes, or in any class. If crossbreeding accounts for national revival, then existing dikes against international migration, assimilation, and amalgamation must be destroyed. Gini's arguments, however, are vulnerable. Metaphysicians will cavil at his teleological phrasings. Sociologists will deny that "the crossbreeding of whites and Negroes gives unfavorable results." Anthropologists will assert that Japan flourishes merely because she has ended her time-honored policy of isolation. Historians, when they admit periods of national exuberance, ascribe these to marked changes in physical and social environment. Both economists and biologists will contend that social factors account for the decline in the birth-rate. It is to be hoped, nevertheless, that American scientists will examine Gini's theories and consider his figures, some of which seem on their face to indicate a decline in natural fecundity.

J. J. SPENGLER

A Monumental Undertaking

Introduction to the History of Science. Volume I. From Homer to Omar Khayyam. By George Sarton. The Williams and Wilkins Company. $10.

IN a monumental volume of 839 pages George Sarton initiates his "Introduction to the History of Science" with a study of the first twenty centuries. It is the beginning of a gigantic undertaking which the author conceives distributed in three series: first, a purely chronological survey of civilization; second, surveys of different types of civilization; third, a survey of the evolution of the special sciences. Of these the first (of which the present volume is Volume I) would require five or six volumes of the size of the present one to carry it down to the eighteenth century.

Dr. Sarton limits his survey to the development of science; he defines science as systematized positive knowledge, and justifies his exclusive concern with it by the fact that "the acquisition and systematization of positive knowledge is the only human activity which is truly cumulative and progressive." Our saints and artists today are not necessarily greater than those of preceding ages; our men of science are not necessarily more intelligent, but their knowledge is at once more extensive and more accurate. The scope of the "Introduction" is determined by this characteristic of scientific development. In the course of the survey there are few references to political or economic history or to the history of art or religion, since they fall beyond the limits of systematic positive knowledge. On the other hand, throughout the Middle Ages the connection of theology with philosophy and science entitles it to consideration. For similar reasons it is deemed necessary to include music, philology, and what might otherwise be classed as pseudo-sciences—alchemy, astrology, physiognomy, and others.

The survey of this portion of human knowledge is not limited to the developments in Western civilization, but is extended over Asia and Africa as well as Europe. Moslem mathematics, philosophy, and science are treated along with Christian; Hebrew, pagan, Hindu, Persian, Chinese, Japanese contributions to each of the amazing diversity of departments of knowledge are presented step by step. The treatment is chronological, even schematic: the first four chapters span the centuries from Homer to the fifth century B.C., and thereafter a half-century is disposed of in each chapter. The chapter heads take the names of the outstanding figures of each half-century: the first half of the fourth century B.C. is the Time of Plato, the second half the Time of Aristotle; the first half of the third century the Time of Euclid; while the final chapter deals with the second half of the eleventh century, the Time of Omar Khayyam. Chapter by chapter, then, the thread of the narrative is resumed in the many divisions of the sciences and over the many divisions of the human race. In the succession of chapters what seems an arbitrary juxtaposition takes on cumulative force. One reads in the sections of a single chapter successively of Hellenistic anatomy, physiology, biology, and medicine; of Hellenistic technology; of Hellenistic, Hebrew, and Chinese historiography. But continuities emerge, lines of development die out, influences cross.

Dr. Sarton's manner of exposition is brief and effective. Even the most famous figures are treated in a few pages. A short biography is given, some characteristic doctrines are summarized in a few sentences, and a detailed but selective bibliography is appended. The bibliographies should be especially useful to the student of the history of science, particularly since the scope of the work carries it into so many fields in which bibliographical information is not readily available; moreover the arrangement suggests connections which might not have appeared from a work of less universal intentions.

The achievement of this volume is so outstanding and its contribution to scholarship so notable that the only appropriate criticism would be of details. But even in the detail of the work the plan has been executed so well that there is little that might be criticized which could not be justified. For example, in the bibliography of Aristotle it would not be difficult to point out omissions, some of them important; but the bibliography had to be selective, and the works on Aristotle from which it was made are almost innumerable. Again, it is at first sight surprising that Bailey's edition of Epicurus does not appear; but Usener, Bignone, and von der Mühl are there, and Bailey adds little to them except a translation. Moreover, no translation of Epicurus is listed, although Diogenes Laertius, from whom the greater part of the fragments are culled, has been translated frequently. Again, in the few places in which Dr. Sarton permits himself a critical estimate he expresses some opinions which might be difficult to justify. Thus, the section of the introductory chapter which treats of scholasticism gives warning in its title, Scholasticism, Its Cause and Its Cure. Dr. Sarton clearly has not separated the theological from the purely logical and philosophical grounds of scholasticism. Fortunately, none of this bias appears in the exposition. The bibliographies, moreover, amazingly complete even here, are submitted to continual revision and addition at Dr. Sarton's hands in the pages of Isis. It is to be hoped that he will be able to issue further volumes of this extraordinary work soon.

RICHARD MCKEON

The Art of Max Weber

Max Weber. By Holger Cahill. New York: Downtown Gallery. $3.50.

ARTISTS are seldom fortunate in their biographers. Generally inarticulate about their own problems, they often fall victim to some ambitious, system-building critic who forthwith proceeds to endow them with ideas they may have never entertained—to explain the artists to themselves, as it were. Max Weber, not inarticulate himself, has been more fortunate. His recent biographer, Holger Cahill, bringing to his task a great admiration for the artist, has made an earnest effort to study the important facts of his life, the formative influences on his art, and that art's salient aspects.

Cahill tells of Weber's childhood in Russia, his early impressions of Russian and Jewish folk art, his emigration to the United States, his study under the stimulating guidance of A. W. Dow, his extensive travels abroad, his meeting with Picasso, Matisse, Rousseau, his first-hand acquaintance with the work of El Greco, Cézanne, the Italian primitives, his return to America, and the slow growth of recognition.

In the course of the narrative Cahill analyzes various phases of modern art, particularly those that in one manner or another affected the work of Weber. Passing then from a general discussion to concrete instances, Cahill examines and characterizes at some length Weber's work according to its subject—still life, figure, landscape. Next he studies the artist's work in its evolution, dividing it into several periods: 1900-1909, the period of research and acquisition of craftsmanship; 1909-12, the period of expression, emotion objectified in plastic terms; 1912-16, the period of construction, problems of spatial and geometric composition; 1916-20, the period of abstraction, visible form as incidental to abstract composition; 1920 to the present, the period of synthesis, reinterpretation of nature according to laws of design. To complete the portrait of the artist, Cahill finally quotes numerous passages from Weber's writings. Over thirty illustrations accompany the text.

From all this excellently organized material there emerges a man and artist almost fictional in the preordained inevitability with which events, ideas, persons appear about and within him at precisely the moment required by the narrative—a rare character with apparently never an error of judgment or taste and always historically on time, so to speak. And we have also a full view of his art, evocative, seeking "the spirit of things," in quest of "eternity" (Weber's favorite word), keeping outside of war and strife and other ills to which the social body is heir in order to achieve, in the words of his biographer, "a revelation of life itself."

LOUIS LOZOWICK

Hindenburg

Hindenburg: The Man and the Legend. By Margaret Goldsmith and Frederick Voigt. William Morrow and Company. $3.50.

The Biography of President von Hindenburg. By Rudolph Weterstetten and A. M. K. Watson. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

NEITHER of these books is a satisfactory biography of Hindenburg. Margaret Goldsmith and her husband, who end their narrative with Hindenburg's election as President of the Reich, apparently set out to dethrone a Hindenburg of "tradition" or "legend," but they do not make it entirely clear what the misconceptions are that they are combating, and they seem reluctant to express an opinion after presenting, or at least suggesting, both sides of the uncertain case. What interests them particularly, if apportionment of space be a fair criterion, is the controversy as to which of the two men, Ludendorff or Hindenburg, was the dominating military personality of the war; but after going into the question at considerable length, and with about the same degree of thoroughness that the average newspaper correspondent would show, they leave the reader to answer the question for himself. They are hardly more successful in exploding other parts of the "legend" that troubles them. One gathers that Hindenburg was undoubtedly a great commander, but that his abilities have been overrated and that it would be well to use caution in worshiping at his shrine.

The Weterstetten-Watson book, on the other hand, is laudatory. It has the great advantage, for average readers, of giving nearly half its space to the period of Hindenburg's presidency, and of going much more into detail in its treatment of Hindenburg's early years and personal life, but what is written is written prevailingly in praise, and there is a conspicuous absence of detachment or critical appraisal. The chapters on the presidential period, too, while they bring out the really noble traits of Hindenburg's character, are superficial in their treatment of the political situations with which he has had to deal.

Both books, of course, agree substantially in certain fundamentals, save as the first affects dark colors and the second lightens them. They make clear Hindenburg's rigorous training as a soldier, his virtually complete absorption for long years with military matters, and the absence of brilliant qualities that made his advancement slow. He had no interest in literary culture, and the intrusion of politics and diplomacy into war made him frankly impatient. His life was keyed to devotion to the Kaiser and the Fatherland, and when, with the imperial cause a matter of history, he gave his support to the Reich, he carried into the new relationship the same high sense of duty. The extracts from his presidential speeches and letters which are given in the Weterstetten-Watson volume, many of which have not appeared in American news, show a broadening interest in the social and cultural life of Germany and in the welfare of German youth which helps to explain the disappearance of the fear, notable in England and France, that his election as President would strengthen the old imperial and military tradition. Both books are worth reading, but while the first is better written, the second is more worth while.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Books in Brief

Briand, Man of Peace. By Valentine Thomson. Covici-Friede. $5.

Madame Thomson, daughter of a French Cabinet minister and for many years an intimate friend of Briand, appears here as a kind of Boswell to her hero. The book is not a formal biography, although it contains a good deal of orderly information about Briand's life and recovers from sources not now easily accessible a number of extracts from his letters and speeches. It is rather a series of sketches of typical episodes in Briand's public career, mixed with observations on his personal habits and tastes, his friendships, and his attitude toward the public and his official associates. The best parts of the book are those in which Madame Thomson recounts Briand's first excursions into politics, his relations with the wage-earners and the Socialists, his connection with the separation laws and the Dreyfus case, and his earlier services as minister and premier. The later chapters, dealing with the war period and Briand's peace propaganda, are relatively slight. In the absence as yet of a more formal biography the volume will serve a useful purpose, all the more useful because its tone, while uniformly friendly, is not unduly eulogistic.

The Chinese Drama. By Kate Buss. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

The Chinese theater, in its repertory, music, and stage conventions, was fixed in the Yuan dynasty, about 1200 A.D. It is a medieval art surviving in our day. Its historical subjects are taken from the remote past; its emotional content is derived from Confucian ethics and tradition, principally the relationship of a son to his parents. The plays themselves are librettos rather than dramas, and rarely rise above mediocrity. The dramatic literature of China is so little held in esteem that well-known scholars writing for the stage hide under pseudonyms. The Chinese theater as a whole has suffered from social ostracism; even the law discriminated against players; and it is only in late years that the popularity of a Mei Lan-fang is winning some respect for his art. Miss Buss has her material in a mass which she has not been able to set in order. Her book, short as it is—being but a hundred pages—is hard to read, and much of it is ill-written. It is valuable chiefly because there is no better, and because it is beautifully illustrated with stage portraits of Mei Lan-fang.

Carl Akeley's Africa. By Mary L. Jobe Akeley. Dodd, Mead and Company. $5.

This is an account of the Akeley-Eastman-Pomeroy expedition of the American Museum of Natural History, begun in January, 1926. It was Carl Akeley's fifth visit to what, in contrast to the usual name, he used to call the "Bright Continent." It was also his last visit—for he died and was buried in its heart. His wife presents his material graphically. Especially interesting is her account of the gorillas:

> Natural histories, encyclopedias, and stories of travel have so long pictured the gorilla walking erect that it is little wonder that this misconception of his mode of locomotion is prevalent. My husband saw no indication that gorillas ever walk other than on all fours. . . . He saw gorillas stand erect only in the brief moment recorded in his motion-picture film when the female and the young gorilla rose to beat their chests. It is hard to imagine that the gorilla's short weak legs could long support his bulky trunk in an upright position.

How to Commit a Murder. By Danny Ahearn. Ives Washburn. $2.50.

The ghost walks so often these days that one tends to look warily at a book like the one under consideration. In this instance, however, the publishers tackle the problem quite frankly. "This book is entirely [Ahearn's]." It was taken down before two witnesses by an expert stenographer from his talk. "Parts of it have been rearranged, parts of it cut . . . but every word is Danny's." The book itself would seem to bear out the statement. It is full of non-sequiturs, inconsistencies, flat contradictions; it is rambling, discursive, and intensely personal. Ahearn is talking from a hair-trigger mind, jumping to conclusions and decisions. There is no evidence of reflection or of attempt to rationalize, synthesize, or harmonize his mass of statement and opinion. The thinking of the hunting and hunted order of man of action is perfectly reproduced. It rings as true as those psychological and pathological studies of wily crooks carried out in the rabbit warrens of certain scientists ring false. A respected gangster is a man who has amazing "guts," who can be as ruthless and remorseless as a wild beast when necessary, and who can think and work fast. Ahearn at twenty-eight has had a long criminal career. He claims to have been tried twenty-two times for major crimes and to have "gotten away with it" twenty. Twice he was tried for murder. And twice he served short sentences. He has tried a number of rackets. In certain sections of every big city the gunman is the aristocrat, the man most feared and most admired. Why do youngsters become gangsters? As well ask why some become big-league ball players. Certainly not because of the shape of their heads.

Schönheit am Mittelmeer. Von Franz Carl Endres. Mit Originalaufnahmen von Paul Hommel. Stuttgart: Verlag Friedrich Bohnenberger.

Considering the heroic size of the 505 large-type pages with 84 full-page illustrations on heavy paper, the author's introductory warning that the book is no Baedeker provokes a smile. What it does aspire to do is to serve the traveler as a reminder of beautiful and important scenes, to prepare the mind of the prospective tourist, and to compensate the homebody with vivid descriptions of natural and man-made beauties. The author is well fitted for the task by his intimate acquaintance with the countries of the Mediterranean and his intense love of nature and art. A comprehensive historical background accompanies all his descriptions, and his awareness of changes wrought by the World War adds a valuable feature. Of the art and cultures of the ancients he might be said to be a nostalgic connoisseur.

My Tropical Air Castle. By Frank M. Chapman. D. Appleton and Company. $5.

Frank M. Chapman, the ornithologist, is one of those lucky devils who has realized his dreams—or at least one of them. After many attempts to find the ideal place in the tropics for the study of nature, he came upon it on the island of Barro Colorado in the Canal Zone, where the National Research Council has established the Institute for Research in Tropical America, open to accredited scientists. Barro Colorado was once a hilltop; it became an island when the region was flooded in the construction of the Panama Canal. On the island, in a small house of his own, Mr. Chapman was able to study animal life from the windows or screened veranda and by taking walks by day or night in the surrounding forest.

> If you would really see and know a trail [he remarks] enter it without plan or purpose. Let your motto be "Where I am is where I'm going." . . . Here, at least, is one place in the world where speed is at a discount. Therefore walk slowly and stop often. Stopping is the very essence of walking.

Mr. Chapman's book describes his nature studies on the island.

The Tree of Life. An Anthology. Made by Vivian De Sola Pinto and George Neill Wright. Oxford University Press. $3.

The editors of this beautifully printed collection worked in the belief that the essentials of religion, being untouchable either by science or by dogma, lead a kind of immortal existence in the best prose and verse of all the centuries. In this faith they have ransacked literature from Genesis to Shaw, from the Elder Edda to Whitehead, for the best that has been said, Christian or otherwise, about the wholeness of the universe and about the position of man as a spiritual creature in it. Whether or not any special meaning emerges from the miscellany, it makes good reading; and the arrangement of material, suggested undoubtedly by Robert Bridges's "Spirit of Man," is of distinct advantage to the reader.

The Good Estate of Poetry. By Chauncey Brewster Tinker. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

Academic criticism at its best. Mr. Tinker examines a number of contemporary literary attitudes against the background of all literary history. This background is fatally large, so that Mr. Tinker fails sometimes to see the little truth we speak; but at other times he is refreshingly wise as he deflates some of our most cherished generalizations.

The Newer Knowledge of Bacteriology and Immunology. By Eighty-two Contributors. Edited by Edwin O. Jordan and I. S. Falk. University of Chicago Press. $10.

In nearly twelve hundred large pages this book presents a summary of progress during the past decade in the most active special subjects comprised under the title. These range from underlying physical chemistry to the innumerable applications of the new knowledge in medicine and in public health. The authors are selected from all parts of the world and write with authority and distinction. Each chapter has its own bibliography and the book has excellent author and subject indexes. It should prove invaluable as a base-line for the research of the next decade and indispensable to anyone with the remotest claim to medical education. It is, indeed, an epic of modern exploration and would have a tremendous popular appeal if it were not for the inevitable and insuperable difficulty of scientific terminology. A glossary is needed but it would have to be encyclopedic. The University of Chicago Press deserves congratulations on a monumental service to research and scholarship.

I defy anyone to put down this book once he has started it. F WRIGHT MOXLEY is a literary find. Red Snow is a gigantic piece of concrete visionary writing, a burning satire --and a high tragedy, packed full of dark prophecies...the passions and fates of men and women under the shadow of extinction. It is ruin itself in terms of moving and symbolic prose. As far as I can see, the book's appeal is limited almost entirely to mothers, fathers, children and unmarried people. We may sell a million copies, but I advise publishing it anyway..

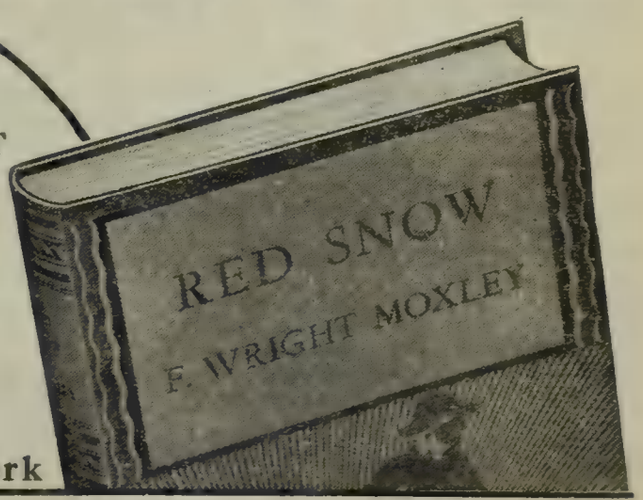
FROM AN EDITORIAL READER'S REPORT

On August 17, 1935, the sun is dimmed by a red cloud

9 months later the world's hospitals report —NO MORE BIRTHS

RED SNOW By F. WRIGHT MOXLEY

"In the same class as Job, Gulliver and Moby Dick." — N. Y. Herald-Tribune.



An INNER SANCTUM NOVEL Just Published, $1.00

Other New INNER SANCTUM NOVELS Now in Bookstores—$1.00

I Am Jonathan Scrivener by . . . . . Claude Houghton
Fifteen Rabbits by . . . . . Felix Salten
The Earth Told Me by . . . . . Thames Williamson
Denny and the Dumb Cluck by . . . . J. P. McEvoy
Casanova's Homecoming by . . . . . Arthur Schnitzler

At your bookstore, or direct from

SIMON and SCHUSTER, Publishers, New York

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □

"LYSISTRATA"

"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockridge, The Sun

FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre W. of B'way, Eves. 8:30 Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:30

THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS

The NEW GARRICK GAIETIES

GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

EMBASSY

THE NEWS REEL THEATRE

B'way and 46th Street — Cooled by Refrigeration — ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT — Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight

Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

STARTING AUG. 29TH

UFA'S FIRST TALKIE BI-LINGUAL PRESENTATION

(IN GERMAN) "MELODIE des HERZENS" | (IN ENGLISH) "MELODY of the HEART"

STARRING WILLY FRITSCH AND DITA PARLO

at 8TH ST. PLAYHOUSE 52 W. 8th St. Spr. 5095 | at 5TH AVE. PLAYHOUSE 66 Fifth Ave. Alg. 7661

CONT. NOON TO MIDNITE. POPULAR PRICES

□ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT □

Plays to See

†Dancing Partners—44 St., E. of B'way.
‡Flying High—Apollo—W. 42 St.
•Journey's End—Henry Miller—124 W. 43 St.
†Lost Sheep—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
†Lysistrata—44 St.—44 St., W. of B'way.
†Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45 St.
•The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47 St., W. of B'way.
‡The New Garrick Gaieties—Guild—52 St., W. of B'way.
†Topaze—Barrymore—47 St., W. of B'way.

First Nights

Cafe—Ritz—48 St. W. of B'way.
Torch Song—Plymouth—45 St. W. of B'way.

Films

Good Intention—Beginning Saturday, August 30; Caught Short, beginning Wednesday, September 3—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave
Hell's Angels—Gaiety—46 St. & B'way.
Lincoln—Central—47 St. B'way
Melodie des Herzens, beginning Friday, August 29—8 St. Playhouse—52 W. 8 St.
Melody of the Heart, beginning Friday, August 29—5 Ave. Playhouse—66 5 Ave
Moby Dick—Hollywood—B'way and 51 St.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46th St.
Old English—Warner Bros.—52 St. & B'way.
The Bad One, beginning Saturday, August 30; What a Man, beginning Wednesday, September 3—The Plaza—58 St. E. of Madison Ave.

• Drama. † Comedy. ‖ Musical.

Films

"Hell's Angels"

So much has been made of the fact that it cost nearly four millions to produce "Hell's Angels" (Gaiety and Criterion), Mr. Howard Hughes's "epic" of war in the air, that I am prompted to state with all haste that the picture is not nearly so bad as the fact referred to might lead one to expect. On the other hand, I am also compelled to admit that it is not so good as it might have been, perhaps at a quarter of its actual cost, had its producer known better where to look for his value. One has the feeling that the picture succeeds mainly in spite of his conscious efforts. For the really exciting scenes in "Hell's Angels" are of two kinds: instances of superb photography, like the view of the Zeppelin speeding its way through the clouds, or the breath-taking scene of a falling airplane, followed by the camera throughout its progress without a single cut; and, secondly, instances of purely spectacular action, like the burning of the Zeppelin or the destruction of the munition depot. In all these scenes the effect produced is truly magnificent. But if the beauty of the photography seems to have been merely incidental to the use of the material, the spectacular thrills mentioned, I suspect, were not quite authentic. And it was realistic authenticity—so we are repeatedly told in the program—that was the declared aim of the producer and that accounted for most of the expenditure of the four millions. The battle scenes in the air between the British and German squadrons are such authentic and costly realism. But interesting as these are in parts, particularly in the long-shot views of the free-for-all "dog fight," they are not very impressive as a whole. The much too numerous close-ups of men and machines with which this sequence is studded are, in spite of their authenticity, as obviously theatrical as any studio close-ups could be. Nor is there visible in this sequence much dramatic and rhythmic organization by way of "montage." One misses the heightened and almost tangible sense of movement that one found in "The Big Parade" or "Potemkin."

So far no mention has been made of the story of the picture. Perhaps it is just as well, for, poor on all accounts, it becomes intolerable because of the persistence with which it thrusts its lurid banalities into the procession of aerial splendors. A really interesting story for a picture like "Hell's Angels" should have stuck to the clouds rather than to the earth. Incidentally, it is a pity that the dramatic possibilities of clouds are made so little use of in this picture. There is a hint at such a dramatic effect in the Zeppelin sequence when the airship suddenly disappears in a cloud. For the rest, we get our clouds merely as a pictorial background. And yet what wonderful dramatis personae they would have made had the hide-and-seek motif of the plot been more consistently developed. Judging the picture by what it has, however, rather than by what it has not, "Hell's Angels," on the whole, is a very creditable performance, with some moments of surpassing beauty.

The new sound version of "Moby Dick" (Hollywood) impresses one as a very tame and conventional treatment of a subject which in the hands of a cinematic genius might have equaled the stupendous quality of Melville's masterpiece. In this case suffice it to say that the overwhelming grandeur of the image of the whale finds no better expression than a few shots of actual whale hunting, supplemented by shots of a wooden model. As for Captain Ahab, John Barrymore's Satanism does not seem very convincing.

Alexander Bakshy

Fascism in Finland

THE following article, written by a correspondent for the New Statesman, a London weekly, gives an interesting account of the new political alignment in Finland and the forces responsible for the change.

Political anarchy has suddenly made an appearance in an unexpected quarter—in Finland, the country justly admired for a long time as a pioneer of true parliamentary democracy. The reason for so surprising a change has been represented to Europe as a popular reaction against the spread of communism, but this is a calculated and entirely misleading view.

As in all upheavals of the kind, an economic cause is the true reason of the disturbance. The staple of Finnish industry and export, the foundation, in fact, of her economic position, is sawn timber. For the past two years and more Russia, under the harrow of an international financial boycott, has been forced to make use of her more easily realizable assets in order to provide ready money for the financing of her immediate needs. In consequence, she has been throwing her timber freely upon the European market at prices below the actual cost value of the goods. As the quantities have been very large and the quality of Russian wood is superior to that produced in Scandinavia and the Baltic countries, this timber has found a ready sale; but the process has caused so great a fall in the world price that Finland for more than the past eighteen months has been sawing wood at a cost of some £2 per standard more than is received for it by her shippers.

Most Finnish sawmills are being carried by the banks (which have stepped in to prevent national bankruptcy); a large number are already insolvent; and it is safe to say that no single sawmill in Finland is today working at a profit. The damage to this side of Finnish economy is chiefly felt by industrial capital; and at the same time the fall in the world price of butter [the other main article of Finnish export] is equally affecting agriculture, so that grave alarm has now permeated all classes of employers. Socialistic measures for remedying the situation being out of the question, the one solution, in the eyes of the employing class (which includes the close-fisted yeomen-farmers, numerous in the districts bordering the Gulf of Bothnia, in the midst of which is Lappu), is a heavy and permanent reduction of both industrial and rural wages. But to bring that about, it is imperative first to destroy what remains of Finnish trade unionism; and thus new legislation is necessary in order to put all workers' organizations outside the law. This could not be successfully done in the Diet just dissolved (July 20) nor in any subsequent Diet elected on the existing franchise of adult suffrage with proportional representation. The Social Democrats (60) and the so-called Communist members (25) form too large a minority in a Diet of 200 seats to leave any hope of obtaining the two-thirds majority required by the existing Finnish constitution for alterations to a fundamental law. Some sort of coup d'etat, therefore, provides the only way out of the impasse, and this has carefully been prepared for, around Lappu, during the past seven or eight months. Here in the Wasa district the idea first took root, among a community consisting chiefly of narrow-viewed, politically bigoted, culturally ignorant peasant-proprietors—the "Orangedom," in fact, of Finland. In such an atmosphere it was not difficult to arouse enthusiasm for a movement astutely labeled by its leaders "anti-Communist."

Mr. Kossola, the would-be Finnish Mussolini, by proclaiming his movement "national" and "anti-Communist," has brought down two birds with one stone. He has captured the enthusiastic cooperation of the stupider and more unreflecting masses of his fellow-countrymen, and the tacit approval of every Cabinet in Western Europe. He has also, evidently, secured the sympathy—if only silent—of practically the entire European press. By his threat, actually carried out last month, of a "march on Rome," he so intimidated the feeble Agrarian Government of Mr. Kallio that it promptly resigned. At the same time he launched an active campaign of lawless violence. So-called Communist members of the Diet were openly kidnapped in the streets—the police not daring, or not being instructed, to interfere. Local members of the "Communist" Party all over the country were seized and forcibly run across the Russian frontier. Finally, on July 5 two "Communist" members of the parliamentary Grand Committee were carried off during a session of the committee in one of the Parliament buildings and taken away to Wasa in motor cars in broad daylight.

This somewhat indecent breach of law and order rather sobered the more sensible and European-minded sections of society in Helsingfors, and Mr. Swinhufvud, the new Prime Minister (a national hero in 1917, when he was sent to Siberia by the Russian authorities for refusing, as judge, to violate his constitutional oath to the Finnish administration), fearful of the effects of the scandal upon foreign public opinion, then opened negotiations with Mr. Kossola for a return of the prisoners. They were brought back to Helsingfors on July 11, still in custody; and, as described in telegrams to the Swedish press, one of them, Mr. Pekkala, "bore evident signs of maltreatment." No attempt was made to arrest the law-breakers, but instead Mr. Swinhufvud, the arch-constitutionalist, at once imprisoned the two members, having already four days earlier arrested all the other twenty-three "Communist" members of the Diet. The Prime Minister's action was one of barefaced illegality. The only semblance of a charge against the members was that of being members of a Communist party. But they are not in fact either Communists or members of any Communist party. A Communist party has been for some years past an illegal organization in Finland, and anyone proclaiming himself a member of such lays himself open to the charge of high treason. Their party is a very ordinary Left Socialist one, numbering some 50,000 or 60,000 voters. But for the purpose of arousing popular odium, the press and the great middle-class public have combined from that time to describe them as Communists, and by now the name is firmly attached to them.

With the elimination, in prison, of the twenty-five members, the resulting unconstitutional Rump Parliament proceeded to pass several hasty measures, including a stringent State Defense Act. But it failed, even then, to get the requisite majority for the Lappu men's new franchise bill, which destroys the whole of the workers' representation at one stroke, since it limits the parliamentary vote to those paying direct taxes. These bills were rushed through the Rump Diet, before the dissolution on July 20, under the intimidation of 4,500 men from Lappu, who by cars and special trains (on the state railways) had invaded Helsingfors on the critical day, and under the even more potent threat of action by the armed Civic Volunteer Defense Corps (Skyddskar), 125,000 strong, which had been recruited on a political and strictly Conservative basis.

New elections to the Diet are to be held in October. As Mr. Swinhufvud, immediately after the dissolution, issued a decree forbidding "Communists" to hold meetings or in any way to organize for electoral purposes, and the Skyddskar may safely be trusted to enforce the provisions of the decree without discriminating too closely between so-called Communists and Social Democrats, it seems pretty certain that the coming Diet will show a sufficiently fascist complexion to deal with inconvenient existing fundamental laws. . . .

Up to the present the workers as a class have shown no sign of reacting to the challenge thus insolently flung at them. They are aware of their own impotence, unarmed as they are, against the Skyddskar, cantoned everywhere in town and country. There are, however, one or two cross-currents that may soon bring about some measure of dissension in the country. The narrow nationalistic element that is now so marked a feature of the Lappu men is viewed with apprehension by the Swedish Finns, who form one-tenth of the population and through their better positions and superior level of education still count for a great deal more than 10 per cent of social and economic, and therefore political, influence. These people fear —and not without reason, for Lappu has been indiscreet in its moments of triumph—that their turn for repression will follow that of the workers. And further, big business . . . is showing signs already of nervousness and jealousy. . . . Industry, after all, requires external peace for its development. The industrial interests, therefore, begin to have misgivings about the possible antics of Nationalists in the region of foreign policy, which, in their case, means Russia!

Contributors to This Issue

EDGAR W. KNIGHT is professor of the history of education at the University of North Carolina.

FRIEDRICH SCHEU is the Vienna correspondent of the London Daily Herald.

CONRAD SEILER, author and producer of plays, is a resident of Southern California.

HORACE GREGORY will publish this fall "Chelsea Rooming House," a book of verse.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

EUGENE LÖHRKE is editor of "Armageddon: The World War in Literature."

J. J. SPENGLER is in the department of economics at the University of Arizona.

RICHARD MCKEON is in the department of philosophy at Columbia University.

LOUIS LOZOWICK, painter and illustrator, is a contributing editor of the New Masses.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

REAL HARRIS TWEED Direct from the Makers. Suit-lengths by Mail. Postage Paid. Sample free on stating shades desired, and if for Gents or Ladies wear. NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland

REAL ESTATE

NON-PROFIT COOPERATIVE APARTMENTS

OUR COOPERATIVE HOUSE
433 West 21 Street
Chel 3309

3 rooms $62-95 per month
4 rooms $77-124 per month
Investment $2500-4200
Option to withdraw in two years

Renting office open Until 7 P.M.

Consumers Cooperative Services Inc
54 Irving Place—Stuyvesant 9842

TO NATION READERS

When you make an inquiry on an advertisement appearing in The Nation do you use the "key Address" or mention the fact that you saw the advertisement in The Nation.

It means much to the advertiser to know.

□ POSITIONS WANTED □

PUBLICITY and newspaper woman, experienced also in field work, lobbying, etc.; seeks connection. Box No. 111, % The Nation.

EX-HEARST newspaperman, 24, seeks work calling for honest writing ability. Box 113, % The Nation.

YOUNG fellow, 25, traveled, cultured, cheerful disposition, would be sincere companion to gentleman who can offer leisure for creative work. Box 114, % The Nation.

YOUNG MECHANICAL ENGINEERING GRADUATE desires to study Vocational Psychology at recognized educational centre where support (as fellow, laboratory assistant, etc.) is possible. Correspondence solicited. Box 115, % The Nation.

YOUNG man, 28, University graduate, certified public accountant, 5 years' commercial and public accounting experience, desires to turn native ability, excellent training, and willingness to work to service of some institution or organization for research, special investigations, statistical or accounting work. Nature of organization and service required of more importance than salary. Promises of splendid future not asked for. Now located in New York but will accept satisfactory position anywhere in United States, Canada, or Europe. Box. No. 116, % The Nation.

WOMAN attorney desires position with firm (legal, commercial) organization, where training will be beneficially applied. Box No. 110, % The Nation.

GRAPHOLOGIST

YOUR HANDWRITING discloses inherent quality of your ability and character. Graphology not sensational, but reliable. Send handwriting. Character or vocational analysis, $1.00. Miss Florence Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

FOR SALE

COOPERATIVE Apartments for Sale. 6 year old successful Rochdale cooperative. Lowest operating charges in N. Y. C. Consumers Cooperative Housing Association, Inc. Phone or write J. D. Steblins, Mgr., 64 Barrow St., Greenwich Village. Walker 7394.

FOR RENT—HOUSE IN FRANCE

GRASSE, A. M., FRANCE (near). Sept.-June. Attractive heated screened house with good studio, bath, suitable 3 adults, 1 child; garage. $100 month including wages good cook. E. S. C., % Pratt, Bridgewater, Ct.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

WANT to share one room apartment, kitchenette, bath, tastily furnished, near City College, with young, fine and intelligent business girl. Reasonable. References exchanged. Smith. Audubon 9279.

BOARD WANTED

YOUNG college woman in business wants home. Manhattan, Brooklyn preferred. Small Jewish family, alert, cooperative; will stay in two evenings weekly; can pay reasonable board; references exchanged. Box No. 117, % The Nation.

A HOME WANTED with intelligent family for girl of eight and working mother. Call President 4716, mornings.

OPEN SHELF

THE BOOKS YOU CAN'T GET ELSEWHERE

may be rented for a nominal fee. Members throughout the United States have access to a large collection of rare, scarce, out-of-print, strange and curious books; limited, privately-printed editions, unabridged translations and extraordinary new books. Please state occupation or profession when writing for information and lists.

Esoterika Biblion Society
45 West 45th Street, Dep't N-6 New York City

WE specialize in Curious Books; privately printed items in limited editions; unexpurgated translations; unusually illustrated volumes. Join our select clientele. Catalogue on request. Falstaff Press, Dept. N, 489 Fifth Avenue, New York.

SHOPPERS' CORNER

LABOR DAY SAVINGS: 25% on bicycles; 40% on flat silverware; other savings on standard advertised merchandise. Write or call John 1427. SERVWELL SYSTEM, INC., 35 Maiden Lane, N. Y. C.

MARITZA, 172 W. 4th Street,
is having a summer clearance sale, which is very worth while. Very special crocheted coats made of hand woven material $24.50. Hand embroidered dresses, voile—$7.50 up, silk—$16.50 up. Palestinian children's dresses—$3.50. Also hats, and crocheted dresses. New cloth models for the fall.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1930 No. 3401

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 257
EDITORIALS:
The League Shuns Disarmament 260
The Lambeth Bishops 261
Will New York Lead? 261
Flying High 262
REVOLT IN CONNECTICUT. By Allen B. MacMurphy 263
IS ENGLAND PLAYED OUT? By Alice M. Cameron 265
FASCIST SYMPATHIES IN THE UNITED STATES. By E. C. Lindeman 267
CUT YOUR OWN RENT. By Roswell Ward 269
CLUCKINGS OF CALVIN. Translated by Herbert Fordham 270
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 270
CORRESPONDENCE 271
BOOKS:
Clean as These Rocks. By Wilbert Snow 273
Our Intellectual Rulers. By Henry Hazlitt 273
Mrs. Undset's Tetralogy. By Eugene Löhrke 273
Fair Harvard. By William A. Neilson 274
A Skeptical Biologist. By Bernhard J. Stern 274
Restoration Dramatists. By Donald A. Roberts 275
Voices of the New Russia. By Walter Gutman 276
Roger Williams Again. By William MacDonald 276
The Philosophy of Aesthetics. By DeWitt H. Parker 277
The Ethics of Power. By George E. G. Catlin 278
China in Revolt. By Isidor Schneider 278
Books in Brief 279
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 280
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Japanese Trade-Union Bill 281

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

CALIFORNIA HAS GIVEN the country the good news that Governor Young will not be an exception to the unbroken rule that no one shall twice in succession be governor of that State. We rejoice because it is a just punishment for a man who has shown the utmost cowardice in dealing with the Mooney and Billings cases; who postponed his decision month in and month out, and then shifted the burden of his responsibility to the State Supreme Court. The press associations report that his handling of this case helped to defeat him; it should have done so. From South Carolina comes the encouraging report that Cole Blease, though leading the poll, did not obtain a majority in his fight for renomination to the Senate of the United States, and that this Senatorial defender of lynching and lawlessness will have to try again in a run-off primary, with the odds against him. If ever a politician deserved to walk the plank it is he. In Idaho it looked as if the Democrats were going to pay Senator Borah the compliment of running no one against him, but at the last moment there was a change of plan; a respectable Democrat has been found to make the race and achieve—defeat. From Michigan the indications are that Senator Couzens will win renomination hands down, while in Mississippi the effort to defeat Congressman Ross Collins, the bravest and most outspoken anti-militarist in Congress, was, fortunately for the country, easily defeated. Finally, at its annual conference in Buffalo, the New York State Federation of Labor voted for a new political party by and for labor, contrary to the dictates of the great moguls of the American Federation. These happenings are good omens. They reveal, however, no general trend or popular drift. For this we must await the fall elections.

RAILROAD NET EARNINGS, off 33 per cent during the first six months of 1930 from the corresponding figures of 1929, illustrate clearly a fundamental difficulty of the Transportation Act of 1920. Owners of railroad securities are entitled to a "fair return," now fixed at 5¾ per cent of valuation, but they cannot get it. Valuation itself has proved an almost insuperable stumbling-block, and we are by no means certain yet what the final figures are going to be. Using a tentative figure, the Bureau of Railway Economics calculates the returns of the first half of 1929 at the rate of 5.52 per cent, against only 3.61 per cent this year. Yet any general raising of rates under existing conditions of depression is impossible, even if it were not suicidal. Meanwhile, Mr. F. J. Lisman points out in the current Railway Age certain means, including "elimination of the wastes of excessive and forbidden methods of competition," by which he believes the roads could save hundreds of millions of dollars a year, and he suggests that they need to select a "rate czar" who will stiffen their backbone in raising rates where it can be done. Trying to combine private operation of the roads and competition with a fixed return on capital is like trying to eat our cake and have it too.

NOT SO BAD AS REPORTED seems to be the view that must now be taken of the drought. The drought may still be the worst in the nation's history, as it appeared to be at the end of July, and the crops of wheat and corn may be the smallest in years, but the loss in general has apparently been overestimated. Mr. Legge of the Farm Board, who was traveling about the corn belt just as the mobilized bankers were promising more strength to Mr. Hoover's arm, reports that the region of which Iowa is the center "will enjoy almost if not fully as good or better farm incomes this year than in 1929." The region to which he referred includes Nebraska, northern Kansas, northwest Missouri, the eastern portions of the Dakotas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, most of Illinois, and parts of Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana. This does not suggest the appalling calamity for which Mr. Hoover gave up his vacation, summoned the governors of a dozen States, worked out a great scheme of State and county committees, directed the immediate provision of a hundred and a quarter millions of federal road money, and called on the Red Cross to stand by. What one would like to know now is who started the great scare, who saw that it was kept going, and what it was all about. The Department of Agriculture did its bit, but the politician-farmers appear to have done a great deal more, and the newspapers played up the business in great style.

OF OUR 122,000,000 PEOPLE, one-third, or 41,000,000, are children under sixteen, while there are 38,000,000 men and 37,000,000 women between sixteen and sixty-four, according to a recent radio address of William M. Steuart, director of the census. About 49,000,000 persons reported themselves as having gainful occupation, but probably not more than 40,000,000 to 42,000,000 are ever at work full time on any given day, owing to holidays, vacations, sickness, and unemployment, and our gainful workers do not put in more than 275 days a year on the average. Some 10,000,000 women report gainful occupations, while perhaps 23,000,000 more are keeping house. The 11,000,000 men who are farming constitute less than one-quarter of the gainful workers as against 45 per cent in 1880. Nearly a third of our workers are now in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits, while clerical occupations employ about 7 or 8 per cent of the total. Successive censuses only emphasize the rapidity of our industrialization, and indicate the necessity of bringing American thinking abreast of the conditions of 1930, instead of letting it lag in the atomic individualism appropriate to a pioneer agricultural state.

GRAVE WORDS were recently spoken by Dr. Edward Ewing Pratt, former chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, based on his observation in foreign countries of the effect of the new tariff on our trade. It has done more damage to that business, he declares, than any other official or unofficial act of the last generation. Pointing specifically to the new Italian duty on motor cars, he says that already the American business ruined in France, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, and Germany alone far exceeds in value any possible benefits that could come from the measure, and he urges that we are driving the British Empire into a scheme of imperial preference fatal to our trade with its members. He calls attention to the incident of 15,000 persons in a small Swiss town solemnly swearing never again to buy American goods, and expresses the belief that a tide of animosity to American business is rising to a degree unimagined by the untraveled American or by "our untutored Congress." On the same day Luis Zuberbuhler, a business leader of Argentina, indicated the bad psychological effect of the Hawley-Smoot measure, and courteously pointed out that further American restrictions on imports from Argentina might drive that country willy-nilly to take measures to decrease Argentinian purchases here. The business community realizes the dangers of this Bourbon tariff monstrosity.

MANY ARE THE WAYS of balancing international claims. If we further embarrass France in paying her debt to us by raising our tariff wall a few more feet, we still allow our tourists to go abroad, and they help mightily to straighten the account. The French economist Meynial has calculated that Americans spent in France last year about $130,000,000. From all foreign visitors France received a total of $400,000,000. What is perhaps most significant in these calculations, however, is the announcement that German tourists this year form a majority of all the foreign visitors. Their presence in such numbers must, of course, raise still further difficulties in the payment of German reparations.

SIR JOHN SIMON'S message to the United States, as expressed in his address to the Federal Bar Association and broadcast over a national radio hook-up, is simply the plea of the Simon report in little, for an understanding of the complexities and difficulties of the Indian problem.

> The difficulty with India's constitutional problem [says Sir John] is that the mass of Indians know nothing of Western political conceptions, and yet the educated minority is urging a rapid application of representative institutions based on Western models in an Eastern continent whose traditions of government are Oriental.

Sir John would undoubtedly reject our interpretation, but this seems to us really an indirect way of saying that Britain's policy has lost the support of the "educated minority" in India, and that British rule, consequently, must rest increasingly on naked force—an understanding that the events of the past six months tend strikingly to confirm. If this be true, the very magnitude and complexity of the problems to be faced render more imperative a prompt understanding with those imprisoned leaders whom the Indians still follow. The Indians have got to solve their own problems; with the best will in the world, the British can never do it for them; with lathis and bombs and machine-guns they can only make solutions impossible. Out of the most sincere friendliness to British and Indians alike, we eagerly look for evidence of an effective desire on the part of the government to cooperate with those who are today the real leaders in India.

A BANKRUPT NATION is unusual these days, but Australia appears to have come dangerously near to that predicament and to be not yet clearly on the road to solvency. Falling prices for wheat, wool, meats, and other staple exports have pulled down the volume of Australian credits abroad from nearly a billion dollars two years ago to somewhat over a fourth of that amount this year, and unemployment, aided by a coal strike in New South Wales, has gravely increased. The result was £36,000,000 of foreign liabilities, chiefly in London, which the Commonwealth was unable to meet. A default has been averted only by the interposition of the Bank of England, which has undertaken to pay the debts as they fall due, the Commonwealth in turn converting the debts into long-term loans to be paid ultimately through a sinking fund. Various financial reforms suggested by a representative of the bank have also been agreed upon, among them a drastic cut in expenditures if the present budget does not balance by the end of September, and a restriction of future loans to public works from which a revenue is assured. A special grant of $5,000,000 to New South Wales has also been made to save that state from financial breakdown. Australia, in other words, has been living beyond its means, voting money freely when times were good, and trusting that the prices of what it had to sell would continue high. Now has come a lean year, and the future must be heavily mortgaged to pay for the extravagance of the past.

GOVERMENTS CHANGE QUICKLY in South America at times, and Peru has just gone through a revolution with all due neatness and dispatch. Just why the former President, Augusto B. Leguia, should have been so suddenly deposed with little more than a show of resistance is not quite clear, but his successor, Lieutenant Colonel Luis F. Sanchez Cerro, has charged Leguia with maladministration of public finances, an attempt to sell the Peruvian oil resources to foreigners, a huge addition to the public debt, and a censorship of the press. His acceptance of the decision of the Tacna-Arica boundary dispute with Chile appears also to have injured his popularity. The new administration, of course, promises a clean-up. Meantime the former president, who is ill, is a prisoner on an island in Callao harbor with the threat of a trial and a possible death sentence hanging over him—the latter a fate which the foreign diplomats are reported to be trying to avert. With some $200,000,000 of American investments in Peru, the United States has naturally a keen interest in the revolution and its outcome, while the Department of State is concerned over the arrest of Lieutenant Commander Harold B. Grow, a member of the American Naval Mission to Peru and since 1926 director of the Peruvian aviation service, who is threatened with trial by court martial, and of Charles W. Sutton, long in charge of irrigation for the Peruvian government. Unrest is reported also in Argentina, where President Irigoyen is facing serious difficulties.

A READER of The Nation in the South begs us to report a dreadful happening in Jackson, Mississippi. There a Negro was arrested for living with a white woman at her volition. When arrested, he was shot in the hand "for attempting to escape." Later a deputy sheriff undertook to remove him from one cell to another. The wounded, unarmed prisoner "lunged against him against the wall of an adjoining cell," according to the Jackson Clarion-Banner. What happened next is thus described:

> The light yellow Negro disregarded a warning to halt and Ford drew his gun. The first bullet caught the Negro at the top of the left shoulder. The second struck him full in the chest. He fell forward through the doorway and died almost immediately. . . . Deputy Ford was cleared of all blame by the coroner's jury. Ford acted in self-defense.

The white woman was given six months in prison and a fine of $250. Our horrified reader writes:

> I may tell you frankly that if sex and race had been reversed the man might have been socially ostracized—I doubt even this, but such would have been the severest punishment meted out to him and nothing would have happened to the woman. An individual has usurped the functions of a mob in the killing of this Negro. When things like this happen, I am ashamed that I am a Southerner, and wish that I could blush because I am a native of Mississippi.

SO HENRY MENCKEN is safely married. May all the blessings of that holy state attend our contributing editor and his bride! We confess that our astonishment at the surrender of this confirmed advocate of celibacy is still not done. Is it possible that we may yet hear that he no longer favors the return of the old-fashioned bar with the brass rail and the polished mahogany, and the inevitable spittoons, and all the rest of its chaste appurtenances? Who shall know? Stranger things have happened. All we can say now is that his American Mercury reads today as if new life coursed in its veins, with its new and better cover, larger and more readable type, and some strikingly fine articles in the issue just at hand. To Cupid American letters are plainly in debt again.

MAJOR GENERAL HENRY T. ALLEN was not the ordinary type of speech-making general whose sole object is to increase the American military establishment. On the contrary, he resembled the elder generation of soldiers like Sherman, Sheridan, and Grant in his dislike of war. In addition he had moral courage, a warm heart, and a sense of justice which was not circumscribed by his uniform or the boundaries of his country. Hence he was admirably qualified to be the commander of the American forces left in Germany with headquarters at Coblentz, especially as he spoke German and had for four years served as military attaché in Berlin. To Coblentz he took not hatred but sympathy for the conquered, with the result that our army was the best liked of all the forces of occupation, and that the German people today regard him with a deep sense of gratitude. More than that, General Allen had the courage to head the fund to collect money here for the starving German children when it was highly unpopular to do so.

THE DEATH of Lon Chaney removes from the motion-picture world one of its most interesting characters. What seemed the misfortune of his childhood proved one of the chief sources of his later fame; both his parents were deaf mutes, and his later gift for pantomime is attributed to the necessity he faced from his earliest days of conveying his emotions and thoughts by gesture and facial expression. To this training were added intelligence and remarkable pertinacity. His exceptional genius for make-up made his name familiar to everyone, and in his first talking picture he revealed that he could alter his voice almost in the same astonishing way as he had previously altered his face. But like Charlie Chaplin, he continued to believe that pantomime was the peculiar art of the screen. He was probably mistaken in this, but he was not mistaken in his belief that pantomime could still have retained an important place. Unfortunately, like so many other recent inventions, the talkies seem to have become a stern master rather than a useful servant, and the ability to reproduce the voice on the screen has been interpreted to mean that the voice must be used, regardless of the consequences.

A SLUMP IN THE PRICE of lions is reported by the New York Times, prime stock in excellent condition going at a recent sale in Hamburg for less than 3,000 marks. Giraffes are very cheap, too, and can be had for 20,000 marks a pair, while hippopotami bring 8,000 marks and riding elephants run all the way from 8,000 to 12,000 marks. These columns are not devoted to market tips, but we have no hesitation in advising our readers to lay in their winter's supply of lions and giraffes now while the market is weak. In considering their long-time needs, however, they not only should take into account the gold supply and other influences affecting the general price level, but should remember that the zoological parks are now operating on the bear side of the market. According to Dr. Raymond L. Ditmars of the Bronx Park Zoo, they now know more about their animals than they used to do and so can keep them longer. It's a hard world for the good old law of supply and demand.

The League Shuns Disarmament

THE Assembly of the League of Nations is again at work. A year has elapsed since it last met. What has it accomplished during the twelve-month on the most important of all issues before the world—disarmament and peace? The answer is—nothing, save that it has sponsored the publication of some figures as to the increasing armaments of the militaristic nations, which figures constitute its own grave indictment. For it has been charged with certain responsibilities under the Treaty of Versailles which created it. In this, its organic act, the chief Powers that sponsored it pledged themselves to disarmament. Eleven years have elapsed. There has been no decrease, but steady increase in expenditures for war. The Geneva report is that no less than $3,750,000,000 was what fifty-three nations, Christian and otherwise, spent in 1929 in preparation for the next war. The officials were reported to be "optimistic" because this disarmament bill was only $100,000,000 larger than a similar bill for 1928! They maintained that optimism in the face of the fact that the world launched 50 per cent more cruisers in 1929 than in the last years before the World War and that it has today three times as many under construction as in 1913. Indeed, during the past year the only action which can be construed as pointing in the direction of limitation of armaments came as the result of action by a non-member—the United States. The League's Disarmament Commission meets, talks, studies, adjourns. It is explained that it is "clearing the ground," "exploring the bases for land disarmament"—"a grave and difficult task." But the fact remains that it rejected with contumely the only clear-cut and sincere proposal to disarm and to disarm at once ever made to it—the Russian plan that was brought to it by M. Litvinov.

The growing danger of war is the complete answer to the excuse that the problem is difficult. Granted that it is, there is no time to lose. It is idle to waste years exploring the bases for scientific disarmament when every preparation for the approaching catastrophe is under way; when the situation between Italy and France is so delicate that the French do not dare even to permit the Minister of War or the foreign military attachés to witness their High Savoy maneuvers near the Italian border lest dangerous military importance be attributed to them. They have not had to be so secretive about some of their other maneuvers. At Lyons, for instance, they have this summer staged a night air attack upon the city under the direct supervision of the General Staff. As far as possible the exact war conditions were simulated. Thus, the populace being notified by sirens that the "enemy fliers" were at hand, took refuge in their cellars and in the specially prepared bomb-proofs, while the city was plunged into complete darkness. The fire department was called out to extinguish pretended blazes, the Red Cross representatives in gas masks took care of "poisoned" and "wounded" citizens, and the "enemy fliers" constantly threw down upon the city articles intended to represent gas or other bombs. The anti-aircraft cannon fired steadily until two o'clock in the morning—in short, nothing was left undone to represent war-time conditions.

With what result? The commanding general, Serrigny, in his official comment upon the maneuvers declared that the anti-aircraft defense had not sufficed to save the city from any massed attack from the air. In recording these facts General Berthold von Deimling, the former German corps commander, declares in the Berliner Tageblatt that in every similar instance, notably in recent "attacks" upon Milan, London, and Paris, the result was the same—a complete fiasco on the part of the defense. As for air counter-attacks, General von Deimling declares that there can be no hope of success for the counter-attackers unless there is sufficient advance notice of the attack and the direction from which it is to be expected to enable the defensive blow to be struck at exactly the right time and place before the enemy's objective has been attained. He points out in this connection that the development of the bomber has gone on so fast that it can not only carry the enormous load to be dumped, but can now actually defend itself against attack. General von Deimling thus comes to the same opinion as General von Seeckt, who has just resigned as commander of the German army, that about the only way of counter-attacking is to strike the enemy on his own territory before he can cross the frontier. The future war in the eyes of these experts becomes then nothing but a mad rush by all parties to the conflict to be the first to get their airplanes over the frontiers and to destroy immediately all enemy chemical, automobile, and airplane factories, all flying fields, and important towns.

General von Deimling cannot refrain from asking, in view of this prospect that all important cities that can be attacked will be immediately bombed, gassed, and set on fire, how any military department or general can pretend hereafter that any amount of preparedness will protect any of these strategic points from utter destruction. He is right. The old argument that safety can be secured by a given preparation has been utterly finished. A million infantry scattered along the seaboard, and a full arsenal of anti-aircraft cannon besides, will offer no guaranty whatsoever that Birmingham and Manchester and Edinburgh will not be bombed within twenty-four hours after the declaration of war. "Is it not suicidal mania," he asks, "for the European states with their sensitive industries to destroy their economic life and their culture by poison, by fire, and by shells?"

From his own people the General demands in the coming election a choice of representatives in the Reichstag to form a government absolutely opposed to the ideal of armaments and war. He believes, however, that it is only by the rousing of the masses of the various peoples that safety will finally be attained. He does not mention the League of Nations. We repeat that upon its handling of this question depends beyond all else its success and its usefulness to the human race. It must demand prompt action by the leading Powers; it must make them prove that they were sincere when they signed the disarmament clause of the Treaty of Versailles, when they went to Locarno, and when they signed the Kellogg Pact. If they will not act they brand themselves not only with insincerity and hypocrisy, but with complete responsibility, even now, for the next conflict.

The Lambeth Bishops

IF organized Protestantism has any message for the world today, one might fairly expect to find it at its best in the conclusions of the 307 "archbishops and bishops of the Holy Catholic Church in full communion with the Church of England" who met in the recent Lambeth Conference at Canterbury. The encyclical letter and seventy-five resolutions of the conference, however, mix progress and extreme conservatism in disturbing proportions. Regarding war and peace the bishops speak out with no reservations whatever. War is condemned as incompatible with the teachings of Jesus, the Paris anti-war pact is cordially commended, and the Christian church "in every nation" is urged, where nations have "solemnly bound themselves by treaty, covenant, or pact for the pacific settlement of international disputes," to "refuse to countenance any war in regard to which the government of its own country has not declared its willingness to submit the matter in dispute to arbitration or conciliation." "The existence of armaments on the present scale" is declared to be a menace to world peace, and an appeal is made for a "determined effort to secure further reduction by international agreement."

Representing as it did an Anglican communion of world-wide extension, the statements of the conference about subject races and the color line are remarkable for the small comfort they offer to imperialists or champions of white superiority. "The ruling of one race by another," the conference declared, "can only be justified from the Christian standpoint when the highest welfare of the subject race is the constant aim of government, and when admission to an increasing share in the government of the country is an objective steadfastly pursued." The "guiding principle" in racial relations should be "interdependence and not competition," and "the realization in practice of human brotherhood postulates courtesy on the part of all races toward one another" and "a complete avoidance of any exploitation of the weaker races such as is exemplified in the liquor traffic among the natives of Africa and enforced labor for private profit." As for the color line, "all communicants," the conference affirmed, "without distinction of race or color," should be admitted to communion, and neither race nor color should exclude any one from worship "in any church."

All these are praiseworthy statements, applicable to preparedness for the next war, to the exploitation of native labor in the British colony of Kenya, and to race discrimination in an Episcopal church in Brooklyn. It would have been well if in other matters the conference could have evinced equal enlightenment. A cautious approval of birth control, quickly seized upon by the press as the most striking of the episcopal pronouncements, is not only hedged about, quite properly, with an earnest plea for the preservation of the family and the safeguarding of children, but is also accompanied by an unqualified condemnation of all sexual relations outside of marriage and by a recommendation that the remarriage of a divorced person whose former partner is living "should not be celebrated according to the rites of the church." A divorced person may, apparently, continue in good standing as a communicant if he or she is adjudged to have been "innocent," but a sacramental remarriage is to be refused if the "guilty" party has unkindly declined to die.

In theological matters, again, the whole tone of the encyclical letter is a reaffirmation of those cardinal points of doctrine which have set the Christian church at variance with modern science and led increasing numbers of persons to eschew religion in any form. The fervent appeal of the bishops for confidence in the essential harmony of science and religion, and for united effort in recovering for the church the youth who have turned their backs upon it, rings hollow when it is perceived that the church, as the Lambeth Conference saw it, has not changed, and that all that the human mind has compassed in new knowledge and experience is looked at as a confirmation of Anglican assumptions.

Nor did the bishops see their way to speak out, save in time-worn generalities, about the glaring evils of the existing social order. Naturally, they discern in the modern world much that is unjust and degrading, but they content themselves with arraigning evil in the aggregate and leave to those who may feel so disposed the specific application. One must conclude that the Anglican bishops, zealous as they seem to be for a society which shall conform to New Testament precepts, have no better method of approach to offer than the services of the Prayer Book and the dogmas of an ancient faith. Old men about to die may salute the formula, and such as care little either way may go on accepting it, but the young men and women who today are demanding truth with liberty are not likely to bow to even a venerable device for keeping up appearances.

Will New York Lead?

THE speech of Governor Roosevelt before the New York State Federation of Labor urging a Statewide system of unemployment insurance is a matter of large importance. The Governor has apparently determined to offer that leadership in the employment crisis which the Administration at Washington has so conspicuously failed to furnish. If intelligent people will back him vigorously, the foremost industrial State in the Union may turn out to be the first one to develop a modern scheme of protection against unemployment.

It should be remembered that Governor Roosevelt's demand for insurance is only one part of the unemployment program to which he is committed. On March 30 last he appointed a committee on the stabilization of industry for the prevention of unemployment. In doing so he said:

> I wish to stress the fact that in appointing this committee I am looking forward to a long-time program for industrial stabilization and prevention of unemployment. We do not expect miracles but rather to assist the employers of this State in a gradual progress toward stabilization based upon authentic American business experience and arising out of and adapted to their own local industrial problem and such methods as their good will and sound business judgment may develop.

The committee on April 21 submitted a preliminary report, making certain limited recommendations as "an immediate, practical contribution to the reduction of unemployment at the present time." In discussing the long-time problem of regularizing employment, it pointed out briefly what has already been accomplished by certain individual concerns, and what might be done by local communities and the State. Finally it asked its own continuance until January 1 next in order that it might prepare a comprehensive report. We may therefore hope in due time for a document summarizing the important body of experience already available, and pointing out the next steps to be taken, both privately and publicly, in order to keep men steadily at work. We are aware that work of this kind does not meet the immediate needs of the present crisis. None the less it represents one of the most important things that can be done; for a system of unemployment insurance is solidly founded only when it is built on a sound program for stabilizing employment. Stabilization involves far-reaching organization and ordering of industry, but it must be attained; for if capitalism cannot destroy unemployment, then unemployment will surely destroy capitalism.

Efforts at stabilization, however, basic as they are, are not enough, as the present crisis clearly shows. Hence the Governor calls for "a practical, definite study of unemployment insurance, avoiding, of course, any form of dole, and basing . . . investigation on sound insurance lines under which the State, the employer, and the employee would all be joint premium payers." The details of any such plan are intricate, and the problems it must solve are extremely difficult, but its central principle is clear. The worker today does not and cannot control the conditions of employment; he is likely at any time to find himself out of a job by reason of causes entirely unrelated to his acts and choices. He cannot, then, be left to bear the burden of unemployment. Industry is responsible for the full support of its workers, and the State, through a properly organized system of unemployment insurance, can fix that responsibility where it belongs, and in so doing can put pressure on employers to do their utmost in stabilization. Before all discussion of details comes a clear recognition of this principle, a principle very hard for Americans, with their ultra-individualistic tradition, to accept.

Governor Roosevelt is quite right in saying that he will be called a Bolshevik for advocating a State system of unemployment insurance, but he need not be disturbed by the epithet. Nor is that the method by which thoughtful men will oppose his demand. There are real objections to unemployment insurance, as brought out in European experience, and opponents of that plan, if they are wise, will urge those objections, instead of fighting with epithets. They labor, however, under the fatal handicap of having no adequate substitute to offer in a situation that imperatively calls for action. We know too well today the suffering that exists in millions of homes because of involuntary unemployment; we know that even in the best of times such suffering is never wholly lacking. Unless and until we can actually abolish such unemployment, in a modern democratic society we are bound to provide a means of preventing the suffering and demoralization that that unemployment causes. Nothing short of unemployment insurance on a State-wide (and indeed a nation-wide) scale provides a means of such protection to all workers. Until its opponents can offer a substitute, their objections will prove vain. Governor Roosevelt has performed a great public service in calling for action on unemployment insurance now. The time is ripe. Will New York lead?

Flying High

IF Americans do not become air-minded, it will not be the fault of their newspapers. From the day that Lindbergh landed at Paris, our journalists have eagerly picked up and published, often at great length, every scrap of news that they could get from above ground level. Whether it were a trans-ocean hop, or a cross-continent spin, or a polar journey, or that dreariest of all human activities, an endurance flight, the reporter has been on tiptoe, and every time he has managed to find some element of picturesqueness or interest to carry his story to the front page. The latest conspicuous examples are the flights of Captain von Gronau and Dieudonné Coste, which have been followed in the press with the most detailed attention.

What is the explanation of all this publicity? It may be doubted whether the space given to flying represents simply the judgment of our managing editors with reference either to the actual importance of the subject or to public interest in it, as such interest is ordinarily conceived. It can scarcely be advertising, unless it be the lively hope of favors to come. Somehow, the ordinary explanations don't quite fit. After all, flying still has a spark of romance, in newspaper offices as well as outside. Despite the achievements of the Wright brothers and their successors, most of us still look up into the sky with something of the feeling of Daedalus and Darius Green, and maybe the editors somehow share that feeling. But now, alas, aviation is settling down to the sober business of "transportation by air," to humdrum matters of miles flown and passengers carried and profits and losses incurred. The everyday man begins to think of being a passenger some day himself and that thought gives him a new interest in certain figures recently published dealing with the little understood question of air safety.

A considerable number of ridiculous calculations have been published at various times purporting to show that it is safer to travel by air than by rail. The Actuarial Society of America has just issued an interesting report containing real information. From January, 1927, to March, 1930, the society's committee found, fatalities among passengers on scheduled air lines amounted to one in 5,000. On short non-scheduled commercial flights they came to only one in 50,000. Air travel is somewhat more than 200 times as dangerous as rail, air deaths amounting to one per 1,250,000 passenger miles, and rail fatalities to one per 300,000,000 passenger miles. Of every 1,000 pilots flying on scheduled mail and passenger routes alike, 50 are killed each year. The committee attributes the uniformity on the two classes of lines to the necessity of maintaining schedules in all kinds of weather. The death-rate among licensed pilots last year was 79 per 1,000 among those who had flown less than 400 hours, and only 29 per thousand for those of 400 hours or more of experience. With this year's passenger total expected to reach 200,000 it is encouraging to note the increasing safety of air travel, and the promoters of aviation will be well advised to give the widest publicity to the facts, and not to attempt to hide accidents or to give currency to grotesque and misleading figures. The further progress of the industry will rest securely on a wide public knowledge of the results already attained.

Revolt in Connecticut

By ALLEN B. MacMURPHY

CONNECTICUT, long as boss-ridden a State as there is in the Union, is witnessing a remarkable revolt in the Republican Party. J. Henry Roraback, chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, Republican national committeeman, political dictator of Connecticut, and president of the Connecticut Light and Power Company—a subsidiary of the United Gas Improvement Company of Philadelphia—is the object of the revolt. Professor Albert Levitt, member of the law faculty of St. Lawrence University and ordained Unitarian minister, and William J. Pape, publisher of the Waterbury Republican and American and for nearly two decades Mr. Roraback's consistent opponent, are the leaders of the revolt. Professor Levitt is seeking the Republican nomination for governor, and Mr. Pape that for State comptroller. Whether they will succeed at the primaries in September, and in the subsequent State convention where nominations are still made in Connecticut, is doubtful; neither of them expects to win this year; but that they have set in motion a current that will ultimately sweep Mr. Roraback from his leadership of the Connecticut G. O. P. and divorce the utilities companies from Connecticut politics appears certain.

Mr. Roraback's connection with Connecticut politics dates from 1892, when he began practicing law in Canaan; his connection with the utilities interests from 1905, when he organized and became president of the Berkshire Power Company, building a hydro station on the Housatonic River near Canaan. In 1898, having proved his ability as a vote-getter and political organizer in a small way, Mr. Roraback was put on the Republican State Central Committee, on which he has since served continuously. From 1901 to 1910 he was simultaneously a State central committeeman and a lawyer for the New Haven road.

> From 1901 to 1910 [says a friendly article published in the Hartford Courant in 1928] Mr. Roraback was counsel for the New Haven road under the railroad's chief counsel, Edwin D. Robbins, protecting it in the legislature against injurious and confiscatory legislation or marshaling the legislators behind bills favorable to the railroad. He carried on this work while a practicing lawyer in North Canaan and through it gained his wide knowledge of men and affairs. . . . With the fall of the Mellen regime in the New Haven road about 1910, Mr. Roraback gave up his law practice and turned his attention to more practical politics and business.

A hint of the nature of the "more practical politics and business" to which the Courant's writer refers is given by the late Charles Mellen's testimony at the Interstate Commerce Commission's hearings on the New Haven's finances in May, 1913. After Mr. Mellen had answered questions about the road's political activities in Rhode Island, government counsel quite casually asked him if the road had any lobbyist in Connecticut.

"Oh, yes," replied Mr. Mellen; "a man named Roraback takes charge of things up there. We pay him five or six thousand dollars every two years."

That statement, given under oath, made Mr. Pape see red. Through his newspaper, the Waterbury Republican—he did not acquire control of the American until after the war—Mr. Pape declared that Mr. Roraback must go. If Mr. Roraback wanted to be a lobbyist, that was not illegal; if he wanted to be chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, that was an honorable ambition; but the two were incompatible. Thus ran the Republican's argument. For the moment, the Republican's contentions attracted attention; so much so that when Mr. Roraback sought reelection as chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, his friends declared that he was no longer connected with the New Haven. This declaration was taken at its face value, and Mr. Roraback was reelected.

A year later the General Assembly convened. The old railroad lobby was on the job, and Mr. Roraback was obviously its leader. His friends offered the excuse that since the General Assembly had not been meeting when they said he was not working for the railroad, they had told the truth. That was too much for Mr. Pape, who immediately started attacking Mr. Roraback with fresh vigor and has been attacking him in season and out ever since. Incidentally Mr. Pape's argument today is the same that he first made back in 1913: that a man cannot simultaneously serve a favor-seeking corporation and the voters of a major party—the only party that can win in Connecticut under normal circumstances.

This argument has won many converts among Connecticut editors in recent years. Whereas when first uttered Mr. Pape's contention found hardly an echo, today the greater part of the State's Republican press—daily and weekly—is either actively supporting Messrs. Levitt and Pape or remaining neutral. The New London Day is the only Connecticut daily of any importance actively opposing the anti-machine movement.

Mr. Levitt entered the Connecticut political scene about a year ago. He had been living on a farm in Redding since 1921—except during the school year. Last year he began attacking the Roraback interests, hitting chiefly at the State Public Utilities Commission, which, he charged, was more interested in serving the State's corporations than its people. Mr. Levitt secured a writ of mandamus ordering the State's attorney general to summon the commission into court to show cause why it should not be removed for neglect of duty in having failed for years to enforce the law regarding grade-crossing elimination. This action followed the attorney general's refusal to grant a petition from a hundred electors requesting action against the commission; that official is now seeking to have the order rescinded. Meanwhile Mr. Levitt began making speeches and statements. Finally he announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination for governor, and got Mr. Pape to run for comptroller on the ticket with him. Messrs. Levitt and Pape are concentrating on those two key offices; they are making no efforts to boom anyone for lieutenant governor.

It is a hard task that they face. Rorabackism is strongly intrenched. An instance of the sort of influence Mr. Roraback exerts became public a few weeks ago, when a factory inspector—a salaried employee of the State of Connecticut—was found trying to induce farmers near New Milford to sell to the Connecticut Light and Power a transmission-line right of way across their properties. The Roraback machine has been in power so long that most of the four or five thousand persons on the State pay roll, realizing on which side their bread is buttered, may naturally be expected to work more or less openly and effectively in its behalf. Of course it cannot be proved that the machine has spies at the Levitt-Pape meetings, yet the suspicion that it has is hard to throw off. Certainly no one owing his position to Roraback the political dictator or Roraback the power magnate is likely actively to oppose his wishes! Considering the situation as a whole, it is not unreasonable to estimate that Mr. Roraback can virtually order ten thousand voters to the Republican primaries to smash revolt. To win, then, Messrs. Levitt and Pape must mobilize from twelve to fifteen thousand other voters, distributed throughout the State.

As has been said, it is unlikely that they can accomplish this at the forthcoming primaries and convention. Whether they win or lose, however, they will have made a substantial breach in the Roraback defenses. There are evidences of dissatisfaction with the Roraback regime throughout the State. Such evidences are to be found not only among the rank and file, but also among men in high place who outwardly conform to the wishes of the machine, but who inwardly long for leadership that will enable them to defy Mr. Roraback and his companies with impunity.

The insurgent two appear qualified to furnish such leadership over an extended period. Mr. Levitt is young—only forty-three. He has always led a vigorous life and is in the best of condition physically. Barring accident, there is no reason why he should not be able to fight for years if need be. Mr. Pape, also, is vigorous; only a few years ago he went on a strenuous hunting trip to Alaska, and every year he wrestles with the sportiest peaks in the White Mountains. He has nothing to lose by fighting the machine; he has been out of its good graces nearly twenty years. To drive Mr. Roraback from power is the great ambition of his life. His success in turning one of the weakest of run-down newspapers into one of the most substantial newspaper properties in New England in twenty-nine years has demonstrated his ability as an organizer and his bulldog tenacity.

"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," says an old proverb. Signs of approaching political madness on the part of Mr. Roraback are not hard to descry. The source of his power has always been on the farms and in the small villages where Republican majorities are rolled up in Connecticut. At the last session of the General Assembly Mr. Roraback turned his thumbs down on proposals to appropriate State funds to put the back roads in passable condition—roads which are not part of the splendid Connecticut trunk-line system, but over which farmers must take their products to market. This disregard of an urgent need of Connecticut agriculture has led to formation of a State-wide organization to force measures for dirt-road improvement through the next legislature.

Mr. Roraback aroused still more indignation when the Connecticut Light and Power put into effect the service charge which adds substantially to the bill of every private consumer of electricity produced by that corporation. Whether justly or not, Mr. Roraback is blamed for this. The fact that the Connecticut Light and Power has been absorbed into the U. G. I. system does not lessen popular indignation at the service charge.

To complete the picture, it is necessary to say a word about Mr. Roraback's part in the inception of the Connecticut Light and Power. In 1905—"with characteristic foresight," says the Courant's laudatory article previously quoted—Mr. Roraback obtained a charter, in the name of the Rocky River Company, to develop the water-power resources of the Housatonic River. At the time, the Rocky River had no plant, no capital, no electric light business. Mr. Roraback carried the charter in his pocket for twelve years. In 1917 he interested Randall Morgan of Philadelphia, prominent utilities promoter, in the project. From that interest grew the Connecticut Light and Power Company. The Waterbury Republican has stated editorially, and so far as known no attempt to refute it has ever been made, that Mr. Roraback sold the Rocky River charter, which granted unusual privileges, to the Connecticut Light and Power for seventy-five thousand dollars in cash and a position as vice-president in charge of land at an annual salary of eighteen thousand dollars. Whether this is true or not—and, as has been said, the statement has not thus far been denied—Mr. Roraback is today president of the Connecticut Light and Power.

Some Connecticut citizens profess to see a joker in the Levitt-Pape revolt; they contend that it is a terrific attack against a straw man, that Mr. Roraback wishes nothing so much as to retire from politics. That Mr. Roraback wishes to retire is probably true; he has had every honor his party can bestow save chairmanship of the Republican National Committee, and for this he can hardly hope. A charming man personally, a lover of books and flowers, Mr. Roraback would undoubtedly like to go back to his home among the Litchfield hills, far from the hurly-burly of politics. This, however, does not make the Levitt-Pape revolt a joke. When Roraback retires, someone will take his place; will that someone be another power-company man, groomed by Roraback and turning to him for advice, or will he be an independent leader picked by the rank and file of Connecticut Republicans?

It is vitally important for the Republican leader in Connecticut to be a man independent of favor-seeking corporations. As has been said, the Republican Party is the only party that can win in Connecticut under normal circumstances. It may or may not be true, as Mr. Levitt has charged during his campaign, that collusion exists between Mr. Roraback and leaders of the Democratic State Central Committee. The half-hearted support given to Hamilton Holt in his campaign against Hiram Bingham for the United States Senate prior to the special election of December 16, 1924, lends color to the charge. Whether collusion with Mr. Roraback and the forces he represents exists or not, to rely on the Democracy for cleaning up Connecticut is to lean on a broken reed; the Presidential election of 1928, when Governor Smith was beaten by Mr. Hoover by 44,405 majority, shows this conclusively. Whatever reform comes to Connecticut in the next few years—probably the next decade, at least—must come through the Republican Party.

The issue is clearly defined. It is the issue that is confronting the voters of State after State as they awaken to realization that the electric utilities are edging into the political position which the railroads held a generation ago. Neither Mr. Levitt nor Mr. Pape is afraid of an occasional reverse; each has had to overcome seemingly insuperable obstacles to attain his present prosperity and influence. If victory is not achieved this year, it probably will not come two years hence, as Connecticut Republicans are accustomed to bury their hatchets in Presidential years. But four years hence, barring some unforeseeable developments, the final divorce of the electric utilities from the Republican Party in Connecticut may reasonably be expected.

Is England Played Out?

By ALICE M. CAMERON

> There are indications today [in England] of a mortal disease of the soul which if sufficiently advanced may at last corrode the character, a combination of sloth, resistance to change, blindness, defeatism, and excessive temporizing which suggest a sick or exhausted civilization.—NICHOLAS ROOSEVELT.

IN view of this judgment by an American writer, it is worth while describing for American readers certain important tendencies in English working-class life. I shall interpret them in the light of concrete changes of attitude among the workers of a town (to be called X) of 70,000 situated in the East Midlands, a center of engineering and saw-mills, in which I have lived for the past eight years. It is in the low-paid agricultural area; the wages of labor are below the average; and the oppressive atmosphere of a cathedral town has hampered the progress of the workers.

The first point to be noted is the amazing decrease of crime in the past ten years throughout England. Twenty-four prisons have been closed in less than twenty years. Their number has been halved since the beginning of the century. Pentonville and Maidstone prisons are now to be torn down and the sites used for model dwellings. The figures are signs of a revolution in the attitude of the worker toward the law. The old attitude was one of class solidarity against the law and its representatives, the police. Obedience and law observance were a matter of fear. Since the war a new attitude has developed, and new relations of mutual confidence and understanding have grown up between workers and police.

In the town of X there has been an unemployed population for the past eight years of from 2,000 to 3,000; yet crime has decreased so much that on more than one occasion the judge of the Assize court on circuit has found no case to try. During the general strike thousands of excited strikers thronged the streets, holding meetings and listening to speeches. The chief of police was directed by headquarters to enrol special constables for the emergency. He rang up the local officials of the trade unions on strike and asked them to appoint their own specials. They readily agreed. No other specials were appointed, and not a single case of lawbreaking occurred. In place of the old-time mutual suspicion between police and unemployed, we have now such institutions as the Police Boot Fund, managed jointly by policemen and unemployed, for providing the children of the latter with boots. The police collect from the public, while a committee of the unemployed attend to the distribution, their labors being unobtrusively checked by the policemen. No less striking are the classes in economics and history conducted by workingmen of the Workers Educational Association in the local prison with no prison officials present. There is a growing understanding of the value of standards of law and order on the one side, and a greater sympathy on the other, leading to experiments in cooperation hitherto undreamed of.

A second significant fact is the percentage of voters voting at the last election. In X it was 86 per cent, for the whole country over 82 per cent. Making allowance for sickness and removals, this means that practically every citizen voted. What attitude of the workers lies behind this? First, a continuous interest in public affairs. Sunday evening meetings are held weekly at X at which members of Parliament and trade-union leaders speak on current political problems. The theater, holding over two thousand, is usually packed with workers. Interest is not dependent on sensational propaganda. The Labor candidate at X, at the last election, sent nothing whatever to the electorate beyond a short appeal to them to think for themselves and study the records of the parties. He was returned with a majority increased by 3,000. The Labor Party could afford very little advertisement. In X, as elsewhere, all the work of the election on the Labor side, from addressing and delivering poll cards to canvassing and speaking, was done by volunteers of the working class, and expenses were met by the collections at meetings. A thoroughly intelligent and responsible electorate is emerging, due not to organization from above but to spontaneous development from below.

An important factor in this development has been the invasion of political affairs by the working-class wife and mother. Before the war such women were chained bodily and mentally to household drudgery; they are now attending weekly meetings of political, cooperative, educational groups run by the women themselves. One political party in X has six women's sections meeting weekly; the cooperative guild has eight. The growth of women in self-confidence, initiative, and civic responsibility is nothing short of amazing. For example, at one time they organized a mass meeting outside the town hall while the election of senior medical officer was going on. They wished to support an Indian doctor of whom they had had experience in a subordinate position, and they were afraid of color prejudice among the upper-class members of the council. It has long been customary to praise the unselfish devotion, economic ingenuity, and dogged courage of the working-class wife and mother. Now all this fund of character and good sense is gradually being diverted into public service.

Third, attention should be called to the facts of adult education. Classes of all kinds have increased by thousands since the war. In X the number of tutorial classes has increased from one to six. These are three-year courses at which a weekly essay and considerable reading is required. Men from these courses who have had no high-school education are able to read for honors on admission to such colleges as Balliol and New College, Oxford. Men are going from the workshop to Oxford and back again. The special feature of these classes, aside from the high standard of work, is their democratic self-governing character, and their tendency as a group to organize public service in various forms. For instance, besides the lectures at the prison above mentioned the senior members organize and deliver courses of educational talks in the villages during the winter, while others go out to hold open-air meetings for the Labor Party during the summer. Permanent personal friendships are thus built up between town and country groups. A similar group of workers set up the People's Service Club for cooperation between employed and unemployed. The club established workshops on self-governing and educational lines in which unemployed members worked for nothing, for the benefit of the needy. Great difficulty was experienced at first in launching the scheme, but insight was gained by personal friendship and persistent experiment, and the club has robbed unemployment of its worst terrors for the workers of X.

To return to the cultural aspects of education: Hamilton Harty, one of the leading conductors of symphony orchestras in England, said recently that the most joyful experience of his life was the emergence of a new audience for the best orchestral music from the working class. He believes that the spread of good gramophone records and the high standards of the state-controlled radio programs are responsible for arousing this taste, which seeks further satisfaction in the concert hall. In X there are classes in theory of music organized by the workers, and a workers' art group which meets weekly to paint in oil and water color, and holds frequent exhibitions. Dramatic and play-reading groups are also popular.

In all these fields there is a spontaneous and growing movement which expresses itself in three inter-related ways. First, there is search for higher standards, an eagerness to enjoy the best and most difficult things. I once warned a philosophy class early in the session against reading Kant's Ethics till later in the course on account of its difficulty. Immediately a large number of copies went off like hot cakes. "Philosophy teaches you to doubt everything," said a tinplate worker, "but it also teaches you not to mind doubting." Another man, an unskilled laborer, related how he had waked in the night, and, suddenly realizing what Bergson meant in a certain passage, was so excited that he got up and paced the streets. Such persons are, of course, a minority, but a leading and respected one. They are called, not "high-brow," but, in local slang, "far-on," and are consulted by the others in any emergency.

Second, the movement creates more personal and intimate relations within and between groups. These are tending to become groups of friends with mutual confidence and appreciation, and the resulting elasticity and constructiveness. Further, there is a tendency of groups of different kinds to cooperate, as, for instance, employed with unemployed, town with country workers, police and workers, men and women, the members of each group retaining their individual character but finding new forms of cooperation through mutual confidence.

Third, an interest in public affairs shown in a readiness to undertake unpaid service for the community and the desire to learn more in order to understand the issues better. All these tendencies reinforce one another, as in the prevailing desire to travel in Europe in order to learn to know the workers there and to cooperate with them. The added year of compulsory schooling, making it possible for all workers to learn a foreign language, should lead to great developments in this field.

Can such a movement be called civilization? Not perhaps if by civilization is meant the highest standard of attainment yet realized by a select few. If, however, we mean progress in a certain direction which is likely, if it continues, to attain such standards, a good case could be made for this contemporary movement. English civilization at its best has always expressed itself, not only in craftsmanship and science, but in forms of disinterested public service and in social relations. The same tendencies, we have seen, are now stirring the whole people to find new expression. The fact that the civilization they attained would be for perhaps the first time in history a democratic civilization would give it a character hitherto unknown.

What are the chances of such a development? The movement is not a self-conscious attempt to reach a level imposed by others for reasons extrinsic to the activity, but a hearty desire to exercise new capacities and to enjoy them, whether the outside world notices it or not. The movement has in fact escaped notice because it has been too much absorbed in its own progress to advertise itself. Another factor which may guarantee continued progress is the constant self-criticism that prompts to further efforts. Any progress is assimilated and taken for granted, while suggestions for new possibilities and experiments are eagerly welcomed. It is difficult to convey the fact that the urge in all this is not as in the past a "myth" of any kind but rather a spontaneous impulse to promising experiment on the basis of enjoyed achievement. It is not the dream of something happening to them but the fun of making it happen and seeing what will happen next, on a small scale at first but a gradually widening one, which inspires alike dejected out-of-works, drudging housewives, and artisan students. The observer gets a sense of a present adventure dynamic and enjoyable. It is tempting to speculate on what will happen when this zeal for higher aesthetic and scientific standards, this more subtle and free way of cooperation, and this serious public spirit find full scope inside the workshop as well as outside.

How far do these advances and their continuance depend upon material prosperity? Owing to the decline in the export trade of certain basic industries, such as coal and cotton, the financial prosperity of the country has been declining since the war while these gains were taking place. Wages in nearly all industries have been lowered since the war (those of engineers after the lockout of 1912, for instance), and yet the progress has gone on. The skilled worker even now is slightly better off in real wages than before the war, but in the case of the unskilled the increase is very slight, and for the unemployed the standard of living is below that of any pre-war employment. Yet in both these classes the diminution of crime and the virtual disappearance of drunkenness, as well as other signs, indicate improvement. That such progress does not, in its initial stages at least, depend upon any increase in financial means is plain if we consider its different expressions. One of these is the active interest in political organization and enterprise. Here the keenness of the participants enables their activities to proceed with a minimum of financial expense. The services paid for by other parties are performed by volunteers. Again, the building up of new types of social relations is independent of financial increase. The People's Service Club (of the unemployed) has no entrance fee or subscription and pays nothing to its members for their work, and its "spirit" and influence largely depend on that fact. The same thing might be said of the educational movement. It is run at a minimum of cost through the disinterested services of those concerned. The improvement of taste in clothes, furniture, and personal habits which is so striking in comparison with pre-war standards is not due to the workers being able to buy more expensive goods, so much as to their exercising better choice and learning to make better things for themselves. The revival of handicrafts has been very marked since the war in the villages, but it has also occurred in the towns, where workers are eager to beautify their homes. The initiation of such a movement does not depend on increased financial prosperity, but rather on improved education and more leisure. Once aroused, the movement seems able to develop, whatever the standard of living, by using resources in new ways discovered by intelligence, cooperative enterprise, and volunteer service. New sources of interest and enjoyment are also discovered, and their discovery sets a new standard of active happiness and skill. English workers have always been strong at making the best of things. An examination of the programs of trade unions, cooperative guilds, and labor parties shows that both their avowed ideals and their practical projects have more to do with social conditions and opportunities than with wages proper. Their highest and most inspiring ideal is workers' control of industry, and their immediate objects include abolition of overtime, better status, and provision of adequate holidays.

On the other hand, many facts point to the importance of the financial element. Both skilled and unskilled workers limit their families in order to maintain their standard of living. A small family of one or two children means to the skilled worker the possession of a small surplus over bare living expenses, and for the unskilled worker an amount of food and clothing just adequate instead of inadequate. Further, the better-paid workers usually develop their tastes and capacities still further by the use of their added means. Typical cases in my knowledge are a bricklayer who practices cabinet making as a hobby and has furnished his house with beautiful pieces, and another who spends his additional means on music. Some observers fear that a rise in the civilization of the workers is likely to divert them from economic progress, while others are afraid that high wages will make the workers content to be wage slaves. Fortunately or unfortunately, the dangers of prosperity are not at present acute in England; but there can be no doubt that enormous progress is possible at the existing material level, and all signs seem to show that such progress is likely to continue.

Fascist Sympathies in the United States

By E. C. LINDEMAN

IT is, of course, well known that Fascism has many friends in the United States. Fascism would, indeed, seem to many a system of social control admirably suited to serve as team-mate for our other authority, namely, efficiency. With these twin gods harnessed together we might eliminate all criticism of the present order; we might then stamp out the last vestiges of chaotic democracy and confused liberalism. Of course, it would be necessary, if all of this were to be accomplished, to deny our past and, perhaps, to discover a symbolic Mussolini who could induce enough people to wear black shirts to frighten the rest of the population into submission. These accomplishments, although they seem grotesque in view of our historic aspirations, could be realized, provided (a) enough people could be led to believe that Fascism represents a guaranty for efficiency, and (b) a sufficient amount of sympathy for the Fascist experiment in Italy could be generated among the citizenry here.

The devices which alter and enlist collective sympathies are surprisingly subtle, almost paradoxical in their operations. How, for example, is one to explain why both England and the United States now entertain greater sympathies for Germany than for their former ally, France? How is one to explain the fact that Soviet Russia admires capitalistic United States and despises labor-governed England? Ready explanations, of course, exist, but they are for the most part too superficial, too unpsychological. Certainly there is nothing in the historic development of the United States which might lead anyone to believe that leaders here could be sympathetic toward a repressive, absolutist dictatorship such as Italy now suffers under Mussolini. The fact remains, however, that such sympathies do exist, and, moreover, are cultivated by most subtle means. In what follows I have attempted to indicate how the press may purposely or unwittingly contribute to a potential sympathy for Fascism among American citizens.

In the issue of the New York Times for June 1 its Rome correspondent affirms that the cause of current friction between Italy and France derives from the problem of anti-Fascist refugees now residing in France. This correspondent assumes that France not only extends hospitality to anti-Fascist "plotters" but that its courts are wilfully lenient and complacent about crimes committed by such persons. This equation, obviously, elevates Fascists to the level of martyrdom. It is well calculated to enlist sympathies and at the same time provide Fascism with fresh international support. If it can be successfully maintained, or rather, if naive readers can be led to believe that France is officially on the side of anti-Fascist refugees in its midst, France becomes, ipso facto, a villain while Italy becomes heroic. Nothing more than this is needed to begin a drift of thought and sentiment in the direction of Fascism, and, it might be added, in the direction of future international conflict.

To what degree do the facts in the case, as far as these may be discovered and impartially interpreted, conform with the above assertions of the Times correspondent? Perhaps a dozen Fascists, including one consular official, have been killed between 1923 and 1930, not by "Italian anarchists and communists" as the Times correspondent carelessly affirms, but by anti-Fascists. Considering the total number of Italians now living in France, Belgium, and Luxemburg, probably one million, and the nature of the provocation, this is a small number indeed. Many of these Italians have, of course, been compelled to leave Italy on account of Fascist persecutions; these persons are frequently followed by espionage, under consular auspices, and some of their families continue to live under persecution at home. Given such conditions, it is in reality surprising that so few aggravations have led to murder.

There are, in addition, strong evidences that the Italian government itself employs agents provocateurs for the very purpose of stirring up trouble with anti-Fascists abroad. In the autumn of 1923, for example, one Amerigo Domini (later associated with the murder of Matteoti, if not, indeed, his assassinator) admitted the receipt of 30,300 lire paid by Signor Finzi, under-secretary of the Foreign Office, for the purpose of giving "a lesson to the anti-Fascist émigrés." Some of Domini's followers came with false passports, furnished by the Italian police. Happily, they did not at that time carry out their mission but returned safely to Italy after visiting the cafes of Montmartre. Had they then attacked anti-Fascists in Paris, Mussolini no doubt would have cried out that his heroes were being murdered.*

On November 2, 1929, the Fascist paper L'Impero proposed that the Fascist provocations in France be more systematically organized. "Battles will start," so the article read; "the (French) government will decide to deport all the aliens causing trouble to their native country." It would, of course, please Mussolini immensely if the French government should turn over to him a certain group of refugees. Those who have in the past been participants in brawls, mostly poor and unknown workers, he does not want; he wants those who are the "causes of the discrepancies," a few outstanding Italians who have no connection with crimes but whose intelligence and political ideals he fears.

As far as the charge that the French courts treat anti-Fascist criminals leniently goes, there seems to be little evidence. In fact, this charge of the Times correspondent raises the whole question of who these so-called anti-Fascist "plotters" in France really are. The first of these events, the "Garibaldi plot," occurred in 1926, and the second, the "Menapace plot," in 1929. With respect to the first, it seems clear that Ricciotti Garibaldi was a spy and agent provocateur paid by the Fascist government. His mail was addressed to the Italian Ambassador, Baron Avenzana, and it appears to have been proved that his payments came through a trusted Fascist policeman named LaPolla. On October 5 Garibaldi met with three anarchists whom he enlisted in a plot to assassinate Mussolini. On October 14 he asked one of these conspirators to carry some letters to the Grand Master of the Freemasons at Rome; at the same time he transferred a photograph of this "plotter" to policeman LaPolla. The plotters decided at the last moment to remain in France. Garibaldi was arrested in France in November and confessed the details of this "plot." The so-called "Menapace plot" belongs to the same category. An Italian anarchist, Berneri by name, was arrested in Brussels on December 20, 1929; he was charged with having gone to Brussels for the purpose of assassinating Signor Rocco, the Italian Minister of Justice, who was expected in Brussels at this time. Berneri had in his possession some photographs, or pictures, of Signor Rocco and a revolver. An Italian refugee in Paris, Alberto Cianca, was also involved in this plot. Inquiries by the police in both Belgium and France indicated that this plot had also been engineered, this time by a Fascist agent, Ermanno Menapace. Indeed, it was he who supplied Berneri with the pictures of Rocco and the revolver; he actually brought Berneri to Brussels in his automobile. There he notified the police and immediately left for Italy. The Belgian courts convicted Berneri, not for "plotting" but for traveling with a false passport and carrying a weapon without a permit; he was sentenced to five months in jail. The Paris courts sentenced Cianca for three months, Berneri for six, and Menapace himself for two years. The last French conviction resulted in a ten-year sentence imposed upon an anti-Fascist named Pavan; he had killed an Italian spy. The French jury did not sentence him to death because it found many extenuating circumstances.

The above facts, although based upon official records of French courts, cannot be verified to suit every test of evidence, but they at least have the merit of being specific and may, therefore, be investigated. What they reveal is that blanket and question-begging terms such as "anti-Fascist plotters," "French leniency toward anti-Fascist criminals," and the like convey no accurate meaning. These are words which are intended to stir sympathies and precipitate convictions. When they appear in a reputable newspaper readers are likely to make the assumption that they stand for real facts. How much more consistent would it be if American correspondents abroad attempted to interpret the news of Europe in the light of the essential American tradition! We were once, let it not be forgotten, the nation which offered asylum to political refugees. It was integral to our whole experiment that those who were oppressed by anti-democratic governments abroad might find shelter here. Indeed, in the early days we made excellent use of such émigrés. If we have now become a frightened nation, too timid to allow for difference and criticism, might we not, in view of our past, at least refrain from making trouble for other nations where political refugees are welcomed? The chief import of the article by the Rome correspondent of the Times was its apparent appeal to France to bar anti-Fascist refugees. And this, it seems, is a sorry role for an American to play. If this particular correspondent wishes to place himself at the service of Mussolini, this is, of course, his affair, but when he attempts to influence American citizens in the same direction he performs a public function, and this is not wholly his affair.

* A royal decree of August 10, 1927, enacts that anyone "who in a foreign country sustains injury to his health in any conflict or assault while acting directly or indirectly for a national aim is entitled to a pension." No distinction is made, of course, between "injury" received while attacking without being provoked and injury suffered in legitimate self-defense.

Cut Your Own Rent

By ROSWELL WARD

TWO significant contrasts in city housing development are rising in the old Chelsea district of New York City. One of them is the ultimate expression of traditional landlordism, a business project yielding business profits, and said to be the largest apartment house in the world. A few blocks away is the pioneer cooperative apartment of the Consumers' Cooperative Services, Inc.—a project having many features new to American housing practice—which will provide modern apartments at cost in a central metropolitan area where real estate (and apartments) ordinarily command high rentals. These two buildings represent divergent economic trends: housing as a business, at a profit, versus housing as a cooperative enterprise, at cost.

Cooperative housing is not a new thing in the United States. The Amalgamated Clothing Workers and other organizations have built great cooperative apartment houses which have been very successful, but this first housing project of the Consumers' Cooperative Services is organized to provide an unusual degree of security and flexibility for the tenant's investment, and to offer apartments of modern type in a location which compares most favorably with that of even the most expensive "commercial" apartment houses. In this respect it follows very closely the practice as typified in the immense cooperative housing projects carried on in European countries.

It is the first cooperative housing plan in this country to be sponsored by a cooperative organization which is actively carrying on other cooperative enterprises. The Consumers' Cooperative Services has been notably successful over a period of years in operating a chain of cafeterias and food shops which charge prices sufficient to insure a small working margin and then periodically rebate the difference between income and cost of operation to their 3,500 members. This service at cost is the basic principle of all genuine cooperative activities, both here and abroad.

Consider for a moment the expenses involved in a new cooperative apartment-house development. The cost of the land and building is shared between the mortgage holders, the parent organization, if any, and the tenants. In the cooperative houses already constructed in this country by independent groups the initial costs have necessarily been financed by short-term loans, and after the land has been acquired about 50 per cent of the cost of the entire project has been obtained by mortgages on the land and building. The other 50 per cent of the initial cost has been invested by the tenants, who are ordinarily stockholders in a tenant organization actually owning the land and building.

In the Consumers' Cooperative house, however, the tenants pay only 28 per cent of the cost of construction, all the organization costs being carried by the parent cooperative, which retains ownership of the house and leases it on a fifty-year lease to the tenants' organization. The form of the tenant's investment is a fifty-year lease on his apartment and a mortgage on the property. As mortgage-holders the tenants are given greater security for their investment than if they were stockholders, while the parent cooperative assumes the risks of actual ownership and, in case of future increase in the value of the property, is enabled to apply this increase to the extension of its cooperative activities. In case of losses, however, the tenants are protected and the cooperative organization must shoulder the loss. This is another of the unique features of this house.

This arrangement also illustrates the value of affiliating a housing project with a parent cooperative organization, as we have the Consumers' Cooperative Services buying the land and underwriting all the initial expenses. About one-third of the cost of the project is supplied by a first mortgage from the Bowery Savings Bank. A second mortgage is held by members of the Consumers' Cooperative Services, who can buy second-mortgage bonds in units of $100 apiece. The balance of the capital required is supplied by the tenants themselves, who are third-mortgage bondholders.

The real benefits of cooperative housing are not so apparent in these organization preliminaries, however, as they are when one considers the "rent" or monthly charges which the tenants are required to pay. Can one imagine the average owner of a commercial apartment house displaying to his tenants a schedule of his actual operating costs—the interest which he pays on his mortgages and his own investments, his insurance, his accounting and legitimate management expenses, the cost of janitors and maintenance help—and thus basing his rent on the actual cost of the apartment house?

This quixotic state of affairs actually exists among cooperative tenants. No one can make a profit on this house; only the nominal legal rate of interest is paid to defray the cost of financing it; the book-keeping and supervisory duties are assumed by tenants who receive a limited stipend; the only person who gets a salary is the hired janitor; apartments cannot be sub-let at a profit; and absentee ownership of apartments is not permitted.

This apartment house is a pioneer expression of all the principles of consumers' cooperation which have been shown by American and European experience to be desired in housing activities. It is sponsored by a cooperative organization of broad scope; the tenants are limited in the amount of initial investment they have to make and secured to a greater degree than if they assumed the risk of actual ownership; they pay only the actual cost of operating the house; they manage it themselves; they have one vote apiece, irrespective of the amount of their investment; and they can redeem their original investment at any time. They receive no direct return on the initial investment which they are required to make, but if the interest on the tenant's investment is added to his monthly charge, the total is estimated to be from 25 per cent to 50 per cent less than the rentals current in commercial apartment houses. Of course success cannot be attained without honest, efficient, and economical management, and it is to this point that the efforts of cooperators must be directed. Is it possible that cooperative housing may be the spearhead of an American adaptation of cooperative enterprises which will approach the magnitude of the great European cooperative organizations?

Cluckings of Calvin

Translated by HERBERT FORDHAM

July 1. Brethren, let us stop finding fault.
2. The founders of this country were concerned chiefly with things that are eternal. Let us be like them.
3. If every one now working will pay his bills and buy whatever he needs and can afford, the unemployment problem will be solved.
4. We all are dependent on one another.
5. Congress has adjourned. It will be criticized. This will do little good. Anyhow, it might have done worse.
7. Our tourists will spend a lot of money in Europe this season. Maybe it will be all right.
8. Our moral power at the London conference was great because we did not insist on superiority to Great Britain but only on parity.
9. If we learn that the Farm Board cannot fix prices by buying up wheat, we shall learn a lesson worth whatever it costs.
10. No matter how much some people may have lost, an end has not come to the progress of the United States.
11. Most people have failed because they did not really try.
12. Foreign nations should not object to our increased duties on imports. They ought to know that the higher the tariff the greater the imports.
14. Now that the German bond issue is subscribed for and Congress has adjourned, the business of the world can go on.
15. The granting of the first charter to the Colony of Massachusetts Bay has changed the whole foundation of human relationship.
16. Self-government in the United States during the last decade has been a success.
17. In spite of all efforts for peace, the nations are arming more heavily than before the war. Only the United States is doing right.
18. We should support the President whether he be right or wrong.
19. Everybody is partly good and partly bad. We should perfect ourselves before criticizing others.
21. The South is improving.
22. People should build more homes. To build now may or may not be best, but the present seems to be a good time.
23. We did well to ratify the naval treaty.
24. For a long time we have maintained a higher standard of living than have other nations. Perhaps we can keep on doing so.
25. If it appears that the Amtorg agents have been trying to overthrow our government, proper action will be taken.
26. During the vacation season, many will enjoy our natural scenery but some will prefer to visit the old home.

In the Driftway

IT was a Princeton friend of the Drifter's who remarked at Oberammergau that if the Americans didn't seize Germany in 1918, they have certainly done so this summer. A year ago the Drifter was repacking his rucksack and drifting away from laughter-loving Bavaria to a region unsought of his countrymen. His friend's remark brings it all back by contrast as though it were today.

* * * * *

ESTABLISHED in darkest Junkerland, the Drifter feels in a uniquely authoritative position for writing a modish biography of Bismarck. In this wide country, with its low rolling hills of beech and white birch and hemlock, where the ground is sand where it's solid, and peat-bog where it's not, things are as they used to be. The Drifter's host and his forebears have lived seven hundred years on this estate. The Junkers may not be good political neighbors, but they're mighty nice to their friends. The Baroness makes with her own hands a Christmas present for every child on the estate, and there are twenty-five families, many of them large. Everything for the household is a home product—an old peasant woman still weaves the family towels, the lady of the manor superintends all the sausage-making; they bake their own bread in straw-heated stone ovens (bread as is bread). And yet there are changes: things have never been quite the same since Bismarck died.

* * * * *

TWO more guests besides the Drifter at the Baron's table—two geologists, one of whom has invented a new sort of divining rod for minerals. They are going to look over the place for mineral wealth. While they "witch for gold" the Drifter, feeling as if he were in one of Freytag's stories, leaves the old hall, where one hundred and fifty roebuck horns decorate the chimney, and the carved spiral staircase winds its way upstairs (the only stairway in the house, and worthy the renown of that celebrated one in the French dictionary, "winding stairs pronounced ou-in-dignesterze") and takes his way past the great gardens, down the long cherry alley. The gold-seekers are intent on a recently harvested grainfield, where the divining rod indicates gold. Three peasants are set to digging. About six feet down they come to some bright metallic flakes. The Drifter recalls the enterprising alchemist who hopefully set about transmuting into gold New York harbor or the waters thereof. Though he did not succeed, his abandoned laboratory later made a pleasant study for the Drifter.

* * * * *

IT was that kindly soul the Bürgermeister who drove the Drifter along the Polish boundary, that fantasy of Versailles. The road suddenly halts, barricaded by a black-red-gold fence, next comes a hundred-yard stretch of grass, then a red-white-red fence and a Polish guardhouse, and then the road "takes up" again in Poland. The railroad tracks run exactly to the German border, there is a heap of earth across them, some beams on end, thirty feet of bare railroad bed, and then tracks again. The major local iniquity is a lake around which the boundary runs, about twenty feet on the German side of the shore, to prevent the German peasants from watering cattle in the lake. At Rauschendorf, on the lake, the international boundary runs down the middle of the village road. (The Drifter, sitting on the right side of the car, unexpectedly made his first appearance in Poland.) The village is thus half Polish and half German, and every time the Germans want to water their cattle in the lake they have to show a passport and have the cattle examined "for disease," so the Bürgermeister says.

* * * * *

ON August 10, 1825, the Drifter learned, there died in Lauenburg a certain Dr. Vollmer, a physician extremely fond of good living, and, remarkably enough, much afraid of death. In his will, which makes a thick volume, he provided that he was to be put in a glass casket and left for the next one hundred years, so that if he should come to life he could get out. He also wished a great banquet to be given every year on the anniversary of his death, to which the Bürgermeister and the evangelical clergymen of Kreis Lauenburg were to be invited. In order to dodge all danger from inflation, taxes, and the like, he left certain meadows the income from which was to be applied to the banquet. The will provided the exact amount of salt, of pepper, of drinks, and of all the victuals. It provided a certain amount for a tip to the man who kept the city gates, for letting the guests into the city in the evening. Lastly it provided that none of the guests was to leave the house before daybreak of the morning after, and that they were all to be taken home in wheelbarrows!

* * * * *

ALAS that the Drifter has no qualifications for wangling an invitation to the late Dr. Vollmer's banquet tonight. But his friend the Bürgermeister will be there. As toastmaster he admits that tonight the guests are not to be taken home in wheelbarrows, but he adds that as soon as the hard times are a little past, so that people can appreciate a joke, he is going to revive the custom. May the Drifter be there to see! THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Catholicism and Liberalism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a non-Catholic reader permit me to felicitate The Nation for printing the enlightening article by the Rev. John A. Ryan, Catholicism and Liberalism, which leaves no doubt about the attitude of his church—there can be no compromise! Therein lies the strength of the Catholic church with its perfect discipline and its fulcrum of dogmatism.

Nevertheless, Father Ryan gives us some very clear definitions of "liberal" and "liberalism" in their various aspects and applications, both here and abroad. By following these to their logical conclusions, we find that a strict authoritarian in religion, like Father Ryan, can also be classed as a liberal in economics and in politics, always provided they are kept apart from his church; and if it comes to a question of policy, we know without a scintilla of doubt which way the policy points. And so, in the words of Father Ryan, if you "desire to see established a reign of wider industrial and political justice . . . the task before us all is formidable enough to command our united efforts."

It is very evident that if we wish to enlist the sympathy of the church we must heed these warning admonitions—antagonism will only produce the opposite effect. This seems a good opportunity to exercise that spirit of tolerance we hear about so much, not condescendingly, but generously. Father Ryan's loyalty to his church commands our respect, his admirable lucidity and firm but courteous tone set us a good example.

Glen Ridge, N. J., August 11 LOUIS CORTAMBERT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The point which interests me in Father Ryan's article Catholicism and Liberalism is his interpretation of liberalism. It is true that some people call themselves liberal in politics and economics but conservative in their religious views. That such people, who are liberal in one aspect of life and conservative in another, are not liberal at all is revealed by the fact that whenever they are called upon to enact their liberal views they shrink from doing so.

An integrated liberal character is liberal in all aspects of life. The idea that life in all its forms is changing except in the field of so-called religious truth is not the idea of a liberal mind, but of an opportunist who for personal reasons accepts liberalism in one aspect of life and rejects it in another.

When we talk of liberal Catholics we mean precisely Catholics liberal in their religious interpretation. But such Catholics are not acknowledged to be Catholics any more by the church. The whole discussion therefore begs the question.

Parkdale, Oregon, August 12 F. WERTGEN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article by the Reverend John A. Ryan is a masterpiece of diplomacy and evasion. False premises and tricky reasoning are apparent under the veneer of erudition. The peak of bizarre logic is reached when Father Ryan says that the average educated Catholic could spend his time to better advantage than in reading such books as are banned by the "Index of Prohibited Books," viz., Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," Darwin's "Origin of Species," Kant's "Critique," or the works of Maeterlinck.

New York, August 8 MAURICE DEL BOURGO

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a new reader of The Nation may I comment briefly on Catholicism and Liberalism? First, Father Ryan has skilfully and interestingly demonstrated that a doctrinally liberal, "good" Catholic cannot exist. Second, his logic in discussing the Index is amusing if not convincing. If the Catholic's prayer books are "incomparably better" than the Book of Common Prayer why is it necessary to administer the prohibition? Why should a thing that is inferior be so intolerable and obnoxious? Why not confess that it is fear alone which places the Prayer Book on the Index?

Adams Basin, N. Y., August 10 THEODORE G. CLEMENT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In my humble opinion the Reverend John A. Ryan is perfectly right in his contention that thinking in air-tight compartments is not confined to Catholics. But in charging the "mistaken course of liberals by lecturing, threatening, and antagonizing Catholic economic and political liberals" with responsibility for "the ultra-conservative position taken by prominent Catholics on the Continent of Europe," it would seem that Father Ryan has been too sweeping. In Europe the church is supported by the state which collects her taxes, while here the church depends on the voluntary offerings of her votaries. This circumstance, permit me to state, is at least a contributory factor to both, the ultra-conservative position of prominent Catholics in Europe and the economic and political liberalism of prominent Catholics in this country. I hope Father Ryan will forgive me this slight annotation to his splendid article which was read with keen relish several times.

Clinton, Iowa, August 10 J. C. MENZEL

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Father Ryan's article on the Catholic and Liberal is interesting, not for the questions it answers, but for the questions it raises. How, for instance, would Father Ryan demonstrate to the liberal of any faith or creed the validity of the propositions which are the foundations of Father Ryan's article: (1) that Jesus was and is God; (2) that Jesus founded the church now known as the Roman Catholic church; (3) that that church continues to be the medium for the revelation of God? Intelligent, scholarly demonstrations of such Catholic assumptions would be the most fruitful contribution any apologist could make to the situation which evoked the original questions of your correspondents.

Rättvik, Sweden, August 15 JOHN MCCHESNEY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Reverend John A. Ryan may be a liberal, and I am inclined to think a very interesting and charming personality. But no amount of theoretical explanation will explain away the assumed infallibility of the Catholic church and its final authority over its adherents, as stated in the Encyclical of last December. I am a Protestant of Italian birth who voted in the last election for Al Smith, and also advocated in season and out of season that religion should not enter as a qualification, and I also was very indignant at the intolerance shown by some Republicans. However, since then, the encyclical and other pronouncements of the Pope have convinced me that the Catholic's philosophy of education and life is fundamentally inimical to the fundamental pillars of the government of this nation, a liberal education, and gradual intellectual progress.

East Orange, N. J., August 3 JOEL TESSITORE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Father Ryan says that "undoubtedly the Catholic church does reject unlimited freedom in all these spheres. She denies the moral right of men to accept or to profess false opinions or to propagate doctrines or practices which are contrary to the moral law."

Father Ryan certainly must have read the history of the Inquisition in Spain and other holy lands where "false opinions and false doctrines" contrary to the then "moral law" sent thousands, nay, tens of thousands, to the stake. Was it not an infallible Pope who held that the doctrines and opinions of Galileo and Giordano Bruno were false? I would like to know if there is any institution in the world today, including the Catholic church, that can tell what are false opinions or what doctrines or practices are contrary to the so-called moral law.

Brooklyn, August 9 J. M. E.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Father Ryan's sharp exposition of the liberal Catholic stand in America is a high point in your generally noteworthy issue of August 6. After concluding the article the question uppermost is: How much within the liberal fold can a Catholic possibly be?

Politically, not at all, unless he is disloyal to the historical stand of the Catholic church as set forth in papal encyclicals too numerous to mention, including the "Mirari Vos" of Gregory XVI, August 15, 1832, the "Quanta Cura," December 8, 1864, the "De Fide," Vatican Council, 1870, the Decree of the Congregation of the Inquisition, July 3, 1907. Politically the liberal Catholic is too circumscribed to be able to venture far except where Catholic property is involved or where Protestant domination is feared. French and English history shows the church invariably aligned with reaction if the ruling group is Catholic and with the opposition if the ruling group is Protestant.

In the field of economics Christian socialism has always turned to Bishop Ketteler, Cardinal Manning, Count de Mun, and similar figures for inspiration and has frowned on any of the more progressive doctrines of the nineteenth and earlier twentieth centuries. The church is not anxious for any revision of the conception of property and it has issued more than one encyclical to convince the liberal thinkers of its stand.

In science the tradition of the church again is a distinct handicap if not a deterrent. Tertullian, Lactantius, St. Augustine, and Gregory founded an unfortunate tradition that the sincere efforts of many broad-minded Catholics to this day have failed to undermine.

The obvious difficulty is in the interpretation of "infallibility in faith and morals." All three terms do not lend themselves to precise definition. All three terms shade off imperceptibly to mysticism on one side and into just earthly security on the other. As soon as definition is attempted the highly compartmentalized mind, the bane of progressive thinking, is encouraged. Father Ryan feels that he can be reactionary in religion and liberal in economics at the same time, or as Shakespeare would have it,

> . . . hot ice and wondrous strange snow,
> How shall we find the concord of this discord?

But for the liberal Catholic there is no difficulty, obviously. If mathematics can be "absolute," religion can, despite the fact that God has revealed nowhere that two and two make four and compels the belief therein at the pain of hell, but approximately seven-eighths of the world does not believe "Christ is God and that He endowed the Catholic church with plenary authority to teach and to govern in spiritual and moral affairs." An intelligent student of human development is amazed!

Brooklyn, August 8 OCHUNVAY DEVELDT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of August 6 Father Ryan makes out as good a case as possible for the so-called liberal Catholic. In spite of a few very telling points, however, I am left with the feeling that the "liberal Catholic" is like the guinea-pig, neither guinea nor pig; that is, neither liberal nor Catholic. Now it is true that we have a few individuals in the Catholic church, and I think Father Ryan will agree with me that they are very few indeed, who are capable of throwing themselves into that mental state which the psychologists term "dissociation." Such individuals must define liberalism in the terms Father Ryan employs. Such individuals cannot see that the very essential of liberalism in religion, in science, in politics is the individual's right, the moral right, to use Father Ryan's term, to investigate all the facts at his disposal and to reach his own conclusions therefrom. For that reason he is as much opposed to the church that would use moral force to send all her children to a school that suppresses all free inquiry into matters of religion and morals as he is to the Soviet school that has for its chief aim the inculcation of the doctrines of communism.

But the most demolishing argument of all against Father Ryan's stand is the strong undercurrent within Catholic circles of intense opposition to liberalism in all its forms. Has Father Ryan never felt the oppressive hand of extreme orthodoxy persecuting him for his quasi-liberal opinions and activities?

It is Catholics everywhere who have opposed all liberal legislation not directly concerned with freedom of worship and greater opportunities for themselves as Catholics. I might mention in this country birth control, liberal divorce laws, and child labor. I know that Father Ryan on the last-mentioned question fought his church single-handed.

New York, August 8 JOHN JAY

Books

Clean as These Rocks

By WILBERT SNOW

Clean as these rocks are, washed by every tide,
Sweet as the fragrance of the summer sea,
Sparkling as sunlight on the waves, and wide
As ocean I would wish my life to be.
Others may feel the rocks too self-contained,
The fragrance lost in pockets up the bay,
The dazzling sun on waves too unrestrained—
Chilling, the ocean's drench of bitter spray.

For me these granite barricades suffice
To beat back waves of unrest one by one;
The heady tang of brine holds Orient spice
Tinctured with ambergris; each dart of sun
On waves is foe to dulness; and the ocean
A slughorn call to bury dead emotion.

Our Intellectual Rulers

FOLLOWING Mr. Gerard, this department has thought it useful to compile a list, not of our economic but of our intellectual rulers. Like Mr. Gerard, we have decided to make our choices realistic; we therefore present not our nominal but our actual mentors. If we had chosen those whom it would be pleasant to think of as our intellectual leaders, our list would include Santayana, Morris Cohen, Wesley C. Mitchell, Charles Horton Cooley, Lewis Mumford, T. Hunt Morgan, H. S. Jennings, Judge Cardozo, Justice Holmes, Jane Addams, and so on. Occasionally we find that writers who deserve a wide influence actually wield it, as, for example, Mr. Mencken and Mr. Dewey; but it should be pointed out that the influence of the latter is usually exaggerated. It is not nearly so great, say, as that of Will Hays.

Historical comparisons will help us here. Jonathan Edwards was perhaps our profoundest early thinker, but his influence was negligible when compared with that of Thomas Paine or Benjamin Franklin. Emerson was an important influence even with the Americans of his own day, but not half so important as Horace Greeley, who, as Emerson remarked, did "all their thinking and theory for them, for two dollars a year." The real thinker of a later period might be a Willard Gibbs, a Henry Adams, or a Charles S. Peirce, but none of them had any influence on the American thought of their time comparable to that of Robert Ingersoll. Nor did William James, in his heyday, have any influence approaching that of Elbert Hubbard or Dr. Frank Crane. The question to be asked of any candidate for admission to our present roll, therefore, is: Will what X thinks today become the thought of thousands tomorrow (using "tomorrow" quite literally)? In the list which follows, we had at first intended to assign each thought ruler a national ranking, but this task proved too difficult:

Leonard P. Ayres	Charles E. Hughes
Bruce Barton	Ivy Lee
Roger W. Babson	Sinclair Lewis
William E. Borah	Charles A. Lindbergh
Arthur Brisbane	Walter Lippmann
Heywood Broun	Andrew W. Mellon
Nicholas Murray Butler	H. L. Mencken
S. Parkes Cadman	Robert A. Millikan
Calvin Coolidge	Henry Fairfield Osborn
John Dewey	William Lyon Phelps
Will Durant	Will Rogers
Thomas A. Edison	John S. Sumner
Henry Ford	Samuel Untermyer
Glenn Frank	John B. Watson
Edgar Guest	William Allen White
Will Hays	Harold Bell Wright
Herbert Hoover	Owen D. Young

As we never completely agree with anybody else's list, we do not expect complete agreement with our own. We ourselves are in some doubt both about certain inclusions and more particularly certain omissions, for example, Stuart Chase, Dwight Morrow, Charles E. Mitchell, Margaret Sanger, Upton Sinclair, and Senator Norris. Certain industrialists, whose opinions are listened to merely because of their economic prestige, are omitted, but others who are famous as spokesmen in their own right, such as Andrew W. Mellon, Owen D. Young, and Henry Ford (whose name is here taken to cover such ghosts as Samuel Crowther) must be included. After some hesitation, Mr. Hoover was listed ex officio.

All in all, we feel that this list of thirty-four rulers gives a very fair composite picture of the American mind; and no doubt Mr. Gerard could even show that it proves the beneficence of the protective system.

HENRY HAZLITT

Mrs. Undset's Tetralogy

The Son Avenger. By Sigrid Undset. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

IN her latest novel Sigrid Undset completes her monumental tetralogy "The Master of Hestviken." The volumes in the order of their appearance are: "The Axe," "The Snake-Pit," "In the Wilderness," and "The Son Avenger."

No proper estimate of this work should overlook Mrs. Undset's stride from a succès d'estime to a very high order of general popularity in America. She has, within five or six years, risen from a writer whom nobody read and somebody appreciated to one whom many will read whether they appreciate her accomplishment or not. The award of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1928 had something to do with this, but less, perhaps, than appears on the surface.

For, possessing a style which is so effortless as to appear no style at all, narrowing her delineation of character down to a chiaroscuro of simple action and superficial description—employing, in other words, the most primitive and time-honored of all the devices of the story-teller—she is able to create an atmosphere and a sensation of power. This old method, in a period satiated with the new, the super-analytical, and the exotic, appears marvelously fresh and original. And to say that it is fresh is only to remark that the grace of simplicity is perennial.

She writes of the North countries in their heroic age, and it is difficult to see how any other place but the North could have produced her. The lapse from drama into lethargy, the slow accumulation of passions, the towering melancholies producing their own sense of predestination—all these are reflections of a brooding winter land. "The Son Avenger" brings out her method and temperament very clearly. It is a less graceful story than "The Axe," and also far less gracious. In it, the storm of the whole tetralogy rises to a final height of blood and thunder. But it also contains some of the author's finest descriptive writing. And it is a fitting climax to a dramatic whole.

"The Son Avenger" traces the fortune of the Master of Hestviken through the destinies of his daughter and adopted son to a final tragic close. The theme of the tetralogy—that vengeance is God's alone—is rounded out in Olav's tragic death and repentance. It is a persuasive and beautiful ending.

EUGENE LÖHRKE

Fair Harvard

The Development of Harvard University, 1869-1929. Edited by Samuel Eliot Morison. Harvard University Press. $6.

IN 1936 Harvard College will celebrate its three hundredth birthday, and the task of compiling its history has appropriately been placed in the hands of Professor S. E. Morison, the distinguished authority on the maritime history of Massachusetts. Foreseeing the fatigue that often overtakes an author in the last stages of a prolonged task, and wishing to take advantage of the survival of some of President Eliot's contemporaries, Professor Morison has boldly adopted the unconventional plan of issuing the volume dealing with the last sixty years first. There can be no question as to the wisdom of this policy. Every year between this and 1936 will see the dropping out of men who are authorities on the period dealt with, and the present moment is the latest possible for a really contemporary treatment of the revolutionary changes of this period by those who had a hand in them. A true historical perspective on these things will not be obtainable for many years, and the next best thing is to see what they meant to the men who lived among them.

The book opens with an Introduction containing an account of the Government and Administration of the University, the curriculum of the College, the establishment of Voluntary Worship, the Inaugural Addresses of Eliot and Lowell, and some tables of growth. The description of the somewhat intricate administrative and academic machinery is admirably clear and concise, and forms an essential background for the detailed studies which follow. The two inaugurals remain on rereading as pregnant and significant as when they were first delivered, and have gained new interest in the light of the developments which they prefigured.

The first twenty-five chapters deal with the various departments of study which come under the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, and are written by scholars who have or have had an important part in conducting them. The remaining thirteen describe the growth of the graduate and professional schools, the Blue Hill Observatory and the Library. There is a full index.

The editor has shown throughout a marked degree of self-restraint. Each author has been permitted to deal with his subject in his own way, and the lack of uniformity is more than made up for by the personal flavor which permeates many of the narratives. Some, like Professor Palmer's account of his colleagues, James, Royce, Santayana, and Münsterberg, are valuable as vivid portrayals of distinguished personalities, and rise from the level of chronicles to that of literature; others are contributions to the history of methods of college and university instruction; still others to the history of the growth of knowledge in the various branches of learning. All, however, take account of the individual scholars who have created the university as it is today; and the skill with which practically every professor who has taught in it during these sixty years is mentioned and characterized without any semblance of cataloguing, is highly remarkable. Hundreds of Harvard men who will never read through these six hundred-odd pages will scan them to see what is said of a favorite teacher or a classmate turned professor, and none will be disappointed. The combination of interest and compendiousness achieved by so great a variety of authors is very noteworthy.

The danger to be feared in a work of this nature is that of a kind of parochialism which forgets the relation of the institution described to its rivals and the outside world, and gives itself up to an orgy of self-glorification. Of this, or of that arrogance with which Harvard men are sometimes charged, there is almost no trace. On the other hand, the well-known freedom and frankness with which Harvard professors and alumni alike are accustomed to indulge in intramural criticism is given free rein by the editor, though the tone throughout is urbane and at times enthusiastic.

Looking back over the book as a whole, one is forced to admit that the enthusiasm is justified. Closeness to the academic problems and failures of the moment often induces pessimism about our colleges and universities; but the record of service and devotion and accomplishment displayed in this volume is tremendous. Whatever periods of lassitude or decadence have to be admitted, one cannot fail to be profoundly impressed by the extent and depth of influence exerted during these two generations by this single institution. In every department of human thought it has made itself felt not only throughout the United States but throughout the world, and has contributed to the enrichment of human life, the alleviation of suffering, and the advancement of justice and enlightenment. That it is, though the oldest, only one of many such institutions in our country working toward these ends is a matter for national congratulation and a source of comfort in these lean and troublesome times.

WILLIAM A. NEILSON

A Skeptical Biologist

The Sceptical Biologist. By Joseph Needham. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

AT present it is not popular to say, as Needham does in his stimulating book, that materialism is the life-blood of scientific thought, that a view of the world based solely on the achievements of scientific experience can only be materialistic. It has become a commonplace for philosophers and theologians desirous of making the world safe for the spirit to contend that the researches of modern physicists have destroyed the old-fashioned materialism of science by substituting electrical charges for atomic billiard balls, thus making matter less material. But "matter cannot be turned into spirit by making it thin." Scientific naturalism, postulating infallibility, may be forced to yield to the more mature judgment that the scientific method is merely a very useful fiction, a mental construct which is veridical but not veritable. Yet science remains incurably mechanistic, mathematical, and materialistic. As such, it is fundamentally antagonistic and contradictory to religion, which is equally fictitious and none the more revealed.

Needham, stressing the limitations of both the scientific and religious interpretations of life, would have us tolerantly grant equal tenability to both. But the two approaches must be judged not merely in terms of their metaphysical validity but also by their achievements. While science, fostering doubt and impatient of mystery, has gradually extended man's command over nature through its elimination of one charming anthropomorphism after another, religion, cherishing these very anthropomorphisms, has been ministrated by men who find it needless to inquire further because of their direct telephonic connection with omniscience. The religious emphasis on the sacred and the holy may give "demonic joy and dread" to individual mystics, but this is socially fruitless when compared to the power to manipulate nature's processes for the ends of man which science has promoted. Although Needham looks for unbounded benefits in the application of mathematics to all aspects of nature and is philosophically critical of contemporary religious institutions, he never contrasts the social efficacy of science and religion, and contends that to reject religious experience is "a futile bit of self-limitation."

But Needham would have religion stay in its place, and as a bio-chemist is vehement against its entering the laboratory in the disguised form of the neo-vitalism of Driesch and Haldane. In the most persuasive of his essays he disposes of vital forces, entelechies, and hormonic urges as irrelevant and useless in science and characterizes them as a modern company of vestals, all of which, like Bacon's final causes, are dedicated to God and are barren. BERNHARD J. STERN

Restoration Dramatists

Restoration Tragedy, 1660-1720. By Bonamy Dobrée. Oxford University Press. $3.

Thomas Killegrew. By Arthur Harbage. University of Pennsylvania Press. $3.

Brawny Wycherley, First Master in English Modern Comedy. By Willard Connely. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

FEW literary epochs so severely try the mettle of a critic as the period of the Restoration. The inherent charm of those mad and glorious years may predispose to an indulgence as misleading as the castigation of a modern academic Collier. The strange alloy of artificiality and profundity in the men of Dryden's world does not simplify the matter. Mr. Bonamy Dobrée, as students of the period know, brings to a discussion of Restoration drama knowledge both broad and exact, and to the expression of his incisive critical opinions a style at once urbane and laconic.

"Restoration Tragedy" considers a field perhaps less fruitful, certainly less known and understood, than that surveyed in the author's companion volume, "Restoration Comedy." Mr. Dobrée devotes four of his nine chapters to critical theory. In The Necessity for Heroism, and Restoration Criticism and the Trend of Writing he traces the conditions of life and letters that made inevitable the fixed, artificial substance and the self-conscious manner of Restoration drama. All the elements in the situation are considered, with more emphasis, however, on the theories of art held by dramatists and critics than on the literary antecedents of the plays themselves. Despite frequent and often extremely apt allusions to Jacobean and Caroline drama and to French classical tragedy, the total effect of these streams of influence is not clearly defined. The gist of Mr. Dobrée's sound conclusion on this phase of the subject he states in the final chapter:

> It is not by its form, but rather in the choice of material laid upon the form, that Restoration tragedy is condemned to a secondary place. The error arose through limiting the elements in human nature which were supposed fit for the purposes of art. This is always fatal . . .
>
> And in Restoration tragedy, instead of the content creating a form proper to it, romantic, that is to say immature, undisciplined passions were made to flow into a classical mold, with the consequent sense of discomfort we experience in many of these plays. One or two are superbly successful; here and there we find some adequate ones; but there is no large body of good work simply because the form does not correspond with the emotion.

In Chapters 3 and 4, Blank Verse and the Heroic Couplet, and Cleopatra and "That Criticall Warr," the special problems of versification and dramatic structure receive inspired summaries. Mr. Dobrée traces the rise of the heroic couplet out of the ruins of Elizabethan blank verse, its fall before the slow attack of a sentimentalism for which Otway and Rowe needed a softer medium, and the eventual defeat of this later, enervated blank verse in Addison's "Cato," written in rhymed measure "without the rhymes." The use of the unities is considered objectively by reference to Daniel's "Cleopatra," Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," and Dryden's "All for Love." Quite properly the author reaches no conclusion more dogmatic than that in each play the particular method employed accomplishes effects impossible by the use of the other.

In his discussion of the plays themselves Mr. Dobrée deals with the works of Dryden, Lee, Otway, and Rowe. A final chapter considers the "Mourning Bride" of Congreve and Addison's "Cato." If the impressionistic nature of this survey tends to emphasize some of the lesser phases, such as the weakness of Otway and the bombast of Lee, the treatment in general is sound and just. One is constantly grateful for the discretion, Addisonian in poise but not in timidity, that marks the author's critical statements. Of Dryden he says: "He was an artist because his eye and his mind were always on the object made . . ."; of Lee, "Had he lived today, he would, as one may guess, have joined the ranks of the expressionists . . ."; of Otway, " . . . had he lived he might have found a world for his own peculiar sense of fact, and disciplined the latter into material for art." Here is criticism factual in its base and imaginative in its scope.

Needless to say it is not Mr. Dobrée's purpose to supersede any or all of the general or highly specialized studies of the period. His book is for those whose knowledge of the field will enable them the more readily to realize the vividness of his comment and the soundness of his analysis.

A careful study and just appreciation of Killegrew has been long overdue, and it is especially fortunate therefore that a scholar of Mr. Harbage's quality has undertaken the necessary research. If his book lacks the graceful style of Mr. Dobrée's study, it is as sure in its learning. Mr. Harbage has written a straightforward biographical and critical study, painstakingly accurate in every detail and notably sane and objective in interpretation. The author traces the family of Killegrew from its known beginnings in such a way as to clarify many circumstances in the dramatist's life. No effort is made to condone the young courtier's practice of preying on the victims of uncertain justice, a practice through which the younger son of the Killegrews made his living. As willing as Mr. Harbage may be to face the ugly facts, however, he appears equally willing to justify Killegrew when research demonstrates that the dramatist has been unjustly treated. His dismissal from the Venetian embassy is shown to be creditable rather than disgraceful, and his reputation for excessive debauchery is proved to be unfounded.

The plays of Killegrew receive careful attention. Mr. Harbage has no illusions about their importance as stage pieces, but he does succeed in showing that Killegrew's dramas mark a step in the development from the late Elizabethans to the men of the Restoration, that they have autobiographical and historical value, and that Killegrew conceived of the stage in perspective long before D'Avenant wrote "The Siege of Rhodes." Excellent though the biographical and critical parts may be, however, the book lacks an adequate presentation of Killegrew's most important work, that done as manager of the King's Company. Mr. Harbage explains this omission by saying that the subject has been fully treated by Nicoll and Hotson, but the fact of the omission leaves the reader with the impression that the study is incomplete.

A book that Wycherley probably seldom read would tell Mr. Connely, in slightly different words, that one cannot serve both the scholar and the casual reader. Obviously well acquainted with his subject, the author presents a readable thought somewhat padded biography of a man whose only real distinction or claim upon the attention of anyone but the specialist rests upon the fact that he wrote two very important comedies, two less notable plays, and much inconsequential verse. As a focal point for a view of the period he is not typical enough of his age nor its literature. He was "first master" of "English modern comedy" (comedy of manners?) only if George Etherege be forgotten. No place appears in such a study as this for an estimate of Wycherley's real contribution—his use of the mordant satire and cruel cynicism he found in Jonson and developed. Wycherley must dance to the tunes of syncopated scholarship. But Mr. Thorn-Drury may feel some embarrassment at being called, in the introduction, "the final authority in England on the Restoration period." He knows that Mr. Nicoll, Mr. Summers, Mr. Dobrée, Mr. Brett-Smith, and Professor Saintsbury are still alive.

DONALD A. ROBERTS

Voices of the New Russia

Voices of October: Art and Literature in Soviet Russia. By Joseph Freeman, Joshua Kunitz, and Louis Lozowick. Vanguard Press. $4.

THE editors of "Voices of October" may merely have intended to give information about the art and literature of Soviet Russia, but they have written a very vivid account of the whole country. It is vivid because it appears to be without benefit of propaganda. The editors have not tried to evaluate this work or to exploit it; they simply tell who the writers and artists are, what the main groups stand for, what they think of each other, and what the government and people think of them. As the writers and artists of Russia are unusually interested in the life of the country, their conflicting opinions make a criss-cross of beliefs which yield the final effect of a photograph.

All the writers quoted are naturally in sympathy with communism. But evidently it is possible to criticize the achievements of the Bolsheviks, though perhaps not their ideals. After reading this résumé Russia appears, as one might expect, very like our own country. There is the same glamor in present Russia that there was in "building up the West." The Russians are experiencing the thrill of great factories and vast projects of education. There is the comedy of the young folks hastily inoculated with "Carlo Markov," who return to the small towns and villages to teach communism to their elders. And there are the town drunks who become chiefs of police.

The most interesting section of the book is that dealing with the writers. Immediately after the Revolution the government encouraged the people of every class to express their opinions on all topics of public interest. So there emerged the wall newspaper and contributors' columns filled with the naive reactions of people who had never before been allowed to express themselves. The Revolution has developed an admirable school of novelists and poets. The work of these writers reveals three main tendencies: heroic, pessimistic, and nostalgic. The first is represented by exceptional stories of war and industry and some fine, combative poetry; the second by the exquisite feelings of a large group of intellectuals who helped to promote the Revolution but whose sensibilities and ideals have been trampled upon by the people they liberated. The pessimism of this group is personal. Another pessimism is that of the puritan Communists, appalled by what seems at times the incorrigibility of human nature. The last group are "nature" lovers, people who thought communism would encourage a peacefully joyous and idyllic way of living. Though absurd, these writers express their nostalgia with talent.

Through its frequent quotations, the book gives an appealing picture of the mind and thought of the revolutionary leaders. These quotations mainly deal with art and literature, but it is difficult not to have faith in men of such vigorous style, and such straight and even humble thinking.

WALTER GUTMAN

Roger Williams Again

Roger Williams, Prophet and Pioneer. By Emily Easton. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THE most noticeable characteristic of this biography of Roger Williams is the small attention which is paid to religious controversy and the general absence of hero worship. For that, in certain Rhode Island and Baptist circles, the author will probably be accounted a heretic, since in those quarters there is a Roger Williams myth which is both widely accepted and devotedly cherished. Most biographers of Williams, like most historians of New England, have made much of him as a distinguished champion of religious liberty and a founder of American democracy. There is a sense in which he was both, but it is not the sense in which the ascriptions are often employed. Williams stood for freedom of conscience at a time when the right to such freedom had not the least chance of being generally recognized, and he established his settlement in Rhode Island on the basis of a brotherly love and mutual concession which his associates seem conspicuously to have lacked. Being in those matters not only an extreme individualist but also an irritating critic of his opponents, he naturally left no immediate following, and it remained for later generations to acclaim his personal attitude toward religion as a potent argument against theological or ecclesiastical authority, and to connect his tiny experiment in Rhode Island with the large practice of national self-government.

Miss Easton, however, lets the legendary Williams go his way, and devotes herself pretty strictly to telling the story of Williams's life. She passes lightly over Williams's controversy with John Cotton, keeps close to the record in recounting his experiences at Salem, Plymouth, and Boston, and wastes no space in discussing the patent of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations from the standpoint of political science or the development of American ideas of government. Apparently she has had in mind the reader who likes to have his history recalled to him, and we accordingly find a 65-page introduction on the London into which Williams was born, and nearly the whole of two chapters given over to Coke and Bacon, with the former of whom Williams read law. With these exceptions the book is straightforward narrative, well proportioned and eminently readable.

Broadly speaking, the book brings out little of importance that is new. Bereft of the halo of greatness which time has bestowed upon him but which no one in his day seems to have perceived, Williams stands out as an extreme individualist whose collisions with authority in church and state were inevitable, and whose conception of social organization was hardly susceptible of realization either then or later. He was as individualistic in his religious notions as he was in his views of politics, joining the Anabaptists in Rhode Island only to leave the sect in a few weeks, and disliking the Quakers although lamenting their persecution. William Bradford of Plymouth was not far wrong when he characterized Williams as "a man godly and zealous, having many precious parts, but very unsettled in judgment." His greatest distinction, next to his demand for liberty, was his humane attitude toward the Indians —an aspect of his life to which Miss Easton properly gives a good deal of attention. The spread of the ideas which he championed, and the contrast between the colony which he planned and the one that actually developed, are subjects that lie outside the scope of this book.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Philosophy of Aesthetics

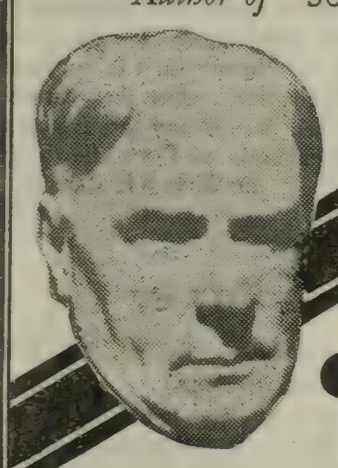
Aesthetic Judgment. By D. W. Prall. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $4.

A WRITER on aesthetics has a good deal against him. Artists and connoisseurs will shrug their shoulders as they would at any impertinent intruder who tried to tell them what they should do or feel, historians of art and specialists in physiology and psychology will laugh cynically, expecting to find unwarranted generalizations concerning matters of fact belonging to their own fields of research, and philosophers will speak condescendingly as toward one who has abandoned rigorous thinking in the proper spheres of philosophic study—logic and metaphysics—for hazy speculations regarding a seductive, but unfruitful subject. Mr. Prall has, I think, protected himself from the shafts of all such scoffers. He is himself so discriminating a connoisseur in many arts that if any of the professional initiates will read him they will be certain to recognize him as their peer; he has such a wide knowledge of the history of art and the relevant facts of science, yet such restraint in exhibiting and using this information, and he is so meticulous in his effort to think clearly and write exactly and avoid hypotheses, that the most empirical men of science and the most boastfully "scientific" philosophers will not discover much to criticize. At this last point, indeed, the chief limitation of the book is, I should say, a certain lack of boldness, an unwillingness or inability to offer a novel hypothesis in a field where there is a crying need for the brilliant idea, even if only half true, to illumine the exceedingly complex and subtle phenomena.

The underlying philosophy of the book is a blend of Croce's conception of "lyrical intuition" as the aesthetic fact with Santayana's doctrine of essence. "The beauty of anything," Mr. Prall writes, "seems then to be the delight in the object as directly apprehended, with no reference beyond this apprehended form or appearance." From this it follows that "the surface of all of our experience is aesthetic; that everywhere and at all times, the surface that our senses come upon may be dwelt on for what it is in direct intuition." So far the Crocean element, closely related historically to the perfectio cognitionis sensitivi of Baumgarten and the "disinterested interest" in the mere appearance of things of Kant. Having thus identified beauty in the primary sense with the delightfulness of the sensuous surface of our world, Mr. Prall assures us—and this is the contribution of Santayana—that "every beauty is eternally itself, eternal not as lasting through time, but as in its own nature what it is regardless of time, eternal in the simple and familiar sense in which a geometrical meaning is eternal, independent as to its nature and character of the exigencies of space and time, held to no place and no date to be what it is, as triangularity needs no place to occupy and no time to fill to be what it means anywhere at any time." Now with the general doctrine of es-

BACK FROM ANOTHER WORLD

Out from the enveloping darkness of insanity—across a borderland of vague shapes and shadows—the author vividly traces the progress of her struggle to regain reason.



"The Shutter of Snow" probes into strange things. Mrs. Coleman tells, in sensitive, impressionistic prose, of her extraordinary personal experience in an asylum for the insane.

THE SHUTTER OF SNOW . . . by EMILY HOLMES COLEMAN

Not merely an important case history in abnormal psychology, but a profound description of a human experience. Mrs. Coleman's impressions have been authenticated by leading psychiatrists. $2.50

THE VIKING PRESS
18 EAST 48th STREET -:- -:- NEW YORK

By NORMAN DOUGLAS
Author of "SOUTH WIND"

Good-bye To Western Culture

"THE book is written with all Mr. Douglas's skill of phrase; it glitters with his malicious wit; it is intensely readable. It compels you to think; it compels you to see the phenomena of European civilization from a new angle"—ARNOLD BENNETT.

$3.00 HARPER & BROTHERS

sence I have personally no wish to quarrel. I take it that Mr. Prall knows how to fit the eternal entities into our temporal experiences and to reconcile their universality with the uniqueness of individual intuition. I shall content myself with putting this question: whether such a static concept can take us far toward an understanding of the phenomena of natural beauty, so evanescent, so changeful, so dependent upon living personality and mood, or the phenomena of art which are, if not more akin, at least equally akin to moving passion as to the eternal. For explanation we need a more dynamic concept, and as we might anticipate the book offers rather descriptions of facts of beauty than explanations. If we are to retain the notion of essence in aesthetics, we must relate essence to passion, which Mr. Prall does not even attempt to do.

Despite this limitation in underlying philosophy, Mr. Prall's discussions are valuable throughout. In his preface he rather too modestly denies any claim to originality, offering his book as a text for college students that may also interest the general reader. To both these classes of readers the book has much to give, first in the way of relevant and important facts skilfully and delightfully presented; and second, through the contact which it provides with a mind that knows how to communicate its own finely cultivated and buoyant taste. It would be hard to find a book better adapted to arouse a dormant sense for the beauty of the "aesthetic surface" of life. And there are many pages in the discussion of the arts which the initiated also will read with pleasure. Of particular value is the conception of the standard of taste as being "not a quality, but a degree." The plan of the book is admirable. It begins with a few introductory chapters devoted to the definition and illustration of beauty, including a novel chapter on the Aesthetic Surface of Primitive Life; it then proceeds to an account of the elements and types of order, of sound, color, space, and time, which constitute the materials and possibilities of aesthetic surface; after which come chapters on the fine arts and a final philosophical chapter on Aesthetic Judgment and Knowledge in General. The pivotal chapter is Chapter X, where the author makes the transition from aesthetic surface, or the beauty of mere sense elements and patterns, to art in terms of a specific expressiveness given to surface by the definite purpose and technique of the artist. The argument to show that the significance of art cannot be limited to mere surface, or "form" as it is currently called, but must include the "specification" upon the aesthetic surface of "human feelings, emotions, desires and satisfactions" is utterly convincing and a good example of the author's insight and dialectic skill.

DeWitt H. Parker

The Ethics of Power

The Ethical Basis of Political Authority. By W. W. Willoughby. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

PROFESSOR WILLOUGHBY has the habit of writing important books. In this he reviews with learning and clarity preceding political thought and expounds (rather, as it were, intersticially) his own theory of the principles of political obligation. He demonstrates very effectively the weakness of that doctrine of natural and indefeasible rights which Jeremy Bentham called "nonsense walking about on stilts" and establishes the right of the constituted political authority to exercise such force as may be required in the light of its own conscientious judgment of the needs of the public weal. He is not quite equally enlightening about the nature of the duty of the individual to obey this authority. On this point, surprisingly enough, he seems to come near to accepting Professor Laski's doctrine of "my conscience against the world," which doctrine (a little misleadingly) receives an eponymous patron in Athanasius. The distinction between the private conscience and the rational conscience is not discussed. Nor is it clear whether Professor Willoughby limits the use of force to the national sovereign state, as that state is popularly understood today. It would appear that he admits a superior ethical claim of a world state, did it exist, but he does not discuss (as did Kant) except indirectly the ethical obligation of humanity to develop a world organization, or whether (which Bosanquet denied) unorganized humanity has any prior ethical claim over the national state. The general character of this excellent book is markedly more "liberal" than that of Professor Willoughby's more purely juristic treatises.

George E. G. Catlin

China in Revolt

The Chinese Revolution. By Arthur N. Holcombe. Harvard University Press. $4.

CHANGES are rapid in China, and so it is a tribute to this book that the events since its composition have so far fulfilled the author's implied predictions. But the book needs no such extraneous commendation. Its own careful and tolerant tone wins the reader at once, with all the abundant evidence that the care and the tolerance derive from a large knowledge of history.

From his historical perspectives Professor Holcombe can see present-day China without the despair and cynicism that even some Chinese observers have fallen into. He is able to correct the distorted views of foreign onlookers like Rodney Gilbert and Legendre, who proceed from the present disorder to a retrospective condemnation of the whole of Chinese civilization. Dr. Holcombe decisively disposes of their theory that the Chinese are inherently without political capacity. He reminds us that the Chinese had political capacity enough to maintain a greater empire longer and more firmly than Rome, which is presumed to be the political genius among peoples. Having disposed of this and other preconceptions, Dr. Holcombe proceeds upon his history, analyzing the old and the new institutions and explaining what has rarely been explained so well before—why the revolution, being a social and cultural revolution as well, must take so much more time than a political revolt. It is admirably done.

The genius of Sun Yat-sen dominates the tale. More effective as a dead saint than a living rebel, he has made it impossible for China to relapse into the days of the bandit generals. Even the most cynical militarists must fight in his name and be converted in the process. The downfall, first of the Parliamentary Republic, then of the Soviet Republic established by Canton was due, as Dr. Holcombe shows us, to their alienation from Chinese institutions. The present Kuomintang dictatorship is replacing the old Mandarinate, educated in the Chinese classics, with a new Mandarinate educated in the Western sciences. It looks to the continuance and further development of a responsible official class selected by the traditional Chinese system of competitive examinations and controlled by the traditional Chinese right of revolt and the traditional check of the censorate. The revolution is following the three stages that Sun Yat-sen predicted; the military phase and the period of tutelage to fit the people for the final stage of self-government.

An interesting commentary on the independence of this work is furnished by this legend on the copyright page: "The Bureau of International Research of Harvard University and Radcliffe College has aided the author in carrying on research and in publishing the results. The Bureau assumes no responsibility for any statements or views expressed."

Isidor Schneider

Books in Brief

Touch Me Not: Four Writs of a Curt Picaresque. By Vincent McHugh. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

This first novel is a book of finished and incisive writing, of great power, and of depth. It tells the story of the love of a boy of twenty for a girl of seventeen. The background of the novel is a vulgar and garish amusement park in New England, brilliantly and vividly sketched in, where Gil Blent and his college friend, Dane, have got jobs during the summer vacation. The friendship between Gil and Dane, and the whole portrait of Dane, are done with great beauty. If "Touch Me Not" falls short of what it might have been, it is because it is special and too intense; because it fails to achieve that indescribable thing, a sense of the universal, and because Mr. McHugh, as the book grows, tends to overstep the bounds of the inner probabilities and surrenders something to unbalanced emotionalism. But at its best one senses in this remarkable novel a hard and tempered mind guiding a strong and poetic creative power.

Eugène Sue. Par Paul Ginisty. Paris: Berger-Levrault. 10 francs.

Eugène Sue has experienced the extremes of popularity and vilification, of attention and neglect. There was a period when the workingmen of France regarded him almost as their god, and the intense hatred of the clerical party for him was so well known that at his death the suggestion that his enemies had poisoned him found not a little credence. The unexampled sale of his books excited the frank jealousy of Balzac, and yet the new "Britannica" allows him only a curt score of lines (it is interesting to note that they have cut their former note on him in two, whereas Balzac still enjoys as much space as ever, some six or eight columns). But Eugène Sue is by no means forgotten. There is still a sale for "The Mysteries of Paris" and "The Wandering Jew," and these are the only books of his which ever exerted a great deal of influence, although the influence of these two was tremendous. It is unfortunate that competent biographers have left him so completely alone that most readers know his life only from the spiteful narrative of the prejudiced monk-to-be, Eugène Mirecourt. Paul Ginisty has treated him more fairly and more ably, in a quiet little volume which is very little like his own noisy verbosity and perhaps not quite what one would have expected from a number in the series "les grandes vies aventureuses."

Deutschlands Aussenpolitik in der Nachkriegszeit. By Erich Koch-Weser. Berlin-Grunewald: Kurt Vowinckel Verlag. M. 2.50.

In this short and instructive review of Germany's post-war foreign policy the author points out that the Reich would probably have fared worse at the hands of the Allies had not the advice of Rathenau and Stresemann been followed to fulfil the Versailles peace treaty as far as possible. This course was adopted unwillingly and only under compulsion at first, but now it is being pursued voluntarily because the bulk of the German people realize that the way to better their condition and to lessen the hardships of the peace settlement is by appeasing and cooperating with their enemies and not by further resort to arms. The opening and closing chapters treat of the decline in Europe's economic importance since 1914, and of the policy that Germany should pursue hereafter. The great objects to be striven for, the author contends, are world disarmament, a closer understanding with France, the protection

I defy anyone to put down this book once he has started it. F WRIGHT MOXLEY is a literary find. Red Snow is a gigantic piece of concrete visionary writing, a burning satire --and a high tragedy, packed full of dark prophecies...the passions and fates of men and women under the shadow of extinction. It is ruin itself in terms of moving and symbolic prose. As far as I can see, the book's appeal is limited almost entirely to mothers, fathers, children and unmarried people We may sell a million copies, but I advise publishing it anyway..

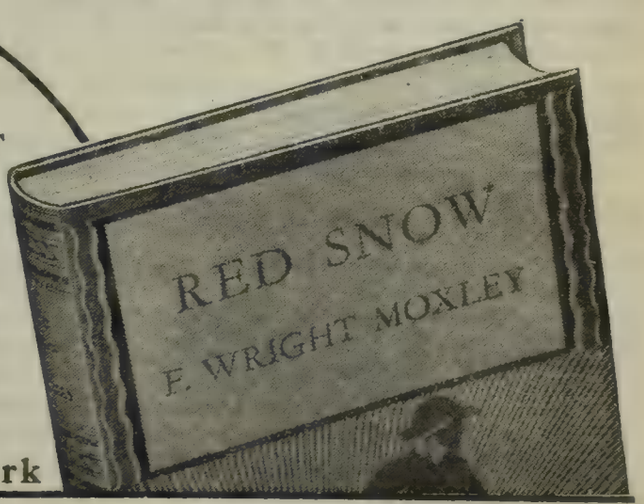
FROM AN EDITORIAL READER'S REPORT

On August 17, 1935, the sun is dimmed by a red cloud

9 months later the world's hospitals report —NO MORE BIRTHS

RED SNOW By F. WRIGHT MOXLEY

"In the same class as Job, Gulliver and Moby Dick." — N. Y. Herald-Tribune.



An INNER SANCTUM NOVEL Just Published, $1.00

Other New INNER SANCTUM NOVELS Now in Bookstores—$1.00

I Am Jonathan Scrivener by . . . . . Claude Houghton
Fifteen Rabbits by . . . . . Felix Salten
The Earth Told Me by . . . . . Thames Williamson
Denny and the Dumb Cluck by . . . . J. P. McEvoy
Casanova's Homecoming by . . . . . Arthur Schnitzler

At your bookstore, or direct from

SIMON and SCHUSTER, Publishers, New York

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □

"LYSISTRATA"

"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockridge, The Sun

FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre W. of B'way, Eves. 8:30 Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:30

THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS

The NEW GARRICK GAIETIES

GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

EMBASSY

THE NEWS REEL THEATRE

B'way and 46th Street — Cooled by Refrigeration — ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT — Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight

Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

DYNAMIC—DRAMATIC THUNDERBOLT!

The amazing cinema that swept Paris and Berlin.

"STORM OVER ASIA"

Directed by PUDOVKIM, producer of "The End of St. Petersburg."

New York Premiere FRIDAY, Sept. 5th

RKO CAMEO THEATRE 42nd & B'way

□ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT □

Plays to See

†Dancing Partners—44 St., E. of B'way.
‡Flying High—Apollo—W. 42 St.
†Lysistrata—44 St.—44 St., W. of B'way.
†Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45 St.
•The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47 St., W. of B'way.
‡The New Garrick Gaieties—Guild—52 St., W. of B'way.
†Topaze—Barrymore—47 St., W. of B'way.
•Torch Song—Plymouth—45 St., W. of B'way.

Films

Lincoln—Central—47 St. B'way
Love Parade, beginning Saturday, September 6; What a Man, beginning Wednesday, September 10—Little Carnegie—57 St., E. of Seventh Ave.
Melodie des Herzens, beginning Friday, August 29—8 St. Playhouse—52 W. 8 St.
Melody of the Heart, beginning Friday, August 29—5 Ave. Playhouse—66 5 Ave
Moby Dick—Hollywood—B'way and 51 St.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46th St.
Old English—Warner Bros.—52 St. & B'way.
Storm Over Asia—Cameo—42 St. & B'way.
What a Man, beginning Saturday, September 6; One Embarrassing Night, beginning Wednesday, September 10—Plaza—58 St., E. of Madison Ave.

• Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

of all national minorities, the peaceful readjustment of all badly drawn frontiers, and the realization of Briand's idea of a Pan-Europa. In Herr Koch-Weser's opinion these results can best be accomplished by enlarging the powers of the League of Nations so that it will be able to correct injustices instead of being, as heretofore, merely an instrument for the preservation of the status quo.

Our Biggest Customer. By George Harrison Phelps. Horace Liveright. $2.

This is a terrible book. An advertising man apparently devotes himself to a peppy exposition of the thesis that the laboring man consumes most of the goods produced in this country and that therefore something or other. Perhaps the book means something, but certainly one reader has been unable to discover what.

Contributors to This Issue

Allen B. MacMurphy is on the staff of the Waterbury Republican.

Alice M. Cameron has for several years been engaged in the work of the Workers' Education Association in an English manufacturing town.

E. C. Lindeman, of the New York School of Social Work, is a contributing editor of the New Republic.

Roswell Ward is a writer on architectural subjects.

Herbert Fordham is a New York lawyer.

Wilbert Snow is a New England poet, author of "Maine Coast."

Eugene Löhrke is editor of "Armageddon: The World War in Literature."

William A. Neilson is president of Smith College and associate editor of "The Harvard Classics."

Bernhard J. Stern is assistant professor of sociology at the University of Washington.

Donald A. Roberts is a member of the English department at the College of the City of New York.

Walter Gutman is at work on a book on modern art.

William MacDonald is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

DeWitt H. Parker is professor of philosophy at the University of Michigan.

George E. G. Catlin has recently published "A Study of the Principles of Politics."

Isidor Schneider is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

□ TRAVEL □

SOVIET RUSSIA

An extraordinary combination of low price and tour value for Students. $280 complete. The itinerary is fascinating.

Sept. 17 S.S. Berengaria.

Special October Sailings. Of particular interest is the special rate tour for the November 7th celebration.

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

175 Fifth Avenue, New York Algonquin 6656

The Japanese Trade-Union Bill

THE following article by Dr. S. Washio appeared in a recent issue of the Trans-Pacific, a weekly review published in Tokyo. It gives an account of the present status of the Japanese labor movement and of the circumstances surrounding the preparation of the trade-union bill recently put forward by the Home Minister of the Hamiguchi Cabinet.

In the past ten years the strength of organized labor in this country has increased from some 60,000 to over 300,000. Ten years have elapsed since a trade-union bill was first prepared by the government, but was not acted upon. Legislative action has lagged behind the actual development. It is clear that the trade-union movement can develop without a Trade-Union Act. The state comes into relation with it only when conditions call for state interference. Legislating prematurely would be as unwise as belatedly.

The present move, sponsored by Home Minister Adachi, appears to be serious and to have a good chance of realization if the Hamaguchi Cabinet can remain until the next session of the Diet. In the Home Minister's opinion the time is ripe and in the opinion of the Social Bureau of the Home Department, which drafted the bill, the present industrial depression is an opportune time to introduce a bill in the next Diet.

It is, however, contested by capitalists, who think that the attempt is gratuitous and harmful, especially under present circumstances when the country is going through the most difficult financial and industrial test. They fear that it may become an additional incentive to labor unrest, which is already bad enough owing to the necessity of lowering wages and other processes of readjustment.

Broadly speaking, the Home Minister's proposal cannot be called premature. Ten years have elapsed to bring it to maturity, but at the same time capitalists may be justified in thinking that introduced at present it amounts to a gratuitous provocation of labor unrest. Or the Social Bureau may be right. It will be right if the introduction of the bill can divert the attention of organized labor from industrial disputes to the political outlook for the bill itself. The capitalists, without exception, are opposed to the bill, while the opinions of the proletarian parties are divided. The left group, the Farm Labor Party, scorns it; the right wing, the Social Democrats, welcomes it on the whole; and the center bloc, the Great Proletarians so-called, is agitating for its own plan. The Home Minister says the bill is good since no one is entirely satisfied.

It is apparent, however, that labor is better satisfied than capital. It is as liberal a bill as labor can possibly hope for for long years to come. It is as liberal as the British Trade Union Act of 1913. It incorporates the British Trade Disputes Act of 1906 (freeing labor from indemnity for damage caused by trade disputes), which in Britain was obtained after the famous Taff-Vale case of 1902. It virtually permits professional labor leaders to become members of trade unions. Since professionals are interested in politics as well as in trade disputes, the funds of unions will naturally be used for political ends as well as for strikes. When funds are available they are even now so used.

That means that the British Trade Union Act of 1913 which grew out of the famous Osburn judgment is incorporated. It is even more liberal than the British Act, since it prohibits employers to discriminate against trade-union men. In a country like Britain where the trade-union movement is fully developed such a provision is not necessary. Labor can protect itself. But in the proposed Japanese bill this protection to trade unionism is to be accorded by legislative action in advance of actual development. In favor of this provision it may be said that it will minimize chances of trade disputes arising from employers' discriminatory actions. But it will, of course, be resented by capitalists.

These points, freeing labor from indemnity, the inclusion of professional labor leaders, and denying employers' freedom to discriminate against trade-union men, constitute the principal objections to the bill from the capitalists' point of view. But from labor's point of view these three principles are vital for the recognition of trade unionism. If Labor has to pay for damages arising from a strike, trade unionism as an influence against capital supremacy will be practically nil. The development of professional leaders is an automatic phenomenon. If they do not come from outside they will arise from within the rank and file of workers. It is obvious that trade unions, like any other organization, must be led and that in the light of the development actually taking place in this country leadership is political as well as industrial. The last is even more vital for the recognition of trade unionism. If this protection against discriminatory treatment is not accorded by legislative act, labor will fight for it anyway and it may be a long, bitter, and unnecessary struggle.

Capitalist objections will be more logical if not directed so much against the details of the bill as against trade unionism itself as an instrument of industrial dispute. And in fact it is against this role of trade unionism that capitalists are objecting. They say that it encourages class warfare. The first clause of the Home Minister's bill defines trade unionism as an instrument of bettering conditions of workers. Capitalists object to this clause. That is tantamount to objecting to trade unionism. They would like to substitute capital and labor harmonization societies for trade unions. But the Home Minister condemns this appeal of capitalists as reactionary and as an incentive to class struggle.

In other words, capitalists still stick to the so-called paternalistic conception of the relations between capital and labor, but the government, as represented by Mr. Adachi, whose main consideration is to weigh what effect his policy will have on elections, has outgrown that conception. His political vision is that paternalism is reactionary and unpopular. It is a significant development.

But the ultimate object of the state must be the harmonization of the relations between capital and labor. Trade unionism as an instrument of industrial dispute must, after all, be a transitory and secondary consideration. Unless it is going to lead to a proletarian revolution it must arrive at a new stage of harmonization between capital and labor. Each country must decide in the light of its own special industrial, social, cultural, and other conditions what method will be best adapted to bring about the desired end. There are great differences betwen this country and Britain not only in social and cultural traditions but in industrial structure and development. There are on the one hand great masses of workers still working according to the old tradition in industries that are little developed beyond the family scale. All agricultural and most manufacturing industries belong to this category. On the other hand, there are in Japan more nationalized industries than in any other country. The standard of living is also immensely different. A country where the population is still increasing at the rate of 700,000 a year cannot be talked of in the same breath with a country where the population has become stationary.

The old view may be losing ground. But there may still be something in it that is worth preserving and can be made to fit the changing circumstances. To say the least, it is not very ingenuous to follow blindly in the British footsteps. Why cannot trade unionism, as we know it in the long dark industrial history of Britain, be substituted by something nearer the desired stage we wish to bring about? The proposed bill is in advance of actual development in its liberalism. Why should we not go a step farther and draw up a program of harmonization?

But Mr. Adachi may after all be proposing the bill for his own gain and for his party in obtaining the credit for being liberal and not seriously expecting that it will have a chance to appear in the next session of the Diet. There is something mysterious in the abrupt way in which be began to advocate it. He is a political wizard.

It is very unlikely that the proposed trade-union bill will become law. It is very doubtful if it will have a chance to be introduced in the next session of the Diet. Even if it should be, and should pass the Lower House, it is almost certain that the Upper House will reject or shelve it.

We need not look so far ahead. The opinion of the Minseito itself is by no means unanimous in its favor. The Home Minister, Mr. Adachi, is now inclined to see the need of revising it. The opinion of capitalists is determined while Labor is not enthusiastic. The liberal part of public opinion supports it, but it is a lukewarm support amounting to no more than an academic interest at present. It is probably an academic interest more than anything else that inspired officials of the Social Work Bureau, who drafted it, and the Home Minister, who is not well versed in such matters, allowed himself to be tempted by the possible popularity which the bill might bring to his party. The chances of the bill becoming law are negligible.

Apart from this, the bill contains some suggestions of serious implication, and it is these suggestions that capitalists are afraid of. They are determinedly objecting to the general spirit of the bill, which does not prescribe forms of labor organizations to be recognized as lawful, and therefore admits by implication a kind of organization known as "industrial unionism," to which our labor movement will easily tend if left unrestricted. They further object to three points in particular: freeing labor from indemnity (article 13); allowing virtually the participating of professional labor agitators and brokers (article 10); and prohibiting discrimination against union men (articles 11 and 12).

Capitalist apprehension cannot be dismissed as altogether groundless. If this bill becomes law it is not unlikely that the labor-union movement will widely spread. The present strength of organized labor, which is 300,000, may in a few months jump up to 1,000,000. Nothing more than a simple procedure of registration will be needed to enrol union men entitled to all the major protections which labor has struggled for in other countries under incomparably more favorable economic conditions than in this country. All that is needed is labor canvassers, but they exist in abundance now. It will offer a fine field of employment for jobless intellectuals equipped with Marxian doctrines.

If such trade-union laws had existed, the recent Kanegafuchi strike would have become a general strike of all the cotton-mill workers throughout the country. The recent strike of car operators might also have become a general transportation strike throughout the country. Since the labor unions are to be created prematurely by a legislative act in advance of actual economic development, they would not have sufficient funds for strikes, which would not be orderly. They would try to achieve their object by breaking into sentimental demonstrations bordering on riot. That is the characteristic of Japanese labor strikes even now. While they are on a small scale and localized, their disorderly tendency can be effectively prevented, but what if the strikes become nation-wide? The general economic situation of the country does not offer much room for the general improvement of working conditions. The wider the extent of a strike, the less chance there is for material gain on the part of the workers involved.

This apprehension of capitalists is to be reckoned with. The defenders of the bill contend that disorderly tendencies are provided against by the peace-preservation law. They also point out that although discrimination against union men is prohibited no penal clause is attached. That is why labor is suspicious and the left wing looks scornfully at it. It amounts to no more than a moral exhortation, which capitalists would openly defy. If capitalists defy it and labor appeals to the government what can be done?

The defenders of the bill contend further that although the forms of labor organizations are not prescribed, the government is at liberty to dissolve any organization deemed injurious to peace (article 17) and that since unions are required to make a report of their financial conditions and membership (article 14) the government can exercise in this way a proper discriminatory treatment against objectionable organizations. Why does the state accord labor recognition and protection if it has no intention of abiding by it in practice? If the trade-union movement can grow automatically by its merit or power, there is no law in this country to prevent its growth. Either the proposed bill is an encouragement to labor at the expense of capital or it is meaningless. One presumable result of it will be a rapid spread of the trade-union movement. A weapon cannot be given without implying some encouragement for its use. Why should the government sow the seeds of trouble it is really anxious to suppress? Is not the proposed bill a blunder even considered from a purely technical point of view?

But the liberally inclined officials of the Social Work Bureau must have drafted the bill in good faith. They are surely not biased friends of labor. They meant no harm to capital. They are under the spell of Western liberal influence in advance of the actual development in this country. That is all. Liberalism is always justifiable as an abstract principle. Whether it is practically good or not depends on its probable practical consequences.

The test of the present case comes to this: will the bill stabilize the labor movement of this country in the direction of liberal development, or will it aggravate the present labor unrest? The defenders of the bill can abstractly make for it all the pleas of fairness, but it is hard to visualize what fair practical consequences will result from it. We must consider the practical situations in which the bill will react.

We know that labor is distrustful of rationalization and will oppose it wherever it can. We know that the moderate leadership of the old Japan General Labor Federation type is unpopular among the rank and file of workers and new professional labor leaders are revolutionists with Marxian doctrines at their finger tips, whose ardent belief is that capitalism is coming to an end. They are not so much interested in the particular material uplift of a section of the workers as in the general awakening of class-consciousness.

It is hard to imagine that liberal consequences will develop out of the bill applied to such practical situations. One way for liberalism to destroy itself is to attempt to put its ideals into practice too far in advance of the actual situation. If a Fascist revolution is contemplated in this country the proposed trade-union bill may be one effective way to bring it about.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1930 No. 3402

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 283
EDITORIALS:
Weighing European Union 286
Life Insurance 287
More Speed! 287
The Ideal Income 288
TWO YEARS OF FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT. By Ernest K. Lindley 289
REVOLT IN PERU. By Arnold Roller 291
WHERE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION FAILS. By Howard S. Cullman 294
SEGREGATION DE LUXE. By Gustavus Adolphus Steward 295
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 297
CORRESPONDENCE 297
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Last Instructions. By Virginia Moore 299
The Neurosis of Civilization. By Henry Hazlitt 299
More Thunder from Mr. Ludwig. By Eugene Löhrke 300
The Heir of Dickens. By Alyse Gregory 300
Kuno Francke. By Ernst Feise 301
Stage Englishmen at War. By Horace Gregory 301
Our Religious Heritage. By C. Hartley Grattan 302
Art in India. By W. Norman Brown 302
Books in Brief 303
Drama: The Career of Mr. Kibbee. By Heywood Broun 303
Films: Mr. Griffith's New "Epic." By Alexander Bakshy 305
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 306
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Reorganizing the Cotton Trade 307

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

PRESIDENT IRIGOYEN IS OUT, and martial law temporarily prevails in Argentina in place of a virtual civil dictatorship. The sequence of events seems to have been entirely in harmony with the rules of the revolutionary game. Irigoyen clung stubbornly to office until riots in Buenos Aires heralded the beginning of the end, then "resigned" under a favoring provision of the constitution and left his mantle with Vice-President Martinez, fled from the capital when revolt became nation-wide, was quickly overtaken, and wrote his resignation a few minutes after reaching the army barracks where he was confined. The one-day President, Dr. Martinez, went theatrically through the form of declaring that he would die rather than resign, only to capitulate when General Uriburu declined to make him a martyr. General Uriburu himself found his rule almost immediately challenged, but got the situation in hand shortly and put Irigoyen under arrest. With the downfall of Irigoyen goes also, apparently, the defeat of his party, and the transfer of political control to the conservative forces of aristocracy and wealth. The overturn is by no means wholly political and personal, however, for back of it lies a disordered economic life due to the world-wide depression in agriculture, industry, and trade, and a financial situation marked by currency depreciation and inflation which Irigoyen's policy directly aggravated.

THE OVERTURN in Argentina naturally occasions some perturbation in Great Britain because of the favor which Irigoyen, who heartily disliked the United States, had long shown to British capital and trade. Washington, on the other hand, is reported to breathe a sigh of relief at the eclipse of a ruler who was anything but a great and good friend. An intensified competition for Argentine trade and a still keener interest in loans on Argentine security are accordingly to be looked for. Politically, the aloofness of Argentina, joined to the outspoken resentment which its press has more than once shown, has undoubtedly been a chastening restraint upon American imperialism, but criticism, however much it may be justified, does not make for international amity. It will be interesting to see how Mr. Hoover deals with the question of recognition in the cases of both Argentina and Peru.

A HEALTHY and somewhat novel tone has run through the dispatches from Washington indicating the attitude of the State Department toward revolutions in South America. We do not intend any longer to attempt to deny the right of revolution to the countries south of us. We will wait to make sure that the revolutionaries are in control; then recognize them. This was the attitude of the United States in its early days—naturally, since the memory of our own revolution was fresh in the young national mind—but Seward, as rank an imperialist as ever ruled the State Department, began to diverge from it, under Roosevelt and Taft self-interest dictated the policy of recognition, and under Wilson the course was continued, covered by a veneer of principle. Mr. Hughes developed Wilson's doctrine into a rigid opposition to intervention which involved us profoundly in the internal troubles of several republics. Both Wilson and Hughes undoubtedly desired sincerely to contribute to the tranquillity of Latin America; but it is all too obvious that the policy failed. Liberals who approved Mr. Wilson's opposition to the tyrant Huerta must realize today that it would have been better to let Mexico solve her own problems, even though she solved them wrong. It is an old tradition to which Washington is now returning. Jefferson defined it as early as 1792 in instructing the American Minister in troubled Paris that "it accords with our principles to acknowledge any government to be rightful which is formed by the will of the nation substantially declared." Jackson made it clearer still in 1836 when, referring to Texas, he stated "that the uniform policy and practice of the United States is to avoid all interference in disputes which relate merely to the internal government of other nations, and to recognize the prevailing party eventually without reference to our own particular interests and views or merits of the original controversy." Wise words—good to apply today to Latin America, and Russia also.

SENATOR BARKLEY of Kentucky, returning after a study of the European situation, calls attention to the growing discussion of our new tariff in its relation to war debts. He looks for a readjustment of European tariffs against us, resulting, in connection with our own law, in a sharp restriction of American trade with Europe. "In England, France, Switzerland, Germany, Italy, and among the smaller states of Europe," says Senator Barkley, "I found in every circle with which I came in contact, official and unofficial, a profound feeling bordering almost on despair and even bitterness." The European political and industrial leaders interviewed by the Kentucky Senator simply cannot understand how we expect them to pay their war obligations at the same time that we make it as hard as possible for them to sell us anything so they may have the means to pay. Call the tribute reparations or war debts or what you will, if we will not let Europe sell, then Europe cannot pay. The burden of reparations and war debts is growing heavier because of the fall of prices. The growth of the load is bound to lead, and ought to lead, to further discussion of revision, and Americans will have to learn to think of international payments and trade policy together.

WHEAT HAS SOLD IN CHICAGO during the past week as low as eighty-one cents. In October of last year, with prices half a dollar above the present level, the Farm Board made the luckless declaration that prices were then too low. All efforts to keep them up, whether by private pools or by government agency, have necessarily proved unavailing in face of the golden flow that pours forth from the soil and in presence of purchasing power cut by business depression. Now with a heavy carry-over from the last crop year, the Department of Agriculture estimates world production for this year about 3 per cent greater than last year's good crop while Broomhall puts this year's increase at 6 per cent—and that in spite of the low prices prevailing since last spring. Low prices will in time bring less production and better prices. Farmers will turn to less unprofitable crops, and no greater disservice could be done American agriculture than to foster the notion that wheat prices here can be kept up without relation to world levels by government action, whether through "orderly marketing" or export bonus or whatever other method. Such an idea simply helps swell the overflowing production.

EUGENE MEYER, JR., was appointed governor of the Federal Reserve Bank by President Hoover on September 6—"a highly interesting selection," to quote the New York Times. Mr. Meyer has been continuously in government service since 1917, with the exception of the past year, having served as manager of the War Finance Corporation and chairman of the Farm Loan Board. His present appointment is being interpreted as meaning a probable continuation of what may be called the Mellon policies in Federal Reserve matters, which is by no means a reassuring prospect. The board today is generally blamed, just as it was blamed at the time by competent bankers, for its failure to take vigorous action to check the speculative mania of 1928-29, and the partisan political reasons for such failure are commonly known. It is, of course, easy to criticize the board, for its tasks are of almost inconceivable complexity, and every one of its important decisions is bound to hurt somebody. But the wise exercise of its enormous powers is of fundamental importance to the whole of our trade, our industry, and our agriculture as well; weakness is little less injurious than ignorance, and political purposes are anathema. If Mr. Meyer can bring into the operations of the board vigor and courage as well as sound judgment, and can at the same time exorcise the demon of partisan politics, we may conceivably see something of that economic statesmanship that has been so conspicuous by its absence during the years just past.

WILLIAM GREEN, president of the American Federation of Labor, in a formal statement foreshadowing the report of the Executive Council, denounces compulsory unemployment insurance as only one step from the dole, which he characterizes as paternalistic, demoralizing, and destructive. Instead, he favors voluntary unemployment insurance funds in seasonal industries, a shorter work day and work week, and a guaranteed yearly wage. This position is entirely consistent with official federation opposition to any except voluntary contractual arrangements. With the New York State Federation on record in favor of compulsory unemployment insurance, a vigorous fight may conceivably mark the Boston convention of the American Federation next month. "The best, the real remedy for unemployment," says Mr. Green, "is employment." Absolutely right, and the first step in any intelligent employment program is stabilization of industry. The program that does not put steady employment first courts disaster. But when industry will not or cannot provide the regular employment that Mr. Green rightly demands, does he propose to let men starve or to maintain them by charity? Unemployment insurance does not mean charity. It does not mean abandoning stabilization as the primary aim. It does mean that industry collectively must assume responsibility for the support of its workers even when it is temporarily unable to use them. Under present conditions it is hard to see how Mr. Green can oppose it successfully.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT continues moving to the left, as indicated in the article by Ernest K. Lindley which we publish elsewhere in this issue. He recently came out for unemployment insurance, and now he is urging New York towns on to further power wickedness. He has been visiting the village of Gouverneur, whose municipally owned power plant is now selling its surplus power of 50,000 kilowatt hours a month at one and three-fourths mills to a private company, which in turn retails it to the 4,000 inhabitants of Gouverneur at nine cents. The plant was built two years ago at a cost of $136,000, to light the streets and public buildings and pump water. According to the officials, it is saving the town $10,000 a year as it is, and will pay for itself in thirteen years; but if the village could retail its surplus power to its citizens at two cents, there would be an added profit of $11,000, while a five-cent rate (as against the private company's charge of nine cents) would pay all the costs of municipal government and leave Gouverneur tax free. The village officials believe that they cannot sell to private consumers without added legislation, but the Governor advises a direct appeal to the Public Service Commission for the requisite permit, suggesting that the village law and the public-service-commission law already give such authority. Public distribution of power in New York is now hindered by the lack of assured legal authority in municipalities. Unless local communities have authority, at need, to compete in distribution with private companies, there is no way of making rate control genuinely effective. With the St. Lawrence Power Commission actively at work, the Governor is thus taking the next step forward in the power fight.

WE COMMENTED lately on the sharp rebuke given by the Mandate Commission of the League of Nations to Great Britain, and on Mr. Henderson's return rebuke to the commission. "You were responsible," said the commission; "so were you," said Mr. Henderson. And the cause of Palestine, perhaps, was not much advanced by the exchange. But there is another aspect of this tart talk which deserves attention. It was the first serious reprimand yet given by an organ of the League to one of the major Powers. Toward Greece and Bulgaria the League has been severe; when Italy was the offender, in Corfu, it hesitated and sidestepped; it let the French outrages in Syria and the British abuses of power in what used to be German Southwest Africa go. The Mandate Commission has, once or twice, provided a forum for international discussion of the administration of those disguised colonies known as mandated territories; but never before has it come out so publicly before the world in denunciation of the conduct of a Great Power. That is a striking and profoundly encouraging phenomenon. Perhaps a time may yet come when the words of the Covenant, the authority for the mandates, will acquire real meaning: those words, hitherto such a tragic farce, that

> To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the state which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization.

THE COMPLETE FAILURE of the negotiations between the Indian government and Mahatma Gandhi means the definite wrecking of the round-table conference scheduled for next month in London. The Indian Office has announced that the conference will be held as planned; yet it is plain that no real settlement can be reached without the agreement of Mr. Gandhi, whose terms, steadily adhered to by him for months, the government has flatly refused. The past six months have brought such defections from the ranks of the Moderates to the Nationalist cause that it is doubtful what persons of any importance, in addition to the fourteen princes representing so-called independent states, will even attend the conference. In another provocative speech Winston Churchill reproaches the government for negotiating at all with Gandhi, yet there is some truth in his unfair statement: "By imprisoning him without trial the government has won for Gandhi the sympathy of millions. By supplicating him they have informed those millions how much they fear his power." In fact Lord Irwin's government did the only possible thing in negotiating with the prisoner of Yerovda; he holds the power, and they know it. Their difficulty is well indicated by the grim comment of Lord Rothermere's Daily Mail: "In India we must govern or go, and we don't intend to go, despite Lord Irwin and his friends." The government is reported as hoping that the suffering occasioned among the Indians by the boycott and consequent economic disorganization may detach Gandhi's more moderate followers from their leader; but these Indians have hitherto displayed a strange eagerness to suffer for their cause.

PRINCE SIXTUS of Bourbon-Parma—the name awakens echoes. Today he is reported negotiating for the return of a Bourbon prince to the throne of Hungary; in 1917 this brother of the ex-Empress Zita played a more pleasing role. He was negotiating for the peace of the world. A sister invited him, an officer in the Belgian army, to Switzerland; the king and queen of Belgium lunched with him before he left. In Switzerland he met the Austrian emperor's personal envoy, and returning from this traffic with the enemy he was received by M. Poincaré at the Elysée in Paris. Not only that, but he went back, in full war, with a message to Charles. From France to Switzerland again, and across the border into Austria; by automobile at night to the imperial park, and up a back stairs to the emperor himself. Back to Paris, where he met two successive French prime ministers, M. Poincaré again, and to London to see Lloyd George and the British king; and back to Vienna, and back to Paris again. It is one of those little romances of war time that conventional historians prefer to neglect. For in the early months of 1917 the war might have been ended. Charles promised Austrian aid in regaining Alsace-Lorraine for France; neutrality regarding the Dardanelles; full restoration of Belgium; even some territorial compensation for Italy. But the negotiations failed because Ribot and Lloyd George felt they must stand by their secret promises to the Italians and win bigger loot.

THE SEA IS STILL a place of mystery and of adventure. Thus at Brest extensive operations are going on to rescue a treasure ship, the liner Egypt, which went down eight years ago with five millions of gold and silver in her cargo. Divers are busy, cranes are dragging at the submerged strong room 400 feet under the surface of the Atlantic. It reads like fiction but, to the marine underwriters who paid claims for the loss of the Egypt, it is a fairy story that is about to come true. As romantic is the story of the sinking of the liner Tahiti, written for the New York Times of September 7 by John Sullivan, one of the passengers. Stewards quietly ordered passengers on deck with life preservers at 5:30 on the morning of August 15; the rescue to the steamship Ventura was not effected until fifty-odd hours later. During that time food was scarce and water brackish, passengers were forbidden to go to their cabin, to undress, or go to bed, the crew bailed without stopping, the ship listed, the seas swept her. Yet, says Mr. Sullivan, not the slightest hysteria or panic was seen. Everybody was calm, patient, often cheerful. Even a lady with three children, one of whom had the whooping cough, was unfailingly gallant. Last but not least comes word of a rusty tin can that floated the other day into the harbor of St. Petersburg, Florida, bearing word of the mysterious vessel Commodore which drifted, black and empty, into New York harbor about thirty years ago. The newly found note, dated March 21, 1899, asks help for the wrecked ship Commodore. Who wrote the note, and where, and after what harassing experience? Another mystery of the sea.

Weighing European Union

THE Briand proposal of a European federation has had at least one useful effect: it has provoked a widespread discussion marked by a healthy difference of opinion. Some of the comments, as in the case of the Italian, German, and British replies to M. Briand's questionnaire, have offered searching criticisms of particular features of the plan or of the assumptions upon which it seemed to rest, while others have suggested alternative arrangements of more limited scope. Generally speaking, there appears to be no invincible opposition to the idea, but it is clear not only that the project is not to be swallowed whole or without careful study of what acceptance may imply, but that it may also be necessary to go to the roots of the existing political situation in Europe before any plan with a political character can be assured of general support.

The most serious criticism of the Briand plan thus far made is that it assumes the continuance of the political arrangements ordained by the Versailles treaty. Premier Mussolini has declared that the peace settlement is unsatisfactory, although he has not indicated wherein it should be revised. The German Government has raised the same issue, and the belief that Germany is bent upon revision has been deepened by the recent speeches of Dr. Gottfried Treviranus, Minister of Occupied Areas in the German Cabinet, denouncing the Polish corridor as a standing affront to Germany and predicting that the lands lost to Germany will some day be retaken.

It has been generally assumed that the peace settlement, misguided and vengeful as some of its provisions are now seen to have been, would have to be accepted in perpetuity because of the insuperable difficulty of changing it. The assumption, it should be pointed out, does not apply with equal force to all parts of the Versailles treaty. Some things, it must be admitted, cannot well be changed. No one would seriously urge that any of the new states which the Peace Conference created or recognized in Eastern Europe should now be deprived of their sovereignty. The reparations settlement of the Young Plan cannot with propriety be torn up now, whatever its fate may be at the hands of a later German generation that knows the World War only as fateful history. Certain territorial readjustments, on the other hand, could be made without throwing Europe into chaos or depriving the former Allies of any important fruits of their victory. Even the Paris negotiators knew that the Polish corridor was a fantastic anomaly, and that a guaranty to Poland of free-port privileges at Danzig needed no control of an illogical strip of hinterland to support it. The Polish corridor should certainly be abolished and the territorial connection between East Prussia and the rest of the Reich restored. The retention of Eupen and Malmédy by Belgium has nothing to commend it, the enforced demilitarization of the Rhine zone is only an irritating reminder of German defeat, and poverty-stricken Austria may well be allowed to unite with Germany if the peoples of the two countries so desire.

In so far as the acceptance of the Briand plan or some modification of it depends upon first allaying German resentment, we have here four points at which justice can be done whenever the former Allies are willing to do it. The other difficulties that have been raised, while also in part political, concern mainly the form or scope of the Briand plan and the relations between a European union and the League of Nations. The International Juridical Union, an unofficial body of statesmen, diplomats, and lawyers, has come forward with a recommendation that the proposed union should not be a political affair in the strict sense, but that it should be formed within the framework of the League without intruding upon League functions or duplicating League activities, and that it "should not prohibit the formation within its scope of regional groups."

On the other hand, a special committee of the European Customs Union, another unofficial organization, has just advanced a proposal for the creation of two commissions to formulate plans for developing and regulating European internal and external trade (the latter including trade with Great Britain and Ireland) and lowering or abolishing the present customs barriers. This proposal, which appears to have grown out of the World Economic Congress at Geneva, in 1927, and the agitation for a European customs union which Count Coudenhove-Kalergi has for some years been carrying on, looks to the replacement of "the present chaotic condition" of trade by an organization which shall control both production and sales, and contemplates the eventual development of something that can be called a European market. The committee emphasize the necessity of making clear that the organization of such a market would not be directed against any single state or group of states outside of Europe.

It seems a reasonable guess that neither the Briand plan nor any of these alternatives will emerge intact from the renewed discussions at Geneva. Any plan that is adopted will almost certainly be a compromise. Thus far, representatives of twenty-seven nations at Geneva have decided to put the question on the agenda of the Assembly, but only after Arthur Henderson had won the British fight to keep any new union "in complete agreement with the League of Nations." Meantime, an interesting measure of cooperation is being attained through trade treaties and regional agreements. Rumania, for example, has just concluded treaties with Great Britain and France which open markets for Rumanian raw materials and French and British manufactures, and a convention between Germany and Poland is designed to end a disastrous competition in the rye trade with Scandinavian countries. An understanding is reported to have been reached at Warsaw between Poland, Rumania, Czecho-Slovakia, Jugoslavia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Latvia, and Esthonia looking to the elimination of export bounties on agricultural products and, with the aid of the League, to a general amelioration of competitive conditions in agricultural trade. The recent Russo-Italian commercial convention is another case in point. With such foundations already laid, it is possible that some larger scheme of economic cooperation may in time be worked out and the idea of a political union allowed to wait.

Life Insurance

ONCE or twice within the last year we have noticed certain facts about the life-insurance companies of the United States which somewhat dim the glory of the $110,000,000,000 coverage which their 95,000,000 policies provide for 70,000,000 of us. In the September issue of the American Mercury Abraham Epstein, executive secretary of the American Association for Old Age Security, presents so thorough an exhibit of existing insurance evils that they can no longer be lightly ignored.

Mr. Epstein begins by recalling the insurance scandals disclosed in 1905 by the New York legislative commission of which the chief counsel was the present Chief Justice Hughes. That investigation disclosed, among other things, the following outstanding abuses in the private insurance business: (1) Nepotism, (2) excessive salaries for high officers as against starvation wages for clerks, (3) extravagant costs of writing insurance, (4) an excessive rate of lapses, (5) control of legislation and public opinion by the expenditure of large sums for lobbying. Mr. Epstein finds that outside of the last evil, the possible extent of which is unknown, all the other evils are not only being perpetuated today, but that their extravagances are more appalling than ever.

In 1928, the year for which the latest reports are available, Darwin P. Kingsley, president of the New York Life Insurance Company, received a salary of $126,600. The president of the Metropolitan Life in 1928 was the late Haley Fiske, who drew $200,000. Frederick H. Ecker, now the president of the Metropolitan, in 1928 drew a salary of $175,000 as vice-president. Mr. Epstein shows that altogether eighty high officials of the larger insurance companies received a total salary of $3,492,000 in 1928. Contrasted with these life-insurance salaries, the presidents of the New York Central and the Pennsylvania railroads, with five and eight times the number of workers employed by the Metropolitan, received respectively only $53,550 and $57,600. The insurance prosperity shared by the higher officials apparently never quite reached the clerical staff. Late in 1927 it was stated that "a large percentage of the girl clerks start as low as $12 per week and rise from that to $16 weekly at the end of three years, while bookkeepers' salaries run from $18 to $25, rising to a maximum of $33 weekly between the tenth and twentieth year of service."

More serious than this from the point of view of the policy-holders has been the extravagant cost of writing insurance. During the 1905 investigations Vice-President Tarbell of the Equitable testified that the first year's commissions paid to agents on ordinary insurance amounted to about 60 per cent of the premiums and that the commissions on renewals ranged from 7½ to 10 per cent. A little over a year ago the superintendent of the New York State Insurance Department made a study of insurance acquisition costs. He found that the acquisition cost in ordinary insurance was 48 per cent for forty-seven New York companies, which are limited in their expenditures by law, and 75.5 per cent for 215 companies not authorized to do business in New York. The renewal expense rate was 14.3 per cent for the companies writing insurance in New York and 23.4 per cent for the other companies investigated.

Perhaps the gravest of Mr. Epstein's charges concerns the existing rate of insurance lapses. He finds that even in ordinary insurance, for every policy maturing more than two policies are either surrendered or lapsed, involving either complete or partial loss to the policy-holder; while for every dollar maturing, nearly three dollars is either surrendered or lapsed. The story of industrial insurance is even more astonishing. Of the nearly 72,000,000 industrial policies outstanding in 1928, fewer than 1,000,000, totaling $210,000,000, matured; whereas 1,760,000 to the sum of $317,000,000 were surrendered, and 5,802,000, valued at $1,594,000,000, were lapsed.

Writing in the Weekly Underwriter, Henry E. Niles attempts to answer Mr. Epstein's charges. He remarks that the $200,000 paid to the president of the Metropolitan is "less than one-tenth of the income of the Metropolitan for a single day"; he makes no similar comparison with the low salaries of the clerks. He holds that Mr. Epstein has made various misrepresentations; that, for example, he has compared commissions alone on old business in 1905 with "commissions and all other old business expenses" in 1927, and he asserts that if we compare the renewal premium income to the renewal commissions paid by companies operating in New York State we find that such commissions are less than 6 per cent of the premiums as compared with Mr. Epstein's figure of 14.3 per cent. Mr. Epstein quotes President Ecker of the Metropolitan as having testified that 85 per cent of the industrial policies lapse in the first year. What President Ecker actually testified, replies Mr. Niles, is the very different thing that "85 per cent of the lapses occur in the first year."

Mr. Niles's report seem to us to blunt the effect of some of Mr. Epstein's charges without reducing their essential seriousness. Insurance under private control in this country is not a matter that we can afford to feel smug about.

More Speed!

IN England a speed limit for motor vehicles has just been abolished by the passage of the new traffic bill; and at the same time we read that eleven of the American States have no legal speed limit, and twelve more, in 1929, increased the maximum speed at which a car may be driven. In these places where there is no specified rate of speed a driver may be arrested for reckless or foolhardy driving at any speed; which means that the legal machinery in these matters is merely being adjusted realistically to what is taking place on the roads every hour. If we kill 30,000 persons a year with automobiles in the United States—as last year we did—which is at the rate of about one person to every thousand cars, we are nevertheless determined to drive faster and ever faster. The old days of driving at twenty to thirty miles an hour are vanishing, even in cities. In New York to drive at the legal rate of fifteen miles an hour would invite a rebuke for obstructing traffic. Forty is the speed now, or fifty. At the same time that our cars are equipped with more powerful engines and stronger brakes, our roads are smoother, better graded, freer of dangerous curves. They invite the swift, long rush of the motor. And the motor is eager to respond.

It will be interesting to watch the results of this new system of abolishing a speed limit. It is plain that there are times when to drive at a speed of twenty-five miles an hour would be to invite disaster. On a straight, little-traveled, properly built road no sensible law would demand such a rate of speed. Yet it is true that whether or not it is due to our increasing rate, our motor fatalities are rising sharply every year. And it is equally true that on one of the main arteries leading into New York City, a highway almost twenty miles long, a maximum speed of thirty-five miles an hour is quite generally maintained. The road is heavily policed. One would like to know the cost to the city of maintaining this rate, the comparative number of accidents with other highways of similar length—and then compute the cost of policing the many hundreds of thousands of miles of roads all over the country on which cars roll twenty-four hours a day. It is evident that an effective police threat is necessary to maintain a moderate rate of speed. A simple regard for public safety will not do it.

There are, of course, other possible checks on reckless driving beside the policeman on a motor cycle. A thorough and careful reorganization of the system of licensing drivers would be one. As it is, a man or woman entirely unacquainted with the functions or limitations of a gasoline engine may, after a few tries and a perfunctory test, receive a legal permit to take this engine, pulling a couple of tons of metal and anywhere from one to six human beings, out on the public highway in competition with any number of other engines similarly equipped. In some States of the Union no driver's license of any sort is required. Not even the perfunctory test stands between the public and a reckless or incompetent driver. No schoolboy with a book knowledge of rods and levers would be permitted to take a high-powered locomotive from one station to another. But he may take a motor car through the heaviest city traffic if, in some localities, he has attained to the ripe age of sixteen. And if he violates some rule of the road and it happens to be seen by a traffic officer he is fined from three to five dollars and allowed to go his way. A recent analysis of the causes of 100,000 accidents which took place in 1929 shows that in the main they were due to "road hogging." For this no speed law is an adequate remedy. A remaking of the human spirit is required. A third of the accidents studied were due to what is called right-of-way theft—one driver driving in the lane that belongs to another. And since this may so easily come under the head of foolhardy driving, it is properly dealt with by a law that recognizes no speed limit but only recklessness.

